"I regret that you should listen to me, my prince, from such a motive. But still I will try to persuade you to adopt my scheme. Believe me, my prince, when I say I have thought long and earnestly upon the subject, since it is an important one, not only to me, but to you, and all here present. You, as I do, must know full well that our ultimate capture and inevitable death is certain. It will, in all probability come upon us to-morrow, unless something is done to entirely change the current of events."

"I do not dispute that," replied Charles. "I expect to see them come. I have fully made up my mind to it. But we will meet them. We will each draw our swords, and fight to the last gasp, and if we fall, as doubtless we shall, it will not be until we have left our mark upon more than one of our foes. They shall slay us in fair fight if they can, but I will never gratify their malice by allowing myself to fall into their hands a prisoner, and all who are here, I feel certain, will defend me so long as a drop of blood remains in their veins."

CHAPTER CCIX.

THE YOUNG HIGHLANDER PERSISTS IN HIS DETERMINATION OF DYING TO SAVE HIS PRINCE.

THERE are certain times when a man can, by his voice and animated actions, command the involuntary admiration of his fellows, and rouse their enthusiasm to its utmost pitch.

So it was with the Young Pretender on the present occasion.

His auditors were, without exception, men who looked up to personal bravery as being the most estimable quality a man could possess.

Therefore, they listened with kindling eyes to the heroic sentiments he expressed, and when he finished they were all dominated by the same feelings as he was.

The young highlander, however, who had showed himself so much attached to the cause of the Stuarts, waited until this sudden outbreak of excitement had passed away.

Then he again spoke.

He commanded great and immediate attention.

"Prince," he said, "the words which you have spoken to me, and the manner in which you have listened to what I said, has had the effect of making me bold, and"——

"Do not apologize," said the Pretender; "you will please me best by speaking freely."

"And should I say that which will offend you, will you forgive me?"

"Freely."

"Then, prince, it is this. I do not wish for a moment to detract from your bravery, or those others present, but as you say, and truly, we shall all perish; now, let me ask you whether it would not be better for one to suffer in order that the others might escape?"

"And would you be that one?"

"I would, prince, with your permission."

"And in order that the others might be saved you are quite willing, young as you are, to quit life?"

"My life, as I have said, is devoted to your service, and to put you beyond the reach of your enemies I would sacrifice it with the utmost gladness."

"This surpasses all belief."

"Not so, prince; I have thought the matter deeply over, and I am sure that I could so arrange it that, though my life will pay the forfeit, yet your safety will be assured."

"How?" asked the Pretender; for it cannot be denied that he wished to save his life, but was reluctant to do so at the cost of another's. "How, my friend? tell me!"

"Thus!" said the young highlander; and as he spoke the word, he drew, with inconceivable rapidity, a poniard from its sheath.

It flashed for a moment in the air; and then, before any one could interpose, or even anticipate his design, he plunged it into his breast.

The prince started to his feet, and the ejaculation of horror which burst from his lips was echoed by the others, who, out of respect, had remained silent spectators of the scene.

"What have you done?" asked the prince. "What have you done?"

"My duty," replied the highlander; and as he spoke he drew the dagger from the wound, and threw it to a remote corner of the cavern.

The blood gushed in incredible quantities from the orifice.

Then he sank down upon one knee at the Pretender's feet.

"My dear prince!" he cried; "I die, in order that you may live, and my comrades escape. On the battle-field I was willing to risk my life for you, and shall I begrudge it now, when I know how great a gainer you will be by my decease? Forgive me! par—!"

His strength was ebbing from him fast, and he was unable to complete the sentence; but, with the last effort of expiring nature, he caught the hand of Charles Stuart between both his, and pressed a fervent kiss upon it.

Then he relaxed his grasp, and would have fallen backwards on to the hard flooring of the cavern, had it not been for the support Dick Turpin's arm afforded—for the highwayman sprang forward in time to save him.

"Let me lie down!" gasped the young man, feebly. "Let me lie down! I shall be better then. Let me lie down!"

Dick did not hesitate to comply with the request.

The wound, he felt certain, from the quantity of blood that had in so short a space of time effused from it, must be a mortal one.

Consequently it could matter little whether he remained in an upright or decumbent posture.

"The prince," said the young highlander, in a yet fainting tone of voice, "the prince!"

"I am here," replied Charles Stuart, and as he spoke he knelt down by the fast-dying youth, and took his hand.

"Forgive me, my dear prince," he said, "forgive me for my disobedience. Believe me, it is better that I alone should die than you should all perish. Do not shake your head. What I have done cannot now be undone, and do not let me die with the consciousness that I have so deeply offended you as to be unable to obtain your forgiveness."

"I forgive you freely," replied the Pretender, in a broken tone of voice, for naturally he was deeply touched by this great proof of devotion to his cause. "I forgive you freely."

"Then I shall die panglessly. Are you sure, my prince, that I have your full pardon."

"Quite; but yet do not think that I approve of your rash act, for to do that would be impossible."

The highlander sighed deeply.

"Well—well," he said, "I suppose I must remain content. But ere I die, listen to what I have to say. You will listen, will you not?"

"Certainly."

"Bend down closer, then, my prince, for to speak in so loud a tone as I have just done, exhausts me."

The Young Pretender, in obedience to the wish which his dependant expressed, bent his ear yet nearer to his lips.

"I have thought long and deeply upon what had best be done, my prince, and so I trust you will listen with what patience you can command, to what I am about to say. When the idea of personating your royal highness first found a place in my mind, I felt almost certain that you would never consent to it, but I determined, nevertheless, to carry out my intention."

"Rash youth."

The speaker did not heed this ejaculation, but continued—

"As we all know well, my prince, the ordere of the savage and unscrupulous Duke of Cumberland to all his soldiers are that when you are discovered by any of them, they are not to attempt to spare your life, but slay you without mercy. That very order, cruel as it seems, my prince, will turn out to your advantage, and to his defeat."

"How so?" asked the Pretender, for he could not help feeling a deep interest in what was said.

"I will tell you. Great as may be the resemblance between us, so far as our faces and complexion are concerned, yet that resemblance extends not to our bodies. I have known harder service than you, and my body is more muscular; it may be that I am altogether stouter built. At any rate, if they saw my body, the cheat we wish to put upon them would be almost certain to be discovered. Do you not think so, my prince?"

"I do."

"I am certain of it; but our enemies play into our hands, and that which would have been impossible becomes the easiest matter in the world."

"In what way? Explain yourself. I do not yet understand you."

"When I am dead—which will be in a few minutes now—I must request you to do something more, or I shall have died in vain. Surely that is not worth while! Promise me to accede to my request!"

"What is it?"

"Promise me!"

"I do. Speak!"

"It is this. As soon as I am dead, let some one draw his sword and sever my head from my body. Do not start and look so horrified! I shall not feel it. You have promised, and I rely upon you to keep your word. Do not delay me, for I feel that I am sinking fast, and I have yet much more to say."

"I am listening," said the prince, mournfully.

But the young highlander was almost exhausted.

By making a great effort, however, he rallied himself, and went on, though his voice now was little better than a hoarse whisper.

"Let some one sever my head from my shoulders. You understand me, do you not? That head, my poor head, will be worth thirty thousand pounds! My prince, that sum of money will be of the utmost service to you. Therefore, let some one upon whom you can depend carry my head to the Duke of Cumberland, declare it to be yours, and obtain the reward which is offered for it. I will defy them to detect the imposition, unless there should be someone there who is very intimately acquainted with you indeed.

The boldness of the plan which the young highlander thus unfolded, filled the prince and the highwaymen with admiration.

As for the highlanders, they stood looking on mournfully, for in the morning when, after his descent from the mountain, he had called them aside and one by one spoken to them, which circumstance it will be remembered had excited the suspicions of Dick Turpin, he had told them his scheme, and while some admired his bravery, all had endeavoured to dissuade him from it.

"Prince, prince," he cried, so feebly, that had not the cave and those within been profoundly silent, his voice would never have been heard; "do you comprehend my plan? Let my head be taken to the Duke of Cumberland, and passed off as yours! Let the reward be claimed. It is a large amount, and when it is obtained, let it be handed to you, to do with as you think fit. Thus will you be doubly revenged upon your enemies! You will be able to escape, and obtain the thirty thousand pounds as well. Can you hear what I say?"

"Quite plainly. But your voice shows me that your death is hastening on with rapid strides. Oh! for a priest to grant you absolution for the sin you have committed ere you die!"

"Do not think of that, my prince. To obtain a priest here is utterly impossible, but I shall die with the conviction on my mind that if ever any one was justified in committing self-destruction, I was, and that the motive will sanctify the deed. I am dying now, my prince. I feel myself growing cold, and things fade away from my view. Promise that I shall have my wishes carried out—promise that I shall not die in vain?"

"I promise!" said the prince.

"A smile lighted up the face of his devoted servitor, but either from a sudden pain, or from a remarkable fixity of purpose, he banished it, and assumed an expression of extreme anguish.

It might have been that, even in his last moments, he thought of still further imposing upon his foes, for, with the same look upon his features, he drew a gasping breath, a convulsive shudder overspread his body, and he expired.

CHAPTER CCX.

DICK TURPIN AND CLAUDE DUVAL CUT OFF THE HEAD OF THE YOUNG HIGHLANDER.

For several minutes after the young highlander thus drew his last breath, no one in the cavern either spoke or moved.

All were deeply impressed with the solemnity of what had just taken place, and that mysterious influence which the presence of a dead body never fails to produce, was shared in the full by all.

Prince Charles was the first to break the kind of spell by which their faculties were enchained.

He rose from the kneeling posture, which at the request of the now dead man, he had assumed.

The others, however, did not presume to move or speak, but waited with no inconsiderable degree of curiosity and interest to see what he would say or do next.

They were not long kept in suspense.

Drawing back a few paces from the corpse, round which the highlanders and our friends had rather closely congregated, the young prince spoke.

Without exception, his words were listened to by every one with the most profound attention.

"My friends," he said, "it seems that you all perfectly comprehend, as I do, the motives which led this poor young man to commit the crime of self-destruction; and, such being the case, it will be unnecessary for me to say anything about them. As he very truly said, our situation is a most desperate one—so desperate, indeed, that it is questionable whether by any adverse combination of circumstances it could be worse. If we leave the shelter of this cavern we shall assuredly, in a few hours, be captured; if, on the other hand, we remain where we are, our discovery will be certain. We have two courses open to us, the termination of both of which is precisely the same.

A murmur of assent responded to his words.

"The matter is one which concerns you all equally, intimately, and individually; and therefore I shall leave you to decide what had better be done. In the first place, do you consider the plan proposed a feasible one, and, if so, shall I be justified in adopting it?"

The prince paused, and looking at the group of anxious faces by which he was surrounded, awaited a reply.

The rude highlanders, however, would never have dreamed of advising their prince. To them a Stuart was a being little inferior to a god, and anything he chose to say they would have looked upon as law.

But, with our friends the highwaymen, it was altogether different.

Each of them was accustomed to perilous emergencies and to taking the responsibility of action upon themselves.

Yet they felt that for them all to have spoken at once would have shown a want of respect, so they nudged Turpin to speak for them.

He knew what they meant, and obeyed them promptly.

"It appears to me, prince," said Turpin, in his rough and ready way, at which no one could take offence, "that such important business demands some amount of deliberation; and as we have but very little time, the sooner we come to a decision the better."

"Let me hear your candid opinion!" said the prince. "In the hour of danger I have always found you a most trustworthy adviser, and in the present instance I shall be greatly guided by what you say."

"If you wish for my candid opinion, prince," replied Turpin, bowing in acknowledgment of the compliment which Charles Stuart had paid him, "I can give it to you in a very few words."

"Pray do so."

"Then I consider the plan a most excellent one. It will require great boldness and address to put in execution, but I think all the better of it for that."

"And do you feel inclined to adopt it?"

"I do, most certainly; not, however, that I should ever have sanctioned or approved of the deed which this young man has committed; but as he is dead, and it is beyond the power of all of us to bring him back to life, I think we shall be greatly to blame if we scruple to make use of him to secure our own safety."

"And you think we should be justified in mutilating his remains?"

"It is not a very pleasant idea, I confess," replied Turpin, "but it strikes me that I would much rather mutilate his body than not, when I knew that by so doing I should not be injuring him in the least, but save my own life and the lives of my friends at the same time."

"That is enough. I own at first I felt some scruples whether I should keep the promise made him, but now you have quite removed them."

"The end to be gained will, I am sure, justify the means, and I for one should rejoice most heartily at the idea of your playing your foes such a trick as actually to receive the reward offered for your apprehension."

"Stop!" cried the prince; "that reminds me"——

"Of what?"

"Where is there any one to be found who will be willing, if we cut off this young man's head, to carry it to the Duke, and claim the reward?"

"I will—I will—I will!" cried every one, the highlanders included.

The prince smiled.

"Are you so ready to leave me?" he asked.

"Nay, it is not that," replied Turpin. "Had the service been to have remained by your side, and fight to the death, your appeal would have been as readily responded to."

"I believe it—I believe it!"

"But you see we are willing to do as you desire. It will remain with you to make election as to which one shall perform the mission."

"It will be one of extreme danger."

"Perhaps, prince; perhaps."

"If the fraud is discovered?"

"Why then I admit the bearer of the head would be in rather an unpleasant predicament! But, for my own part, I am sanguine of success if the one who goes performs his part well."

"Who shall I select?"

"That I shall leave entirely to you, my prince. I would speak, however, only I do not wish to shut myself out from the list of candidates."

"It shall go by the general voice," cried Charles. "That will be the fairest and most satisfactory."

"It will. How shall we proceed? for, my prince, I have always found it advisable, whenever a particular course of action has been decided upon, to set about it at once."

As you will. A show of hands shall decide it, and each candidate shall stand forward in succession."

"And you will decide who shall have the precedence?"

"I have no objection."

"It will be best."

"Then I decide upon you!"

"Me?"

"Even so. Stand forward."

Turpin, of course, complied.

"Now, my friends," continued the prince; "those who consider this the most proper person to depart upon the dangerous expedition, let them hold up their hands."

Scarcely had the words passed his lips than, as if by the exertion of one muscle, every hand was raised.

The decision was unanimous.

Dick Turpin looked round with a pleased smile upon his face.

He had all along coveted this task.

The inactive life which he had of late been leading made him long for such an enterprise as this no doubt would prove to be.

"Is this your decision?" cried the prince.

"It is."

"Enough, then. It will not be worth while for any other to stand forward, and if it will be any satisfaction to the electors and the elected, I can say that I heartily approve of the choice which has been made."

With an expression of countenance which one would think but ill accorded with what he was about to do, Dick Turpin drew his heavy sword from its sheath.

"It is a disagreeable task," he said, "but it is one that must be performed, and I am not the man to shrink from what is necessary."

He made a sign to Claude Duval, which was instantly understood.

He came to his side.

The others in the cave looked on with the greatest curiosity. There was not one who could have turned away.

The dead highlander lay out quite straght upon his back.

Dick stooped over him, and with his left hand took hold of him by the clothing about his neck.

Then, with some slight exertion, he raised him to a sitting posture.

Claude Duval sank down behind him upon his hands and knees.

Then Dick gently let the body fall backwards, as it had a tendency to do.

It balanced, of course, over Claude's back.

The head hung back, leaving the neck fully exposed.

It was a fair mark.

Dick lifted his sword.

He caught hold of the massive hilt with both hands, in order that he might bring it down with greater force.

The steel weapon rose a sickening, swishing noise as it descended.

But such was the vigour with which it was brought down, and so accurate was the aim which Turpin had taken, that the head was severed at a single blow. It rolled several paces along the floor of the cavern.

Very little blood followed the stroke. It had nearly all drained out of the wound which the young man had inflicted upon himself.

Dick assisted Claude to rise from his awkward position.

"That is done," he said; "but there is yet more to do."

"What, oh! what?" asked the prince; "this sickens me."

"No doubt—no doubt. When I leave here, let a spy accompany me. By hovering about at a distance he will be able to learn whether the ruse is a successful one, and whether the troops that guard the mountain passes are withdrawn. If this is done, let me implore you not to lose a moment in quitting this place, and making the best of your way to the sea-shore, at the point most convenient for you. There you must find some opportunity of embarking and getting safely over to France, where you will be sure to find an asylum."

"Unless," said the prince, mournfully—"unless indeed they, in the hour of my extremity, should turn against me."

CHAPTER CCXI.

DICK TURPIN SETS OUT UPON THE MOST PERILOUS ENTERPRISE HE HAS EVER UNDERTAKEN IN HIS LIFE.

"Do not anticipate misfortune, my prince," said Turpin, "it is bad enough without that."

"What?"

"Your position."

"I know that."

"If I succeed, you will have many difficulties to contend with in gaining the sea-shore. The fraud may not be suspected at first, and yet afterwards be detected, and a hot pursuit instituted after you."

"But have you reflected what you shall do in the event of discovery?"

"I have not—nor shall I. I shall wait till the time comes. Leave me to shift for myself, and I shall be all right. It must be close upon sunrise now, and so it is time for me to start, but let me, before I take my departure, advise you what to do, in order that my proceedings may be all the more effectual."

"What is it you wish?"

"My friends here," said Turpin, indicating by a movement of his hand, Tom King, Jack Rann, and Claude Duval, "will remain with you, and will do their best to aid you in making your escape. They will also be hostages for me."

"Hostages?"

"Yes, my prince, I look forward, with great confidence to obtaining the thirty thousand pounds, and should I do so you will want some security for my handing it over to you. As I said, escape to France. I will take the earliest opportunity of rejoining you there. If you do not see or hear anything of me, you may conclude that my mission has failed, and that I am no more."

"But you will take every precaution to insure your own safety?"

"Do not fear that, prince. I am not so tired of my life that I am desirous of flinging it away. I shall meet you in safety, I feel assured."

"I trust you will, indeed.'

"And now listen, further. As quickly as possible, I shall take the head, and carry it direct to the Duke of Cumberland. I shall not adopt any particular disguise, for I do not believe I am known as one of your adherents. I shall invent on my journey a plausible tale to account for the head coming into my possession. On delivering it, however, the probability is that I shall be asked to lead them to the spot where the body is to be found."

"Ah! I did not think of that."

"But it is a thing likely to occur."

"Certain."

"I think so, too; therefore, some means must be taken to fix the deceit more deeply in their minds."

"But how?"

"My prince, I will tell you. These means will be rather disagreeable, but they cannot be avoided."

"What are they?"

"There are several things you carry about your person which will go a long way towards establishing your identity, such as your claymore, your dirk, your target, your sporran, and your curiously-worked belt. These you must transfer to the body of the man who died to save us."

The prince hesitated.

"It is inevitable, my prince, or I would not press it upon you. Your best course will be to exchange apparel, and, with your permission, I will proceed to strip these things off."

Turpin hardly waited long enough for the required assent to be given, but stooped down, and with great rapidity took off the different articles of clothing which the highlander had worn.

He carried them to the prince.

"They will furnish you," he said, "with that of which you so greatly stand in need."

"And what is that?"

"A disguise! Take the things as they are; retire to a corner of the cavern, and change them. We will then dress the corpse in those which you take off."

Dick, as he spoke, almost thrust the clothes into the prince's hands.

Repugnant as it was to him, no doubt he clearly saw the necessity of doing as he had been advised; and as the old proverb says, "necessity knows no law," so he overcame his dislike as well as he could, and exchanged apparel.

The operation was one that did not occupy much time.

In a few minutes he returned to where the highwaymen stood.

Of course, during his absence they had taken the opportunity of speaking to each other, and making a few arrangements as to their future proceedings.

The difference which the simple change of habiliments made to the prince was really astonishing, and the highwaymen were more than ever struck with the great resemblance which existed between him and the highlander.

Dick was well pleased to perceive it, since it gave him all the better chance of success.

Without loss of time, he and his three comrades dressed the dead body in the clothes which the prince had just taken off.

The job was a very awkward one, but they succeeded in accomplishing it.

Then the resemblance was perfect.

The clothes fitted tightly, for the young man was larger made about the body than the prince was.

"Now," said Turpin, "I think we may look upon success as almost certain. I shall bring the Duke and those who like to come here to see the body. But, stay! I must make it appear as though there had been an encounter!"

Struck with the thought, Dick drew the claymore from its sheath, and plentifully smeared it with blood, and laid it near the dead man's hand.

Not content, however, with this, and wishing to make the deception as complete as possible, he drew his own sword, and plunged it several times into the inanimate clay.

No blood, of course, to speak of, flowed from these places, but he took care that there should be plenty placed there; for, owing to the manner in which the dagger had entered, the young man had bled to death.

These preparations were ghastly and horrible, but they may be excused on the ground of the absolute necessity there was for them.

At length all was ready.

Dick took up the head.

He held it by the hair.

The others who were present involuntarily turned their eyes from contemplating it to the prince, in order to compare the two.

Of course some differences could be detected, but they were very slight, and intimate as he was with the prince's features, Dick felt that had the head he held been shown to him, he would, without hesitation, have declared it to be that of Charles Stuart.

It was Claude Duval, however, who proposed, as a precautionary measure, to inflict a wound upon the face in such a manner, that while it did not mar the face, would yet make it more difficult of identification.

Dick approved of this entirely, and so accordingly as he held it, Claude drew his sword and inflicted a slight gash upon the face, extending from the mouth to the temple.

"Now I think all is finished. Look! the sun has already broken forth."

All turned as he spoke.

The entrance to the cavern faced the east, and a few beams of the rising sun penetrated a foot or two inside the entrance.

"It is time I took my departure. Farewell, my prince. You understand, I think, how you are to act. Nothing will elapse, I hope, before I learn the welcome intelligence that you have escaped. Then, as soon as may be, I will meet you in France, bringing with me, I hope, the thirty thousand pounds, though I shall consider effecting your escape the primary object, and the other a secondary one."

"Right," said the Pretender. "I can feel now how much I shall regret to part with you; but that time will have to come. I am reconciled now, however, by the hope that, though the enterprise you have taken in hand is one of a most dangerous character, you will escape all peril, and join me in a little while. Farewell! and may success attend your efforts."

The prince retired to a distant portion of the cavern for a double motive.

To conceal his own emotion.

And to allow Dick to take a farewell of his comrades, without the restraint which his presence would of necessity impose.

Dick found that bidding good-bye for an indefinite period to those three gallant hearts with whom he had shared so many perils, and from whom he hoped never to be separated, was anything but a pleasant business.

It had to be gone through, however, and he—

Screwed his courage to the sticking place.

It was necessary that he should do so, for he could not blind himself to the fact that the peril he was about to incur was one of no ordinary character; but Dick Turpin was never the man to flinch from danger, as the present occasion fully proved.

"Good-bye, old friends!" he said, in as cheerful a voice as he could assume. "Good-bye! We shall meet again, I hope, ere long; and then we will once more cry, 'Hurrah for the road!' Do your best to procure the young prince's escape. Nothing on my part shall be wanting, rest assured of that; but I have every confidence in the success of the plan, which is one of the best I ever knew of."

"Take care of yourself, Dick!" said Tom King. "Do not run into any kind of needless danger!"

"I will not, Tom, rest assured of that. Farewell, friends! Let the spy be sent after me, and the moment he returns, evacuate this place, for I shall bring the duke here. That will be your best chance of escape. Farewell!"

[DICK TURPIN CLAIMS THE REWARD FOR THE PRETENDER'S HEAD.]

"Farewell," cried his comrades.

They shook hands all round.

But they were very loath to leave him, and followed him out on to the little plateau in front of the entrance to the cavern.

Holding the head in his hand in the same manner as he had first taken hold of it, he began the descent of the precipitous mountain path.

The highlander who was to watch his movements, and bring back a report of his proceedings, followed.

Then the prince came out on to the little plateau.

So, too, did the highlanders, whose numbers were now reduced to four.

The little party stood there and watched the receding form of the highwayman until the masses of rock at the base of the mountain hid him from their sight.

CHAPTER CCXII.

DICK TURPIN CARRIES THE YOUNG PRETENDER'S HEAD TO THE DUKE OF CUMBERLAND, AND CLAIMS THE THIRTY THOUSAND POUNDS REWARD.

MORE than once during his descent of the perilous mountain path, Dick Turpin turned back and waved his hand to his companions.

Those companions who it was questionable if he should ever see more.

But at length, when the bottom of the path was reached, and he turned round again, he found them no longer visible.

The immense masses of rock among which he had wound his way intercepted his view.

But the highlander who had followed him could still see at a distance.

And now, having gone so far, Dick began to very seriously consider as to which would be the best manner in which to act.

Accustomed as he was to trust to the chapter of accidents, and rely upon his own resources in the moment of danger, yet he felt that upon the present occasion, so pregnant with importance as it was, it would be better for him to depart from his ordinary method, and arrange beforehand some plan of action in his mind.

While thus deliberating, he found that the head, in the manner he carried it, was a serious inconvenience.

Besides which, should he meet any one, it would be the means of attracting more notice to himself than he wished.

And not only that, too, did it not represent a sum of thirty thousand pounds, and should he tell any one that it was the head of the Pretender he carried, would they not try to take it from him?

Assuredly so, and then not only would the chance he had of obtaining this large sum be lost, but also the escape of the young prince himself be jeopardized, if not made impossible.

These reflections showed him the necessity there was for him to conceal the nature of what he carried from every prying eye that might rest upon him, and he resolved to do so at once.

A fragment of rock—or rather what geologists would call a bowlder—projected conveniently from the hard ground a few paces before him, and so he seated himself upon it.

The head he placed beside him.

He wanted something like a cloth in which to tie it up.

This he soon found.

In the days of which we write it was customary to wear round the neck a cravat of very voluminous dimensions.

They were made generally of white cambric, folded into four thicknesses.

They were worn once round the neck, and tied in a large bow, the ends of which were of preposterous length, and trimmed with lace, according to the wealth and position of the wearer.

This, then, Dick felt was not only what he could spare, but what would best answer his purpose; so he pulled it off and carefully enveloped the ghastly-looking head in its folds.

This done, he rose and resumed his journey.

The highlander who followed him, on perceiving him stop, stopped also, so that the same distance was maintained between the two.

From the spy who had returned with such a budget of alarming news, Dick had learned which path he ought to take, in order to reach his destination.

The way, however, was long and toilsome.

At the expiration of three hours from the time of his starting, and just when he was ready to drop with fatigue, he saw before him, in the distance, a small troop of English soldiers.

This nerved him to proceed at a still quicker pace—for, at first, he was unable to tell whether they were approaching or receding from him.

He found the former to be the case; and that if they continued in the same line of march, they must pass over the very spot upon which he stood.

Under such circumstances there could be no necessity for him to continue on his way; and so he determined to wait till they came up with him.

The highlander, who had also perceived the soldiers, and comprehended Dick's motive, halted, and hid himself from observation by lying down at full length on the top of a distant rock, and allowing no portion of his body, save the upper part of his head, to be visible.

Strains of martial music now began to make themselves heard.

Dick scarcely dared to hope that this, the first troop he came in sight of, was the one of which the Duke of Cumberland had taken the command, but he resolved upon no account to surrender the head, unless to that individual himself.

From these, however, he reasonably calculated that he should be able to ascertain his whereabouts.

It took the soldiers about a quarter of an hour to reach the spot where Turpin sat waiting for them.

When pretty near, however, he rose, and advanced to meet them.

In number they did not much exceed thirty, but they were all exceedingly well armed.

They were on foot.

One, however, who rode, sometimes in the van, and sometimes in the rear, attracted Dick's immediate attention.

He had never seen the Duke, for during the past few years he had been commanding the army on the continent, and he had only been sent for home to crush this formidable rebellion.

But more than once he had been described to him by those who had had frequent opportunities of observing his appearance, and the figure who sat on horseback entirely coincided with the description he had had of him.

Seeing Turpin approach, it would seem as though orders had been given to take him prisoner, for several hastened towards him.

But, with the rapidity of thought, Dick stripped off the covering that concealed the ghastly burden which he carried, and again grasping it by the hair, he held it aloft, as high as his arm would allow him, and shouted—

"The reward—the reward! I claim the reward! Thirty thousand pounds reward! I claim it, I say! Here is the head of the Young Pretender! Charles Stuart's head! Where is the duke? Lead me to the duke! I claim the reward!"

These vociferations caused, as might be supposed, the utmost surprise and excitement among the soldiery, and something of their import seemed to reach the ears of the personage on horseback, whom Dick took to be the Duke of Cumberland, for he spurred his horse forward as he said—

"Vat is this? Vat you zay? Donder and blitzen! Zay zat one time more! Zirty zouzand pounds! Mein Gott! Did you zay it was ze Pretender's head?"

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland always spoke execrable English, but especially so if anything excited him.

"My lord duke," replied Turpin, as he stood near the duke's horse, and holding up the head in his right hand, and pointing to it with his left, "my lord duke, I said this was the head of Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender, and so it is, and I claim the reward of thirty thousand pounds!"

"Donder and blitzen!" cried the duke, doubt, astonishment, and triumph alternately appearing upon his face. "Hold ze head up, and let me have von look at him."

He turned half-round in the saddle as he spoke, and Turpin held the head in such a manner that he could perceive the features.

The duke looked long and keenly.

"Mein Gott!" he cried, at length, "zat's him, for sure, though he looks fatter as when I zaw him last. Where did you find him?"

"With the permission of your royal highness," replied Turpin, "I will relate to you the whole of the particulars."

"Goot! Is zat his head?"

"Your royal highness, I know your character too well to be foolish enough to attempt to impose upon you in any way."

The duke smiled.

He was not insensible to flattery.

He liked to be thought sagacious and cunning.

But that may be easily accounted for.

It was because he was neither the one nor the other.

But then he, in common with most others, like to be flattered for that which they do not possess.

He looked with an eye of favour upon Dick already.

The highwayman saw his advantage, and, of course, did not fail to profit by it.

"It would be an insult to your royal highness to attempt to deceive you in any way, and, not only that, it would be sure to fail. Look, your royal highness. Look upon this face, and tell me whether there is any doubt about it."

"Certainly not. As you zay, zat is ze traitor's face."

Upon hearing this decided expression of opinion upon the part of their chief, the soldiers gave three cheers.

But the subordinate officers who attended the troop pressed forward to examine the head.

They looked, too, very curiously at Turpin, but he assumed an air of the most perfect self-possession, though, for all he knew, one or more of those who crowded round him were acquainted with his person.

The exultation of the duke was great—so great, indeed, that he would have overlooked all details had not the officers reminded him.

Not one, however, entertained the least doubt of it being the Young Pretender's head, and the idea of a man being temerarious enough to pass some one else's off for it, never occurred to them at all.

They were exceedingly jealous, though, of Turpin.

Each one entertained the hope of being the lucky man, and now they were disappointed, though the probability is they would not have so much cared had the reward been claimed by one of their comrades.

But the duke now turned to the highwayman, and said—

"Vat you zay may be quite true, but you vill have to give us de proof."

Turpin bowed.

"I am ready, your royal highness."

"Donder and blitzen, then you shall make von begin."

CHAPTER CCXIII.

THE YOUNG PRINCE AND HIS FOLLOWERS COMMENCE THEIR HAZARDOUS JOURNEY TO LOCHNANUAGH.

From his lofty post of observation, the spy who had followed Dick saw all that had taken place.

It was rather premature, but he considered the whole affair now settled.

The troop they had so much reason to dread was there.

He could not tell, of course, how soon they would, under the direction of Dick Turpin, set out for the cavern.

He, therefore, considered himself justified in jumping to the conclusion that all was well, and so, with great care and stealth, he had crept down from the rock, and, by a circuitous route, made his way to the little mountain path leading up to the cavern.

Upon arriving at its commencement, he paused and looked back, in order to make sure that his foes were not close behind him.

To his great relief, there was no one at all in sight.

To say that this man did not feel the full peril of the situation in which he was placed, and that he was not anxious to get safely out of it in the best manner he possibly could, would not be true.

For his own part, however, he would never have dreamed of betraying his prince, although he might have gained so much if he had.

Nor would he have consented to the sacrifice of his companion's life if he could have in any way prevented it; but as the sacrifice had taken place, he thought it would be best to take all the advantage of it that he possibly could.

Satisfied that the coast was quite clear, he commenced the steep ascent of the mountain path.

By this time it was nearly noon, and the sun was at his greatest altitude.

The mists which usually hung about the mountain had been dispersed, and having passed the rocks at the bottom, he looked up to that place where the little plateau was situated.

An eye less keen than his, and less familiar with the spot, would fail to have detected anything upon it, but he could tell even at that distance that his friends were there watching and waiting for his return.

Up, up he went steadily and slowly, for he found climbing was a severe strain upon his already much-taxed strength.

But when he reached his destination, he was literally overwhelmed with questions respecting the manner in which Turpin had got on.

The reader is already in possession of more facts than the spy could give, and so it will be needless to repeat the imperfect imformation which he imparted.

They, however, like him, looked upon the affair as already settled—as though the result was already achieved. But how great was their mistake.

We will not, however, anticipate the course of events, but, leaving Dick Turpin for a little while in the enemy's camp, proceed to relate what steps were taken by his companions.

Hope had once more revived in the breast of the young prince. Not that he thought he should ever accomplish that which had been the dream of his own and his father's life, but he had the hope that he should escape from his enemies.

Moreover, he was stimulated by the hope which Turpin had held out of getting possession of the thirty thousand pounds.

This sum, large as it was, would not indemnify him for the loss of the crown of England, nor was it with that idea that he wished it.

It was chiefly because it would gratify a certain feeling of revenge which he very naturally felt.

Added to which, it would provide him with the means of recompensing those who had so bravely stood by him in his direst extremity.

He would, in fine, be able to give them as much as they would have obtained had they betrayed him and handed him over to his foes.

But should Turpin fail, they would have to rest satisfied with thanks, for he would have no more substantial payment to offer them, the unfortunate enterprise which he had undertaken having left him impecunious.

A great thing he felt, however, it would be to leave the shores of Scotland, taking the men with him, and thus saving their lives.

He listened, therefore, with the utmost intentness to every word which the spy uttered.

As soon as he had finished he spoke.

"My friends," he said, "you have all heard the news. All of you, too, heard the instructions which our absent friend gave us. They were that we should immediately evacuate the cave, for he would not be able to tell how soon he should return with the troops after he had fallen in with them."

"Exactly so," replied Tom King; "and, therefore, my prince, let us bid this place good bye, without delay. I have great faith in Dick's strategic abilities, and so would you have, were I to relate a few anecdotes about him. He will impose on them successfully, beyond doubt, and, relying upon our carrying out the instructions he was so careful to particularly give us, he will lead the soldiers to the cave."

"And so, the sooner we are out of it, the better," replied the prince.

"Unquestionably," said Tom King, "and so it only remains for you to decide what we shall do, and then we will make a start."

"I am anxious that we should all keep together," answered the prince," for in the present case I fully believe union to be strength. Lochnanuagh will be the nearest point where we can meet with our friends, and where we have a reasonable prospect of getting a boat. I propose, then, that we make that our destination. Do you agree with me there, my friends?"

A general murmur of assent came from the lips of those whom he addressed.

"That is sufficient. The next thing is, we shall require a guide, for I am not familiar enough with the country to find my way there. Let the one, therefore, who knows the road best stand forward, and we will make him our guide."

Neither of the three highwaymen were better qualified to take this post than the prince was himself, so it rested entirely with the five highlanders.

They spent some minutes in earnest conversation with each other.

There seemed to be some slight difference of opinion.

But as they spoke in their own outlandish guttural language, and in a low tone, the others could not tell its import.

The dispute, if any there was, was soon decided.

Perhaps this was in some measure due to the presence of the prince.

One highlander stood forward.

He was one to whom particular allusion has more than once been made.

He was the oldest, and the one that seemed to have some degree of command over the others.

He was a stalwart, sturdy Scot—a perfect type of his hardy race, and though his hair and his beard were of a grizzly gray, and his countenance interlaced with countless wrinkles, yet he was as strong and firm as many a one who had not attained to half his age.

The attitude in which he stood before the young prince was one of profound respect.

He did not speak, but waited for him to address him first.

"Speak freely," said the Pretender; "do you feel yourself qualified to guide us to the spot I mentioned?"

"My prince," replied the old highlander, "I am an old man now, and all my life I have lived about this spot, and am as familiar with the road to the place you want to reach as I am with the pathway which you can see winding down to the base of the mountain."

"We will trust you, then," said Charles Stuart. "But if you know two roads, and one of those two is less frequented than the other, let us take that one."

"Enough, my prince! I can lead you the whole distance along a pathway inaccessible to horse, and where it is a thousand chances to one if we meet any one."

"Then let it be decided that we take that route; so now, my friends, forward, and I fervently hope not only that our brave comrade may bring his undertaking to a successful issue, but that we shall be so fortunate as to reach the shores of France, where I make little doubt we shall meet with a hospitable reception. At any rate, they will not treat us as our foes would."

"My prince," said the old highlander, respectfully, who had been intrusted with the duty of guide.

"Say on, old friend."

"If I might advise, I would have the order of march agreed upon before we start."

"You are right; it ought to be decided. Speak; let us hear how you think it should be done. I shall defer entirely to you, believing that you have the best idea of the difficulties we should meet with."

The highlander's face assumed an expression of the utmost gratification as the words fell upon his ears.

He drew himself up even more proudly than before.

"I think it will be best, my prince," he replied, "for one of my companions to go before us, in order to ascertain that the path is free from all dangers and obstructions."

"Certainly."

"And that another should bring up the rear, whose duty it will be to apprise us of the approach of the enemy."

"A better mode of procedure could not be devised," said the prince, "and let it be fully acted upon. The news that I am no more will quickly spread from place to place, and the vigilance of the troops who have been set to guard the various mountain paths will be abated."

"Let us trust so," said Claude Duval.

"Forward, then!" cried the prince; "it is high time now that we left this place."

"We shall have to cross the mountain," said the guide, "not descend it. The path will be rough and difficult, but each man must do his best."

He then gave some instructions to one of his companions, who set out first.

The others then followed.

The guide and the young prince.

The three highwaymen.

The highlanders.

And then one was left behind to bring up the rear in the manner they had arranged.

CHAPTER CCXIV.

FICKLE FORTUNE SEEMS AT LAST TO SMILE UPON THE FORLORN ENTERPRISE OF YOUNG CHARLES STUART.

In this way, then, they began their long and toilful journey.

The path was narrow, and in some places almost perpendicular.

Its course was upward and round the mountain.

They gained the highest portion, and then they were compelled by sheer fatigue to halt.

Naturally they looked back upon the route they had just come.

The prospect was full of grandeur.

As they gazed around, the breasts of the principal characters were animated with very different emotions.

The old highlander, as he stood up and looked at the magnificent scenery below him, felt a glow of the warmest admiration at his heart—he was proud of his native land.

But the young prince felt his heart swell almost to bursting, when, on looking round, he contemplated that which he considered by right belonged to him, and yet saw himself a disguised fugitive, with his life in the most imminent danger.

The three highwaymen, although impressed by the beauty and sublimity of what they saw, looked keenly upon the plain, in order to detect, if possible, some trace of their foes.

Claude shaded his eyes with his hands, and looked long and earnestly.

Suddenly an exclamation broke from his lips.

At the same moment he pointed with his finger in a particular direction.

"Look," he cried, "look there, all of you, and tell me whether those tiny specks are not soldiers."

In an instant every eye was turned upon the spot he indicated.

A cluster of specks, looking like a number of small red insects, could just be seen.

To distinguish them required a steadfast gaze and a clear eye.

Most particularly did the old highlander fix his looks upon them.

Our readers must have noticed how well aged people, when in possession of health and strength, can perceive distant objects.

In this respect they have the advantage of youth.

The reason is obvious.

As age increases, the pupil of the eye becomes flattened.

This produces a twofold effect.

One is, that objects near at hand, such as the letters in a book, cannot be seen unless held at a considerable distance from the eye.

The other is, that objects afar off, such as the figures upon the face of a distant church clock, or a balloon in the air, can be seen by them when invisible to younger persons.

And this was the case with the highlander.

Claude Duval was what is familiarly termed "long-sighted," and that is the reason he was the first to see the moving specks below.

But the guide, when he fixed his glance upon them, was able to make them out distinctly.

They were soldiers.

"I can see them," he said, "quite plainly. They are on foot, and are making their way towards the path leading to the cavern.

"Are you sure?" asked Charles Stuart.

"Quite, my prince," was the reply. "We must put ourselves again in motion. Fortunately, a few steps will take us round the side of the mountain. If we stay here we shall run the greatest risk of being seen."

"Lead on, then," cried the prince. "Do not delay a single moment. If they saw us, they would try all they could to capture us, although they might not suspect who we really were."

"Very true, my prince."

Once more, after their brief and insufficient halt, the little troop put themselves in motion.

But now their path trended downwards, which made a vast difference.

At first, they made all the speed they possibly could, but, as soon as they were quite out of sight of the soldiers, they slackened their pace, and proceeded at a more easy rate.

To measure in a straight line from where they were to the plain beneath was no great distance, but they could not, of course, reach it in this fashion.

The path wound round and round in the most tortuous manner conceivable, and, by the time they were near the base, it was quite dusk.

By the advice of the guide, they halted at a spot where stood an old ruined hut, doubtless erected by some poor shepherd.

It was now quite deserted.

The whole of the little party, save two, entered it, and these were left outside as sentinels.

Had they deemed it prudent they would have lighted a fire, not only for the sake of the agreeable warmth, but also for the light it would have afforded them, but they were obliged to forego this comfort.

Here they broke their fast with such rude food as they had each brought with them, and, throwing themselves at full length upon the floor, sought that rest which nature imperiously demanded.

Here they stayed for nearly four hours.

Night had then fully come.

The slender crescent of a new moon shed a faint and subdued light upon the surrounding country.

All was still—oppressively so, in fact.

That this was as good a time to recommence their march as they could possibly have was beyond doubt.

But before they fairly started, by the advice of Tom King and his comrades, one of the highlanders was sent out to reconnoitre.

He was absent nearly half-an-hour.

When he came back, he brought with him some rather alarming intelligence.

Some distance further down the path a party of soldiers were stationed.

As soon as the guide heard this, he said, at once—

"We must stay where we are. It is our only chance of safety. To pass them while they remain there will be impossible."

"Are you sure of this?" asked the young prince.

"Quite sure."

"Then we must trust to our scheme having the effect of removing them. When they hear of my fictitious death they will withdraw, for what other motive can they have for keeping watch?"

"None, my prince."

"Then we must stay, and wait till they remove."

At this moment the clear notes of a bugle rang out shrilly upon the night air.

The sound came from a distance.

It was immediately responded to by one close at hand.

Our friends did not dare to move or speak.

They bent all their faculties to that of listening.

Another note was blown, and then another, as though for the purpose of enabling the two parties to wait.

Had either of the three highwaymen been familiar with the nature of the ground, they would have crept forward to reconnoitre, but being in total ignorance of it, they considered it would be too hazardous.

The same idea seemed to strike the old highlander, although no word was spoken.

Motioning to them with his hand to be silent, he glided away like a spectre.

He was quickly out of sight in the darkness.

He was out of hearing sooner, for he had slipped off his shoes and stockings, and walked barefoot.

A very anxious time elapsed while he was absent.

All listened eagerly for his return.

The sounds of the bugles had ceased, leaving them as much in the dark as to their meaning as they were before.

Five minutes passed.

Still there was no sign of the old man.

Just, however, as their impatience had risen to such an unbearable extent that they were about to rise and seek him, he returned.

The young prince and his followers stood together in a dense throng at the door of the ruined hut.

"All is well!" said the highlander, in a deep voice, which was deeply tinctured with satisfaction; "All is well!"

"How so?"

"I will tell you, my prince. When I left your side I made my way with all possible silence down the path to where the troop of soldiers were picketed."

"And did you discover the meaning of the notes upon the bugles?"

"I did, as you shall hear. Taking advantage of those times when the clear, shrill notes made the ear deaf to all other sounds, I crept nearer and nearer, until at length I was able not only to distinguish their forms, but also to hear what was said."

"Go on."

"It seemed to me, my prince, that the bugle was blown by the soldiers below, in order to direct some one to the exact place where they were.

"Presently I heard a heavy footstep, a challenge, and a rejoinder.

"I listened with the utmost intentness.

"The new comer was a soldier, and he brought the others the intelligence that they might break up their watch, as the Young Pretender had been already captured.

"I lay quite still, and soon, to my great joy, the whole party of soldiers, who were twenty in number at the very least, retreated, leaving the pathway free."

"Is it possible?"

"Fortune at last favours you, my prince. Let us lose no time in taking advantage of this fortunate circumstance."

"The ruse seems to have succeeded, then?" said Charles Stuart.

"Yes; may he who has successfully carried it out fall into no great danger in consequence."

It was Tom King who uttered these words.

The deep and solemn tones of his voice left no doubt behind as to their earnestness

"Most fervently," said Prince Charles, "do I re-echo your wish; and let me also add that we may be fortunate enough to pursue the rest of our journey without molestation."

CHAPTER CCXV.

AN UNEXPECTED SPECTACLE PASSES BEFORE THE EYES OF THE FUGITIVES.

THE stirring episode in the lives of the four highwaymen, in which Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender, played so prominent a part, is fast approaching a termination; and as in a little while we shall have to busy ourselves with relating the adventures of Dick Turpin in the English camp, we think it will be best, in order that there may be no future interruption, to follow the young prince and those he had with him in their dangerous journey to Lochnanuagh.

The withdrawal of the small band of troops, who had been set to guard the mountain pass at such a critical moment, seemed almost like a special interposition of Providence in their behalf.

At all events, the young prince thought so, and even if his followers did not, it seemed to re-animate them with fresh hopes, and they drew from the event the most favourable auguries.

The advice of the old highlander, who had brought this, the only welcome intelligence they had for so long received, was too good not to be immediately acted upon.

Accordingly, preserving the same order of march as heretofore, they recommenced their journey.

Morning was now, however, very close at hand, and so it became necessary for them to proceed with the utmost circumspection.

Indeed, so far as actual safety went, it would undoubtedly have been best for them to halt by day and travel by night; but they did not adopt this mode of progression, because they feared that the deception might ere long be detected, and so their escape from Scotland be for ever prevented.

Their main object was not to lose time, but to reach the coast as quickly as possible.

They relied much upon the knowledge of the country to be traversed which the old man possessed.

Every step they took served to confirm the words that he had uttered—namely, that every step of the road was perfectly familiar to him.

He still continued to express his belief that there was scarcely any probability of their encountering either friends or enemies, so little used, on account of its difficulty, was the path by which he proposed to take them.

On reaching the base of the mountain, a wild-looking glen or ravine was reached, on the other side of which they could just distinguish the outlines of another chain of mountains, whose summits were just a shade darker than the sky they seemed to pierce, save in those places where they were crowned with snow.

A terrible rushing, roaring noise, as of some turbulent mountain torrent assailed their ears, and as they still continued their progress across the ravine, the sound grew louder and louder, until at last the very ground beneath their feet trembled perceptibly, so impetuous was its course.

The din was terrific, and it is only those who have witnessed such a phenomenon who can form a just idea of what it is like.

All such will say that it is utterly out of the power of language to express it.

With great difficulty the old highlander made his voice heard.

"Take care all," he cried. "A narrow bridge, that will allow of the passage of but one man at a time, is the only means by which this mountain torrent can be crossed. Follow me, my prince. I will lead the way."

He walked forward as he spoke.

The others followed him anxiously.

A little more than a dozen paces brought them to the verge of the deep abyss, through some contracted channel in which the water forced its way.

The place in which they now stood was in the profoundest darkness, and had not their eyes grown thoroughly accustomed to it, they would never have been able to perceive the end of the bridge over which they had been told they would have to pass.

As it was, however, they could just distinguish the wooden railing intended for a support for the hand.

Boldly and fearlessly, however, the old highlander, after giving a word or two of advice to his beloved prince as to how he should proceed, advanced, and commenced the perilous passage.

The bridge, as he had called it, was nothing more than the trunk of a huge tree, which had been laid from one brink of the abyss to the other.

The upper surface, however, originally round, had been rudely chopped with an axe, until there was a flat place to walk upon, and a hand-rail had been formed by driving two posts in at each end of the tree, and fastening a long piece of wood of convenient thickness to them.

The young prince followed in the steps of his faithful and aged servitor.

More than once, as he thought of his perilous situation, and the awful depth of the abyss, his brain reeled, and it was only by clutching the railing with additional firmness, that he saved himself from falling.

But difficult and full of peril as the undertaking seemed, the torrent was safely crossed by all, without the occurrence of any accident whatever.

This done, they still continued their progress, relying wholly upon the old man who walked before them with the utmost confidence.

And now they again commenced the ascent of a mountain, but all were inspired to put up with the fatigue by the reflection that each step they took served to bring them that much nearer to safety.

Day dawned, and found them about half-way up a mountain, superior in every respect to that in which the cavern was situated.

Some alarm was generated in the breasts of all by the idea that they might be seen by some one from the plains below; but the old man promptly allayed them by the assurance that there was really nothing of the kind to fear.

The mountain path presented every appearance of being but little used. In fact, few had the courage to attempt to cross the mountains, and incur the risk of falling down some tremendous precipice.

They preferred rather making a detour by taking the broad and well-beaten road which wound round the base of the mountain.

But such a road as that would have been ill-suited to the fugitives, whose main object was to elude observation.

At present, so far as they could tell, they had not encountered a human being.

Fatigue compelled them at last to halt for awhile soon after sunrise.

Here they broke their fast with such rude food as they had been able to carry with them.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack both had an expression upon their faces which very plainly said they had had enough of it.

It will be remembered that all along they had felt rather unwilling, and it was only not to be separated from their comrades that they made a sacrifice and came.

Tom King was anxious for the fate of Turpin. The more he thought upon it the fuller of peril did the enterprise which he undertaken seem to be.

For the young prince, too, he felt the greatest possible solicitude.

But, with that constancy of purpose which formed so prominent a trait in his disposition, Tom determined to hold by him to the last—that is to say, until he had seen him in a place of perfect safety.

They stayed no longer than nature compelled them, and again set forward upon their journey.

The old highlander, however, gave them the welcome assurance that the distance they now had to go was comparatively short, and that, by pushing forward vigorously, they would probably reach it by nightfall.

This infused a little fresh energy into their exhausted frames.

Soon after this, too, the descent of the mountain was begun.

At the foot their guide told them they would have to exercise the greatest caution, because there they would have to cross the broad high-road, which during the day was much frequented by passengers of all kinds.

Owing to the very peculiar manner in which the path wound among the rocks, they were able, by stooping, to descend without exposing themselves to the gaze of any one upon it.

But now they reached a part where it would be no longer possible to do this.

They stopped.

It would be necessary to watch for an opportunity of crossing the road when it was free from travellers.

One of the men, after a little while, was sent forward to reconnoitre.

Scarcely, however, had he departed than the loud and spirit-stirring strains of martial musi burst upon their ears.

But it was not Scotch music.

It was the brass-band belonging to some English regiment that sent forth the cheerful sounds.

Not daring to move, they crouched still closer down behind the rock where they had concealed themselves.

The tramp—tramp of the soldiers could now be heard.

From this they could tell they were in large numbers, and marching steadily along a well-kept road.

At this moment the spy returned.

Alarm was in his looks.

"The Southrons," he said. "They come! Their numbers are countless! They are marching along the road!"

"Have they learned our whereabouts, think you?" asked Charles Stuart.

"That, my prince, I cannot tell, but they are coming in this direction."

"This is serious," said Tom King. "But with your permission, I will make a suggestion."

"Say on, my friend. I have every confidence in your judgment."

Tom bowed, as he replied

"It may be that this bodes no special harm to us. Let yonder fragment of stone be rolled against this, and I will stand upon it. By so doing I shall command a view of the road, and as only the upper part of my face will be exposed, there will be no fear of my being seen."

"As you will," said the prince; "but pray be careful not to betray our hiding-place."

"Fear nothing," said Tom. "My own safety would make me take measures not to do that, without counting yours and my companions.

As he spoke, Tom mounted upon the piece of stone which he had mentioned, and cautiously peered over the edge of the rock.

CHAPTER CCXVI.

THE PRINCE AND HIS FOLLOWERS REACH LOCHNANUAGH, AND ARE WRECKED UPON THE ROCKY COAST OF BARRA.

To his great satisfaction he found he could obtain an excellent view of the high-road.

It was many feet below him, and he considered the danger he was in of being seen by any one upon it was so slight as to amount to no danger at all.

In the distance he could perceive a large moving mass, the top of which was a forest of bayonets.

He watched its onward course with great attention.

It soon became obvious to him that they would have to pass just beneath him, or else mount the path, and discover them where they stood.

But when he came to consider, he felt that from the latter he had very little indeed to dread.

The circumstance of their passing along the road just at that time, amounted, he considered, to a coincidence, and nothing more.

Seeing that some time must of necessity elapse before the troops actually passed by, he descended, and requested the young prince to take his place and look.

The same was done by all of them, and then Tom resumed his old post of observation.

The foremost of the soldiers had now got a little beyond the rock behind which he stood, and up the road, as far as ever his eye could carry him, he saw them there in countless numbers.

What it meant he was rather at a loss to guess.

He turned round to the guide.

"You saw the soldiers," he said; "tell me, does the road they are taking lead them to England or to Scotland?"

"To England," was the reply.

"Good!"

Tom was looking out again.

He had intended at first to count the different companies, but he had found the effort beyond him.

His patience, and that of his companions grew exhausted.

Still there seemed to be no end of the troops.

There must have been several thousands of them at least.

They walked, too, as many abreast as the road would allow.

At last came some on horseback.

But these were comparatively few in number.

Then the officers.

The idea that had occurred to Tom when he asked the question of the guide, seemed confirmed.

The English troops, satisfied of the death of the person they had been sent to capture, were returning to the lowlands.

And now Tom could see the end.

With the greatest eagerness and impatience he looked forward, narrowly scanning the countenances of all who passed.

Presently he saw that for which he had been looking.

Surrounded by a guard, but without weapons of any kind—looking, indeed, very much like a prisoner of war—was Dick Turpin!

Yes, there could be no mistake, Tom could have told his familiar form from a thousand others.

He fancied Dick looked rather grave.

He noted one fact, however, with surprise.

Turpin was mounted on Black Bess!

It was as impossible for Tom to mistake the mare any more than her master.

After Dick and his guard came the Duke of Cumberland, surrounded by his staff, whose brilliant uniforms, despite the hard service they had seen, looked beautiful in the sunlight.

This was a sight that so absorbed Tom King, that he almost forgot his companions.

But at the last moment he did think of them.

They looked up again, as on the former occasion.

Sixteen-String Jack was the last, and when he came down again they had passed out of sight.

A vast crowd of people followed, as usual.

Not a word was said about Dick, for the old guide spoke.

"My prince," he said, "this is indeed a most fortunate circumstance for us. When the last stragglers have gone you may depend the road will be clear, for some little time at least. That is the opportunity we must take of crossing it. If we wait for ever we shall never have a better."

All present could not fail to be struck with the truth of this, and so not another moment was lost in speaking, but they crept cautiously down the path.

When they came fully into sight of the high-road, it was quite deserted.

Descending, then, the remainder of the path as quickly as they could, they, after looking both right and left, crossed it, and gained the shelter of a dense forest which was on the opposite side.

All drew a long breath of relief.

Then the prince spoke—

"Let us continue to push forward with what speed we may, for who can tell the meaning of this sudden movement of the troops, or estimate the danger it may bring upon us if we delay."

"My prince," replied Tom King, "I think you have now no cause for fear. The meaning of what we have seen is, I take it, clear enough. The whole troops under the command of the sanguinary duke have been withdrawn from the mountains, and, under the belief that you are no more, are repairing with your head to London."

"Do you really think so?"

"I feel almost certain of it, therefore, I say, push on with all speed. The chance of our meeting with our foes is now almost at an end."

"But," said Claude Duval, "what do you make of Dick being a prisoner?"

"Ah! there I am as much abroad as yourself. I can only account for it in one way,"

"And how is that?"

"That he is made a sort of honourable prisoner, in token of his good faith."

"Then, if that is the case, he is in a very ticklish position indeed."

"I fear he is, but if any one can get out of such a difficulty, Turpin can."

"I quite believe that, Tom."

"Most fervently," interrupted the prince, "do I hope that all will go well with him, and that he will lose neither life nor liberty through me."

"I know he has your good wishes, my prince," replied Tom King, "and he must even be content to abide by his own luck."

"I am puzzled," said Sixteen-String Jack, "to account for his having possession of his mare. You all of you know that it was left at Sir Kenneth Grant's, and that is a long way from here."

"We must wait," said Claude, "until we see him, and then he will have doubtless much to tell us, and many mysteries to elucidate."

In such-like talk and speculations respecting their absent comrade, they whiled away the time upon their long and weary march.

But as Tom had said, they met with no further molestations, though they did not upon that account abate the caution which they had all along observed.

Contrary to the opinion of the guide, it was nearer daybreak than nightfall when they reached Loohnanuagh—at which place they arrived thoroughly wearied out.

But the information respecting the Camerons and Macdonalds being found there was perfectly correct.

The interview between the young prince and Cameron of Lochiel, was a most affecting one. The gentle chief, in common with nearly every one, had heard of his death, and that the English were taking his head to London; for short as was the time, the startling nature of the intelligence had caused it to spread with extraordinary rapidity.

During the whole of the first day the prince and his followers were accommodated with rest and refreshment at a rude cabin, the temporary residence of Lochiel.

The latter started off without delay to find a vessel which would transport his prince to France; but for a long time his influence, great as it was, was powerless to obtain one.

He knew, however, the absolute necessity there was for instantaneous action, and that the deceit which had been put upon the duke might at any moment be discovered, and so he did not relax his efforts to obtain what he sought.

It was nearly dusk, and he was standing near the seashore with his object unachieved, when he saw a small boat come in sight.

He waited until its keel grated upon the strand, and then he spoke to the inmate.

From him he learned that a French sloop-of-war was anchored off the coast of South Uist—an island contiguous to the Isle of Skye.

The idea of reaching this sloop at once occurred to Lochiel; and after some trouble, he succeeded in engaging the man to row them to the spot where he had seen the vessel.

Midnight was the time decided upon for them to set out.

The night was dark and gloomy.

The highlanders who had been so faithful to the unfortunate young prince, could not be induced upon any consideration to leave their native land.

So the three highwaymen were all he had to accompany him, and they as steadfastly refused to leave him.

They found, however, when they took their seats that it would have been inconvenient to have loaded the boat more.

A last farewell was exchanged by the prince with Lochiel and the other chiefs, who, like their clansmen, would not suffer themselves to be pursuaded to leave Scotland.

The boat was pushed off.

At first the boatman took both oars, out, after a little time, the highwaymen alternately relieved him of one of them.

But, as they shot through the waters, darker and darker it grew, and the wind began to moan and sigh like a giant in great pain.

Fain would the boatman, as he glanced up at the threatening sky and heard the tokens of a coming storm, have turned back to the shore, but our friends would not listen to it: such a course would have been more dangerous to them than going on.

And now the waves began to swell, and on their tips appeared a thick white foam, which glistened around them wherever they turned their gaze.

Still on they went.

The storm rose to its full height.

The boat was tossed about like a feather.

All control of it was lost.

Suddenly, however, a tremendous crash made itself heard above the din of the tempest.

The boat had struck against a rock and gone to pieces.

CHAPTER CCXVII.

THE DUKE OF CUMBERLAND REACHES THE CAVE AND SATISFIES ALL HIS DOUBTS, AND THE HEADLESS BODY IS BURIED ON THE PLATEAU.

"DONDER and blitzen, den you shall make von begin."

Such was the elegant manner in which the Duke of Cumberland requested Dick Turpin to give him an account of how the head came into his possession.

Concealing the smile which rose to his lips as he heard these uncouth words by bowing deeply, Dick said—

"Your royal highness, it will take some time to relate the whole history to you, and, therefore, if you will permit me, I will defer it to another and more convenient opportunity."

"Nein! nein! Mine Gott! Nein! You shall make von begin at von now!"

"Your royal highness's wishes are my commands," replied Turpin. "I was fearful of tiring your patience."

"Nein! Go on!"

"My name," said Turpin, assuming a manner which he judged would make him thought well of by the soldiery, "is John Palmer, and by those who know me well I am called Jack Palmer, and nothing more. I come from Essex, and when I heard of the rebellion and the reward our good king offered for the prince of the Jacobites, for so I call him, I thought I would come to Scotland and try my luck. Well, a very hard time I have had of it since. I have been climbing over mountains and such like, but I met with no success. I was just thinking about coming back and giving it up, when, as I came down a road, I saw a narrow path leading up the side of the mountain. I don't know hardly what made me go up, only it was a sort of forlorn hope you see. Well, after a while, I found that this path brought me out on to a square piece of rock almost like a large table, and before me I saw what looked like the entrance to a cavern; and, fearing nothing, I entered.

"It was very dark inside, except just by the mouth, and I was going to turn away again, when I heard a groan.

"'Hullo!' I thought, 'what's that?' but I hadn't much time to wonder, for some one crawled out of the dark part of the cave into the light.

"I looked at him, and saw he was dressed in a Scotch dress, but I did not know who he was.

"But he spoke to me, and implored me to save his life; he said he was dying with cold and hunger, and that he had got separated from his companions and had been wandering about the mountains ever since, until he had laid down in the cavern to die.

"I asked him who he was, your royal highness, and then, after a great deal of hesitation, he confessed that he was Prince Charles Edward Stuart, for so he called himself, and begged of me not to betray him.

"There was my thirty thousand pounds, I thought; so I drew my sword and made a lunge at him.

"I wounded him slightly, but, faint and worn out as he was, he drew his own sword and attacked me with the desperation of a dying man.

"Of course you know the end now. I conquered him, cut off his head, and bore it in, and I claim my thirty thousand pounds reward."

"Good," said the duke, who had listened with pleasure to this barbarous tale. "Vera good indeed."

No sooner did he give utterance to this speech, than the soldiers set up a unanimous cheer.

When the sound had died away, one of the inferior officers addressed a few words in German to the duke, who gave a nod for a reply, and said—

"Vera good, mein friend. It is all vera good. But can you take us to the cave where his body may be found?"

"Certainly," replied Turpin, with the greatest readiness. "It is a long way from here, but I can lead you there direct."

"Good, then make von start."

The order to march was given, and then the whole party made their way to the mountain path.

While coming, Dick Turpin had taken the greatest possible notice of his route, so he was able to lead the duke without hesitation to it.

But he did not hurry, for fear his friends should not have had time to leave the place and get fairly out of sight.

For if even a glimpse were to be caught of them it would spoil all, and when in the distance he could perceive the mountain, he did not dare to turn his eyes up to it for fear he should see them, and that those accompanying him should follow the direction of his eyes and see them also.

And, in truth, had he looked up and his eyes been keen enough, he would have seen his comrades where they had taken the first halt, and from which place Claude Duval had detected the soldiers moving across the plain.

Fortunately, however, for all those in whose good fortune we feel an interest, the little plateau before the cavern was reached without a glimpse being caught of them.

The duke had been obliged to dismount at the foot of the mountain and ascend it on foot like the rest, for by nature dukes are no more respected than any other people.

No time was lost in crossing the little open space and penetrating the cavern, for all were filled with curiosity to see the remains of the young prince.

When there was no fire, the interior of the cavern was rather dark—too dark for any objects to be seen with proper plainness.

Turning round, Dick requested a light, but none of those present had the means of obtaining one.

It was then proposed that the body should be dragged outside into the daylight.

The outlines of the still, stark form could just be distinguished from the floor of the cave, and that was all.

But it was sufficient to enable two of the soldiers to catch hold of it by the feet.

In this ignominious manner, then, the body was dragged out on to the plateau.

Headless and besmeared with blood as it was, it presented a most ghastly and horrible appearance, such as would make any heart quail to look upon.

But it had the effect intended.

Whatever doubt might have lingered about the hearts of the duke, his officers, or his men, it was completely dissipated when they saw it.

There could be no mistaking the dress.

It was the same as he had been described as wearing.

Then there was the belt, with its curious workmanship, which was well known to belong to, and be highly prized by, the unfortunate prince, since he had received it at the hands of one very dear to him indeed.

His target, also, as the shield was called, and his sporran, or leather pouch, worn in front of the kilt, all went to place the question of his identity beyond dispute.

A close examination was made of the headless body, and Dick, who wished to quite satisfy them, again unwrapped the head, and placed it on the neck from which it had been taken.

All could see, then, that it had been cut from that, and no other.

The features, too, now that they had quite stiffened in death, and partially disfigured as they were, bore so remarkable a resemblance to those of Charles Stuart as to absolutely startle even Turpin himself.

His heart beat high with hope.

Hitherto the bold and daring scheme had succeeded in a manner that he never could have hoped for.

The duke and every one were perfectly satisfied.

And now Turpin had the other and more difficult portion of the plan to carry out, and that was to obtain the thirty thousand pounds.

This the Duke of Cumberland, in his uncouth manner, was pleased to express his opinion he had fully earned, but, before he could actually receive it, he would have to accompany him to London without delay, and place the head before the king.

This Turpin would, of course, gladly enough have backed out of, but he could not see a means of doing so, and, besides, he thought for so great an end he could afford to incur a little danger.

Having been absent from the road for so long a time, he thought he might almost be forgotten.

At any rate, he should run the risk.

When all had quite satisfied themselves by looking upon the blood-stained corpse, Dick ventured to propose that he should be buried there and then upon the spot.

For some time the sanguinary duke refused to listen to any such suggestion.

His brutal nature would have been better satisfied had they mutilated, in some horrible way, the inanimate remains.

But, in the end, he was prevailed upon to pay this last tribute of respect.

None had spades or shovels wherewith to dig, but Turpin set the example by drawing his sword, and with it turning up the hard rocky earth.

A dozen were ordered to assist him, and, though the progress each individually made was small, yet together it quickly mounted up.

At the expiration of about a quarter of an hour, therefore, a tolerable sized hole had been scooped out of the rock.

It was rather shallow, however, and not very regular in shape.

But it was better than no grave at all.

With very little ceremony the body of the young highlander, who had so bravely died in order that the others might be saved, was thrown into the hole.

Then they began filling in the dirt.

This was an operation that was quickly performed, and the whole was packed in as hard as possible by the men stamping upon it with their feet.

At last the unhallowed funeral was finished, and Dick, again carefully wrapping up the head, followed the duke and his troop from the melancholy spot.

CHAPTER CCXVIII.

THE EXTRAORDINARY MANNER IN WHICH DICK TURPIN REGAINED POSSESSION OF HIS MARE, BLACK BESS.

It was easy to gather from the manner of the duke that he considered his enterprise in the highlands was quite achieved.

He was the victor, and felt elated accordingly.

It will not be hard to believe that he cordially hated all members of the house of Stuart.

He rejoiced, therefore, at having, as he thought, seen the last of the race.

Gladly would he have had all of them exterminated, for he felt that while any of them lived, the members of his family held the English throne by a very uncertain tenure.

He gave orders, therefore, as soon as his troop was again in marching order, to withdraw all the soldiers who had been set to guard the different mountain passes, there being no longer a necessity for their being posted there.

The main body of the army was at Fort Augustus, a considerable distance further north, and it was to this place that, after some deliberation, he made his way.

He would then and there have set out for England, only he felt he could not justly and consistently do so.

Therefore, with an unwilling heart, he took the road to Fort Augustus.

He made all speed there, however, and immediately upon arriving, sent out messengers to the different troops commanding them to return.

Considering the manner in which they were scattered about the country, they reunited in a very short space of time.

It was early one fine morning that the army commenced its return march.

The hearts of all beat high with satisfaction and delight, but no one experienced such a joy as the duke himself did.

He was crafty enough, however, to keep a sharp eye upon Turpin.

Without actually saying as much, he contrived to make him a kind of military prisoner.

Dick Turpin, with the duke and his staff, stood together on the morning when the army began their march, in such a manner that the whole of the troops passed by them.

It was a pleasing and invigorating sight.

In the contemplation of it Dick almost forgot the peril of his situation.

There was something like pride visible in the glance which the commander-in-chief bent upon his soldiers, as, accompanied by bands of martial music, they all marched by.

The greater part was composed of foot-soldiers.

Then came the cavalry.

Suddenly, however, as these were passing by, Dick uttered an exclamation of the most unbounded surprise.

It was so loud as actually to amount to a shout.

The duke turned round.

An angry look was on his face, for he did not know from whose lips the cry had come.

But when he saw it was Turpin, that expression softened a little.

"Your royal highness," cried Dick, "hear me. Call to the men to halt. Do so, I beseech you, it is something of the utmost importance."

The duke muttered something in which the word "donder" could be distinguished, and gave the required command.

It was obeyed with that promptitude upon which generals so much pride themselves.

The progress of the whole was stayed.

Then the duke, in common with all the rest, turned an inquiring look upon Turpin, to know the reason of his sudden ejaculation, and the motive for making the extraordinary request he had.

Respectfully, he advanced towards the duke.

"Your royal highness will, I hope, pardon me when I tell you why I asked you to bring the troops to a halt, but as the cavalry were passing by I saw one man mounted on a black mare which I would swear belongs to me."

Such was the case.

Dick's quick eye had detected from among the horses which the soldiers rode, the familiar form of his own bonny mare, Black Bess.

At first he could hardly believe his own eyes.

He fully believed she was in perfect security in the charge of Sir Kenneth Grant.

And yet here she was before him.

There could be no possible doubt upon the subject. He knew the look of her too well, had seen her too often, to fall into any kind of mistake upon the subject.

And so he called out in the manner we have recorded.

"A horse!" cried the duke. "Donder and blitzen, do you stop the troop for a horse?"

"Excuse me," cried Turpin, and then he paused.

He hardly knew what to say about his mare, or where he had left her.

It would not do to relate just the facts of the case, that was quite clear.

Nor would it do to hesitate.

But Dick was used to doing things upon the spur of the moment, and concocting a tale upon an emergency, and though on this occasion, as we have said, he hesitated, yet it was so slightly as scarcely to be noticed.

"Excuse me, your royal highness, but I have no doubt of what I say. One of your men is riding upon a black mare which belongs to me, and by whom I set great store."

"Donder and blitzen" ——

"One moment more, your royal highness," said Turpin. "I would rather a thousand times surrender the large amount which you acknowledge that I have gained by slaying the Young Pretender than I would part with her."

"But, mein Gott! how did von soldier have von horse of yours?"

"That I cannot tell, your royal highness, but she is mine! She was stolen from me! I don't say that the man who rides her committed the crime, but she has been stolen from me, and I appeal to you as a just and upright man to demand her restoration to me!"

"It is von trifling thing vot for to stop de march! How can you prove your vords? Donder and blitzen, how can you prove dem?"

"Easily, your royal highness," replied Turpin, "if you will only allow me the opportunity."

"The troops is come to von stop! Be quick!"

"I will—I will prove it to you, because she will know me."

"Von horse know you?"

"Even so, your royal highness."

"Mein Gott, dat is good—vera good! Let us see von horse know his master."

"Command the whole regiment before us to dismount, your royal highness, and loose their bridles, and the thing is done."

Filled with surprise, and no small degree of curiosity either, the German duke gave the command to his men.

The regiment, of which Dick spoke, was a troop of horse soldiers.

In number they were about three hundred.

The one who rode Black Bess had, during the colloquy between the duke and the highwayman, got a considerable distance in advance.

A slight bustle and confusion of course ensued upon the obeyal of this command, but it soon subsided.

Every soldier and every horse stood immovable.

"Now, your royal highness," said Dick Turpin, and as he spoke his eyes sparkled with joy and pride, "if I call my mare, and she comes to my side out of all that number, shall you consider it a sufficient proof that she really belongs to me?"

"It will be von vera vonderful zing," said the duke.

"Shall you consider it a proof?"

"Donder and blitzen, yes! I should like to zee se horse or ze mare zat could do it!"

"Then you shall at once, your royal highness, for upon giving the signal, she will make her way to my side in a moment."

From where Turpin stood it was quite impossible for him to see Black Bess, so, of course, it follows that Black Bess could not see him.

But Dick was not afraid of the test he was going to apply, long as was the time he had been separated from his gallant steed.

She had heard and obeyed the sound too often when he was engaged in some perilous highway exploit to forget it now.

Not only the duke, but all those who had heard what had taken place, looked forward to see what would be the result.

All were silent.

Then Dick Turpin turned his face towards the soldiers, so that the signal should be heard with proper plainness.

He looked not, however, particularly in the direction in which he knew Black Bess to be, but straight before him.

Then he gave utterance to a strange chirping sound, such as might be heard at night in a lonely wood, as one nocturnal bird gave a signal to another.

The sound was loud and shrill.

Before, however, its notes had fairly died away, a sudden commotion could be perceived in advance.

But whatever might be the cause, it was quickly over.

With a sudden dash, a horse leaped out into the open space before the soldiers.

It stood there a second, as though in doubt.

Turpin repeated the sound.

It was echoed by a joyful neigh, and the next instant his gallant mare, Black Bess, was at his side.

She rubbed her head gently against his shoulder.

The recognition was complete.

A feeling of the utmost joy filled Dick's breast.

His bonny steed was once more with him in perfect safety.

More than half the peril of his situation seemed to pass away now, and patting her encouragingly upon the neck, he took the bridle in his hand, and led her to where the Duke of Cumberland was standing.

CHAPTER CCXIX.

THE GOVERNOR OF EDINBURGH CASTLE SEEMS TO HAVE SOME DOUBTS ABOUT THE HEAD, AND PROPOSES A MEANS OF SETTING THEM AT REST.

"YOUR royal highness," said Dick, respectfully, raising his hat as he spoke, "are you satisfied that this horse belongs to me, and to no other?"

"Mein Gott! Yah! It is von vera vonderful circumstance. Donder and blitzen! it is more dan von can believe!"

And this last opinion was one that seemed to be shared in by most of those present—that is, if their looks of astonishment could be taken as any guide to their feelings.

When Dick had first taught Black Bess to obey a call from him, in the same manner that a dog would, he had done so under the conviction that it would be of the greatest utility,—but he never dreamed it would be so important as it had proved.

It established his right to her beyond all doubt, a thing which might have been otherwise exceedingly difficult to do.

It should be here stated that a considerable degree of jealousy towards Turpin existed among the officers forming the duke's staff, and they let slip no opportunity of suggesting things to the commander-in-chief which he would never have thought of.

On the present occasion one of them whispered something to the duke which was immediately responded to by a nod.

The officer, then, who was mounted on a beautiful horse, rose forward, and cried out—

"Where is the soldier who rode upon this black horse? Let him stand forward."

In obedience to this command, a soldier stepped out of the ranks, and was led by the officer in front of the duke, who, however, Turpin noticed was getting rather impatient at the delay.

The reader, like Dick, of course anticipates the question about to be asked.

It was how Black Bess had come to be in the soldier's possession.

A great deal would depend upon his answer.

At a sign from the duke, the officer propounded the queries.

"Is that the steed you have been riding upon?"

"It is, sir."

"How long have you had it?"

"It's a mare, sir."

"Never mind that, I ask how long have you had it?"

"Just before the battle of Culloden."

"How just before the battle, didn't you bring it from England?"

"No, sir."

"How was that?"

"The one I had first was shot under me at the beginning of the campaign."

"Well?"

"And this was one that was taken by forced levy."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite, sir."

"From what place was it taken?"

"From the house of Sir Kenneth Grant."

"Sir Kenneth Grant?"

"Yes, sir; if you will remember, some doubts were entertained of his loyalty, and so, to prove it, he allowed what was wanted to be taken."

"And you took this horse from his stables?"

"I did, sir."

"That is enough, then."

"May I venture to hope, your royal highness, that you are quite satisfied now that you find it is as I said. Sir Kenneth Grant is a friend of our family, and I left my horse in his stable."

"It is von enough," said the duke.

"Many thanks," replied Turpin; "and I hope you will accept my apologies for having delayed you so long."

"Mein Gott! yes. Forward!"

The order was given to resume the march.

Turpin, with as light a heart as any man in Scotland, despite the imminency of his danger, mounted once more his bonny mare, Black Bess.

He had been full of anxiety to know how he should gain possession of her, when, lo! she was, by a series of apparently adverse circumstances, placed in his hands.

The officers, however, took good care to keep close guard around him.

Many were suspicious.

And so, as the army was marching southward, it happened that Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack caught sight of Dick Turpin, escorted like a prisoner, and mounted on bonny Black Bess.

It will now be understood how it was that the prince and his followers reached Lochnanuagh without meeting with any difficulty.

The Duke of Cumberland was quite firmly impressed with the idea that he had seen the end of the Young Pretender, and who can wonder at his holding such a belief?

The consequence was that he no longer troubled himself to keep guard or to send out parties.

He was desirous of reaching London with as little delay as possible.

Already he fancied he felt upon his brows the laurel wreath which would be awarded to him for the prompt manner in which he had crushed this rebellion, which had at one time threatened to completely overthrow the existing government.

With little of interest to relate to the reader, the army reached the city of Edinburgh.

The whole distance had been performed by means of forced marches, and when they reached the ancient city, a rest became imperative for both man and beast.

They found that the account of what had taken place had already preceded them, and the streets were consequently thronged with the inhabitants when they arrived.

To gratify these, the duke caused the head to be set up on a tall pike, and carried in such a manner that it might be seen by all.

The greatest curiosity was manifested respecting it.

The principal portion of the army took up their quarters in the ancient castle, and it was to this place that Turpin was drafted.

The governor of the castle received the duke and his staff, and, as a token of respect, was allowed to inspect the head.

Some days having now elapsed since it was cut from the body a considerable alteration had taken place in its looks

The governor, however—who had seen the young prince himself upon the occasion of the rebel army taking possession of Edinburgh—when he looked at it, shook his head with a puzzled air.

Turpin, who was present, noticed the circumstance, misgivingly.

But let the governor's suspicions have been what they might, he did not give utterance to them.

Dick was rendered all the more uneasy by this occurrence.

He felt he was now treading upon very dangerous ground.

Yet his heart did not fail him in the least, and, having carried out the enterprise so far successfully, encouraged him to go on.

Besides, the least attempt to draw back would have the effect of bringing danger upon him.

He resolved to stand his ground.

A repast for the officers was laid in one of the largest apartments in the castle, at which Dick and the governor sat down.

As a matter of course, after the meal was over, the conversation turned upon the Young Pretender.

But Turpin noticed that the governor managed to bring up the subject.

What motive had he in doing this?

Dick knew not, but he maintained his composure.

The story of the manner in which the young prince's head had been brought before their notice was told over again.

"It has just occurred to me," said the governor of the castle, after listening attentively to all that had been said, and having come to the conclusion that he had heard the whole of the facts. "It has just occurred to me that there is an easy way to settle all doubts."

"Doubts!" said Turpin, rather fiercely, "who dares insinuate"——

"No one, my good sir," replied the governor with provoking calmness. "I do not wish to insinuate anything."

"Then, sir, just allow me to ask what you mean by doubts?"

"I can easily do so, if you will give me the opportunity."

Turpin bowed, as though he wished for the explanation to be given at once.

No one, to have looked in his face, could have read the feelings of his heart.

"When I said doubts," begun the governor, "perhaps I was not altogether right in using the word. In fact, I admit I was not. The fact is, although the story is rather extraordinary, it seems to be amply substantiated by facts. Now, you admit to solve doubts, you led the duke to the cavern where the body was to be found. Did you not?"

"I certainly did," replied Turpin, "and what they saw there fully bore out what I said."

"Just so."

"Well, then?"

"It was evidence proving the fact, was it not?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Now, in my opinion, any further evidence as to the identity of the head ought to be satisfactory to all parties, and especially so to you, for it would still further establish your right to the reward."

"I am well aware of that, and so far from objecting to have any confirmatory evidence brought forward, I shall only be too glad, for the very reasons you have named.

The governor looked at him keenly.

"But," continued Turpin, "when you spoke of doubts, I naturally took exception to the expression."

"Oh! just so. You see it is all right."

"You have quite satisfied me. For my own part, I must admit that the whole affair is singular enough."

"I think it remarkably so. Poor young man! I feel sorry for him. His wild ambitious dream is over now."

"And with it, I fear, all hopes of the Stuart family holding the sceptre of this country or England," said Turpin.

"Donder and blitzen! I say yah to zat. Vern good. But, mein Gott, governor, what was it you did say about de more of von proof? Let us hear vat zat might be at se vonce."

CHAPTER CCXX.

A PRISONER IS BROUGHT UP FROM THE DUNGEONS OF THE CASTLE TO IDENTIFY THE HEAD.

It was the Duke of Cumberland who spoke.

There was no mistaking the voice, and the utterance was now rendered more than ever unintelligible by the wine he had drunk.

He had been a silent, but not unobservant, listener to the conversation between Dick Turpin and the governor.

He at once took hold of the idea of gaining some additional testimony.

It was only natural that he should.

And when a notion once took root in his mind, the obstinacy of his disposition would for ever preclude all hopes of removing it.

An acute observer of human nature, Dick had been able to come to a correct conclusion as to the duke's character, and this speech of his added greatly to his uneasiness.

What kind of test was going to be applied to the spurious head he could not think.

Of course, he dreaded the inquiry, for reasons well known to the reader.

He was powerless to act.

He was like a rudderless ship, borne onwards by some irresistible current.

It might have been fancy, but Dick thought he could detect upon the governor's face a look of malicious satisfaction.

Could it be possible that he knew who he was?

Could it be possible that he, by some inexplicable means, divined the cheat which he had kept up so long?

He could not tell.

He shut his teeth to maintain his calmness, while the governor replied to the duke's question.

"Your royal highness, I am pleased to find that you think this so important a matter, and that you wish to know the means of placing the identity of the head beyond all doubt. It happens that I am in a position to do this."

"Mein Gott! Go on."

"You must know, then, your royal highness, that I have at this moment a prisoner in the dungeons beneath the castle, the personal attendant or valet of the Young Pretender."

"Valet?" thought Dick, and then in a moment he remembered who he was.

He had disappeared at the early portion of the rebellion, and was, as he thought, slain.

But, by the governor's words, it would seem that he lived.

"With the permission of your grace," continued the governor, "I will have this man removed from his place of confinement, and brought hither."

"Yah—yah."

"When, without knowing the reason for which he is sent, the head shall be placed before him, and, as the condition of his liberty, he shall swear whether it is the head of his late master, the Young Pretender, or not."

"Mein Gott! Yes, let it be done. Donder and blitzen! As you say, Meinheer Governor, we shall know zen for shure."

The governor bowed, and, summoning an attendant, gave orders for the valet to be removed from his dungeon, and brought there without delay.

But little was said after the man had left.

All were anxious and excited.

Dick found himself the cynosure of all eyes.

He had trouble enough to maintain his composure without this addition.

But, by a rare command of the facial muscles, he withstood the scrutiny, seeming in no way interested—as though he felt quite assured of the result.

Such, however, was very far indeed from being the state of his mind.

Upon the next few moments depended everything.

The prince and his friends, he hoped, were by this time completely out of danger, and yet circumstances might have arisen to make their quitting Scotland impossible.

He had no means of telling.

Should the man who was about to be presented declare the head not to be his master's, Dick felt his position would be truly desperate.

Perhaps hopeless would be a better word.

Could he by any means communicate with this man, and let him know the secret, all would be well.

To save his prince he would swear the head was his.

But unforewarned—without the least idea of what had taken place—and offered so powerful an inducement for speaking the truth, what was to be expected?

The worst, unquestionably.

Intimately knowing the prince, as he would, from the fact of his being his personal attendant, and having filled the situation of valet, he would be able to pronounce with certainty that it was not the head of the young prince.

What was to be done?

Nothing.

Dick felt it was so, and, therefore, with the best grace he could, resigned himself to the current of events.

Luck had hitherto befriended him in many a perilous situation, and he could only hope that it would do so now.

He had one consolation under his difficulties, though it was so slight a one as to be scarcely deserving of the name.

Should the head pass this ordeal triumphantly, he might laugh at everything else, save positive proof that the Pretender was yet alive.

Only a few minutes actually elapsed from the time the attendant left the room until he returned, but it seemed an age.

He brought word that the prisoner would arrive in a moment.

The door through which he would come now became the centre of attraction, to which all eyes were turned.

No one spoke.

Presently, however, there was heard outside the door, in the stone corridor, the tramp of martial footsteps.

A voice cried, "halt."

Then the door was thrown open, and the prisoner marshalled into the apartment.

In obedience to a sign from the governor, the little truss which had escorted him separated, and allowed a view of the prisoner to be obtained.

He was an ordinary-looking man, with nothing special either in his face or figure to require description.

He had that unmistakable appearance about him, however, which always enables any one to distinguish a servant from a gentleman.

He looked around surprisedly, for he had not been informed for what reason he had been summoned.

Oh! how fervently Dick wished that he could communicate invisibly with him, but he feared to gaze at him even, lest the action should be taken notice of.

Events must take their course.

The bold highwayman felt his heart beat at an unusual rate.

"Your royal highness," said the governor, "shall I interrogate this man?"

"Yah! make von begin."

The governor turned to the prisoner.

"What is your name?" he asked.

The man hesitated a moment, and then replied—

"David Morrison."

"Good! And what was your last occupation?"

"That of valet."

"To whom?"

"To Prince Charles Stuart."

"There is no such prince! However, listen to me, and remember that your life depends upon the answers you give!"

No reply came from the prisoner's lips.

"If you were valet to this young man, it follows that you must be intimately acquainted with his personal appearance. Is it so?"

"I—I know him," said the valet, stammeringly.

"Enough. Should you be able to recognise him?"

"Why—why do you ask?"

"Reply to my question," said the governor, sternly, "and never mind the reasons. Should you be able to recognise Charles Stuart?"

"From a thousand!"

"That is sufficient, then; you shall be put to the test. Speak truly, and you shall be immediately set at liberty. I promise this in the name of the commander-in-chief."

The man's eyes brightened at the prospect of quitting his prison with life.

"Where is the young prince?" he asked; "has he fallen a captive into your hands?"

This speech was quite conclusive.

He clearly had not heard the intelligence that the Young Pretender was supposed to be no more.

Dick's heart sank.

He felt certain that this man would immediately be able to detect the deception.

It was impossible for him to do otherwise.

In his joy he would be sure to declare it was not his master's head, and rejoice that he was yet alive.

He could never tell, Dick thought, that he would be rendering his prince an essential service by declaring that to be his head when he knew it was not.

Turpin's agitation increased.

By the order of the governor, the ghastly head had been sent for.

It was brought in wrapped up in cloths.

This was done in such a manner that no one could have guessed what it was.

The valet looked on curiously and inquiringly.

Not long, however, was his state of suspense allowed to continue.

One by one the cloths that enveloped it were removed.

Then the terrible-looking object was disclosed.

A shout of horror came from Morrison's lips.

He evidently recognised the head.

With no little satisfaction, Turpin noted this.

His hopes, too, revived when he perceived another circumstance.

From a variety of causes, such as its transit from place to place, in which it had received several contusions, and the partial progress of decay which had already began to make its loathsome presence apparent, it had lost that sharpness of outline which it had formerly had, and consequently, those finer features, which would have enabled one to identify it, were no longer visible.

CHAPTER CCXXI.

DICK FEARS THAT, AFTER ALL, THE SPURIOUS HEAD WILL BRING HIM MORE TROUBLE THAN PROFIT.

When Morrison uttered the cry, he would have sprung forward to make a closer examination of what, at the first glance, he had taken to be the head of young Charles Stuart, but the firm grasp of his captors held him back.

The governor spoke—

"Release him," he said, "and allow him to come forward. Now, examine the head, and tell us, on your life, whether it is the head of the Young Pretender."

This was said to Morrison, who, as soon as he was released, had sprung forward.

The head was on one corner of the table at which the duke and his officers were sitting.

As soon as he got near, the valet looked for a moment, fixedly, at the horrible countenance.

Then he sank down upon his knees before it, and covered his face with his hands.

Dick grew more hopeful still, but yet he dreaded a discovery being made.

Preserving the same unruffled demeanour, however, as he had hitherto done, he bent all his attention to the kneeling servant.

"Speak," said the governor, "and tell me whether this is the head of your young master."

The valet removed his hands.

His cheeks were wet with tears.

"It is he, poor young man," he said, in a broken voice. "Alas! that I should ever have lived to see this day. Alas! that such should have been his untimely fate. He was a good master to me. I shall never have such another."

He recovered his face, and rebowed his head.

The Duke of Cumberland uttered a sigh of relief, and his usual exclamation—

"Mein Gott!"

The valet surely was deceived.

But the governor, unwilling to believe that his suspicions were unfounded, was very loath to quit the subject.

"Rise," he said, "and be a man. Look again at the head, and repeat your assurance that it is your master's."

In obedience to this command, Morrison stood up.

He looked in the governor's face with surprise, and then turned to the duke and his companions.

He could not understand why they wished him to be so particular.

Their doubts communicated themselves to him.

Perhaps, after all, he thought, his beloved master was not dead.

Perhaps this was the head of some one resembling him.

His face became animated with the hope that his master might after all be alive.

Now was the danger.

Suddenly a thought seemed to strike him.

Tremblingly he approached the head, and put back the hair from the forehead near the right temple.

He started, and a half-suppressed cry came from his lips.

To Dick it was perfectly intelligible.

He closed his teeth, and drew in his breath.

The valet, doubtless, had suddenly recollected some mark by which he could tell for certain whether it was the prince's head.

Dick knew the mark for which he looked.

He had once seen it.

It was during their stay in the mountain cavern.

On the prince's right temple, and close to the hair, was a kind of mole, or fleshy excrescence of a very remarkable character, and any one having once seen it would certainly know it again.

Unquestionably it was this for which the valet looked.

He would not find it.

Turpin knew that well enough, and finally gave himself up for lost.

To conceal his agitation, he took up the glass before him, and raised it to his lips.

But his fingers refused to grasp it properly, and it fell with a loud crash to the floor.

This had the effect of turning all eyes towards him.

He laughed lightly, and muttered an excuse about his carelessness.

Among the rest the valet turned.

His eye fell upon Turpin's countenance.

He knew him instantly.

He nearly betrayed his recognition, but, by great presence of mind, he controlled himself.

Then a fresh current of ideas rushed through his mind.

He bent down once more over the head.

Dick Turpin he knew to be one of the prince's most devoted adherents.

What did he do, then, in the enemy's camp.

Why should he be here?

The mole, too, which he had seen a thousand times was absent from the head on the table before him.

Was it some deep laid plan to pass off a spurious head, and so allow the prince a chance of escape?

He thought so.

When once the idea took possession of his mind, it strengthened every moment.

Should he befriend his prince?

Unquestionably.

It was his duty.

But how was he to do it?

Was he to declare the fraud, and say the head before him was not that of his master?

Or was he to say it was?

The question was a difficult one.

How should he decide?

He determined to look at Turpin.

By the expression of his countenance, he judged he should be able to tell which he ought to do.

These thoughts had swept through his brain in an infinitesimal portion of time.

In fact, while he made, or affected to make, an examination of the prince's countenance.

Then he raised his head, taking care as he did so, to look at Turpin.

The latter had his eyes fixed upon the valet, and he gave a look of such deep meaning that it was quite impossible to mistake it.

Fortunately this was not observed.

The attention of all just then was centred upon the valet.

"Speak," said the governor, "and speak truly. Is that the head of the Young Pretender?"

"It is," said Morrison, firmly, "and I am quite ready now to swear to it at any moment after the examination I have made."

Turpin smiled triumphantly.

The danger was past.

The governor had a look of deep vexation on his visage.

It was clear he wished the decision to be otherwise.

"Stop!" he said. "How can you tell? How can you make so sure?"

"I knew him."

"I am aware of that, but why did you look at the right temple?"

As he spoke, the governor leant forward in his chair, and raised the hair in the same manner as the valet had done.

Here was a new difficulty.

But luckily the valet, while looking for the mole, had noticed a slight scar upon the temple, so he did not hesitate to say—

"I had often noticed on the prince's left temple a certain mark."

"And what was it?"

"A scar, almost imperceptible, but yet to be distinguished, on the left temple."

"It is here!"

"Your royal highness," said Turpin, who felt sure the danger had now passed away, "I really hope this testimony will be sufficient."

"Mein Gott, yes!"

"I am glad to hear you say as much. That I felt very anxious I cannot deny; but, then, if this man had declared it was not the prince's head, I should have been in a very awkward position, and not only that, have lost the reward as well!"

The duke nodded.

"But now, when it is impossible for there to exist a doubt, I do hope you will treat, or cause me to be treated, in a less suspicious manner than heretofore."

"How?"

"I will explain, your grace. Wherever I have moved I have found an armed party at my heels, which is exceedingly disagreeable, but not only that, I have been deprived of my weapons."

"It zall be altered. Give me your hand; I zall recommend you to ze king in London."

"Thanks, your grace!"

"As for zis man, ze prince's valet, he zall consider he has earned von freedom, but he must us accompany to ze king."

"I am willing," said the valet, who, with the natural perspicacity of a Scotchman, had divined pretty correctly the state of affairs, and was only too glad of an opportunity of serving this last scion of the house of Stuart.

The governor was thus completely discomfited.

It was not, however, out of any feeling to Dick Turpin that he had spoken as he did, but he was of an incredulous disposition, and would never believe anything until it was incontestibly proved to be right.

That Dick had found it very disagreeable and uncomfortable to be so closely watched and to be disarmed, and he received the assurance that it should be altered with the utmost pleasure.

And so this event, which looked at first so unfavourable to him, really turned out to his advantage in more ways than one

In life how often is this the case?

It was decided that the troops should remain in Edinburgh twenty-four hours, in order to thoroughly refresh themselves.

Now Dick, it must be understood, had latterly had another inconvenience to put up with.

And that was, he was short of that most essential requisite, money.

But this he had been careful to keep secret.

Now that a close watch was no longer to be kept upon him, he felt he might replenish his purse.

In the evening, therefore, he obtained a pass from the Duke of Cumberland to allow him egress from the castle, ostensibly to pay a visit to some friends of his.

In reality, to resume his old life as a Knight of the Road.

CHAPTER CCXXII.

DICK TURPIN ONCE MORE RESUMES HIS OLD VOCATION OF KNIGHT OF THE ROAD, AND MEETS WITH AN ADVENTURE.

With a very great amount of diffidence and reluctance the author of "Black Bess" ventures for the first time to address himself personally to his numerous readers.

But let it be clearly understood that it is necessity, not choice, which has dictated this step.

That the present romance has achieved a success totally without parallel in the annals of literature, is a fact which must be patent to all.

For this amount of patronage the author begs, in the first place, to tender his sincerest thanks.

But the extraordinary success of the present work, however gratifying it may be to the author, has had a contrary effect upon many others.

Envy, the most despicable and yet the most prevalent passion to which humanity is prone, has been plentifully engendered by it.

Other publishers, jealous of the approbation with which the present work has been universally received, have been instigated by this passion—not in a fair spirit of competition, or the desire of pleasing the public—to put forth other works of a similar character, in order that by so doing the sale of the present one should be injured.

But all these attempts, the author is proud and happy to say, have signally and deservedly failed, and he would not have alluded to the matter at all except for the following reason.

About a month or five weeks ago, a work was put forth of a character precisely similar to this, and, so far as the printing goes, as close an imitation as it is possible to make.

Not content, however, with trading in a disreputable manner upon this work, and introducing Dick Turpin as the hero, the unscrupulous and dishonourable proprietor has had the audacity to print in large letters upon the outside of the wrapper the words—a "Companion to 'Black Bess; or, the Knight of the Road,'"

so as to deceive the public by inducing the belief that it was from the pen of the same writer.

Now, what the author of "Black Bess; or, the Knight of the Road," wishes to say to his readers distinctly and emphatically is, that he has no connection whatever with this work. It is got up solely with the view of doing him an injury, and such being the case, he hopes that his readers will not in any way individually give the least encouragement to this bare-faced imposition.

Unfortunately the law, stringent as it is in most things, is very lax in that of copyright, or protecting an author's prescriptive title to his work, or otherwise legal steps would have been taken to suppress its issue.

But the same effect will be produced if the readers of this work refuse to purchase it, for let them bear in mind the fact that every copy they purchase assists in the maintenance of a fraud, and inflicts a direct injury upon the author.

One by one the puny and disreputable attempts to supplant him in the favour of his subscribers has proved abortive. They have lingered out a painful existence, died away, and been forgotten.

But "Black Bess" has had a uniformly large and steady circulation from the first, and the author here promises that no effort shall be wanting on his part to retain it.

At the present moment there is only one work by his hand besides this in circulation, and this is entitled "Blueskin," the only work that can, with any justice, be styled a companion to "Black Bess."

This has been mentioned because, not content with what has been described, the proprietor of the disreputable work in question has endeavoured, by distorting the words, to make it appear to be written by the author of this romance.

Under all these circumstances, it was felt that for once the subscribers to this work should be appealed to, and urged to use their best exertions in putting an end to such unfair and disgraceful competition.

The author, however, would wish to say one word more before he parts company with his readers.

Letters have from time to time been forwarded to him, containing the query "is 'Black Bess' a true story?"

All of these the author would refer to the first portion of chapter the sixth.

But, in addition to what is there set down, it may be stated that the chief incidents are strictly true, and as the narrative proceeds, it will be found that the greatest pains will be taken to make the terminations of the careers of the four highwaymen correct.

With these words the author takes his leave, but not without again expressing his cordial thanks for the support and favour they have so steadily accorded to his efforts.

Armed with the pass which the Duke of Cumberland had given him, Dick Turpin ordered his mare, Black Bess, to be saddled, and, when the night had fully come, sallied out into the silent streets.

Soon, however, he left the city behind, and gained the open country.

Then, when he reined in his steed upon the highway, and listened for the approach of any travellers, a wild sort of glee filled his heart, so forcibly was the old time brought back to him.

When he reflected upon the strange life he had led during the past few months, he could scarcely believe that it was not a dream.

The absence and perilous position of his three companions soon made it seem reality.

A deep shudder involuntarily swept over him as he thought of the peril he had so safely passed through that afternoon.

His life then had hung upon a thread.

And now he is once more the Knight of the Road—bold, dashing, and chivalrous as he had been in former times.

He wondered what had taken place in London during his absence, and whether he had been forgotten.

But especially did the recollections of those who had proved themselves his friends in the hour when they were most needed occupy his mind, and he felt like one who had long been absent in some foreign country, and who was looking forward to a return to his native land.

But a peculiar movement on the part of Black Bess soon roused him from his reverie.

It was one that she was wont to give, and signified the approach of some vehicle along the road.

He listened, and found that the warning given by the faithful creature was a real one.

Some one was coming.

A better position than that which he had taken up could scarcely have been found.

The night was dark, but clear.

Right and left of him, to a considerable distance in both directions, was the broad high-road.

Behind him was a tall and closely-grown hedge, which served as a most excellent background.

In the distance the forms both of himself and his mare were invisible.

Grasping a large holster pistol firmly in his right hand, which he had previously ascertained to be ready for immediate use, he waited.

The sound of the approaching traveller could now be heard with very great distinctness.

Although he had been so long differently employed, Dick had not forgotten his old skill, and, as he listened, he could tell with certainty that it was a vehicle on two wheels, drawn by one horse that was coming.

The speed was enough to show that it was of some light character.

It was from the direction of the city that the sound came.

For this he was glad.

The probability is, that had it been going the reverse way, he would have allowed it to pass unmolested.

A recognition would have been awkward.

A minute more, and then he saw the faint flashing of two carriage lamps.

When he first caught sight of them they looked like two tiny stars behind a vapoury cloud, but they rapidly increased in size and brightness, until at length they shed a light all round them, illuminating the trees and hedges and mossy banks which skirted the highway.

The light, however, was perplexing to Dick's vision, and he was unable to see what was coming, or who was seated in it.

He had to judge by his ear alone.

At length, having waited till the vehicle was nearly opposite to him, he darted out from his place of partial concealment.

"Halt!" he cried, in loud, deep tones, such as would arrest the attention of any one. "Halt, I say, or I fire!"

A faint shriek followed his words, and upon looking closer, Dick could see that the vehicle he had stopped was a kind of tilbury, a conveyance at that time very much in use, and that two persons were seated in it.

One was a female, and it was unquestionably from her lips that the faint shriek had come.

The other was a man.

He held the reins in one hand and a whip in the other, but upon hearing Turpin's summons, he dropped the latter and drew a pistol, the trigger of which he pulled with great rapidity.

The aim he had taken was a good one, and the career of the gallant highwayman would then and there have been brought to a close but for one circumstance.

The hammer snapped upon the lock, and the powder in the pan flashed, but the pistol did not explode.

It ought to be understood that pistols in those days were made rather differently to what they are now.

The invention of the percussion cap, which makes missing fire a very rare circumstance indeed, was not then known.

In place of it there was a piece of flint, the spark from which set fire to the powder in the pan, and that was communicated to the pistol.

But if the powder was to shake out or get damp, or the small touch-hole get clogged up, a missfire would be the inevitable result.

CHAPTER CCXXIII

DICK TURPIN STOPS THE TRAVELLERS ON THE HIGH-ROAD, BUT HAS TO FLY FOR HIS LIFE.

With a bitter curse the traveller flung the useless weapon in the roadway.

Ere he could draw another from his pocket, or urge his horse forward, Dick Turpin grasped him by the throat.

He pressed the muzzle of a pistol against his temples.

The female who was with him uttered a succession of shrieks of so piercing a character, that were any one within half-a-mile of the spot, they would certainly hear her.

"Now," said Turpin, "you have tried to take my life, and there is no reason whatever why I should spare you. Silence!" he added, turning to the woman, "or you will not live five minutes longer!"

This threat, uttered in a cool, resolute tone, had its full effect upon the woman, for she ceased her cries at once.

Then Dick turned to the man.

"Hand over what valuables and money you carry with you, and no further violence will be offered. If you resist you cannot save yourself, and will only have your own folly to reproach for ill-usage."

The grasp Dick had of the man's throat was a very tight one, and he continued the pressure so long that he was scarcely able to move.

"Give up your money, John," said the woman, "and save your life. The one you can replace, but not the other."

"Spoken like a sensible woman," cried Dick, releasing the man's throat. "Take your wife's advice, for such she is, I fancy, and make certain of this, that if you attempt to move in the least, or try to injure me, the lives of both of you will pay the penalty. In general I am a temperate man, but when my temper is roused, I am a desperate one. Quick! Hand over!"

The traveller was about to comply with this forcible request, when there suddenly arose upon the night air shouts of many voices, and the trampling of many horses' feet.

A curse came from Dick's lips as he heard both the sounds, for it looked very much as though he was going to have all his trouble for nothing.

But the traveller seemed to draw hope from it.

Turpin, however, was determined not to let his prey slip through his fingers if he could help it, and though he felt he was running a great risk, he did not change his position in the slightest degree, but said—

"Quick! quick! On your life, quick! Hand over your money, I say! If you hesitate or palter with me, you are a dead man! Quick, I say!"

"Give it him, John! give it him!" said the woman again, in an imploring and terrified tone of voice. "Give it to him! It is not much for you to lose, and I am sure it will be best."

But the husband disregarded the wife's appeal.

Louder and louder grew the shouts, and the trampling of hoofs, and every second served to bring them frightfully near.

That they were some persons who had heard the wife's screams, and were hastening in the direction of the sounds, there could be little doubt.

They were in considerable force, let them be who they might.

Dick could tell that.

He knew that it would be madness for him to attempt to cope with such numbers.

They were not yet in sight, so he did not move.

He pressed the pistol against the man's head.

"Now," he cried, "you have one chance of your life! Hand me over your money!"

The wife was too much alarmed to speak.

But the husband, gathering courage from the nearness of the new comers, replied, resolutely—

"Never!"

At the same moment he tried to wrest the pistol from Dick's hands.

But the highwayman was too quick for him.

"I will count three," he said, with the most perfect coolness, "and if, when I pronounce the last, you have not handed me your purse, I will surely fire!"

The horsemen still came on.

"One!" cried Dick.

He held the pistol in such a manner that the muzzle completely covered the traveller's person.

"Two!" he cried. "I shall say three, and then if you are still obstinate, your death be upon your own head!"

The traveller, seeing the determined character of the man he had to deal with, and that he was a highwayman of no ordinary kind, at last saw the prudence of sacrificing what money he might carry with him rather than his life.

Accordingly, he produced from a breast-pocket a heavy and good-sized purse.

This Turpin took instantly.

He was only just in time.

About a hundred yards off was a body of horsemen.

There must have been from a dozen to a score of them.

That he was seen seemed pretty certain, for all uttered a loud shout.

But Turpin, having accomplished his ends in procuring a sum of money, was all right.

Placing the purse in his pocket, he turned Black Bess's head in the direction of the open country, and giving her the rein, darted off at a tremendous pace.

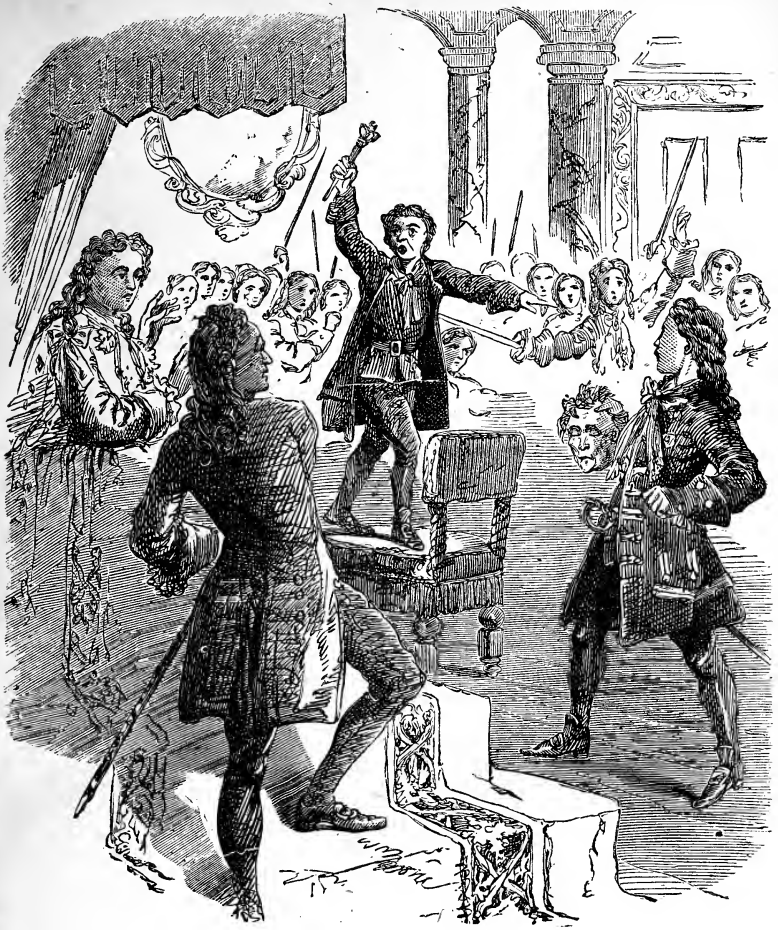
The angry tones of the man's voice, who had parted with his money so reluctantly, rose for a moment on the night air, and then he was out of earshot.

The horsemen, whoever they were, did not wait long to listen to his complaints and expostulations, but prepared to give chase to the highwayman.

But they knew not the matchless steed upon which he was mounted, or they would have saved themselves the trouble of their ride.

Dick would gladly have learned who and what they were, but he could not quite see how he was to do this.

He scarcely thought they were police-officers, but let them be whom they might, he determined to lead them a good dance across the country.



Accordingly, he tightened the rein a little, and reduced Black Bess's speed.

A clear level road was before him, though where it led, or how far it went, he had no idea.

The beat of horses' hoofs at full gallop soon reached his ear.

Still he slackened his pace, determined, if possible, to obtain a glimpse of his foes and, ascertain their character.

A shout from the rear made him aware of their proximity, so he turned round to look.

[DICK TURPIN IS DETECTED IN THE SALOON.]

All he could see was a dense body of men on horseback Beyond that he could form no idea of their appearance whatever.

Still lingering, he nearly paid the penalty of his life, for the sharp report of a pistol arose, and bullet whistled past his chee...

It was immediately followed by another, which showed him the nature of the men with whom he had to deal.

To tarry longer would be insanity, so he gave up the attempt of endeavouring to ascertain who they were, and dropped once more the reins upon his mare's neck.

She had been all the time anxious to proceed, and the moment she felt her head at freedom, she sped over the ground with a succession of long, sweeping leaps.

Each one was made apparently without the least exertion, so gently and gracefully was the action performed.

It was, however, a pace that got over the ground with wondrous celerity.

Before he could get out of pistol range, though, he was saluted with several more shots.

By none of them was he injured.

This is not to be wondered at.

Those who have tried to take aim with a fire-arm while riding at full gallop well know how extremely difficult it is to hit the object aimed at.

For this reason, then, Turpin was unhurt.

So soon as he was at a safe distance once more, he proceeded to carry out his original intention.

The reason that principally moved him was this.

He did not wish to exhaust his mare's strength any more than he could help.

A brief time only would have to elapse, and then the march would be resumed—a march more tedious and tiring than the preceding one.

By contriving to keep a little ahead of them, Dick fancied he should soon tire their patience out, and so be able to return to the city at a gentle pace.

Had he known who his pursuers were, he would have at once dismissed the idea as absurd.

But he was in ignorance of it, and was likely to remain so

Most perseveringly they kept upon his track, and by the sound alone could he tell that they were sparing neither whip nor spur to urge their horses onward.

In a short time he found it necessary to increase the speed of his own mare, in order to maintain the same distance between them.

This was not what he wished.

Still he kept on, wishing, if possible, to tire them out.

But of this there seemed no prospect.

On the contrary, it looked as though they would tire out him.

Reluctantly, then, Dick was forced to the conclusion that he would have to change his tactics.

His pursuers were not to be easily shaken off.

This gave him a little anxiety.

It seemed to show that they had some stronger motive for pursuing him than mere desire of assisting the man in the gig to recover his loss.

But if they were not officers, what special motive could they have?

Dick knew not, and finding it impossible to come to a satisfactory conclusion respecting it, ceased to perplex his brain, but turned the whole of his attention to getting away from them.

The only means by which this could be done would be the adoption of some stratagem that would send them on a wrong track.

He looked round right and left.

On either side of him were tall hedgerows and meadows beyond.

Should he take to these, and striking across them, find a circuitous way back to Edinburgh?

He thought so.

But he would have to get completely out of earshot, first, because if he did not they would know, by the cessation of the beat of the horse's hoofs that he had stopped.

Accordingly, he spoke a few encouraging words to his matchless steed.

As he did so he gradually slackened the reins.

Then, as an additional inducement for her to make greater speed, he pressed his heels gently against her flanks.

She responded by a slight neigh, and dashed forward at a pace that fairly made Dick shut his teeth together, and hold his breath.

CHAPTER CCXXIV.

DICK TURPIN, BY A STRANGE ACCIDENT, DISCOVERS WHO AND WHAT HIS PURSUERS ARE.

For not more than three minutes did Dick Turpin allow his mare to continue this tremendous pace.

At the expiration of that time, he began gradually to rein her in.

He continued doing so until she came to a dead stop.

Then he listened.

Faintly, very faintly, but increasing each moment in loudness and distinctness, he could hear the tramp, tramp, of his pursuers.

But he considered, from the gradual manner in which he had reined Bess in, that they would imagine rather that he had distanced them, rather than that he had stopped.

As for himself, he considered that the time he halted that he was out of hearing.

The sound of their approach still came to his ears, but then they were in large numbers, and the noise they would make would be proportionably greater than his.

But there was no time to lose.

Drawing back to the one side of the road, he prepared to take a leap over the hedgerow into the meadows.

But while he did so, his quick ear caught another sound.

It was very slight, and one that might well have escaped observation.

He listened.

But only for a second.

It was merely to assure himself that he was right.

A single horseman was approaching him.

He was coming, too, at a sharp pace.

This circumstance, slight as it was, filled Dick's breast with hope.

It afforded him the chance he wished for of knowing his pursuers.

Without longer hesitation, he patted Bess upon the neck, and put her to the leap.

There was a very short distance to run and give a spring, but it was enough.

She cleared the obstruction gallantly, and alighted upon the soft turf in the meadow with a scarcely perceptible shock.

At this moment the moon, which during the whole of the night had not once permitted her face to be seen, broke forth.

The landscape for miles around was lighted up as if by magic.

It would scarcely have been possible, at the present juncture of affairs, to have found a circumstance more unfavourable to the highwayman than this was.

To have struck across the meadows would have been ridiculous.

His pursuers would have seen him instantly.

There was only one resource.

That was, to lie down close under the hedge, and trusting to their passing the spot without noticing him.

It was running a great risk.

He resolved upon it, however, because he felt certain that it was the best thing to be done.

Short as was the time which had elapsed since he first halted, it was long enough to enable his pursuers to get close to where he was hidden.

A minute or two more and they would be in sight.

The horseman, too, that he had heard coming from the opposite direction, was now as nearly as he could guess at an equal distance from him.

If this was the case, the meeting would take place just in front of where he was.

Well tutored as Bess was, he had but little difficulty in forcing her to lie down.

In order to keep her still, he put his hand upon her head.

There was one thing which reconciled Turpin, in a great measure, to the risk he was going to run.

He should be able to see his pursuers.

By parting the hedge a little with one hand, he could see very plainly into the roadway, while the chance of any one seeing him was very small indeed.

There was little or no shadow cast by the hedges on the high-road, and the rays of the moon lighted it up with great distinctness.

The longer Dick listened to the trampling hoofs, the more he became convinced that his previous calculation was correct, and that a meeting would take place as nearly opposite to him as possible.

His patience was not much taxed.

By the time he had completed all his preparations, and taken up a convenient position, they were not more than a hundred yards distant.

He heard his pursuers give a loud shout when they saw the single horseman riding towards them.

Of course, owing to the moon's light, they could not see him a long way off.

The cry was one of astonishment, and Turpin interpreted it as signifying that they had fallen into the very natural mistake of supposing that the reason they heard the tramp of hoofs before them grow plainer and plainer was, because they fancied they were gaining upon the highwayman.

It might have been that the moon, happening to peep forth at the moment she did, was an unfortunate one for Dick, but it was, most assuredly, a fortunate one for the traveller.

Had they not seen him, his life would probably have been sacrificed.

On came the little troop, and then they pulled up with a jerk.

The traveller also reined in his steed.

They were face to face.

Dick had an excellent view of both.

The traveller was an elderly man, mounted upon a dappled-gray horse.

His hair was long and white, and a patriarchal-looking beard of the same hue descended upon his breast.

There was an air of great distinction about him, although he rode unattended.

He was, in fine, one of those men who involuntarily command the respect of all with whom they come in contact.

From this individual Dick's eyes turned to the troop of horsemen who had given him so much trouble.

They were all plainly-dressed, well-armed men, with the exception of one.

That one Dick knew instantly.

He wore a military costume.

He was one of the officers composing the staff of the commander-in-chief.

His name was Major Nicholson.

Dick took all this in at a glance, but before he could make any reflections upon what he saw, the major spoke.

If anything had been wanting to make Dick quite sure of his identity, his voice would have sufficed.

"I ask your pardon, sir," he said, politely, addressing the traveller, "but have you come far along this road?"

"By what right do you ask?"

"I will tell you," said the major; "because every moment is of the utmost importance."

"I suppose you mean to yourself?"

"Precisely."

"Then, sir, be good enough to understand that the same words apply to me in an equal respect as to yourself. Every moment is of importance."

"We are in chase of a highwayman," said the major, smothering the irritation of temper which he experienced at being treated in so off-hand a manner.

"Well, sir."

"We have kept hard upon his track for some miles, and when we heard your horse's hoofs, so far from thinking that it was any one approaching, we fancied we were gaining upon him."

"Then, sir, allow me to pass, and don't trouble me any longer. I know nothing about the highwayman."

"No, sir; but"——

"But what? You surely don't imagine that I am he, do you?"

"Certainly not; but, perhaps you have come some distance along the road, and, if so, you can tell us whether a man, mounted upon a beautiful black horse, has passed you?"

"I have come more than ten miles along this road," replied the elderly traveller, and I will give you my word that no one answering to the description you mention has passed me."

"Enough, sir. And I suppose you have not seen anything of him?"

"No, I have not.'

"Then, in some mysterious way he has eluded us, and yet he has never been fairly out of earshot. Pass on, sir, and accept our thanks."

"You are quite welcome," said the old man, raising his hat about a couple of inches above his head.

As he spoke, he struck his horse with his spurs and rode forward.

The troop of men parted in the centre, and allowed him to pass through.

After he had gone, the horsemen looked rather blankly at each other and inquiringly upon the major.

They wanted to know what had better be done next.

The major himself looked vexed and bewildered.

"What is the meaning of all this?" he asked.

The question elicited a general negatory shake of the head.

"It is no good riding any further, that I can see," he added. "Surely that gentleman would never have deceived us?"

"You may depend he has not," said one.

"Why so?"

"The highwayman has doubled upon us in some way, and, perhaps, by this time is a dozen miles off."

"But how?" said the major, "how? We have in a manner of speaking, lost sight of him. How can he have got off?"

"That is more than I can tell, sir, but, if he was a real highwayman, and one used to the trade, he would manage to avoid us without much trouble."

"I can't see it," said the major.

"Why, I remember a remarkable instance of their cleverness. Have you ever heard of Dick Turpin?"

"Dick Turpin?"

"Yes."

"No, I don't know that I have particularly."

"You have been absent for a long time in the wars, so I suppose that is the reason. Well, this Dick Turpin is a very famous highwayman, or was, I ought to say, for nothing has been heard of him lately."

"Well, what of him?"

"A party of officers once chased this Dick Turpin a long way into the country, and then back to London again, for, though he doubled upon them, they were soon after him. However, he distanced them completely, and the officers' horses being quite knocked up, they turned back and stopped awhile at the village of Acton, which they had passed through some time before. They had not stood drinking at the bar very long before a man came in and told them that the very man they had chased so much further on the London-road was at that moment on the top of his cart, and that his cart was in the inn yard!"

CHAPTER CCXXV.

MAJOR NICHOLSON TRIES VERY HARD TO DEFEAT DICK TURPIN.

"But how could that be?" roared the major.

"I don't know, sir; but when the officers got outside they found what the man said was true enough. There was Dick Turpin lying on the top of some turnips in the cart, as comfortable as he could be."

"But it's impossible," cried the major; "quite impossible."

"May be, sir, but they caught him. And so, after hearing that, if this should turn out to be a regular highwayman, we stand no chance of catching him."

"I shall be very loath to give it up."

"But you said you wanted us for some other business."

"I know that, but never mind, we are too late for it already, so you had better earn the money I have promised you by finding the highwayman, and taking him prisoner dead or alive, whichever you like."

"But how are we to do so, sir? We are all abroad, but, if you'll give your orders, they shall be carried out at once."

"How can I?" said the major. "I am as much abroad as yourself."

"Then, sir, I am afraid we must give it up. It is no good going further down the road. I should advise you to turn back, and examine the road all the way."

"A thought strikes me," said the major; "turn back and follow me."

With these words on his lips, and in the manner of one across whose brain some fresh idea has flashed, the major set off again in the direction he had come, with his troop of men at his heels.

Dick Turpin waited till the sounds of their retreat had quite died away, and then he rose to his feet.

Black Bess followed his example.

He did not mount, but stood with the bridle over his arm in an attitude of deep thought.

What was he to think of what he had just witnessed?

Major Nicholson was one of the officers who felt so jealous of him.

Why was he out that night, thus armed and thus attended?

What idea was it that had crossed his mind when he so suddenly determined to retrace his steps?

These were questions almost impossible of solution.

But Dick did not despair of coming to a reasonable conclusion.

He patted his mare abstractedly upon the neck, while he endeavoured, link by link, to form a chain of thought.

At last his face brightened, and though there was no one by to hear what he said, he spoke, as people often do when they arrive at the solution of any matter that has puzzled them.

"I have it," he said. "I see it all now, and I must be speedy. Yes, this Major Nicholson was one who showed himself jealous and suspicious of me from the first moment. He it was that caused me to be deprived of my arms, and treated almost like a prisoner. Perhaps he may suspect something, though by his manner when the man spoke of me, he did not appear to know my name; but that is nothing. It is my firm belief that, when he learned I had a pass from the duke, he set out to watch me, and hired those men from the city to accompany him. Thank goodness! I have avoided them. Steady lass! Steady!"

These last words were addressed to the mare, as he prepared to mount her.

It so happened that Dick exactly hit upon the truth in his surmises.

Major Nicholson, like many another officer in the army, had firmly resolved that the large reward offered for the head of Charles Stuart should fall into no other hands than his.

Therefore, when Turpin appeared and laid claim to it, he looked upon him as a deadly foe—as an interloper, who had stepped in between him and his rights.

His immediate impulse was to try all he could to place obstacles in the way of Dick obtaining his desires.

With a dog-in-the-manger sort of spirit, he determined that, if he could not have the reward, no one else should—that is, if he could in any way prevent it.

But the story which Dick told was too plausible and too circumstantial for him to be able to pick a flaw in it, and, besides which, it was unvaryingly adhered to.

Accordingly, he had managed to indirectly suggest to the commander-in-chief the expediency of depriving Turpin of his arms, and treating him as a prisoner-of-war, which, as we have seen, was done.

The suspicions which the governor of the castle had, infused a fresh current of thought into his mind.

He was present at the time when the Duke granted the order for Dick to leave the castle.

After a little deliberation, he made a similar request.

Of course, it was acceded to.

Going, then, into the city, he hired a dozen men, all mounted and armed, to accompany him upon an expedition.

What that expedition was, he kept locked in his own breast.

At the appointed hour the little troop was ready, and he rejoined them at the place agreed upon.

From where they stood, a view could be obtained of all persons leaving the castle.

They waited here for some moments, and then the sound of the heavy door being unfastened reached their ears.

In a moment or so afterwards, Dick made his appearance.

The major did not move, but watched him until he had proceeded for some distance.

Then he followed.

He had taken, previously, a very ingenious precaution to prevent Dick hearing that he was followed.

Over each horse's hoofs he had caused a thick worsted covering to be drawn.

By this means, the footsteps of the horses were rendered inaudible.

They followed like spectres.

They were very careful, too, not to draw too close, so as to be seen, but allowed the trampling of Bess's hoofs to be their sole guide.

But, suddenly, the horse which the major rode, from some cause or other—probably from the manner in which his feet were bandaged—grew restive, and, had not his rider been a most accomplished horseman, he would have been thrown.

The others were, of course, obliged to come to a halt, and everything was tried to soothe the terrified animal, but all in vain.

The major, in his agitation, probably increased the terror of the steed, for this delay was the most provoking thing that could possibly be.

Had such a feat been practicable, he would, rather than have wasted the time, have dismounted, and taken a steed from one of his followers; but such an attempt would be full of danger, and, besides, no one when riding likes to be mastered by a horse.

At length, after great loss of time, the animal suffered himself to be calmed down, and then it was found that the cord by which the worsted bandage had been bound to his leg had moved in some way, and got tightly drawn.

This, however, was seen to, and then the horse was quiet enough.

It was at this moment that there came to the ears of the whole party a succession of shrieks which must have been loud and shrill once, but, owing to the distance, had become faint.

A fresh start was just then about to be made, and the major, with a smile of triumph on his face, ordered his men to push on at full speed.

In a little while, owing to the stony ground, the coverings over the hoofs were but now the major did not heed the sound.

When he arrived, however, he was just too late.

From the man and woman together, however, he learned they had been stopped and robbed by a highwayman.

Upon receipt of this intelligence he bade the men give chase, and endeavour to overtake him.

The result of this has been already seen.

Of course, the reader is in possession of a few more facts than Turpin was, but the bold highwayman was not very far off the mark.

Satisfied with himself so far, and feeling quite assured that he had baffled the major, he set about thinking what it was that had induced him to turn back so suddenly.

As in the former instance, this for a long time baffled him.

He considered it, though, as rather a secondary affair, and, while pursuing his thoughts, struck across the meadows in a direct line for the city.

At last he reached a broadish road—not the one he had previously travelled, but one that evidently trended to his destination.

A low hedge divided him from it, and this he did not attempt to leap, but walked on in the expectation of finding a gate through which he could pass, and thus gain it without difficulty.

Nor was he disappointed in this expectation.

After skirting the hedge for about a hundred yards, he came to one.

It was fastened, but not locked.

Dismounting, he quickly undid the chain, and flinging the gate open, allowed his mare to pass through.

Then, in order not to leave any palpable traces of the way he had come, he refastened it, which was done by passing the links of a chain through one another.

"There," he said, as he once again seated himself in the saddle, "that will do. I rather think the major has taken a vast deal of trouble to little or no purpose. However, we shall see. Come, lass!"

At a very gentle pace, for Dick had given Bess more work than he intended, he took his way along this road.

It seemed a very lonely and unfrequented one.

He did not meet a soul.

The moon had climbed higher and higher in the sky, and the clouds, which at the commencement of the night had covered the heavens, were now entirely gone.

It was really a beautiful night, and Dick, as he went, hummed a few staves of a popular drinking song, but his thoughts were chiefly occupied by Major Nicholson, and wondering what fresh scheme he had hatched against him.

In this way a couple of miles were passed over, and then, in the distance, Dick, by the aid of the moonbeams, perceived a building of some sort.

On a nearer approach, he found this to be a road-side inn.

Simultaneously with the making of this discovery, a fresh thought darted into his mind, and he resolved to carry it out at once.

"I wonder I never thought of that before," he muttered. "Never mind, it is none too late. Now, Mr. Major Nicholson, I think I shall be even with you! Ha! ha! you had need be sharp to outwit Dick Turpin!"

He laughed lightly as he spoke.

In one more minute he drew up opposite the inn door.

It was open, and from one of the windows on the ground floor streamed a faint light, thus showing that, late as the hour was, the inmates had not yet retired to rest.

CHAPTER CCXXVI.

DICK TURPIN GROOMS AND FEEDS BLACK BESS AFTER A FASHION OF HIS OWN, AND COMPLETELY BAFFLES MAJOR NICHOLSON.

"HALLO, there! hallo!" shouted Turpin, and as he spoke he took from his pocket one of his pistols, and, grasping it by the barrel, knocked with the butt end upon the doorpost.

His summons was quickly replied to by a tall, gaunt-looking woman, with a rather remarkable-looking widow's cap on her head.

"What do you want, sir?" said she respectfully, for Dick's important manner had its full effect upon her.

"I want my horse seen to," said Dick, "in the first place."

"Yes, sir, of course."

"Have you an ostler?"

"Oh! dear, yes, sir! I'll call him. Jim! Jim!"

In reply to this call a shock-headed urchin of about fourteen years of age made his appearance.

He understood at once what was meant, and Dick, having dismounted, led the way to the stables.

Here the highwayman, with his own hands, carefully groomed his steed.

Of course, in her progress that night, she had got in a sad plight.

Her usually sleek skin was rough and wet with perspiration, and foam was about the bridle, and on her lips and nostrils.

Her legs, too, showed that she had crossed more than one ploughed field.

All these indications of a hard gallop, Dick one after another carefully removed, until at last not a single trace was left.

To have looked at her and her trappings, no one would have believed that she had been out of the stable.

When this was over, Dick sent the boy for a quart measure of ale.

Then, going to the cornbin, he took out a small quantity of oats and chaff.

These he well mixed together, and, as soon as the boy brought the ale, he proceeded, very much to that individual's surprise, to moisten the whole with it.

This would be beneficial for two reasons.

In the state that Bess was then in it would have been very injudicious either to have allowed her to drink water or eat dry food.

But by moistening the corn and chaff in the manner we have described with a quart of ale, both evils would be remedied, and great additional vigour imparted to the animal.

Dick did not go into the inn himself, but stood by his mare while she ate, taking care all the time that she did not eat too quickly.

He sent the boy, however, for another quart of ale, the greater part of which he drank himself, and then handed it to him for his trouble.

Dick waited for some time after Bess had finished her meal, and every now and then he rubbed her down with a wisp of clean hay.

But she was quite cool now, or nearly so.

Feeling satisfied, at length, that all was right, and with the conviction on his mind that the major would be rather disappointed, Dick led Black Bess into the stable yard, and mounting her, rode off at a gentle trot.

Soon afterwards the portals of the grim old castle were reached.

He was challenged by the sentry, but the pass from the duke, which Dick handed to him, was quite sufficient, and he was immediately allowed ingress.

He directed his steps at once to the stables.

On his way he looked keenly about on either side of him, and was presently rewarded for his trouble.

Standing in the shadow of a projecting angle of masonry, his form scarcely distinguished from the dark background behind it, was the figure of a man.

Dick took no notice, but rode carelessly on to the entrance to the stables.

A man was there to receive his steed, and, after giving some audible instructions respecting how she was to be treated, he resigned her to his care, and sauntered away towards his own quarters.

But at the earliest opportunity he stopped.

Then, taking advantage of the darkness of the wall, crept noiselessly back.

He looked at the spot where he had seen the dark form standing.

It was gone.

Still creeping onwards, he reached the stable wall, and paused before one of the windows.

The shutter was down, and through the iron bars he could see distinctly.

The murmur of voices reached his ears.

Taking care not to place himself where he would be seen, Dick strained his sense of hearing to the utmost.

But all he could manage to do was to catch a word here and there.

He was, however, tolerably satisfied.

One of the voices was that of the man into whose charge he had given Black Bess.

The other belonged to Major Nicholson.

Disjointedly as the words reached him, Dick could form a pretty good idea of their import.

The major was asking the man whether the mare had or had not had a long and hard gallop.

The man expressed himself confident that she had not. That she had not been far, and not faster than a trot.

In support of what he said, he called the major's attention to several little points, all of which tended to confirm his assertion.

The major was always hard of belief.

But he could not get over the positive testimony of the stable-keeper and the evidence of his own senses.

He had fully expected to find Black Bess in some such trim as she was when Dick so carefully cleaned and fed her.

But instead of that, there she was, cool and fresh, and looking as though she had only been a short distance, and that at a very easy rate.

Those appearances, however, had a two-fold origin.

One was the excellent quality of the mare herself.

The other was the skill with which her master had groomed her.

The major was baffled.

But not defeated.

In a rage with himself and the world in general, he dashed out of the stable.

Dick drew hastily back out of sight, for he by no means wished that the major should know he suspected him, and that he played the spy upon his actions.

Looking, however, neither to the right nor to the left, he strode up the yard.

Dick followed him at a little distance, and entering the castle, laid himself down to take all the rest he could before the march to London was commenced.

In spite, however, of his wish to sleep, he could not do so, but tossed over and over continually.

His thoughts were active, and when that is the case, sleep is quite out of the question until the brain is tired.

His thoughts were much occupied in thinking of his three comrades, and wondering in what circumstances they were then placed.

The young prince, too, whose cause he had so zealously espoused and supported, where was he?

But it was mostly upon Tom King that his thoughts rested.

Somehow or other there seemed to be a closer band of union between him and himself than there did between either of the two others.

That this feeling was reciprocal there can be no doubt.

From a consideration of these, Dick's thoughts reverted to his own position, and the dangerous ground upon which he stood.

What he had seen already of Major Nicholson was quite enough to show him the necessity there was for his continuing to keep upon his guard.

In him he saw a foe to be dreaded, because he was suspicious and sly.

Then he thought of reaching London, and the audacious feat he was about to perform, of laying the spurious head before the king and claiming the large reward.

London!

When he repeated the word, it seemed to him almost like home.

He forgot his danger.

He looked forward with pleasure to reaching it.

The time that he had been absent seemed endless.

What a joy he felt it would be to make his way to the "White Horse," in Drury-lane, and take jovial old Matthew by the hand.

He could fancy how his face would expand into a smile when he saw him safe and sound.

Then there was Tom Davis, who had shown himself to be in the hour of necessity a staunch, true friend.

He could picture him, he thought, without difficulty, and the quaint old building in which he had resided for so long, and which had been in possession of his family for so many generations.

Dick felt that to once more meet this free and goodhearted spirit would be a pure delight indeed, and he could tell with what interest he would listen to the story of the adventures he had met with during his long absence.

Then arose another recollection of a face that would smile, and a heart that would grow light in his presence.

This was Ellen.

The poor nameless, homeless, friendless, ill-used apprentice girl, whom he had rescued from the brutality of her rascally mistress.

His breast glowed with irrepressible joy at the remembrance of this one good deed in his career, which shone out from the rest like and which, he hoped, would go far to palliate many of the darker ones, against which this one shone out with all the more effulgency from the contrast.

Some bright particular star.

He had changed her lot in life—had made it a happy one.

Tom Davis, with his huge, kindly heart, overflowing with sympathy and good nature as it always was, had soon felt her twine around his affections, and he had adopted her as his own child.

A sigh came from D ck's lips as he thought of the blissful calm of such an existence, and how widely different it was from his own wild and turbulent career.

Wearied out at length, he fell into a slumber, in which confused images of all his reflections were presented.

Alas! while thinking as he was, and picturing the condition of Tom Davis and Ellen, he little thought how far he was from reality.

He did not take into considera ion what great and magical changes a few months wil effect.

A person may arise from poverty to affluence, or sink from affluence to poverty, in such a space.

But we will not anticipate events.

CHAPTER CCXXVII.

A GLANCE IS GIVEN AT DICK TURPIN'S THREE COMRADES AND THE PRINCE.

Probably enough, it will be a long while before we can leave Dick in greater security than he is now, or in a situation of less danger, so we will take advantage while he is sleeping, to devote a few moments to his comrades and the unfortunate young prince.

It will be recollected that, with infinite trouble, they had procured a small boat, the owner of which had undertaken to row them to a spot where he had a few hours before seen a French vessel at anchor.

Accordingly, Charles Stuart, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack had taken their places in the frail embarkation, and stood out to sea.

Ere long, however, indications of a coming storm made themselves apparent to the eyes of all.

The boatman wished to put back to the shore, and endeavour to make some safe harbour till the fury of the winds and waves were past, but our friends would listen to no such thing.

They preferred the danger of going on to that of turning back.

Moreover, they were in hopes that they would soon gain the large vessel, and then, doubtless, all would be well; for, however much such a tempest might endanger their little craft, a large one would scarcely bow before its influence.

Their hopes, however, were doomed to be disappointed.

The storm had increased in fury.

The waves swelled.

The wind blew in short and sudden gusts.

All command over the little boat was lost.

It drifted about at the mercy of the tempest.

Suddenly, however, and with a shivering shock, it struck against some jutting rock and went to pieces.

It parted first in the centre.

With the instinct of self-preservation, each one, as he felt the shock, clutched tightly at whatever portion of the boat happened to be within their reach.

To this instinct they owed their lives.

The broken boat floated.

They had, therefore, only to maintain their grasp.

That they would do this there was little fear.

The tenacity with which persons in danger of drowning will cling to anything which they have once seized is proverbial.

The wind howled mournfully.

The din of the storm increased.

As the four breathless beings held on for dear life to the boat, they felt themselves raised high in the air by the force of a gigantic wave.

Then they were propelled violently forward.

Blinded and half conscious, they felt themselves cast upon a rocky shore.

The wave receded.

They were once more on land.

But the wave which had carried them there would return, and wash them back into the deep.

That is, unless they either got out of its reach or shifted their grasp from the fragments of wood to some immovable object.

The latter was what they did.

From the shore upon which they had been so suddenly and violently cast jutted up numberless piece of rock conical in shape, and a few inches in height.

These were firmly imbedded in the sand, being, so to speak, the excrescences of the large rock which loomed up behind them like a giant.

They could not communicate with each other in any way.

The tempest drowned their voices in its roar.

They could not tell each other what to do.

But blinded, bruised, and semi-conscious as they were, each had the same idea at the same moment.

Letting go the boat, they clasped with might and main one of the little rocks.

And only just in time.

The wave came back.

Tons of water were poured upon them.

They felt themselves rising.

They felt the rock slipping from their fingers.

Then the wave receded.

Once more, then, were they allowed an opportunity of drawing breath and renewing their store of life.

But before they could thoroughly recover, the wave came back again.

This time they fancied with less force.

And so wave after wave, wave after wave broke over them.

Still they did not quit their hold, but pressed their bodies as tightly as they could against the sand.

But now, as a longer interval elapsed between each wave, so did they decrease in their intensity, until at last, though the ocean still heaved and tumbled, they did not reach them at all.

Then all lapsed into unconsciousness.

The wind lulled.

The sea no longer rolled in huge, mountainous billows, but, as if thoroughly exhausted, sunk into a dead calm.

The remainder of the night passed away, and then the sun rose.

His beams revealed no other tokens of the preceding night's devastation than those five still and deathlike looking forms clinging to the pointed rocks.

At last Claude Duval, who was the strongest of the party, and in whom the vital principle was most firmly implanted, aroused himself.

He was the one who had sustained the least injuries.

He gradually raised himself to a sitting posture.

Several groans came from his lips as he did so, for he felt as though every bone in his body was broken.

For a little while he was at a loss to remember what had occurred, and could scarcely believe that what he saw was reality.

Presently his eye rested upon the forms of his companions.

Then, like a flash of light, there swept across his brain a recollection of all that had occurred.

As he sat up and looked about him, he felt that he was every moment getting better, so at length he crawled to the person next to him.

He was lying on his face.

Whether he was alive or dead, he knew not.

He turned him over.

It was Tom King.

The faint moans which came from his lips, now that his position had been altered, took a great load off Claude's mind, for it showed that he still lived.

Situated as he then was, he felt he could do little towards assisting him to recover his senses, so he left Nature to take her course, and crawled onwards to the next form.

This was the boatman.

He, too, was living and revivifying under the beams of the rising sun, which poured down every moment an increase of heat.

Under these circumstances, Claude ventured to indulge in the hope that he should be fortunate enough to find all living.

Sixteen-String Jack was the next to him, and he was at some little distance off.

Beyond him, again, was one form of Charles Stuart.

While in the act of crawling towards the former, Claude saw him move his arms about and then rise upon one elbow.

"Jack!" he cried, in as loud a voice as he could command, "Jack!"

The highwayman turned upon hearing his friend's voice, and looked in his face with a puzzled air.

But he soon comprehended his situation.

By a great effort he, by his comrade's assistance, sat up and looked around him.

Claude glided off towards the young prince, whom he found in a perfectly senseless state, and looking so much like death that he gave utterance to an ejaculation, which caused Jack, feeble as he was, to approach him.

But, upon placing his hand upon his heart, he could feel a slight, fluttering pulsation.

But though Claude and Jack, who were presently joined by the boatman and Tom King, tried their utmost to restore him to consciousness, they were unsuccessful.

No doubt, had they been furnished with better means, the case would have been different, but then all were so weak that they could not so much as chafe his limbs, and so promote the circulation of the blood.

The pangs of hunger and thirst, too, began to make themselves felt by those who had recovered; but though they cast their eyes all around, them, they could not see so much as a blade of grass, nor a spot of fresh water.

In fact, they had been cast upon a mere projecting piece of rock, upon which nothing grew—upon which nothing found a resting-place, and where no water, except such as fell from the sky, was ever seen.

The part, too, in which it was went against them.

Mariners invariably avoided it, because of the dangers of the sunken rocks, which grew up from the ocean bed like teeth in a shark's jaw.

Were they then preserved from a more lenient death to perish of starvation upon that rugged and barren spot?

Surely, yes, unless assistance comes, and that promptly.

Higher and higher rose the sun, and when he was in his full power the young prince recovered.

The great heat of the sun, in their exposed situation, was now found to be a serious inconvenience to them all.

But there was no place where they could shelter themselves from his burning rays.

At last the sun declined—day faded—and night once more came upon the deep.

Cold, hungry, weary, thirsty, suffering great torment from their wounds and bruises, the unfortunate party lay upon the sand.

The intense coldness of the evening was now felt to be even a greater hardship than the sun's fervency, but they were helpless, and could not shield themselves from either the one or the other.

They waited for dawn.

It was near the close of this second day that Claude Duval, as he cast his eyes around, caught sight of a white object.

Almost dreading to give any room for hope, he did not speak to any of his companions, but looked again.

It was a sail!

No longer containing the joyful intelligence, he shouted aloud.

Wearied and worn out as they were, this infused fresh life into his companions' breasts.

Painfully they struggled to their feet, and then looking seaward, satisfied themselves that there was no mistake.

Of course the next thing now was to attract attention, and this Claude did by hastily stripping off his shirt, and holding it by the sleeves so that it fluttered out like a little flag.

By rare good fortune the signal was seen by those on board the vessel, and its course was altered towards them.

And then, for the first time, they thought of the unpleasant predicament they would be in if this ship, as most likely was the case, was an English one.

But prospective danger is preferable to present.

It so happened that the ship was really the French sloop of war of which the boatman had spoken.

He knew it again at once.

Animated now by hope, they waited the approach of the friendly bark, and, in less than an hour afterwards, were safe on board of it, where every attention was paid to them.

CHAPTER CCXXVII.

DICK TURPIN AND THE ARMY REACH LONDON, AND THE FORMER PAYS A VISIT TO OLD MATTHEW, THE LANDLORD OF THE "WHITE HORSE," IN DRURY-LANE.

It is not our intention to follow, step by step, the progress of the British army back to London.

Such a recapitulation of ordinary every-day occurrences would be wearisome both to the reader and the chronicler.

The lapse of time, therefore, which it took for the army to go by forced marches from one place to the other, must be passed over in a word or two.

Major Nicholson kept a very keen eye upon Turpin and all his movements, so the highwayman was cautious to a degree accordingly.

During the march, however, nothing further occurred.

No more doubts had been expressed about the genuineness of the head. Indeed, it seemed to be taken for granted, on all hands, that it was exactly what it was represented to be.

London was reached.

Banners waved, crowds gathered, guns were fired in honour of the arrival of the commander-in-chief.

The news of the victory had, of course, preceded them, and preparations for their reception had been made upon a grand scale.

Dick Turpin, however, was fearful that some curious eye should single him out from among the throng and recognise him.

He did not forget that a very large reward was offered for his apprehension.

Therefore, upon nearing the suburbs, he contrived, in spite of the opposition of Major Nicholson, to obtain permission from the duke to leave the ranks.

The conditions under which this leave of absence was granted were these—

The head was to be left in the duke's custody.

Turpin was to be at St. James's Palace without fail at nightfall, when the head would be presented to him.

To these conditions Dick at once agreed, and faithfully promised to comply with them.

He then separated himself from the troops, and at a hand-gallop made his way into London.

After carefully thinking the matter over, he considered that his best place of refuge, and where his priceless mare, Black Bess, would be safest, was the "White Horse" in Drury-lane.

Old Matthew, he knew, would be able to furnish him with the fullest information.

He had, moreover, many contrivances for baffling the officers, should they by any chance get scent of him.

It was not without some degree of trepidation, however, that he made his way in broad daylight into the heart of London.

He shaped his course to Bloomsbury-fields, at that time fields in reality.

Here, of course, few people were met with.

Passing Montague-house, on the site of which the British Museum now stands, he was able to go in a direct line to the top of Drury Lane.

Down that unsavoury thoroughfare, then, he passed, but when he reached the corner of Prince's Street he paused.

"It will hardly do," he muttered, "for me to be seen riding up to the door of the 'White Horse' in broad daylight. I shall surely be seen, and my presence commented upon by some one. No, I will go the back way."

With these words on his lips, he turned the corner of Prince's-street, and, after going a little way, took again the first turning on his right, now called Stanhope-street.

It was at the back of, and parallel to, Drury-lane, and White Horse-yard—the name of the passage at the side of old Matthew's dwelling—connected the two.

The place is hardly wide enough to admit a man on horseback, but Dick had been before.

In a moment or two more, the strange little door in the wall—the secret of which was known only to a few—was reached.

Then he pressed upon the hidden spring and waited.

Before his summons was responded to, he had alighted and stood with his mare's bridle over his arm.

Silently the door swung open.

There stood old Matthew on the threshold.

At the first glance, he did not recognise Turpin, so greatly had his looks altered during the campaign.

But Turpin seized his hand, and, pressing it warmly, spoke.

The worthy landlord knew the voice.

That had not changed.

"Why, Dick?" he said, in the enthusiasm of the moment, almost crushing the highwayman's hand between his huge palms, "that is never you, surely. I had given up all thoughts of ever seeing you again."

"Yet here I am," replied Turpin, "safe and sound, and what is quite as much, if not more, here is Black Bess, safe and sound too."

"So she is; but don't stand there, Dick—come in, come in! I've such news to tell you. Where have you been all this long time? Come in, come!"

The worthy old landlord bustled about as quickly as his portly old form would let him.

The secret door was opened to its full extent.

"Be quick, Dick," he cried; "I don't want any unfriendly eye to see me."

"All right, Matthew, here we are."

Dick, as he spoke, led his mare into the little square yard which has already been described in the earlier portion of this history, and then the landlord rapidly shut and carefully fastened the door.

"Now Dick, lad, where have you been? Come, tell us, and I will tell you afterwards all that I know. And where's Tom King, and how is he, and what has become of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, and?"——

"Stop—stop!" cried Dick, with a laugh. "How do you think I am going to answer any of your questions, if you keep on at that rate?"

"I forgot, my lad; but you see there is so much I want to know."

"I don't doubt that, but, Matthew, my friend, let us first attend to bonny Black Bess, here. Lead the way to the stables, and when I have seen her safely disposed of, we will go indoors and have a glass together, while we talk over the past."

"Bravo! Dick, so I will. You're one of the right sort, you are, and know how to behave to a good horse when you've got one. It was always the same. The mare first and yourself afterwards."

"So it ought to be."

"As you say, so it ought to be. Now, Dick, follow me. I've got the door undone at last. Come along."

Old Matthew threw open a door as he spoke, and led the way along a passage, from which came the unmistakeable odour of stables.

At the extremity of this passage was another door, which led into the stables themselves.

It was not the first time that Dick had seen them, and even Black Bess seemed to recollect, for she walked direct to the stall which she usually occupied.

Old Matthew supplied her plentifully with corn, then littered down her stall with a quantity of fresh straw.

This done, he would insist upon the highwayman accompanying him without delay into the little bar-parlour, where none but privileged guests were admitted.

On the present occasion, in order not to be disturbed, he locked the door.

From a little cupboard he produced two or three bottles containing wines and spirits of a choicer quality than any were vended in London.

These they sat down by the fireside to discuss.

Matthew, however, firmly and flatly refused to answer any questions, or impart any information, until Dick had satisfied his curiosity by telling him all that had taken place since their last parting.

To do this, Dick had to go back to the execution of Tom King—or attempted execution, rather.

Beginning, then, with his rescue, he as briefly as he could, consistently with clearness, narrated to the landlord the principal events that had taken place, ending, of course, by his presence where he was at that moment.

To the whole of the extraordinary narration old Matthew listened, with his eyes wide open with astonishment.

But, above all, was he astounded at the bold and daring plan which had hitherto been carried out so successfully of passing off a spurious head for that of the young prince.

When he learned, however, that on that very night, Turpin was going to consummate it by presenting himself before the king, and demanding the reward, he grew alarmed and tried to dissuade him from it.

The risk was immense.

But Dick was deaf to all his persuasions.

"It is no good for you to say a word, Matthew—not a bit. I have resolved upon it, and you know when I once take a thing into my head there is no turning me! Now, will you listen to me a moment."

"What is it?"

"Will you listen?"

"To be sure I will."

"Very well, then. I have told you all that has taken place without hearing a word from you."

"I know you have."

"Then before anything more is said, you must tell me what has happened during my absence."

"Well?"

"Do you hear anything of the officers?"

Matthew smiled significantly.

"They drop in now and then."

"Still at the same game, eh?"

"Oh! yes. But if you want to know if they have been for you, they hav'nt. Wriggles—you know Wriggles?"

"Of course."

"Well, then, he gave me the most trouble."

"Did he?"

"Yes."

"How was that?"

"He got the idea into his head that you were concealed here somewhere, and he searched the old place from top to bottom."

"Did he?"

"Yes, and even then he was not convinced, but set men to watch, and made no end of fuss."

"All to no good?"

"All to no good!"

"Capital; and lately there have been no inquiries?"

"No. I began to grow afraid that you had departed this life, but I see here you are safe and sound."

"Yes; and now there is another point I want to be satisfied upon."

"What is it?"

"Am I much altered?"

"Very much."

"Then you think I am not in much danger of being recognised."

"I don't know. You are almost forgotten already, I do think! Such a long time has passed since you did any business. People now are not so afraid of taking a journey at night as they used to be."

"So much the better, then. I will soon let them know that Dick Turpin is alive! But come, Matthew, lend me your assistance. It is growing dusk, now, and I must be at the palace at dark."

Matthew shook his head.

"I should never run the risk, Dick, if I was you."

CHAPTER CCXXIX.

WHEN TOO LATE, DICK TURPIN FINDS IT WOULD HAVE BEEN BETTER TO HAVE TAKEN OLD MATTHEW'S ADVICE, AND THAT THERE IS SUCH A THING AS CARRYING A JOKE TOO FAR.

It is night.

St. James's-street and Pall-mall are a scene of the greatest possible confusion.

[THE SENTINEL MAKES AN ABORTIVE EFFORT TO PREVENT DICK TURPIN'S ESCAPE.]

These two streets, and many other subordinate ones, are choked up with numberless vehicles of every description, while the footpaths are thronged with hundreds of pedestrian spectators.

The front of the substantial-looking old palace, which has of late fallen into comparative disuse, was brilliantly illuminated.

At least our ancestors thought so, but then they never dreamed even of the invention of so wonderful an agent as gas.

All over the city, too, and especially in the more aristocratic portions of it, the windows were lighted up from cellar to roof.

Not only was this done by the upholders of the house of Hanover, who were just then in the ascendant, but also by many of those who were attached to the fortunes of the exiled and vanquished Stuarts, who wished to avoid popular ill-usage.

The assembled crowd, of course, was densest just where the carriages stopped to deposit their contents, who had to make their way across the pavement to the entrance.

Occasionally a loud hurrah or a bitter groan would arise as some popular or unpopular personage alighted and crossed into the palace.

As may be supposed, the Duke of Cumberland was just at that present moment the popular idol.

Accordingly, when his carriage drew up with a jerk, a stentorian cheer which made the whole palace ring again issued from a thousand throats.

The commander-in-chief paused a moment to return these acknowledgments by bowing deeply, and then vanished into the recesses of the building.

Within, the palace was one scene of dazzling splendour.

The whole of the aristocracy of the kingdom were present, in order to receive the victorious duke in a manner which they deemed worthy of him.

Dick Turpin—who, it must be borne in mind, was known to the duke and his officers as Mr. John Palmer—was present.

He was dressed in a style befitting the occasion, but he strove, as much as possible, to elude observation.

In this he, to a very great extent, succeeded, for, observing a little ante-chamber, which was fitted up like a refreshment-room, he entered it at once.

A massive curtain of crimson damask, with bullion fringe and tassels, hung before the entrance of it in lieu of a door.

The room was quite vacant when he entered it, so, choosing the least conspicuous seat he could, he sat himself down upon it, and waited patiently.

The hum of voices from the large outer apartment now reached his ears very faintly indeed.

"What's to be the end of this desperate adventure?" he asked himself, musingly. "Am I to meet with the same success that I have done hitherto? As Old Matthew rightly enough says, it is a fearful risk; but never mind, Dick Turpin never was the man to relinquish what he had taken in hand on account of any perils or difficulties that might present themselves."

He was silent for a minute or two, for a louder noise than usual came from the saloon.

But, whatever might have been the cause of it, it was quickly over.

"I ought to arrange a retreat," he added, "in case I should be discovered. That will only be acting like a skilful general when leading his forces into the field. It will be my best course to set about that at once."

With this conviction on his mind, he rose, and, crossing the refreshment room, pushed aside the crimson curtain, and entered the saloon.

It was much fuller than it was when he had left it, and therefore he had all the better chance of doing what he wished to do unperceived.

Gradually, then, he paced round the room.

He came at length to the doors, through which fresh guests came streaming in.

A crowd of menials were about it.

He shook his head and passed on.

"No, no," he said; "if the worst comes to the worst, and I have to make a flying retreat from this gorgeous apartment, I shall stand no chance of getting free if I try to pass there."

The windows of this room were all upon one side of it.

They were small, like all the windows in the old palace, but they were many in number.

Without exception, they were all composed of little diamond-like panes, set in a framework of lead.

Some of these little panes were of stained glass, and so placed as to form curious devices.

Dick strove to look through several of these windows, in order to see what kind of place it was into which they looked, but he was each time unsuccessful.

Having, in a short time, made himself perfectly familiar with the different bearings of the room, he felt himself more at his ease.

Just at this moment, however, some one touched him lightly on the arm.

Dick turned like lightning, and then saw it was one of the duke's personal attendants.

This individual did not speak, but merely beckoned with his finger tips for Turpin to accompany him.

This the highwayman did not hesitate to do.

In a few seconds he reached the duke's side, who made a motion for him to remain where he was.

Then, before he had time to look around him, even to see by what persons he was encompassed, some large folding-doors at the further extremity of the saloon were thrown open, disclosing another apartment of similar appearance beyond it.

Towards this, then, all bent their course.

Upon a nearer approach, Dick saw that this was where the king intended to receive his guests.

He was seated in a massive high-backed arm-chair, which was placed upon a dais.

Upon his fat and vacant-looking face appeared a smile of complacent satisfaction.

It was the first time Dick had ever breathed the atmosphere of royalty, and so, as a matter of course, it oppressed him.

In what way to comport himself he knew not.

But yet he did not appear awkward.

He kept a watchful eye upon the behaviour of those nearest to him, and demeaned himself accordingly.

One by one the assemblage made their obeisance to their sovereign, and then the duke had several flattering compliments passed upon him for the manner in which he had conducted the campaign, and the promptitude with which he had crushed out this formidable rebellion.

It was then that the death of the Young Pretender was more particularly spoken of.

Now Turpin felt that his time was coming.

He could not control a slight beating at his heart.

The ghastly and terrible-looking head had been preserved from the ravages of decay by having been kept in spirits of wine during the march from Edinburgh to London.

Now, however, it had been carefully dried, in order that the king might gratify his curiosity by looking at it.

After that, it had been agreed it should be stuck upon a pike over Temple-bar.

The large, or rather immense reward which had been offered for this object, made every one present regard Turpin with the utmost interest and attention when he stood forward, by the duke's command, to assert his claim to it.

Now was the critical moment.

Was this audacious imposition to be successful?

Was the Young Pretender, after all, destined to have the laugh against his enemies?

We shall see.

Scarcely had Turpin taken the head in his hand, and standing before the king, commenced the recital of how he came to be in possession of it, than a strange hubbub arose.

The courtly guests looked about them with dismay.

An angry look came over the king's face.

But, despite of this, the hubbub increased, and came nearer and nearer.

Probably only one person there present could give a guess as to what it meant.

And that was Dick Turpin, whose eyes had suddenly encountered the gaze of Major Nicholson.

Upon the face of this individual was an expression of triumph.

Simultaneously with his observing this circumstance, a chair, which came from no one knew whither, was pushed forward.

Then a man, in a state of frantic excitement, which blinded him to all notions of etiquette, sprang into it.

This individual, upon whom the glance of all centred, was short and thin.

He was attired as a police-officer.

As if still further to show his authority, he held up at full length in his right hand a little staff with a gilt crown to it, such, indeed, as was carried by constables as an emblem of authority.

"Seize him!" he cried. "Murder! It's all a sham! The Pretender's alive, and has escaped! That is Dick Turpin, the highwayman! Seize him! Down with him! A thousand pounds reward! Murder!"

To paint the effect which these few words produced upon the guests in the saloon, is quite out of our power.

While he uttered the first few sentences, a dead silence ensued.

But that only lasted while they were dominated by surprise.

It was succeeded by a kind of roar, which quickly rose into a shout.

A rush was made in the direction where Turpin stood.

The chair upon which the officer stood was overturned

He was thrown to the ground before he could complete his ejaculatory denunciation.

But he was quickly up again.

CHAPTER CCXXX.

DICK TURPIN IS FORCED TO FLY THROUGH THE PALACE FOR HIS LIFE.

THE king started to his feet.

Swords were drawn.

Fierce cries uttered.

It may seem strange, but we are not afraid to say that the highwayman, who assuredly was in the greatest danger, was the calmest and most self-possessed of all.

It arose in a great measure from the fact that he anticipated the catastrophe.

But so suddenly had the officer sprang up upon the chair, and so rapidly had he spoken, that it was not until he was fairy overturned that Dick tried to fly.

His position was desperate.

He was surrounded.

Hemmed in on all sides.

His first impulse was to get rid of the head, which had now become merely an incumbrance to him.

Swinging it once round his head, he flung it into the face of his foes.

Then, with the quickness of thought, he drew his sword from its sheath.

It was not the trusty broadsword he was accustomed to use, but a rapier.

He glared about him.

To get to the windows was impossible.

The crowd of excited guests was between him and them, and to attempt to force a passage through so compact a body could only result in his own death or capture.

Some other outlet to the room must be found.

There were but two others.

One was the large folding doors leading into the outer saloon.

The other a small private door leading to the state apartments, through which the king had come.

To this Dick at once resolved to make his way.

He reached it at a bound.

A couple of yeomen of the guard stood on duty beside it, and, upon seeing him approach, they presented their long halberts at his breast.

But, with a blow from both arms, he dashed these aside.

Ere they could recover their cumbrous weapons, he gained the door.

He did not attempt to unfasten it, but flung himself with all his force against it.

There was a crash.

The door gave way.

A yell from the rear echoed the performance of this feat.

Dick stumbled when the door gave way, and almost fell.

Luckily, however, he preserved his footing.

A quarter of the force he used would have been sufficient.

Not stopping, however, he looked anxiously around to see what kind of place he was in.

It was a long and dimly-lighted corridor, from which opened a number of doors.

Willingly enough would he have tried to take shelter in one or other of the rooms into which they led, but his pursuers were too close upon his heels for such a manœuvre to be successful.

The confusion and excitement in the saloons were terrific.

The scene altogether had been too much for the royal nerves, so the king had sunk down in a swoon after springing to his feet.

Several rushed forward to his assistance, vociferating loudly

But by far the greater number hastened to pursue the audacious highwayman.

Foremost among these were Major Nicholson and the police-officer.

But Dick had got a start, though not much of a one, and did not allow himself to be frightened by the noise his pursuers made.

At the end of the corridor was another door.

It was ajar.

To dart through it was the work of a moment.

He noticed, too, that the fastenings were on the inner side.

He slammed the door to at once.

Then turned the key, which happened to be in the lock.

Then shot two brass bolts into their sockets.

Frail as the door was, and little strength as would be required to force it from its hinges, yet it answered one good purpose.

It enabled Dick to get out of sight of his pursuers.

Turning round, he found himself in a small ante-room, or vestibule.

Opposite was an open door, leading into a larger apartment.

Two steps brought him to it.

As he put his hand upon the knob to close this second door, his pursuers arrived at the first.

Some heavy blows were struck.

What followed next he did not stay to see, but closed this second door.

From afar off he could hear various sounds, which showed that the alarm was spreading, and would soon become general.

A bell was tolling furiously.

The kettledrums of the soldiers on duty at the palace sent forth their deafening notes.

"This is a serious affair," said Dick. "It strikes me, unless I find some way out of the palace, and that very quickly, I shall be captured."

He was now in a large and magnificently-furnished room.

It was illuminated by a chandelier, carrying some hundreds of wax candles.

Now, however, only two or three of these were lighted, so that the gloom was only partially dispelled.

Dick took this in at a glance, for, of course, he did not stay to make any examination.

It was vacant.

There was then a loud crash.

The first door had given way.

A moment.

And then his foes were at the second, and, by the vigorous manner in which they attacked it, Dick saw it would not hold up two minutes.

Running, therefore, the full length of this apartment he passed into another.

Beyond this was another.

In fact, he was in one of those long suites of rooms of which there are so many in St. James's Palace.

He had no resource but to keep on, for his pursuers pressed so closely after him.

Every door, however, through which he passed, he fastened as well as his haste would permit.

Having at length gained a little upon them, he stopped and drew aside one of the curtains before the windows.

This he found was an injudicious action.

He could just see very dimly what was beyond.

The window looked into an open paved court, which was thronged with people in a state of the greatest possible excitement.

From the loud cry which arose as soon as he drew back the curtain, he felt sure he must have been seen, and that he had given his enemies a clue to his whereabouts.

To have attempted escape from that window would have been madness.

Probably the time that he paused to draw aside the curtain and look out did not amount to a minute, but yet it enabled his pursuers to gain the door of the room in which he was.

They were expeditious.

There was a reason for this, but Turpin did not know it.

They had provided themselves with efficient instruments, by which they were able to demolish the doors almost as fast as Dick could fasten them.

He had no resource but to continue his flight through the suite of rooms.

These must come to an end some time, though they really seemed interminable.

Surely never before that night, and never since, had there been such a racket and confusion as there was then.

In a few moments, however—after, indeed, passing through two more rooms—the end was reached, and Dick emerged into another corridor, running at right angles to the course he had been taking.

The last door, however, he could not fasten, for the bolts and lock were upon the inner side.

Looking right and left down this corridor, for it stretched equally in both directions, he could see no one.

"I will turn to the left," he said. "Perhaps a little further on I shall come to a staircase, down which to force my way."

With these words in his mind, rather than upon his lips, Dick Turpin ran along the corridor, in the direction he had named.

Ere he had proceeded many yards, however, loud shouts, the clashing of weapons, and the hurried trampling of feet behind him, gave notice that his pursuers once more had him in full view.

Still Turpin ran on.

He was afraid to stop and make the attempt to gain one of the many apartments which opened to the right and left of him, lest it should enable them to gain too much upon him.

It was a strange race.

With unabated speed, however, the highwayman kept on.

The long, low corridor was only dimly lighted by a few oil lamps, placed in the hands of statues at long intervals.

To a certain extent, this was an inconvenience, but it advantaged him in this way.

Those in pursuit could not see him so easily as they would otherwise have done.

And now, in the distance, Dick fancies he can discern the termination of the long passage.

Perhaps there was the much wished for staircase.

But, if so, he was destined never to reach it.

Fresh sounds suddenly greet his ears.

They come from before him.

Another moment, and he sees the flashing of lights, the murmur of voices, the rush of feet.

A cry of triumph comes from those in the rear, who press onward with greater eagerness.

It is echoed by a groan from the highwayman, as, thus placed between two parties, he comes to a halt.

To go on would only be to throw himself into their grasp.

What is to be done?

To stand still is to be captured.

There is no hope of being able to force a passage through either those in advance or those in the rear.

Their numbers are too great, and they are too well armed.

CHAPTER CCXXXI.

DICK TURPIN ESCAPES FROM THE PALACE, BUT IS MADE PRISONER BY A SENTINEL.

DESPAIRINGLY, Dick Turpin, the bold highwayman, turned his eyes around him.

He dashes the heavy drops of perspiration from his face, which, trickling down from his forehead, obscure his vision.

His drawn sword is in his hands, and, for a second, it looks as though he was going to turn at bay, and fight his numerous foes.

But that idea is too preposterous to hold place in his mind.

A door was near him.

He did not know it might, if he passed through it, so far from aiding his escape, ensure his capture.

But the risk must be run.

His foes are close upon him.

He hears their swords clash.

He hears them cry to him to surrender.

Unheeding them, however, he grasped the handle of the door, and tried to enter.

Alas!

The door was fast upon the inner side.

A firm, heavy door it seemed.

Could he force it?

He knew that if he stayed where he then was, before his heart could pulsate thirty times his foes would be upon him.

He drew back to the opposite side of the corridor.

As he did so, there was the sharp report of a pistol.

He staggered.

No doubt he would have been shot at earlier, but none of those in chase were provided with firearms with the exception of the police-officer.

He had only one, and he reserved that until he could almost make certain of his aim.

Dick was hit.

But only slightly.

Although he staggered, he did not pause.

He rushed across the corridor, and flung himself with might and main.

It cracked.

It gave way.

He could not stop himself, but fell heavily with it to the floor.

Before his mind, however, was so palpable an idea of his danger, that he was on his feet again instantly.

But his foes were on the threshold.

"Surrender!" they cried. "Surrender, and your life will be spared. Surrender! It is impossible for you to escape."

"Never!" shouted Dick, hoarsely. "Never!"

The room into which he had just made his way, was almost in total darkness.

From the surrounding obscurity, however, he could just distinguish the outlines of the window.

Many of his pursuers had provided themselves with lights, but those who carried them were in the rear.

They did not wait for these to come up with them, but dashed into the chamber, crying out for Dick to surrender.

But this was a thing Dick Turpin determined never to do with life.

There was the window.

He knew not how high it might be from the ground.

He knew not what sort of a place there might be beyond.

But he knew it was the open air, because he could just distinguish the night sky.

Therefore, with the one word of "Never!" upon his lips, he made a terrific spring forward.

He concentrated in it the whole of his remaining energies.

He mounted on the broad window-sill.

Then flung himself, head-foremost, through the casement.

There was a tremendous crash of broken glass.

A wild cry from the king's guests, who were amazed at the boldness of this desperate feat.

Just then, those with the lights arrived upon the threshold.

A general rush was made to the window, from which came a strong current of cold air, that threatened to extinguish the lights.

All that could be seen, however, was a large hole in the very centre of the casement.

Framework and glass had both disappeared.

For a moment all stood still with astonishment, but, recovering themselves, they ran out of the room.

"This way—this way!" some one had cried. "He has leaped into the garden, and cannot escape. This way will take you to it. We shall find him lying lamed upon the ground, for the fall is enough to kill him. This way, all! We have him safe enough now."

But in this they were disappointed.

The communication between the eye and the brain is instantaneous.

When Dick had jumped on to the window-sill, and sprang through the casement, he caught a glimpse of the tops of some trees waving near him.

This at once made him aware that he was a considerable distance from the ground.

And also that ground would be of a soft character.

Had it been otherwise, however, he could not have halted.

He plunged through the window.

The mere weight of his body would have been sufficient to have shattered it to atoms.

He held his breath as he fell.

Then, with a sudden shock, he reached the ground.

But, fortunately for him, he happened to alight upon a bed of soft mould.

He fell, too, on his hands and knees.

For full three moments, though, he was deprived of consciousness.

Although the alarm appeared to be so general, there was no one at all about this spot.

Had there been, his capture would have been certain, for he could not have raised a hand to defend himself.

His senses soon returned to him.

Before he ventured to stir, he listened.

Various sounds indicative of alarm, and such as he had previously heard, still reached his ears, but they did not seem to be particularly near that spot.

When he took the leap, it was only with the idea of escaping immediate capture, but now the hope of being able to get clear off began to fill his mind.

But clearly there was no time to lose.

He struggled to his feet.

He was bruised and shaken, but no bones had been broken.

He was in pain—great pain—and his left ankle-joint seemed out of place.

Ricked is the colloquial word for it.

This, he was aware, would soon pass off.

He glanced round him, in order to take in his position.

The garden into which he had fallen seemed to be of very great extent.

Behind him was the palace.

Before him, sharply defined against the night sky, was a wall.

What was on the other side of that wall?

He looked around him once more.

It must be St. James's Park.

Could he once get into that large inclosure, surely he should stand a chance of baffling those who were in chase of him.

In a moment, then, now that he had resolved upon a particular course of action, he hastened to the garden wall.

It was, he found upon nearing it, only a little more than six feet in height.

To scale it, therefore, would not be a matter of much difficulty.

He raised his arms, in order to pull himself up, but a sudden pain forced him to drop them again.

In his fall, he had almost forgotten the wound he had received from the pistol of the police-officer while in the corridor.

But now he was disagreeably made sensible of it.

The bullet had struck him in the top part of his shoulder, near its junction with the neck.

He rapidly put up his hand to ascertain the extent of the injury.

It was slight.

There was, though, what most would have considered a serious and ugly gash.

The pain he felt arose, more than anything, from a portion of his apparel having stuck in it, and now that bleeding began again, he felt scarcely anything of it.

Once more, then, he placed his hands upon the edge of the wall, and, by the muscular force contained in his arms, drew himself up until his breast was on a level with it.

To get his legs up was easy enough.

And now those who had left the chamber to make their way into the garden, arrived.

Their numbers had considerably augmented, and they had, moreover, provided themselves with torches, which threw a ruddy light around.

They perceived Dick almost instantly, before he could lower himself from the wall, and they made a rush in his direction.

But, ere they could accomplish more than half the distance, Dick had descended.

Only to fall into a fresh peril.

Directly his feet touched the ground, he felt something hard pressed against his body, and a voice cried—

"Stand, or you are a dead man! If you attempt to move, I fire!"

It was a soldier who spoke.

Dick could distinguish his form, for his eyes had grown accustomed to the darkness.

He was one of the sentinels who were deputed to keep watch round the royal residence.

The hard object which was pressed against Dick's breast, was the muzzle of his musket.

He had seen him on the wall, and, as he thought, had him secure.

But he little knew the man he had to deal with.

When any one feels that his life depends upon his actions, it is wonderful how much more can be done than under less pressing circumstances.

Had some trifling punishment only been the result which followed his capture, Dick would then and there have surrendered.

But he was well aware that, should he once be taken prisoner, his life would be the penalty

CHAPTER CCXXXII.

DICK TURPIN DISPOSES OF THE SENTINEL, AND BESIDES UPON A PLACE OF REFUGE.

One touch upon the trigger of that musket, and Dick Turpin would have been a dead man.

But that touch was not destined to be given.

It was a hazardous experiment, but, with the swiftness of thought, Dick seized the barrel of the gun and turned it aside.

He was only just in time.

The sentinel had seen the movement, and prepared to fire.

The highwayman was quickest.

Had a person stood there, however, and been a spectator of the affair, he would have declared that Dick seized the muzzle and the soldier drew the trigger at precisely the same moment.

In reality this was not so.

A space of time—certainly infinitesimal—intervened, and it was during this period that Dick turned it aside.

The bullet flattened itself against the wall within a foot of him.

The recoil of the weapon made it for a moment unsteady in the sentry's grasp.

Dick was prepared for this, and took advantage of it to wrest the musket from his grasp.

Then, still holding it by the barrel, but shifting one hand farther along it, he swung it with great swiftness round his head, aiming a terrific blow at his opponent as he did so.

But the man knew what was coming, and drew back to avoid the stroke.

He did not go far enough.

The butt of the gun, instead of reaching his head, as the highwayman intended, alighted on his shoulder.

But, such was the vigour of the blow, that, with a yell of pain, he sank to the ground.

Dick's blood was up, and well it might be, taking all circumstances into consideration, and he did what he would not in a moment of less excitement have thought of doing.

He struck the man again.

This time he fell like an inanimate body upon the ground.

The struggle was a very brief one, but when Dick looked round, he found his enemies were very close upon him.

A small door in the garden-wall, which he had not previously noticed, was thrown open, and the disorderly throng, worked up to a pitch of the greatest possible excitement, poured forth.

They were this time in greater numbers than ever.

He turned and fled.

The musket, which had once already rendered him such good service, he would not abandon.

It was unloaded, but, used like a club, it would be a very effective weapon at close quarters.

As he crossed that open space in the park, known ever since the reign of Charles II. as "the Mall," he heard the loud clear tones of a bugle rise on the night air.

What this meant, he knew not, but scarcely had the echoes died away, than its notes were taken up by another in the distance.

It seemed to be at the Horse Guards.

It was a signal of some sort or other, for it was taken up by another, this time in another direction.

For a brief space Dick was at a loss to think what this signified, and then he muttered—

"I have it. I know now. Confound it, my troubles are not half over. They have communicated with the soldiers at the different gates, who will now refuse to let any one pass out."

Dick hit exactly upon the real state of the case.

There were then, as now, several gates by which St. James's Park could be left or entered.

At each of these gates were posted soldiers as sentinels.

The bugle call was understood by them as a command to close the gates and allow no one to pass out.

Dick Turpin was in a cage—a large one, it is true, but, nevertheless, it was a cage, and one in which he stood a good chance of being caught, unless luck befriended him in some extraordinary and unlooked for manner.

The park was dark, and the many trees that grew in it threw deep shadows all around.

For him to keep out of the way of those who were pursuing him with lights was no difficult matter, because their exact position was always known to him.

But with them the case was quite altered.

The torches only made the darkness appear darker, and confused their eyes.

Unless just within the sphere of their rays, Dick could not be seen.

The only thing that could guide them was the sound of his footsteps.

All had paused, as if actuated by one impulse, when they came to the sentinel, who lay upon the ground with every appearance of death.

This gave Dick a slight advantage, and he availed himself of it.

After crossing the Mall, he came to the tall iron palings which surround the green inclosure in which the piece of ornamental water is situated.

He had some trouble in climbing over these, for he had no place upon which he could rest his feet.

But he overcame the obstacle.

The Mall was hard and dry, so that no trace of his footsteps could be seen.

But in the inclosure it was soft.

He went onwards, however, until he came to a gravel path, changing his course a dozen times as he found his foes were on his track.

One of these gravel paths brought him out at the very verge of the piece of water.

The clumsy iron suspension-bride which now connects the opposite shores of this pretty lake, and takes off all its beauty, is of modern construction.

At the time of which we are writing there was no such contrivance.

"What shall I do?" asked Dick of himself, as he stood breathless and exhausted at the brink of the still waters, and fixing his eyes upon his pursuers as he spoke. "What shall I do?"

A dreadful sensation of weakness came over him.

He felt as though he should fall to the ground.

But, by a strong mental effort, he recovered himself.

"It is my wound," he said; "and yet it seems to have bled scarcely any. How is it?"

He put his hand upon it, and found his clothes all round about sopping wet.

It had bled more profusely than he imagined, and the crimson fluid had been absorbed by his apparel.

"I must stop this," he muttered, "or, in a little while I shall fall helpless into their hands. I must be quick, too."

While speaking, he pulled off his cravat.

He tore it into halves.

One he soaked in the cold clear water at his feet, and then bound as tightly as he could over the wound.

The other he likewise soaked, and tied tightly around his ankle, which pained him excessively.

While doing this he was all the time careful to keep an eye upon the movements of those who were in pursuit of him.

They had wandered off into quite another direction to that in which he was.

Doubtless they had been misled by some accidental sound, which they took to be indicative of his presence.

This just afforded him breathing time.

Though, in comparison with some of the other parks, St. James's is not a very large place, yet it extends over a good-sized piece of ground, and it can easily be imagined how Turpin managed to elude them.

But that would only be at night.

They had only to keep the guard at the gates, and when the morning came, he would be seen and hunted down easily.

"What shall I do?" asked Dick again. "I think I will cross the water. I shall at least have an obstacle between them which they will not cross in a moment."

This was true.

To have skirted the lake, however, would have taken him some time.

He was an excellent swimmer.

Therefore, without hesitation, he committed himself to the water, taking the utmost care not to make a splash that would betray his whereabouts.

It did not require many long, vigorous strokes to carry him to the opposite bank.

The immersion, however, did him good.

It cooled his heated body, and allayed the smarting of his wound.

It seemed to clear his brain, too, for when he stood up again on the shore, and shook as well as he could the moisture from his clothing, he experienced, not only a fresh accession of energy, but a new idea darted into his mind.

"The haunted house," he said. "The haunted house. Why did I not recollect that before, and make my way for it at once? Never mind, it is not now too late. The haunted house in the Birdcage-walk will afford me a secure refuge, provided I can gain the shelter of its roof unobserved."

He ran forward as he spoke, and cleared the palings dividing the inclosure from the road he had named, and which extends from Bridge-street, Westminster, to Buckingham Palace.

Along one side of this road—for such it is, though called somewhat strangely Birdcage-walk—is a row of substantially-built palatial-looking residences.

A hundred and twenty years ago, however, it was a much more fashionable place of residence than it is now.

It was one of these dwellings to which Turpin alluded.

He could remember how for years back it had been shut up and allowed to go to ruin.

From time to time some adventurous person, tempted by the lowness of the rent, had taken up his residence there.

But their tenancy was never of long duration.

At last it came to be looked upon as unfit for human habitation.

It was this which first depreciated the value of the other houses contiguous to it, and they have never recovered their former status of respectability.

Strange stories had at one period been current about a horrible murder that had been committed there, but, in the lapse of time, the particulars had almost been forgotten, though the house stood there—a deserted ruin, as a perpetual memento of it.

CHAPTER CCXXXIII.

DICK TURPIN TAKES REFUGE IN THE HAUNTED HOUSE IN BIRDCAGE-WALK.

By this time the reader of this history ought to know Dick Turpin well enough to be aware that he was not the sort of man to have any dread of ghosts and spectres.

He feared no man living, and it was not likely he should fear one dead.

He set the whole story of the house being haunted to some ridiculous tale or other.

Whether he was right or not, we shall very quickly see.

He looked up and down the broad road, as well as the darkness would permit him.

No one was in sight.

Then he looked back in the direction he had just come.

Those who had so pertinaciously followed him, had penetrated the inclosure, and were standing on the bank of the lake, as nearly as possible at the spot where he had plunged into it.

Perhaps they had managed, in some way, to get upon his track.

He could see the reflection of their torches in the water.

This warned him to be speedy.

Crossing the road, he looked up at the houses, to find the one of which he was in search.

All of these dwellings had gardens between them and the park palings.

Dick turned a little to the left, or in the direction of Storey's-gate.

He soon found the house for which he looked.

He gave a sigh of relief as he did so, for within the last few seconds the disagreeable idea had occurred to him that, perhaps, during his long absence from London, the house had either been pulled down or tenanted.

But no, there it was, dimly revealed in the darkness, and presenting precisely the same appearance as it had done when he saw it last.

He paused before the little gate, which, like the palings, was composed of iron rods, with wood at the back to shut out the vulgar gaze.

Dick placed his left foot upon the rusty lock, and clambered over easily.

Then crept stealthily along a path, paved with flagstones, which led directly to the mansion.

For it to be a safe place of refuge for him, he must leave no indications of any one having entered it.

But how was this to be managed?

He commenced a patient examination, convinced that, for a minute or two, at least, he had nothing to fear from his pursuers.

This examination, however, was not very assuring.

Dilapidated as the place appeared, he found upon a close approach, that every part of it was firmly secured to prevent any one from gaining ingress.

In the lower windows the panes of glass were every one demolished, but they were defended on the inner side by strong iron bars, too closely placed together to allow anyone to squeeze between them.

Dick caught hold of one, and tried to wrench it from its socket, but the effort was a vain one, it was as immovable as a rock.

Time was passing.

There was a door leading into the lower part of the premises—the kitchen, most probably.

He had tried this before and found it fast, but he was now driven to it as a kind of forlorn hope.

He tried to shake it, and partially succeeded, but there was ample evidence to show that it was firmly fastened on the inner side.

He had the musket with him for he knew its value too well to relinquish it.

With it he could, no doubt, have battered down the door, but that was out of the question.

Not only would the sound betray him to his pursuers, but it would call the attention of the people in the neighbouring houses.

He looked upward, but he could see no chance there of accomplishing his object.

The windows were all provided with large shutters, made somewhat in the shape of Venetian blinds.

"No," he said, "the door is my only chance. Curses on this delay! It was what I never expected."

As he spoke, he felt the door all over with his hand.

In doing so, he discovered something which had escaped his previous observation.

Near the upper portion were two panes of glass; or rather, there had been, for now very little of the glass remained.

The holes were small, but Turpin immediately resolved to try to crawl through one of them.

His first proceeding was to knock away all the jagged pieces of glass as gently as possibly with the butt end of the musket.

Next, to climb through.

But this was almost an impossibility.

He put his hands through first, and then his head.

This was all well and good, but when it came to his shoulders there was the difficulty.

By wriggling about, however, and moving one side at a time, he managed, at the expense of his clothes and his skin, to crawl completely through the aperture.

No one would have believed it possible, and few, save a practised acrobat would have attempted such a feat.

Dick rose to his feet as quickly as he could, and then, going to the hole, removed those portions of his clothing that clung to the points of glass.

The kitchen—if kitchen it was—into which he had thus surreptitiously made his way, was in the profoundest darkness.

When he held up his hand before his eyes it was invisible.

"What will be my best plan now, I wonder?" he muttered, as he stood near the door. "Shall I try to get out of the front of the mansion at once, or shall I stand a better chance if I stay here, where I am, until the pursuit after me abates?"

This was rather a knotty point.

But, after a little reflection, and duly deliberating the matter, he came to the conclusion that it would be best to try and leave the premises at once.

Many a bold heart would have fluttered at finding themselves in such a place as Dick was, and surrounded by so much silence and darkness—two things which have so powerful an influence over the imagination.

Even he, however, brave as he was, did not feel altogether comfortable, and he kept every now and then uttering his thoughts aloud, so oppressive did the silence become.

Which way to turn, in order to find an outlet to the room, he had not the remotest idea.

However, he projected the musket before him, so as to avoid coming into contact with any obstacle, and moved his feet carefully across the floor, taking care not to move one until he had a safe resting-place for the other. He had started with his back to the door, and endeavoured to make his way in as straight a line as possible.

After taking about twenty steps, the barrel of the musket struck against some object, which, upon closer observation, he found to be the wall.

By continuing along this, and maintaining the same caution as heretofore, he judged that he should before long come to the outlet for which he sought.

Nor was he mistaken in his supposition.

He did come to a door. But it was fast.

Inside the house, he was not likely to stand upon so much ceremony as he did out, when he wanted to conceal his entrance.

He drew the rapier from its sheath, and inserted its fine point in the crevice.

He continued to work it in gently, until the strong part of the blade was reached.

Then he bore his weight upon the hilt, using it in the manner of a crowbar.

The door cracked.

He repeated the pressure, and then the door swung open.

But he lost his rapier, for the blade snapped off close to its junction with the handle.

He did not care so much for that, as he had another effective weapon in his hands, and as it had already performed its modicum of service.

The door creaked open.

The same pitchy darkness was beyond.

"There ought to be some stairs somewhere about here," said Turpin. "I wonder whether I shall be able to find them?"

This seemed highly problematical.

By dint of a good deal of searching about with the musket-barrel, he succeeded in finding them.

Then he cautiously commenced their ascent.

As he went higher and higher, he found it grew lighter, and on arriving at the top, he saw the source from whence the light proceeded.

He had reached the entrance hall of the mansion, the front door of which opened into a street running parallel with Bird Cage-walk.

Over this door, which was a very large one, was a fan-light, thickly coated with dirt.

But, nevertheless, a few faint rays of the night-light found their way through it.

At the sides of the door, too, were two long, narrow windows, and through these light also came.

Contrasted with the kitchen below, this place appeared quite light, though any one just coming into it would have thought the reverse.

Dick could see about him with tolerable ease, and a certain feeling of curiosity, which he found impossible to repress, made him gaze all around to take in as well as he could its general appearance.

The hall was broad, but the ceiling was low, and thus took off in a great measure the imposing appearance which it should have had.

On his left hand, and facing the door, was a spacious staircase conducting to the upper stories.

"It looks a remarkably fine place," said Dick. "What a shame for it to be abandoned in the way I have known it to be! I wish I had a light. I would make an examination of it from top to bottom."

Dick's curiosity was strongly roused, and it looked as though he was half inclined to undertake it without a light, for he added—

"If I go upstairs and look out of one of the back-room windows, I shall be able to see all over the park, and find what my foes are about, and by going to the front I shall know whether there is any one there on the look-out for me. I'll do it, and at the same time gratify the longing I feel to make an attempt at discovering the mysteries of this haunted house."

Having come to this determination, he went to the foot of the stairs, and commenced ascending them.

But, before he had reached the first landing, he heard a sound which made him immediately pause.

Then hastily ascend the few remaining stairs, and crouch down in the corner out of sight.

CHAPTER CCXXXIV.

THE PRESENCE OF DICK TURPIN IN THE HAUNTED HOUSE TURNS OUT TO BE A FORTUNATE CIRCUMSTANCE FOR THE YOUNG, INNOCENT, AND GOOD.

A KEY rattled in the lock of the front door.

That was the sound which had attracted Dick's attention.

What could it mean?

Who could it be, at that lonely and mysterious hour, that was about to seek an entrance to that ill-omened dwelling?

Of course, the question was one out of Dick's power to answer.

But, be it whom it might, it was no stranger.

The key, however, was obstinate, and would not turn at first.

Upon a second trial, the lock shot back with a snap which echoed and re-echoed through the lonely building in a startling manner.

The door was thrown open.

Dick ventured to stretch his head over the balusters, in order to see who was about to enter.

They were three men.

Dick could only just distinguish the outlines of their figures in the deep gloom.

One was tall and stout, and attired in a long riding-cloak, which reached from his neck to his knees, thus concealing all traces of his form.

On his head was a large felt hat, with a slouching brim.

Turpin had a better opportunity of observing him than he did the other two.

It was this individual who had unlocked the door, and been the first to enter.

He stood to hold the door open, and take the key out of the lock, and it was while he was thus engaged that Dick had an opportunity of studying his appearance and manner.

The other two men were dressed in a very ordinary costume.

By their behaviour he could tell they were lower in degree than the one in the cloak.

With increasing interest Dick looked down.

The door was closed.

At the same instant a voice said, in suppressed tones, the one word—

"Light!"

No reply was made to this command, verbally, at all events, but directly afterwards Turpin saw one of the men produce something from his pocket, which proved to be a dark lantern.

A broad bright beam of light came through the lens, and fell upon the wall.

It revealed as well the countenance of one of the men.

Villain was visibly impressed upon it.

The intense desire which Dick felt to know what could be the motive of their visit, predominated over everything else.

He forgot the curiosity which he had felt to explore the gloomy mansion.

He forgot the danger through which he had just passed, and that with which he was threatened.

His presence in that house could not fail to be one of great peril.

He could not tell at what moment his pursuers might learn where he had taken shelter, and they could surround it in such a manner as to make escape utterly impossible.

A house would be a very different place to a large open space like the park.

But, as we have said, he quite forgot all about that, and only remembered what was taking place in the hall down stairs.

When the man who carried the dark lantern uncloaked it, he held it in such a manner that the greatest part of the light fell upon the staircase.

Then the one in the long riding-cloak stepped forward, and began to ascend the stairs.

The two men followed him at a short but respectful distance.

As soon as he perceived this movement, Dick hastened to go still higher.

Some thick substance seemed to be upon the stairs, which had the effect of deadening the sound of his footsteps.

In this way he proceeded up two flights, and commenced a third, when he perceived the three men pause upon the landing below him.

He stopped, of course.

He did not turn, it must be understood, and fly precipitately, but ascended with due deliberation, so that just the same distance was preserved between himself and those who were following.

So far, he felt certain that his presence in that strange and mysterious house was unsuspected.

The three men evidently thought they had it all to themselves.

It did not take Dick long to arrive at the conclusion that they were there after no good. Every little circumstance pointed towards it.

They came there stealthily and secretly, concealing themselves under cover of the darkness.

The manner in which they ascended the stairs, pausing at every few steps to listen, showed their desire to be unheard—their presence in that lonesome place unsuspected.

On the landing at the top of the second flight of stairs, they paused.

Dick had reached a bend in the stairs just above them, and screwed himself into the smallest possible compass that he could.

It must not be forgotten that the whole place, except just where the beams from the dark lantern fell, was in the deepest darkness, so that this precaution on Dick's part was hardly necessary, and taken more from impulse than reflection.

As soon as the door was reached, the stranger in the cloak threw that garment on one side, and commenced feeling in his pocket, probably for the key.

The other two still stood in the same silent, respectful attitudes as they had before assumed, the one with the light holding it in such a manner that the principal portion of its beams fell upon the doorway near the keyhole.

At length the stranger, after a moment's search, produced the key.

When his cloak was partially displaced, it showed that the dress he wore beneath it was of the costliest description, both as regards the material used, and the manner in which it was embroidered.

Of his face Dick also obtained a transient glimpse, but only of the lower part.

The mouth, chin, and cheeks were buried in a profusion of dark hair, worn after some continental fashion then scarcely known in England.

This was the extent of his observations, for, having found the key, the cloaked stranger rather hastily and impatiently thrust it into the keyhole.

Dick heard plainly enough in the silence that was around, the creaking noise produced by the key turning in the wards of the lock.

Then the door was flung open.

Ere, however, either one of them could cross the threshold, there arose a strange wailing kind of cry.

So full of woe was it, so heart-rending, and so unexpected, that it was a thousand wonders Dick Turpin did not, by some hasty movement or ejaculation, betray his presence.

He did move slightly, but the faint sound which he made was absorbed by the cry that came from the room, or whatever it was, into which the door opened.

"Cease—cease!" said a feeble but screaming voice, "persecute me no longer. Away—away! I hear your footsteps, and the very air tells me of your loathed presence! Hence—hence! I will not listen to you. Your words are vain—quite vain! I have seen a vision in the night, and the recollection of it will make me deaf to all your urgings. Hence—hence, I say!"

"He is in one of his old fits again," remarked one of the men. "How excited he does seem. I am afraid it gives him too much to eat."

"Silence!" said the stranger, in a stern tone

[DICK TURPIN WITNESSES A MURDER IN THE HAUNTED HOUSE.]

"Silence, both of you, and enter. I will follow."

The two men obeyed this command immediately.

Shriek after shriek arose from the lips of the person within, and who, from the words just uttered, Dick imagined to be of the male sex.

But, had it not been for this, he would scarcely have surmised it.

The voice seemed rather that of a female, and the strange shrieks, too, which floated with so horrible a cadence through the air in that deserted mansion, served in a great measure to confirm the idea.

Suddenly, however, those shrieks ceased, and the highwayman heard a few words uttered in a low tone, but he was too far off to catch their import.

Fully impressed with the idea that they had that lonely house entirely to themselves, the stranger in the cloak, when he followed his two subordinates into the chamber, did not close the door, but swung it to after him, leaving it ajar.

It was open, in fact, to a space of about three inches.

Dick noticed this, for the stream of light made it very conspicuous.

With this little circumstance under his observation, as soon as he found himself unable to hear what was said, he, with all the caution he was master of, stole down the stairs.

The thick coating which lay upon them, and which had before deadened the sound of his footsteps, was nothing more nor less than dust.

The care he took was really quite unnecessary. His steps would have been quite inaudible.

It was rather a remarkable feature in Dick's disposition to feel immediately curious when anything strange or incomprehensible came under his observation.

So, on the present occasion, he lost all sense of the danger he was in, and the additional peril he was bringing on himself.

Something of a very mysterious character was taking place.

And, not only that, there were indications to show that it was of an iniquitous character likewise.

He paused for a moment on the second landing to listen, in order to make sure that he was unheard.

But, feeling tolerably assured, he crept forward to the partially-open door.

Leaning, then, upon the musket he had wrested from the sentinel, he listened with the utmost intentness.

The deep-toned voice was still speaking.

Dick could now for certain recognise it for the tall stranger in the cloak.

The words came clearly to his ears.

"Take care, old man—take care. Do not decide hastily. Reflect upon this last chance I offer you. Bear in mind, too, that your life—and not only your life, but the life of one which you hold at ten times more value—depends upon your reply. Speak, I say. Speak. You are in my power, and what has taken place up to the present moment ought to show you the futility of struggling against the inexorable decrees of fate. Cheat yourself no longer with false hopes. Reply—reply, I say, at once!"

The deep-toned voice ceased, and Dick listened with the utmost eagerness for the reply it was so anxious to elicit.

CHAPTER COXXXV.

IN WHICH IS GIVEN SOME DETAILS OF THE MYSTERIOUS DOINGS IN THE HAUNTED HOUSE.

"MERCY—mercy."

Those were the words that came plaintively and feebly from the lips of the person addressed.

"Answer me," cried the stranger. "Answer me at once."

"Have mercy."

"You palter with your fate, old man. Return me a direct reply. Will you comply with my conditions?"

"Conditions? What conditions?"

"You try my patience to the utmost. What have I just asked you?"

"You are my foe. I tell you I have seen a vision in the night to show me how deadly an enemy you are to me and mine."

"Pho—pho. You rave."

"No—no."

"I say you do. Dreams always go by contraries."

"But what I saw was true. I tell you, you are my enemy."

"A delusion—a delusion. So far from that, I am, could you but see it, your friend. Think of Blanche!"

"Blanche—Blanche!" shrieked the old man, with a sudden accession of vigour as soon as the name was pronounced. "Blanche—Blanche! Where is she? Tell me! Take me to her! Let me once again have the pure joy of looking into her blue eyes! Fiends, you mock me! Where is Blanche? Where is she?"

"I will tell you."

It was the tall stranger who spoke.

"You—you?"

"Even I."

"And know you where she may be found?"

"I do."

"Heaven have mercy on her, then, and shield her."

"Pho—pho. You rave. You see not clearly the aspect of affairs."

"How?"

"You ask heaven to do that which you can do yourself. Is it possible that you can have lived so many years without knowing that the machinery by which this world is set in motion, when once started, goes on and on, overcoming in its mighty revolutions all puny obstacles, and that heaven never interposes on behalf of any one who has the power of helping himself?"

"Scoffer!"

"You tire my patience. It is tried. This scene to-night is but a repetition of many that have preceded it. So many that you, as well as I, must have lost all count."

"I know it."

"But I tell you, old man, that, let the after consequences be what they may, this night shall be the last. Do you understand me? The last!"

"I am thankful."

"Now you are more reasonable, but do not misunderstand me. You have two alternatives."

"Two alternatives?"

"Yes, and you are free to choose between them. Make your own choice freely. The result will fall upon no other head than yours."

"And Blanche?"

"Ah! yes, and Blanche. Certainly on Blanche, if you are fool enough to persist in your refusal to accede to my conditions."

"Blanche! Blanche!" shrieked the old man again, for it seemed as though the pronunciation of the word drove him to a kind of frenzy. "Speak to me of her, I implore you. Oh! speak to me of her."

"If you accede to my conditions, not without."

"I tell you she is the only tie which serves to bind me to this life. Were it not for her, I should be content to die and leave this world, so full of care and trouble, to itself and those whose joy it is to live in its turmoil. But I cannot. Blanche binds my life to this poor wasted frame. I tell you, she is all that is left to remind me of the past. Save her, I stand here a wretched miserable man—the survivor of all his kindred."

"Peace—peace. We have heard all this before."

"One tie binds me!" cried the old man, with ever greater vehemence, for the interruption chafed him "One tie, but that one is so strong and so tightly woven in my heart-strings, that the one can never be wrenched from the other. In that one tie are condensed all those which almost broke my heart to part from. I love her with my whole love."

"You say so," replied the stranger, "but prove the contrary by your actions. But, come; calm yourself, and listen to me."

"What would you say?"

"That which you have heard many times before, but which, I believe, you have listened to unheeded."

"Blanche, I say!" shrieked the old man. "Release me, fiends, and let me fly to her! Release me, I say."

A slight struggle ensued, which ceased almost as soon as it had begun.

The old man was very weak, doubtless, and with his three antagonists stood no chance.

The tall stranger spoke again.

"You shall go to Blanche," he said; "and, if you wish it, remain with her for ever. But, unless you comply with my conditions, you may make your mind easy that you will never see her more."

"I defy you and your power!"

"Reflect well ere you decide."

"I have reflected."

"And is that your decision?"

"It is."

"I trust you will change. Do you know the consequences of your refusal to my conditions?"

"I defy you."

"Old man, you must be mad—utterly insane. You know not what you say."

"Are you really so anxious to save my life?"

"I am."

"And wherefore?"

"Because I would rather not have your blood upon my hands."

"Ha! ha!"

"But, if you drive me to extremities, I shall banish the idea, and then, when you find life is ebbing from you—that it is impossible for death to be averted—then, I say, you will repent, and wish you had acted otherwise."

"Never."

"But I say you will. The workings of the human heart are no secret to me. I say again, that when it is too late, you will repent."

"It is hard to die"——

"I am glad you know it," interrupted the stranger; "and, bear in mind, that there is another who will find it equally hard. There is Blanche. Surely you have not forgotten her. Is this the strong attachment you have always professed for her? Would you obstinately die when you might live to watch over and protect her, until such time as she was able to defend herself."

"Cease—cease."

"Why should I cease?"

"You tear my heart."

"And should it not be torn? You are blind to your own interests and the interests of one who you ought to consider far more than yourself."

"And do I not? Have I not? False villain! My intellect is not yet so stultified as to be unable to detect your sophistry. You would gloze over your own villainy. You have not said a word about that."

"This is worse than all. I have had patience with you so far, but, let me warn you, it will not be of much longer continuance. The limit will soon be reached. Will you listen to me?"

"What would you say?"

"That which it would benefit you much to hear."

"Say on, then."

"You are an old man."

"I know it."

"But few years of your span of life remain."

"I know that, too, but they are much abbreviated through your plottings."

"Be calm!"

"I am calm."

"Seemingly. Let me entreat you to cast away all excitement. It cannot be productive of aught but harm."

"I am calm, I tell you!"

The fretful, peevish tone in which these words were uttered, but ill concealed the excitation beneath them—ready to break forth at the first opportunity.

"I will take you at your word! At first it was my intention to recapitulate the whole of the facts, but that would be most tedious and unnecessary. I am determined to have an answer at once! And upon that answer will depend whether you go from this house a free man, at liberty to do what you think fit. To once more have Blanche restored to you, or whether your life pays the forfeit, and hers also!"

"Monster!"

"Be calm!"

"Calm? Who could be calm while smarting under wrongs so flagrant as mine are?"

"Be calm, I say, and answer me. Do you know what the conditions are?"

"I do."

"Are you quite sure of that?"

"Quite sure."

"That is well."

"At least, you have told them to me. You would have me assign my lands and inheritance to you, and in return, to have my daughter Blanche restored to me."

"To be sure. You are quite right. And why should you refuse?"

"Why should I refuse?"

"Yes."

"For my own sake, or rather, I should say, for my daughter's."

"A wicked and selfish plea."

"Wicked and selfish?"

"Yes."

"How so?"

"How so! You know the history of the past as well as I do."

"Agreed; but that knowledge does not show me that I am either wicked or selfish."

"And I do. There is that little difference between us. Who was it first turned my father's heart against me, and caused me to be deprived of that which was lawfully my own?"

"Your own evil deeds, and more evil passions."

"False!"

"It is true," said the old man, in louder tones, "we are brothers, but, thank heaven, the same mother did not bear us. Mine died, and when our common father took another bride, he little dreamt that he was warming a serpent in his bosom, but so it was—so it was."

CHAPTER CCXXXVI.

THE PLOT BECOMES A LITTLE CLEARER, BUT DICK IS ANXIOUS TO HEAR STILL MORE.

FEVERISHLY interested, and deeply curious as Dick had been while listening to the foregoing dialogue, and accustomed as he was to penetrate an affair, yet it was not until the last words were uttered that he was able to form anything at all like a clear idea of the case.

But that furnished him with a clue, and one which it was very easy to pursue.

Hitherto he had stood without moving in the least from his position, but now he made a change.

The reason that influenced him was, he thought he should have a chance of seeing into the interior of the room, and not only listen to what was said, but observe the actions of those within, if he moved a little.

He made the trial carefully, choosing for his opportunity the time when their voices were raised loudest in talking.

As he expected, he found he could see into the room, but only partially

In a few words we will describe what it was he saw.

At one end of the apartment was seated, in a strange-looking high-backed chair, an old man.

His frame was much emaciated.

His features covered with a network of wrinkles, which crossed and recrossed each other in every imaginable direction.

His hair—what little there was of it—was snow-white.

His head was bald, and the hair encircled it like a trimming of white fur.

Many marks of great age were upon him, but still they had the appearance of being prematurely caused.

His arms were held on each side by the two men, the accomplices of the stranger in the cloak.

The grasp they kept was a tight one, and they forced him to remain seated in the chair, from which he every moment made an effort to spring.

Dick saw him very plainly, as well as the two men who had him in their grip, but he could not see the principal actor in this strange scene.

He was standing just so as to be out of sight from where Turpin stood.

The door hid him.

One table was in the room, which otherwise was barely furnished.

This table occupied a place near the arm-chair.

Upon it was the dark lantern.

The door containing the convex lens was open, so that the light was diffused over the apartment, instead of being condensed into one broad ray.

Anguish, despair, defiance, alternately distorted the face of the old man.

Such a conflict of the passions could not but be debilitating in the frame of so old and worn a man.

Many speculations concerning what he saw passed through Dick's mind, but he did not stay to elaborate any of them.

That which was taking place engaged the whole of his attention.

After the words the old man had last uttered, the cloaked stranger was unable to speak for a moment or so. He was actually convulsed with rage.

But at the end of that time, instead of giving vent to the burst of passionate invective which rose to his lips, he controlled himself by a mighty effort.

"Leave the past," he said. "To rake it up again can do no good. Attend to my conditions. Assign to me all right and title to the estates which you possess, and then your daughter shall be restored to you; refuse, and her fate will be such as to wring pity from the fiends."

"Cease—cease. Why torture me thus?"

"Why? Because I have determined that all shall be mine—mine, as they would have, had it not been for you. I would have slain you long ago, but I knew the conditions of the will, and the only way in which I can obtain what I covet is by a legal transfer of all from you to me."

"And think you I shall give it?"

"Why not? Surely of the two alternatives I offer, it is the more preferable. I do not reduce you or your daughter to absolute beggary. I will provide you with a competence. You shall both have sufficient to supply you with far more than the necessaries of life. You must be blind to your own interests to refuse."

The old man was silent.

The other made no offer to interrupt him, or to press him for a reply.

He hoped, by waiting patiently until he had well weighed it over in his mind, to receive one favourable to his desires.

"What guaranty have I?" asked the old man, at last.

"Guaranty of what?"

"That you will keep faith with me."

"In what?"

"In allowing an income to myself and my poor daughter."

"I swear it."

"I would sooner have your promise than your oath. I should depend on neither."

"In what way can I assure it?"

"I know not, nor do I wish to know it. Again do I defy you, and your utmost power. It may be that you hold me here a helpless prisoner—it may be that you hold my daughter in a similar condition—but, in spite of all that, I defy you—shall continue to defy you—for I have yet faith in heaven's willingness to throw a shield of protection between the helpless and their persecutors."

"Go on—go on! exhaust yourself. You will try my patience in so doing, but still go on. When you are calm—when you no longer rave—then I shall be able to talk with you."

Probably no means could have been found so eminently calculated to effect the end desired.

As if by magic, the old man became calm.

This request to beat out his fury, and the knowledge that it would be passed over without being heeded in the least, made him silent.

On the contrary, had he been opposed, he would have gone on and on, gathering new strength from the conflict.

Of a surety, when the cloaked stranger boasted that the workings of the human heart were well known to him, he said no more than the truth.

The present proved a remarkable example.

Observing that the old man was quiet and subdued, he spoke again.

This time, however, he approached the table.

Then Dick saw him.

But he could gather little more than he already knew.

The broad-brimmed felt hat still concealed his features, and the cloak his form.

But, as he bent down his head over the table, between Dick and the light, a portion of his profile became discernible.

When he saw it, the highwayman was at no loss to detect a likeness—faint, certainly—between the two half-brothers.

He had stooped to put something on the table before the old man, upon which he rested one finger.

It was a piece of parchment, and at one corner was a dark-coloured stamp.

He next produced a pen and ink.

The old man watched his every movement with the greatest eagerness.

But that was a token of the semi-imbecile state to which he had been reduced.

"Behold," said the stranger. "This is a document legally framed, and done so cunningly as to leave no loop-hole to creep out of. Sign it, and by that act you will make yourself free, and your daughter also. One would think, from your wild speeches, that you were an affectionate father, that you would endure anything rather than one so dear to you should suffer pain."

"Pain?"

"Yes, pain. You need not think that her captivity is anything pleasant, except in comparison with her future fate, if you still continue obstinate."

"Mercy! Have mercy upon me!"

"Have mercy on yourself. Sign that paper, and I will take you hence to the place where she now is. You shall both be free and unmolested from that moment. Do you hear me?"

"I do hear you."

"Then do you consent, or am I at once to close this scene, which would long ago have had an end, had I not felt the tie between us, and been unwilling to have your blood upon my hands?"

For the first time, the old man hesitated.

Dick feared he would consent.

The poet has said, "the woman who hesitates is lost," and the remark is applicable to either sex, under all circumstances.

But, imperfectly as we are at present acquainted with the history of these two men, of whose strange meeting Dick Turpin, the highwayman, so unexpectedly became a spectator and an auditor, yet enough can be gleaned to justify the thought that there were many things to secure the old man if he wavered.

Ere long, however, the whole will be unfolded to the reader, and it will be found to be the most remarkable episode which has yet been narrated.

Had there been an opportunity, Dick would have interposed, and cautioned the old man not to take his brother's specious promises as granted.

But he had no chance of doing this, and moreover, in the desire he experienced to be of service to him and his daughter, he felt that his best course would be to remain where he was, and not let his presence be suspected.

"Sign!" said the stranger again, "sign! You have had time enough for deliberation. Have you come to a decision?"

The old man was silent.

The pen was dipped in the ink, and thrust into his hand.

Then he looked up.

Tears were in his eyes.

"If," he said, "I thus abalienate my rights, to save my own and my dear daughter's life, will you keep your word with me?"

"I will."

"Enough, then."

With a heavy sigh, the old man put his pen to the paper.

Then, with the rapidity of desperation, and much in the same state as a man is when he commits suicide—when he dreads to think—he signed his name.

But the very instant he finished forming the last stroke his unnatural brother placed a pistol to his head, and drew the trigger with the rapidity of lightning!

CHAPTER CCXXXVII.

DICK TURPIN HAS YET A GREAT DEAL OF TROUBLE WITH HIS FOES, WHO ARE DETERMINED NOT TO GIVE UP THE PURSUIT.

THERE was a flash, and a puff of white coloured smoke, succeeded, without the elapsion of a second, by a loud report.

The old man was dead!

So suddenly was this horrid deed performed.

So rapidly had it been carried out, that Dick Turpin, prompt to move as he generally was, for a moment stood aghast.

He had never dreamed of so much perfidy.

He had had his doubts and suspicions of the stranger in the cloak, but he had not thought so badly of him as that.

Could anything more treacherous be conceived!

From the manner in which the deed was done, it must have been premeditated.

As soon as he had recovered somewhat from the sudden shock of astonishment he had received, Dick half started forward.

But ere he could achieve his intention of rushing into the room, and confronting the murderers and their victim, something else occurred which immediately had the effect of arresting his footsteps.

Bang—bang—bang.

Such was the sound which came with sudden and startling distinctness from the front door, which had been struck by some heavy instrument.

Bang—bang—bang.

The intention was to batter down the door.

But if the sound had the effect we have described upon Dick Turpin, who knew perfectly well to what cause to assign it, what effect could it have had upon the guilty wretches in the inner room?

They moved confusedly.

There was but one resource open to Dick.

That was, to ascend the stairs.

He did so before those in the room had recovered themselves.

A panic seemed to have been struck into their guilty breasts.

Bang—bang—bang.

Whatever little noise Dick Turpin might have made in moving, was effectually drowned by the reverberations of the heavy blows as they echoed and re-echoed through the deserted mansion.

Dick Turpin at once came to the conclusion that his pursuers, who had been forgotten, had ascertained in some way whereabouts he was concealed.

They had attacked the house.

Never could their presence have been more inopportune.

At least, Dick thought so.

He had, as we have seen, taken a deep interest in the actors in the scene we have depicted.

He would have liked to have seen the termination of it, and used his own endeavours to right the innocent.

Now, however, there seemed to be but little chance of his doing so.

But one thing remained for him, if he wished to remain uncaptured.

And that was to fly.

To leave the mysterious house, and this strange mystery within it, to elucidate themselves.

The discovery of what had taken place would no doubt create a diversion in his favour.

The reader does not require to be told which he considered to be the most important to himself.

It was to make his way with all speed from that ill-omened spot.

But how was he to do it?

The roof.

That was the thought that darted into his mind instantaneously.

But how was he to reach it?

He was unacquainted with the upper portion of the house.

He was in darkness.

Or nearly so.

The only exceptions were when he happened to be near a window, through which some glimmering of night light penetrated.

He had for a guide the nature of the stairs he had ascended, and he was well enough acquainted with the interior of houses to know that the upper flights do not differ materially from the lower.

Before, however, he had well reached the third landing, his ears were assailed by a terrific crash.

The front door was down.

His pursuers would now soon be close upon his heels.

He would fain have lingered, though, in order to learn what effect the discovery of the murder would have upon them, and whether the three men would escape or be apprehended.

But a consideration for his own safety precluded all idea of this, so he was forced to continue his ascent.

And as he went higher, he remembered, with an uncomfortable spirit, what great difficulty he had had in effecting an entrance.

Was it not only reasonable to argue from this that he would experience an equal amount of trouble in leaving it?

But, not allowing himself to be disheartened by this idea, he hurried on.

From the wound in his shoulder he felt but little pain, which was mainly to be attributed to the skilful manner in which he had bandaged it.

His ankle-joint, however, had swelled to more than double its usual size, and entirely filled his huge top boot, so that every time he moved it was at the expense of a great deal of anguish.

At length, he reached what he had no doubt was the topmost story in the house.

But the place upon which he stood was darker than any other part of the staircase, and he was consequently unable to perceive whether there were any indications of a trap-door in the roof above him.

Groping hastily round the walls, he came to a door, which he immediately opened.

While his hand was upon the knob, a terrible uproar came to his ears from the lower part of the house.

There was a confusion of voices, and the hasty trampling of feet.

Aware as he was that he had no time to lose, yet he could not control the impulse to run to the balusters and peep over.

The sounds still continued, and he had little doubt the body of the murdered man had been discovered.

Lights flashed upon the walls, and it was not long before he found those who carried them were ascending.

But he was yet in doubt whether those persons who had made so forcible an entrance were really his old pursuers from the palace.

Once more, then, crossing the little landing, he passed through the door which he had just before opened, and closed it after him.

The key he felt was on the outer side, so he pulled it out and rapidly locked himself in.

Turning, he saw he stood in a chamber of very limited dimensions.

Facing him was a window, and, from having been so long in the dark, the little light that came in was enough to enable him to distinguish the outlines of the walls.

It appeared destitute of furniture.

But it was merely by a glance which he cast round him that he noted these things. His attention was instantly riveted upon the window as the most likely means of escape.

Treading very softly, for he did not want to betray his whereabouts, he reached it.

The panes were of that kind then almost exclusively in use.

That is to say, small, diamond-like in shape and set in lead.

It opened, of course, in the usual old-fashioned manner, by swinging back upon two vertical hinges, and not by sliding up in a groove.

It was fastened, but it gave him no trouble to turn the little buttons at the top and bottom by which it was secured.

Then the casement swung silently open.

Dick looked out.

As he had quite anticipated, he found himself at the back of the house, and with St. James's Park before him.

His eye wandered over the huge green inclosure, but, so far as he could tell, there was nothing either suspicious or remarkable to be seen.

The pursuit of him had either been abandoned, or else his foes were at that moment in the house.

We may as well set all doubts at rest by saying here that those who had broken in were not the persons who had chased him through the park, but a body of ordinary police-officers.

Their presence can be easily accounted for.

The stranger and his two companions, before they ventured to approach the house, took a long look around and about them, in order to make sure that they were observed by no one.

Having satisfied themselves in this manner, they boldly crossed over, and stood concealed in the shadow of the doorway, which was of a curious and antique fashion.

Then they had entered, as we have recorded.

But it so happened, and it really was about as wonderful a thing as could well happen, they were seen by a Bow-street police-officer.

He had been out upon some special service, and was returning, when by chance he saw three dim shadowy figures cross the street, and disappear in the doorway of the haunted house.

This circumstance in itself looked a simple one enough, but not only was the behaviour of the men excitive of suspicion, but the officer well knew the house to be uninhabited and haunted.

He was, however, of rather a matter-of-fact turn of mind, and he came at once to the conclusion that he had discovered a very important thing indeed.

With great presence of mind, then, he had shrunk back into the shadow of the houses, and arrested his footsteps, in order that the mysterious individuals should not take the alarm.

When he had waited what he considered was a proper length of time, he left his place of concealment, and approached the door.

It was closed, and presented no signs of having been so recently opened.

The officer placed his ear against the panel.

All was still.

But, feeling certain that he had not been deceived in what he saw, although there were now no indications of it, he hastened off at full speed to procure assistance.

CHAPTER CCXXXVIII.

THE OFFICERS OF POLICE PURSUE THE MURDERERS, AND A RATHER LUDICROUS MISTAKE IS MADE BY DICK'S FOES FROM THE PALACE.

It was during his absence upon this errand that the strange interview between the half-brothers took place.

Had the officers arrived a little earlier than they did, an awful and cold-blooded murder would doubtless have been prevented.

But fate had decreed it otherwise.

Just as they reached the portal, the clear, ringing report of the pistol reached their ears.

This was enough to warrant them in taking rather more energetic proceedings than they would otherwise have done.

They battered down the door.

This done, they stood for a moment in listening attitudes, in order to learn in what portion of the house the disturbance was taking place.

Sounds came very clearly to their ears from above.

They bounded up the stairs, therefore, with all possible speed.

All were provided with lights, which they held in their left hands.

Guided by a hasty ejaculation, they proceeded to the room on the second floor, in which the murder had been committed.

They pushed open the door, which still stood ajar, and entered in a body.

The first thing they perceived was a door in front of them.

In the general rush forward which all made to reach it, one stumbled over the prostrate body of the old man, which had not been noticed, and fell heavily to the floor.

In a moment their lights were turned upon the spot, and then the hideous object was fully brought to view.

Their comrade was assisted to his feet.

"Never mind the body," he cried; "but look after the murderers, or else they will escape."

"Which way shall we go?"

"Some on the landing outside, to see that no one goes up or comes down the stairs, and the remainder through yonder door, which is the way I fancy they have taken."

As soon as these words were spoken, the officers divided themselves into two portions.

The officer who had given the instructions what to do, and assumed the office of chief, choose himself to go through the door.

They found upon passing through it, that it led into another chamber similar to the one they had just left.

Another door led out of it to a small staircase.

Down this they rushed with the utmost precipitation.

At the time that house was built the principle of making two staircases was much more generally adopted than it is at the present day.

The stairs leading from the hall was what was called the grand staircase.

The other, the secondary one, which was used by the domestics in the estsblishment.

It was down this latter one, then, that the officers precipitated themselves in search of the murderers.

The bottom was reached in an incredibly short space of time.

A gush of cool air came to their faces, which showed them that a means of exit must be somewhere close at hand.

And in fact a little door was found, which, when they passed through, they discovered led into a narrow passage.

Pursuing this, they came to the garden at the back of the mansion, looking into St. James's Park.

They had made good speed, for on looking before them, two men were seen effecting a hasty retreat over the palisades.

"Halt! or we fire," shouted the officers, hastening forward; "surrender, or you are dead men!"

But their words were quite unheeded.

Before, however, they could descend, the officers fired a volley of pistols at them.

Groans and shrieks mingled with the discharge.

But as soon as the smoke cleared away, nothing was to be seen of the men.

They had merely fallen upon the hard road on the other side, and were too severely hurt to be able to escape.

Here they were quickly captured.

They were the two accomplices—the principal had succeeded in making an escape.

But only temporarily.

The different exits to the park were, as we know, strictly guarded, and there was no chance of leaving the enclosure by the ordinary means of egress.

The two men had neither received a dangerous wound; they were, indeed, more frightened than hurt.

The blood, however, was stanched, and handcuffs placed upon their wrists.

Not knowing that the gates had been closed, and not being able to hear any sounds of footsteps, no attempt was made to search for the third person who entered the house, as they believed that such a search could only prove resultless.

Content with their prey, they returned to the house, in order to regain their companions on the landing.

Leaving, however, these and Dick for a little while, we will devote a word or two of very necessary explanation to the man in the cloak.

When he heard the heavy blows struck upon the door, he guessed in a moment that, by some unforeseen means or other, all had been discovered.

The suddenness, however, with which the intelligence had come upon him, deprived him for a minute or two of all power of action.

Then, recovering himself, he called to the men to follow him.

By his actions, it would appear that he was intimately acquainted with the interior of the house.

Without hesitation, he made his way to the door on the opposite side of the room.

It was fastened, but he quickly had it open.

He did not stay to see whether his followers closed it after them or not, but rushed down the stairs and out into the garden.

With an agility that no one would have thought he possessed, he leaped the palisades, and alighted on his feet in Birdcage-walk.

Nothing but instant flight, he considered, would save him.

Anticipating no difficulty in leaving the park, he ran at full speed in the direction of the Horse-guards.

He heard the report of the pistols, and guessed that his followers had been made prisoners.

A curse escaped his lips, for, next to preserving his own freedom, he wished to insure theirs.

It was in their power to reveal some very disagreeable secrets, which he preferred should be kept from the light of day.

He had no chance of rescuing them, he knew, and therefore did not make the attempt.

His original intention had been to make his way into Whitehall through the Horse-guards, but upon nearing this place, he caught sight of several officers on duty.

This induced him to alter his mind.

There was the narrow passage at Spring-gardens, which would answer his purpose quite as well, if not better.

Hurrying along in the darkness, he directly afterwards came in sight of the Mall, or broad-walk through the Park, leading from Charing-cross to Buckingham-palace.

To his dismay, he saw, at no very great distance, several figures moving rapidly.

He could distinguish them because they carried torches, which made them look like dim spectres.

By their manner, he could tell they were searching for some one or something.

Who could it be but himself?

He jumped to the conclusion no one.

A desperate effort must therefore be made to get free.

They did not see him where he stood—for he had come to a halt when he first caught sight of them—he felt pretty sure.

He must take care that they should not do so now.

A person less intimately acquainted with the position of the different objects in the park than he was would never have been able to direct their steps so unerringly to the point he wished to reach.

That point was the gate leading out into Spring-gardens.

Little did he dream how blindly he was rushing on to his own capture—what pains he was taking to effect it.

Skulking along in the shadow of the trees, in order that he should not be perceived, he came at length to a place where it was no longer possible to do this.

He reached the gate.

In the deep darkness he did not notice that the gate was closed, or if he did thought nothing of it, making sure that it would be opened at his command.

He was doomed to be woefully deceived.

He darted forward.

No sooner did he do so, than the sentinel on guard, who had heard his approach, and wisely continued silent, grasped him by the throat.

Then he raised such an outcry as would have reached the ears of the party from the palace, had they been at thrice the distance they really were.

On they came.

The stranger made a desperate effort to release himself. But it was in vain.

The sentinel at that time on duty happened to be the strongest man in the whole regiment.

Powerful as he was, the stranger was but a child in his grasp.

Then the others came up.

The police-officer, with a cry of wild exultation, clasped the struggling prisoner round the breast, thus pinioning his arms to his side.

"I've got him!" he cried. "Hurrah! Nabbed at last! Hurrah! Capital! Tie him up, somebody! Make haste!"

Some rope was produced, and with this the stranger was bound very tightly indeed.

"Bring him along," cried the officer. "Bring him along. I knowed I should have him! Somebody call a coach, and I'll have him taken to Newgate at once."

The iron gate was flung open, and the whole party passed through it.

It did not take them more than a minute to reach Charing-cross, and then they looked about them for a hackney-coach.

CHAPTER CCXXXIX.

THE STRANGER IS TAKEN TO NEWGATE, AND IS ALL BUT SET FREE, WHEN ANOTHER ARRIVAL AT THE PRISON TAKES PLACE.

Of course the reader has not failed to perceive the mistake into which the pursuers of Dick Turpin had fallen.

It seems at first sight rather remarkable that such should have been the case, but after a minute or two's consideration, it will look extremely probable.

In the first place, from the length of time the gates had been closed, they felt pretty sure that there could be no one in the park except the person of whom they were in search.

Then the manner in which the stranger had been caught, all looked as though it was their prey.

He had also favoured them in a great measure, and helped to fix the deceit in their minds, for when he began to run, feeling his cloak a very great incumbrance, he unfastened the little clasp at the throat, and allowed it to fall on the ground beside him.

A puff of wind soon afterwards blew off his large felt hat.

It rolled away into the darkness instantly, and he made no attempt to recover it.

The dress which his cloak concealed was, as Dick had seen, composed of the richest materials, and, as might be expected from that fact, was made in a fashionable manner.

In general appearance, therefore, as he was about the same height as the highwayman, he did not greatly differ from him.

His hat was off, and his hair partially hid his face.

The remarkable black-looking beard, too, had disappeared, which showed it was a false one.

Under all these circumstances, and bearing in mind that the only light they had was such as the torches afforded, the surprise which their blunder at first excites gradually passes away.

Not the faintest breath of suspicion rested on the minds of any of the party.

Indeed, the question of whether this was really the man they sought never entered the heads of one of them.

The elation of the officer at his having been so fortunate as to capture the celebrated Dick Turpin, was very great, and manifested itself in a very extraordinary manner.

At that busy spot they had not long to wait, late as the hour was, before a hackney coach made its appearance.

The driver was hailed, and the vehicle with some difficulty brought to a standstill near the kerb-stone.

The door was then opened, and the prisoner, who said not a word, was thrust inside in no very gentle manner.

Of course, he thought it strange that his foes should be so close upon his track, but a guilty conscience needs no scourge, and he, therefore, did not ask the motive of his captivity.

"Where to?" asked the driver, gruffly.

The officer hesitated a moment, and then answered—

"Newgate!"

The reason of his hesitation was this.

The great city prison was only used for the detention of such prisoners as had been duly committed by a magistrate to take their trial at the sessions.

This rule was, however, at times departed from, and the officer thought the present occasion sufficiently important to warrant his departing from it now.

Several warrants had, from time to time, been issued for the apprehension of the notorious highwayman, and one thing that influenced the officer was, that no prison could be so secure as that.

To be sure, not very many years back, the celebrated Jack Sheppard had made his escape from it, but then he was the only person on record who had performed so incredible a feat.

The driver, as soon as he received the order, whipped up his sleepy cattle, and drove straight to his destination.

Those acquainted with London, of course know that the distance between Charing-cross and the Old Bailey is not very great, but still it takes time to pass over the ground.

At a shuffling sort of trot, then, the horses made their way along the Strand and Fleet-street, and up Ludgate-hill.

There was no light in the inside of the coach, so the mistake was not likely to be discovered there.

The officer was seated by the side of the prisoner.

Major Nicholson sat opposite.

The others had climbed up on the roof, while not a few ran along by the side of the coach, which they were able to do without very greatly exhausting themselves.

At length the gloomy walls of Newgate were reached.

A thundering peal was delivered with the knocker upon the door through which prisoners were admitted.

Since the dismission of Mr. Tapner, and the appointment of Mr. Cawthorn in his place, several improvements in the prison regulations had been made.

All those men who had been found dereliction from their duty in any way, or exceeding it, had been summarily dismissed.

Consequently there was almost a new set of officials in the prison itself, though not many changes had taken place among the officers themselves.

That some alterations had been made could have been seen by any one who was acquainted with the management of things under the old code, for the door was opened immediately.

Without much trouble, the prisoner was got out of the coach, and escorted to the vestibule.

Morning was not very far distant, but still it was quite dark and night like.

The only illumination that there was in the vestibule proceeded from an oil lamp, the rays from which were of a very dim and sickly character indeed.

The result of this was that neither the officer nor Major Nicholson found out the mistake they had made.

"Where's the governor?" roared the former, in a voice of the utmost importance. "Where's the governor?"

"In his blessed bed, I hope, and fast asleep," replied the man on the lock.

"Go and wake him, then, and tell him to come here immediately, as I have a prisoner of the utmost importance to give into his charge."

"I'm on the lock, and it's more than my place is worth to leave it till my time's up."

"Where's some one who can go?"

"Why, there's Jinks somewhere about. Hi! Jinks. Where are you? You're wanted."

This man, who had been to some other part of the prison, hearing himself called, made his appearance.

"Wot's the row?"

"Mr. Cawthorne is wanted. Go and call him."

The man, who seemed of rather a surly nature, made no reply, but at once set off upon his errand.

About ten minutes elapsed, and then the governor made his appearance.

"Mr. Cawthorne," said the officer, "you won't grumble when you know what you have been called up for."

"What is it?"

"At last—I may say at last—I have succeeded in doing what so many others have tried and failed to do. Here is Dick Turpin, the highwayman, for the first time a prisoner within the walls of Newgate."

"Dick Turpin!" ejaculated the governor.

"Dick Turpin!" echoed the prisoner, in tones of the greatest surprise. "Dick Turpin! My fine fellows, you have made some mistake. I am no more Dick Turpin than you are."

"Ha! ha! ha! Very good! Ha! ha! ha!" laughed those assembled.

"That dodge won't do, Dick," said the officer. "Lor' bless you, we are not quite so green."

"Green or blue," said the stranger, "I tell you I am not Dick Turpin."

"Ah! well, it don't much matter."

"The devil it don't. How do you make that out."

"Why, you will have an opportunity of proving your identity, that's all."

"But I protest against this," cried the stranger. "Call who you like, I tell you I'm not Dick Turpin."

Something in the tones of his voice sounded rather unfamiliar to the ears of Major Nicholson, and, in spite of himself, he felt the disagreeable conviction creeping over him that he had made some dreadful mistake.

"More light," he cried. "More light. I will soon set this matter at rest."

"Lor', sir! you needn't take the trouble. There isn't no doubts to set at rest. However, here's my bull's-eye lantern."

With these words on his lips, the officer produced the article mentioned, and handed it to the major, who removed the slide with a nervous hand.

Then he allowed the broad, bright ray of light to fall full upon the prisoner's face, who bore the examination unflinchingly.

But the very first glance was sufficient to confirm the major's worst suspicions.

The man they had with so much trouble made prisoner was not the man they wanted.

The officer who had so congratulated himself upon his prize made the same discovery at the same moment.

He was too much astounded and overcome at first, but at length he broke out with—

"Oh! blow me tight, here's a go!"

"Come, come," said Mr. Cawthorn, who was not in the most amiable of tempers at having been called out of his warm bed on a cold night, "what's the meaning of this?"

The officer looked dreadfully chapfallen.

The major replied for him—

"We have made an unfortunate mistake. This is not Dick Turpin."

The stranger smiled triumphantly.

Then the officer spoke.

"That may or may not be; but there's something peculiar about the whole affair, and quite enough to warrant our detaining him on suspicion."

"Do so, at your peril," said the stranger. "Release me at once, or you shall pay dearly for this night's work."

There was something very authoritative in the manner in which he spoke.

"What shall I do, Mr. Cawthorn?"

"If you are sure he is not the person you name, you ought by all means to let him go free, after apologising for the treatment he has received."

"I will waive the latter part if you will let me free at once," said the stranger; "for the time I have lost is of the utmost importance to my own interests."

"In"—— began the governor; but what he was going to say is unknown, for he was interrupted by a violent banging at the prison door.

CHAPTER CCXL.

THE OFFICERS CHASE DICK TURPIN OVER THE HOUSE TOPS.

WHAT ensued upon the knocking at the door must be left to another chapter, for we feel it is quite time we returned to the adventures of the chief character in this history.

A portion of the officers had stationed themselves upon the landing on the second floor of the haunted mansion, in order to see that no one made his escape.

Casting their lights around them, they quickly discovered the trace of footsteps.

When Dick ascended the stairs, he had noticed he trod upon some soft, yielding substance.

But what that substance was he did not pause to inquire, though it would have been quite as well if he had done so.

The soft substance was dust.

Dust collected in such incredible quantities that it lay as thickly as snow.

Like snow, too, it retained the impression of every pressure.

The officers then discovered upon the upper flight of stairs such indications as left no doubt upon their minds that some one had ascended only a short time before them.

Having made this discovery, they deputed the office of guarding to one of their number, and hastened up the stairs in pursuit.

That they should fall into the mistake of supposing that the footsteps were those of one of the three men who had been seen to enter was natural enough.

Every stair bore the impress of the same boots, so it was the easiest matter imaginable to follow the track.

Up, up they went, until at length they reached the place where they terminated altogether—namely, at the door of the room which Dick had entered and secured after him.

Nothing was heard from the interior, and they immediately set about battering the door down in the same manner as they had the other one.

At the very first blow it gave symptoms of yielding, so it soon fell upon the floor.

Dick had opened the window when he found the men were really after him, with a view to making his escape by its means.

But this, he found, would be very difficult and dangerous.

Upon looking out, he saw that he was indeed at the top of the house, but the window, instead of looking out upon the tiles, as attic windows usually do, was flush with the building.

Casting his eyes upwards, he saw that the top part of the window was immediately beneath a stone parapet or coping, which seemed to run completely round the building.

It was just possible, he thought, by standing upon the window-sill, to reach the edge of this parapet.

Then, having done this, he felt pretty sure of his own power to draw himself up and over it fairly on to the roof of the mansion.

But the danger was immense.

Still his enemies would have all the greater difficulty in reaching him; and should he stay where he was, he must inevitably die or be captured.

Of the two alternatives he would have chosen the first, and he would rather have received his death by a fall from the top of the house to the bottom, than at their hands.

Accordingly he resolved to run the risk, being comforted with the assurance that death was all he could meet with.

This feeling inspired him with a kind of desperate daring, which not a little helped him to prosecute his perilous undertaking.

Mounting on to the window-sill, and holding tightly one half of the casement for support, he carefully and slowly got to an upright position.

Then shifting his grasp from the side to the top of the window, he steadied himself.

It was just when he had reached so far that the door showed unequivocal symptoms of giving way.

But he did not allow this circumstance to unnerve or flurry him for a moment.

When he was balanced he moved one hand, and supported himself with the other.

The one at liberty he raised above his head as high as he possibly could.

To his joy, he found that he could just take hold of the edge of the stonework.

Still his grasp was an insecure one.

[THE LADY IN THE COACH MAKES AN APPEAL TO DICK TURPIN.]

The least thing would destroy his equilibrium.

And should the coping-stone give way beneath his weight, which was no improbable event, nothing could save him from utter destruction.

This was sufficient to dismay even the boldest heart, but Dick Turpin was undaunted.

He clutched the edge of the stone as tightly as the muscles in his fingers would allow him.

He had then the most perilous part of his task to perform.

And that was to release his hold upon the window, trusting entirely to the one he had upon the parapet, and raise that arm to a level with the other.

But pressing himself against the wall as close as he could, he succeeded in doing this.

Then his course was comparatively easy.

Exerting all his strength, and giving a slight upward impulse to his body, he raised himself until his breast was on a level with the topmost edge of the parapet.

He then, with little difficulty, got one leg up, and finally rolled on to the roof in safety.

But he did not perform the feat quite quick enough to throw the officers off the scent.

They saw with wonder the route he had taken.

Every one placed too high a value upon his life to risk it, by attempting to follow the adventurous highwayman.

The idea, however, simultaneously occurred to all of them that there must be a trap-door somewhere at hand, by which access could be had with speed and safety.

Nor were they disappointed, for in the ceiling over the landing was the object for which they sought.

Had Turpin possessed a light as they did, he would have found it likewise, and used that mode of reaching the roof, but we know he was in the profoundest darkness.

Some little delay on the part of the officers took place.

owing to their inability to procure anything by which the trap-door could be reached.

But at last this obstacle was overcome, and, with all the speed they could possibly make, they scrambled out upon the tiles.

But they had now little to guide them.

Dick had got out five minutes before them, at the least.

However, they made a guess as to the direction he would most probably take, and set about searching for him with right good will.

Dick, however, had made the most of his time.

When he had accomplished his extraordinary and unparalleled feat, he laid still upon the tiles for a few seconds to recover himself.

Alive, however, to the necessity there was for immediate, action, he scrambled along the gutter in which he found himself until he could go no further.

Raising himself, he looked over the low stone wall, and found that he was divided from the next house by a chasm about four feet in width.

The distance was not very considerable, but a leap would be no trifling matter.

He looked down.

Or rather strove to do so, for the thick obscurity hid all things from his gaze at a depth of more than a few yards.

Dick cast one glance behind him.

His pursuers were not in sight.

Here, then, was an unexpected opportunity of getting free from them.

Without any more hesitation, he climbed up on to the parapet, and, standing on the top of the wall, made a spring upon the next house.

He performed the distance safely, but alighted with considerable force—so much so, indeed, that he feared the roof would give way beneath him.

But this apprehension proved groundless, and he crawled along much in the same fashion that he had done before.

To his joy, however, he found he had no more such gulfs to cross. The houses were built in one solid block.

Taking care to crouch down so as to be out of sight, he crept on and on.

He heard the sounds of his pursuers on his track, and this warned him to be still more careful not to make a noise, or do anything that would betray his position.

Presently he came to the end of the street.

He looked over, but could see nothing by which he could accomplish a descent.

His heart now misgave him, and the reader can judge what a relief it was when he found that the houses were continued at a right angle.

The further the distance he placed between himself and his enemies, before he made any attempt to leave the roofs, the better he knew it would be for him, so he pushed on with still greater speed than before.

But after a while, when he found that his enemies were out of hearing, he cast about him for some means by which he could descend from his elevated position.

A rope just then would have been of especial value to him, but as there was no probability of his obtaining one, it was no use for him to think about that.

He must find some other mode.

The most natural idea to occur to him was to seek an entrance through one of the numerous attic windows, but then he felt the great danger there was of raising an alarm if he should do this.

But he could not see how he was to avoid it, so he determined to run all risks, and trust to his luck, which certainly had befriended him already in a most surprising manner.

When he made this resolution he saw an attic window a few feet before him, and towards this he crept.

On reaching this, he ventured to peep through the window.

But he did so very cautiously, for as there was no light in the room, of course any one within it would immediately be able to distinguish his dark outline.

CHAPTER CCXLI.

AN ENTRANCE IS MADE THROUGH THE ATTIC WINDOW, AND A FRESH ADVENTURE BEFALS THE HIGHWAYMAN.

Dick Turpin strained his vision to the utmost, but he could see nothing.

He listened at the same time, but no sounds came to his ears.

To be sure this was no great proof that the chamber was unoccupied, but it sufficed for Dick.

Creeping still further, until he came quite in front of the window, he slid his hand up it, to see whether it was unfastened.

As he more than suspected, it was secure.

Such a fastening, however, as it possessed, he knew very well he could undo without making much noise.

Taking a pocket-knife from his pocket, he opened the largest blade, and, with the point of it, gently raised the lead round one of the panes nearest the fastening.

Having loosened it all round, he next proceeded to remove it from its setting.

This was done skilfully and silently.

Then, squeezing his hand through the contracted aperture, he undid the fastening.

The casement creaked open.

Nothing indicative of an alarm reached his ears.

But he paused before he ventured to enter.

After a short interval, however, finding the silence continue, he cautiously got through the window into the room.

To his delight, he found not only was it untenanted, but destitute of all furniture.

In order not to leave so palpable an index to the road he had taken as the open casement would do, he closed and refastened it.

Then sought about for the door of the room.

His intention was to try whether he could not descend the stairs without notice, and make his way out through the front door.

At that hour of the night, when most persons would be in a deep slumber, there seemed to be a strong degree of probability this plan of action would succeed.

The door of the room was composed of some kind of dark wood, and, as the walls were whitewashed, it showed out in strong relief.

The only fastening it had was a rude kind of drop latch, which Turpin raised cautiously, and then allowed the door to swing open.

Before him the darkness was most intense.

"I would give something," he muttered, "for the commonest rush candle that ever was made, but it is no good thinking about that; I have no light, and no means of getting one."

That the head of the stairs must be somewhere close at hand to where he stood he felt pretty certain, and he, after a moment's reflection, hit upon rather a clever expedient to ascertain their precise situation.

He went down upon his hands and knees, and crept cautiously forward.

It was well he took this precaution, for he found that he had been standing much nearer the top of the staircase than he had imagined, and a heavy fall down them would not only have severely injured himself, but raised an immediate alarm.

His great object was to get away from that house unobserved.

But fate had determined to place some obstacles in his path which would be by no means easy to overcome.

The first or top flight of stairs were, however, descended in silence and safety.

More than once, however, he stumbled against different things, but he did not make a loud enough noise to startle any one.

Creeping steadily onwards, he reached, at length, the hall leading to the front door.

A few steps now would lead him to freedom.

But at that moment there came to his ears a sound like the opening of a door, and then the flashing of a light appeared upon the stairs.

Some one was descending.

Voices, too, became audible.

Dick felt at once that it would be impossible for him to run to the door, and undo its fastenings unperceived.

He knew not whether any of his foes were lurking outside, but such a thing was extremely probable.

What was he to do?

He had no time to reflect or decide upon which was the best course to pursue.

A door was close to his right hand.

It was ajar.

It seemed to lead into a parlour of some kind.

The interior was in perfect darkness.

Likely enough he would find somewhere within it a secure hiding-place which would serve him for a little while.

He slipped in.

The door stood open just wide enough to allow him to do so.

The atmosphere within was of a genial warmth, and through the obscurity he saw the dull red embers of an expiring fire.

This seemed to indicate that its occupants had only recently quitted it.

Dick noticed these things, but, at the same time, paid particular attention to the persons he heard approaching.

Step by step they came down the staircase, with great deliberation. By the voices, Dick quickly found there were two of them.

That they were male and female.

That they were aged.

Upon reaching the foot of the stairs, they came straight up the passage.

A few rays from the light they carried penetrated the apartment in which Dick had taken refuge.

Could it be possible they were coming towards it?

That they intended to enter it?

If so, what an unfortunate and unlucky step it was for him to take to seek shelter there.

But there was no time for regret.

The best thing he could do was to hide himself at once, and trust to his luck.

They were coming towards that door, it is true, but then it was just as likely as not that they would pass it.

Dick made first for the window, in the hope of finding some curtains there, behind which he could conceal himself.

Nor was this hope doomed to defeat.

Some curtains were there, and, by the feel, long heavy curtains, too.

They were not drawn across the window, but hung in folds at the side of it.

Choosing the one nearest the door, Dick slipped behind it, and arranged the folds in such a manner as to effectually prevent any one suspecting a person was concealed there.

He was only just in time.

Scarcely had the curtains ceased to flutter than the door was pushed open, and the old couple entered, carrying a light.

The curtains, Dick now found, were of a semi-transparent quality, for he found, now the light was on the other side, he could see into the room with perfect plainness.

The person who first entered was a venerable-looking man, clothed in a fashion that even then was quite obsolete.

In his hand he carried a curiously-constructed lamp, which emitted a much greater amount of illumination than lamps at that time generally gave.

He was followed at a very short distance by a lady, as old, as venerable, and as strangely dressed as himself.

Both were attired with that scrupulous exactness which was so noticeable in elderly people a couple of generations back.

But what struck Dick most, and attracted the chief part of his attention, was that upon the countenances of both of them was an expression of the utmost grief.

That grief, however, was not of a violent or demonstrative kind. On the contrary, it was subdued and chastened, as though the sorrow under which they laboured was of long continuance.

That they were husband and wife, it did not require a second glance to see.

There was that indescribable but unmistakable resemblance between them.

At a rough guess, the age of the old man could not have been less than sixty years.

How much older he was, it would be hard to say, but there are some who assume a patriarchal look much earlier than others.

His wife was not much his junior.

They were speaking when they entered, and the first words Dick heard were these:

"It's no good, wife—no good at all. I can't help it. So don't say another word. I have tried to rest, but I cannot—I cannot."

"Calm yourself, John," said the wife, gently and soothingly. "Calm yourself, pray. Put the lamp down on the table, and I will stir the fire. Come, John, do."

The old man, with a trembling hand, placed the lamp upon the table, as he had been requested, while his wife stirred the embers together, and made them burst into quite a cheerful blaze. After depositing the lamp, the old man, with a faint sigh, sank back into an arm-chair and covered his face with his hands.

"You are not going to weep, John, surely?" said his wife, as she perceived the action, and drawing away the thin wasted hands as she spoke. "You are not going to weep. Cheer up."

The old man shook his head despondingly.

"I can't help it, Martha," he replied. "You know it is always the same, and as each succeeding year comes round, instead of my sorrow abating, it increases."

"But you should try to bear up under your affliction, John. It is wicked to repine, though, Heaven knows, our cross is heavy enough to bear—I——"

The kind-hearted wife's voice failed her at this juncture, and she sobbed aloud.

With a praiseworthy devotion she had striven to ease the drooping spirits of her husband, and sunk herself in the attempt.

It was now the husband's turn to console.

He drew a pretty carpeted stool close to his chair, and gently forced his wife to sit upon it.

Then he smoothed her thin, silvery hair upon her forehead, as he had been wont to smooth it years long, long ago, when that hair was thick and glossy, and black as jet itself, and when that now careworn and wrinkled brow vied with polished marble in its fair smoothness. He accompanied the action with a smile so wan, so sickly, and so sad, that it was more heart-breaking to look upon than his grief.

CHAPTER CCXLII.

DICK TURPIN DISCOVERS THE CAUSE OF THE OLD COUPLE'S GRIEF, AND HIS HEART IS DEEPLY TOUCHED BY THEIR DEVOTION.

THERE was something so peculiar about this old couple, and something so mysterious in their grief, that Dick became immediately interested in them.

Above all, their kind and affectionate demeanour towards each other made a deep impression on his heart.

It touched him acutely, and when he witnessed their vain attempts to console each other, he felt a disagreeable choking sensation rising up in his throat.

The scene had the effect of pressing his own isolated state upon his mind.

There he was, a foe to all men.

His hand was raised against his fellow-creatures, and their hands against him.

In the hour of tribulation there was no one to console him or make his load of affliction lighter.

But he banished these thoughts as much as he could, and fain would have escaped being any longer spectator of a scene that was so painful to his feelings.

But this was quite out of the question, and, besides, a certain kind of fascination, a strange contradictory feeling, made him long to be away and yet desirous of learning more.

"My dear wife," continued the old man, in a broken voice, "God bless you for your kindness to me, and the meek spirit which enables you to sustain your heavy load of grief with fortitude and resignation. We are poor weak creatures. In spite of myself, when this dreadful anniversary comes round, my spirits completely give way, and I cannot rest, sleeping or waking."

"I know that, John, and it shows how affectionate and good a heart yours is, or it would not be so. We ought not to repine, though, quite so much as we do. Try, John, if for once you cannot overmaster it."

"I have tried, wife, and no one, not even you, knows how hard. But my heart bleeds whenever I think of it. It seems to me as though the wounds would never heal."

"It is a long time since they were inflicted, but mine seem as poignant as at first."

"So do mine—so do mine; and so you see, wife, how it is I cannot bear this dreadful night in the year to come round."

"It is almost over now, John. In an hour or two we shall see the sun, and a new day will begin. You—you will be more cheerful then, will you not?"

"I will strive to be. But, oh! wife, when I picture her—when I think how good—no, not how good—how beautiful she was—she was very beautiful, was she not, Martha?"

"Too beautiful, John," replied the wife, as she burst into a flood of tears. "She was too beautiful, too happy, and—and——"

"Good, you would say. Yes, that is the word which your lips hesitate to utter. She was too beautiful to be good; and yet, wife, do you know——"

"What, John?"

"Sometimes, when I reflect upon the past, I do not think her quite so much to blame—not quite so much to blame as I used to think she was in olden times."

"Bless you, John. I believe, even now, if she was to return—if she was to kneel at your feet and entreat your forgiveness——"

"Hold! hold!" cried the aged man, vehemently. "Do not speak of such a thing, do not speak of it. You make me feel quite strange."

"I know how you feel, John. You would like to see her once more before your eyes for ever closed in death. You would like to tell her that, deeply as she has sinned against us, you forgive her. Am I right, John?"

There was no reply, but Dick saw the old grief-stricken man bowed his head still lower and lower, till his cheek rested against his wife's forehead.

It was a touching scene, and hard indeed would that heart have been which could have witnessed it without emotion.

There was about them both all the fondness of early years. Their affection had been a lasting one, but, perhaps it was their deep and mutual grief which had served to knit them into closer bonds of union.

Singly they would never have borne up against it, but, united as they were, the one sustained the other in the hour when their affliction was the deepest, and thus the one alternately proved a support to the other.

"John! John!" said the wife again. "You do not answer me. Tell me whether I am right. Do you think you could quite forgive her? Do answer me."

"I should, Martha. I never thought that I should be able to forget the past, and overlook it, but now I feel that I can do so. As you say, it would be a consolation of no slight description, if I could see her once more on this earth. But why should we think of that? There—there is no hope for it!"

"I fear not," replied his wife, gently. "But yet I like to know that if she should come, you could pardon her! Tell me so again, John."

"Do you forgive her?"

"Do I? Oh! John, how can you ask me such a question? Where is the mother to be found who could not forget and willingly forgive the sins of her own daughter?"

"Not you, Martha! You have forgiven her long ago—I know that; but my heart was hardened against her."

"And enough to make it, John, enough to make it; but you are sure it is softened now?"

"Yes, at this moment, should she come before me, I feel I could grant her forgiveness, unasked."

"God bless you for those words, John! You have a kind, good heart. What years of anguish she has caused."

"Do not speak of that now. Let the past be forgiven. Oh! that I could see her once more—only once!"

"Your prayer, John, may be answered some day! You should recollect that we have never seen her since she fled—have had no explanation from her. Who then can tell what arts were used, what means employed to wean her from us?"

"As you say. Sometimes I think we have been heavily but justly punished."

"How so, John?"

"We thought too much of her. We exalted her by far too much—indeed, we almost worshipped her. She left us."

"Yes, that is it! I feel happier now. Do you, John?"

"I do."

"It is because you have forgiven her. You can bear to talk now about what has always driven you mad. Can you not?"

"Do you mean the past?"

"I do."

"I think I can."

"Do you know how long ago it is—since—since——"

"Since she left her home, to throw herself into a villain's arms?"

"Don't speak like that, dear John; you almost break my heart. But that is what I meant. Do you know how long ago it is?"

"Yes; this very night is the thirteenth anniversary of the event."

"Do you recollect that morning, John? Do not be excited, but let us talk gently over the past. I found the letter, John; you remember she wrote it before she left us?"

"Oh! God, yes—yes! Too well I recollect all that took place upon that awful day! It is written on my brain in characters of fire, which nothing will erase!"

"But forgiveness," pleaded his wife, "nothing but forgiveness. You told me you could forgive her."

"Forgive me, Martha. I am a weak-hearted and sinful old man."

"But do you remember that letter?"

"Why?"

"You read it?"

"I did, and was not blinded by the words; but almost—almost."

"You have never seen it since that morning, have you, John?"

"Never."

"Do you know what became of it?"

"No; why do you ask?"

"Should you not like to see it once more, if such a thing was possible? To once more hold in your hands that which she last touched before she left us!"

"Wife—wife!"

"What, John?"

"You have not got that letter!"

"I have indeed, John. I have never parted with it since that dreadful morning. I have carried it in my bosom till it is almost worn out, and it is stained in many places by tears; for whenever I could find an opportunity, I used to read it; and never without weeping."

"Martha! Can it be possible that you have kept this to yourself—that you have had this consolation, and refused to allow me to share it with you?"

"You are not angry, John?"

"No—no, not angry, but——"

"You know you never could bear to have that day alluded to, until to-night, and I am afraid that the sight of it would anger you."

I dare say it would—I dare say it would."

"And so, you see, I kept it a secret—the only secret, John, that I have ever had from you."

"Bless you, I believe you. But have you that letter now?"

"I have. I am never without it."

"Let—let——"

"Let what?"

"Let me see it."

"Should you like to do so?"

"I should indeed."

"Would it still further soften your heart?"

"I think so—I think so."

"Then I will read it to you."

"Do so, Martha."

"You can look upon the paper while I do so. Oh! you cannot think how I cling to it. It is the only thing I have in remembrance of her. You had all other things destroyed, and her bed-room door nailed up and covered, so that none should ever see or enter it."

"I did all that, Martha."

"But never mind now, John. Since that time we have never been able to see or hear anything of her. I wonder where she went."

"You will break my heart. Cease, oh! cease!"

"I think much upon the past, and should like you to do the same; we could talk then about that, as we do about other things."

"You are right, Martha; but where is the letter?"

"Here, John. You see it is very much worn, but it is quite perfect. I have taken such care of it, for I thought perhaps it would be all we should ever see of her."

As the old lady spoke, she drew from her bosom a little parcel.

Carefully taking off the cover, a folded letter was disclosed, and this, with trembling fingers, she spread out upon her husband's knee, while her tears fell thick and fast upon it.

CHAPTER CCXLIII.

WITH A LITTLE TROUBLE, DICK MANAGES TO GET OUT INTO THE OPEN AIR ONCE MORE.

"TAKE heart, Martha, take heart," said the old man. "You were going to show me how to be brave and firm. Come—come, read the letter!"

"With a great effort, the heart-broken mother subdued her emotion, and then began to read as follows:

"My dear, dear parents,—What will you think when you find I have gone, and when this letter falls into your hands? I tremble when I think of it, but your anger, if there is any, will, I am certain, pass away when you read this explanation.

"I have had a secret from you, my dear parents. I have guarded it jealously, and even your affectionate eyes have failed to notice it.

"Could I have had my own way, it would never have been kept a secret, but let me relate what has taken place, and then I shall leave you to form your own conclusions.

"Three weeks ago, my dear parents, while walking in the park, I was accosted by a young man—a gentleman—handsome—noble—wealthy.

"He paid me many compliments, and we at last grew quite friendly. Before we parted, however, he most earnestly entreated me to keep secret what had taken place. I refused at first, but afterwards he persuaded me.

"I kept the interview a secret. I saw him again, and then he told me that he was titled and wealthy—that he loved me. But he had friends, he said, who would oppose our union, but that in a twelvemonth he should be his own master, and independent of the world.

"He pressed me to wed him—wed him secretly, and keep the marriage a secret for twelvemonths only. At the end of that time he would own me as a wife.

"Then he told me his name and rank, but adjured me to reveal it to no one.

"In fine, my dear parents, I have consented to wed him in the manner he proposes. For twelvemonths I must bid you adieu. When that period expires, you will see me again, happy, and the wife of one of England's greatest nobles.

"You will wonder much at this, my dear parents, and you cannot imagine how it damps my joy that you cannot be at present the sharers of my good fortune, but the time I speak of will soon pass away, and, until it does, I shall remain in the most absolute seclusion. I have promised that I will do so.

"By the time you read this, my dear parents, I shall be a bride, and with no other cloud upon my pure and perfect happiness than that which I fear your displeasure will cast.

"But pray pardon me and wait, and, in the end, you will see that all will turn out for the best.

"From your ever-loving daughter,

"ISABEL."

A deep groan was the only comment which was made to this letter, and that was uttered by the bereaved father.

We have chosen to give the letter in its entirety, and have not related the various interruptions which took place while it was being read.

The poor mother carried the paper to her lips, and kissed it.

What can exceed the love a mother has for her child?

"She is a poor angel," she sobbed. "It was very—very wrong of her to keep such a secret, and allow herself to be guided by her own inexperience."

"She deceived us," said the old man, with a slight tinge of bitterness in his words. "She deceived us."

"But who knows, John, what arguments may have been used. You cannot tell. She is wrong. She has sinned. But who is always right, and who is sinless?"

"True—true."

"Many excuses can be made for her, John. She never dreamt of doing harm, and never for a moment suspected the villain who lured her from her home. That year has passed away, and twelve more years beside. We have never heard of her during all that long—long weary time. What must have been her feelings when she discovered how cruelly she had been deceived? What may she not have suffered since, for she would have been afraid to come to us!"

"Peace—peace, Martha! You make me like a child." Both wept.

"Where is she?" moaned the mother, again; "where has she been all this long time?"

"Heaven only knows."

"If her sin was great, her punishment has been adequate. But have you never thought, John, that we were much to blame?"

"No, I never thought that."

"But we were."

"How—how? I know your kind heart will make every excuse for her you can possibly think of."

"It is not that, John; but do you remember how we brought her up? We strove to keep her from all knowledge of evil."

"We did."

"And that was where we erred. Pure and stainless herself, she never dreamt there could be treachery in another, or, at all events, between a smooth and frank exterior."

"I see now—I see now."

"We ought to have taught her to distinguish evil from good, and shown her what a loathsome place the world was made through the influence of the bad passions of humanity."

"We ought, wife. I see the error now. We ought indeed."

"All the blame must not rest upon her, you know."

"You are right. I have done wrong, and added to my wrong doing. Would that I could recall the past. I would have had all England searched until I found her; but I was stubborn and obdurate."

"You could forgive her now if she came back?"

"Ah! yes, my dear wife; and, all through you, I see at last, when it is too late, that I alone am to blame."

"No—no."

"You would fain excuse me."

"None are perfect and——but hark!"

"What?"

"Did you hear nothing?"

"No."

"Hark again.'

"Did you hear something?"

"Yes."

"What, oh! what?"

"A moan as of some one in great pain."

"Heavens! wife! What can it mean? My heart beats strangely. Now I hear it."

A half-moaning cry from somewhere close at hand now came to their ears.

A presentiment was on the old man's mind that that sound had some connexion with their conversation.

There was the same impression upon the mind of Dick Turpin also.

"Wh—what is it—what is it, John?"

"I don't know, Martha. Hark!"

Again came the strange cry, but this time more wailingly than before.

"It comes from the street," said the mother, with bated breath; "it comes from the street."

"Let us go to the front door, Martha," added the old man, tremblingly; "let us go to the front door."

With these words on their lips, the aged couple slowly left the apartment hand in hand.

No sooner had they got fairly out of sight, than Turpin looked out from the curtain, behind which he was concealed.

His face wore a serious look, such as had rarely before appeared upon it.

One could easily see how much he was affected by the simple and touching scene which he had witnessed.

But, interested as he was, the desire to get away rose paramount above it, and that is why, as soon as they had left the room, he looked out from the curtain.

He was, however, unable to see any means by which he could effect a retreat.

There was the sound of bolts being withdrawn and a lock shot back, for, of course, the door had been secured at night.

Then followed the creaking of hinges, which was echoed by a scream.

"What can it be?" asked Dick. "Ah, stop, I have an idea. How was it I did not think of that before?"

As he spoke, he slipped out of his place of concealment, and approached the table on tiptoe.

The lamp which the aged couple had carried was standing upon it, and burning brightly.

They had not carried it to the front door.

Familiar with the interior of their home as they were, there was no need for it.

The reader will, perhaps, guess what idea had entered Dick's mind.

It was to extinguish the lamp.

Under cover of the darkness, he would then stand a better chance of getting away unperceived.

He understood the mechanism of the lamp in an instant, and, by merely turning a screw, he put it out at once.

Then he stood profoundly still.

The darkness, contrasted with the previous light, seemed most intense—more so, indeed, than it was in reality.

"Bring her in, John," he heard a voice say. "Bring her in, poor dear thing. Who can she be? Perhaps it may be our own lost one come back to us, now that you have forgiven her."

"It is she!" cried the old man in a hysterical voice. "It is she! I know it! I know it!"

"Come this way, then. Why—why——"

"What?"

"The lamp is out."

"Out?"

"Yes."

"How extraordinary."

"Quick, wife, quick. Light it again, and let us look upon our poor lost one! She moans! She knows me! She put her arms around my neck, and presses her cold lips against mine! Mercy! Mercy! My child! Bless you, my child! Bless you!"

The old lady made her way back into the room, and, as she did so, Dick stole out into the passage.

A gush of cold air came upon his face.

Before him he could see the open door, and, upon a nearer approach, the dim and half-defined outlines of some person on the door-step.

Cautiously he made his way towards it.

The old man, with what little strength he had, strove to raise some heavy burden.

Dick's heart, more than his eyes, told him that it was a female form.

The flash of light from the lamp which the poor mother had succeeded in igniting, now shone upon the wall.

Now was the time for action.

He was close to the door.

With one bound he sprang into the street, and, without pausing, ran hastily forwards, until he turned the first corner on his left.

CHAPTER CCXLIV.

DICK TURPIN OBTAINS A DISGUISE BY A SUMMARY PROCESS, AND DIRECTS HIS STEPS TO THE "WHITE HORSE" IN DRURY-LANE.

"THIS has been a night of adventure!" muttered Dick, as he looked around to see what direction he ought to take, "but this last incident affects me most. What a good-hearted couple! I should not have feared to have thrown myself on their protection; but then, why should I bring care and trouble under their roof? They have borne enough already.

"What black-hearted wretch could it have been, I wonder, who, by his sophistic arguments, persuaded her to leave her happy home? The tale is a clear one to me, and not the least strange part about it is that, after a lapse of thirteen years of unforgiveness, as soon as her father pronounced her pardon, she had returned, as though the intelligence had been invisibly conveyed to her."

It will be seen by this speech that Dick jumped to the conclusion that the female form upon the doorstep was that of the erring and repentant daughter.

There were many things, certainly, to induce such a belief, but nothing amounting to a positive proof.

If she had returned just at that moment, the coincidence was a strange one.

And, although he had nothing to show it, Dick could not divest himself from the idea that the scene of which he had just been a spectator had some connection with the murder in the haunted house.

But whether this was so or not, time alone can evidence.

The morning was now close at hand, and a dull gray light seemed to fall upon all things and give them a cold and ghastly look.

By the aid, then, of this dim light, Dick looked about him.

To his relief, he could neither see nor hear anything of his foes.

But he was too close to the scene of his daring exploit to feel safe, and yet he hardly knew to what place to proceed.

Nor had he any distinct notion as to which would be the best direction for him to take.

He presented altogether a very suspicious appearance. His clothes were dirty and torn.

They were spotted with blood in many places, and over his shoulder was a crimson bandage.

He limped too, as he walked, for his ankle pained him exceedingly.

No doubt, by this time, a pretty accurate description of him had been posted all over London.

People would be on the look out.

He would feel safer at the "White Horse" than anywhere, but then how was he to reach that place unobserved, and morning fast coming on?

Old Matthew's roof would only afford him a safe asylum if he was not seen to enter it.

When he reached this point in his reflections, he heard a footstep approaching him.

Desirous to escape the observation of every one as much as possible, he shrunk back into the deep shadow of a projecting doorway.

It might be a mere chance passenger who was coming, and it might be a foe.

He looked in the direction from which the traveller came, and in a little while distinguished him.

He was walking at a rapid rate.

As he drew yet nearer, Dick saw there was a certain military air about him, both in respect to his walk and upright bearing.

A long black cloak which he wore tended materially to favour the idea.

It completely enveloped his form, and allowed only his boot-tops to be visible.

On his head was the almost universally-worn, three-cornered felt hat.

As he saw this person approaching, and noticed how completely the cloak covered his form, hiding everything he wore, the idea struck him of what a capital thing it would be for him if he could obtain a similar piece of apparel.

No sooner had this thought struck him, than he determined to possess himself of the very identical cloak which the comer wore.

He was upon the same side of the way as Dick was, and in a few minutes would pass the doorway in which he was concealed.

But to take anything from so warlike a person would, most likely, be no easy matter.

Dick, however, was not the man to trouble himself much about that.

He wanted the cloak, and he made up his mind he would have it, and that by boldness, too.

He felt rapidly for what weapons he had about him, but found the only thing he had got was a discharged pistol.

His sword had been broken.

But if the pistol was harmless, his enemy need not know it.

Grasping it firmly in his right hand, he waited.

The stranger, not dreaming of an ambuscade, walked on unconcernedly.

But, as soon as he was close enough, Dick sprang from his hiding-place, and, with unerring aim, caught him round the throat.

"Silence!" cried Dick, impressively, almost before the stranger knew he was attacked. "Silence! Utter a cry, or do anything to cause an alarm, and you are a dead man."

A gurgling sound followed these words, and Dick, fearful if he continued the pressure, his adversary would choke, relaxed his grasp a little.

At the same time, he pressed the muzzle of the pistol against the stranger's cheeks, and said:

"I want your cloak. Give it to me without resistance, or you die. Your life now hangs upon a thread. I am a desperate man, and shall not shrink to take it."

The stranger endeavoured to nod his head.

"If you mean you are willing to let me have what I require, be it so. But beware how you play me false. No violence will then be offered. The cloak is all I require. It is of little value to you, so give it up at once. If you are treacherous your death be on your own head."

As he spoke, Dick relaxed his hold.

But as he did so, he very dexterously unclasped the cloak, and, catching the garment from the stranger's shoulders, threw it over his own person.

"Now, sir," said Dick, "you are free. I am much obliged to you, and, if you wish to know to whom you have lent your cloak, it is to Richard—commonly called Dick—Turpin, the highwayman."

Then, ere the military-looking individual could recover his surprise, Dick hurried down the street, and was quickly out of sight.

He found the cloak was of first-rate material, and such as would be worn by any gentleman.

He adjusted it properly, and fastened it at the throat.

It was trimmed with fur, and made very full, so that he could completely wrap himself up in it.

Everything now that would have made him an object of suspicion was hidden from observation.

He walked along rapidly.

The streets were all but empty.

At the dawning hour few people are abroad.

Suddenly, upon emerging from a narrow street, he found himself close to Westminster Abbey.

"I will make my way to the river-side," he said, "and take a boat from thence to the Savoy-steps. That will suit me first-rate. I shall get to old Matthew's without any one being the wiser; and glad enough I shall be, for a little rest would be about as welcome a thing as I could think of."

With these words on his lips, Dick took the direction upon which he had determined.

The nearest point at which he could make sure of finding a boat was at the foot of Westminster-bridge; so it was towards that venerable and almost forgotten structure that he made his way.

A few minutes enabled him to reach it, and, descending a flight of stone steps on the east side of the bridge, made slippery by the recession of the tide, he saw before him several boats waiting to be hired.

He was quickly hailed by one of the watermen, who were always anxious, like cabmen are now, to have a well-dressed, distinguished-looking person for a fare.

With all possible speed, Dick stepped into one of the little vessels, and ordered him to row him to the Savoy-steps.

The usual "Ay, ay, sir," followed his command, and pushing off from the steps, the waterman, by his long, steady strokes, made the boat glide over the surface of the river at a rapid rate.

The tide, too, was running out, which made their progress all the easier and swifter.

But when the prow of the boat touched against the Savoy-steps and Dick leaped from the boat, it was broad daylight.

Taking care to draw the cloak closely around his form, and pulling his hat down over his face as much as possible, Dick took the shortest and most direct route to the "White Horse."

He saw no signs of pursuit, and nothing that looked suspicious, but for all that he did not relax his caution.

Upon second thoughts, however, he determined not to go to the front door, so he made a bit of a detour, and got into Stanhope-street.

Then, turning to the left, he entered the narrow passage which even now exists, and which is known as White Horse-yard.

Straight up to the secret door he went, and pressed upon the hidden spring, which sounded a bell in the interior. He had hardly to wait a moment before the door opened.

Old Matthew, in a state of the greatest uneasiness, had been on the watch for him, and his joy may be imagined when he found him standing there safe and sound.

"Come in," he cried. "Don't linger. Quick! There may be prying eyes about."

Dick stepped in at once.

The moment, however, that the door was closed, and before old Matthew had time to speak, he said—

"Black Bess! Where is she?"

"Safe, quite safe."

"Let me see her first, and I will tell you my adventures afterwards."

"As you will. This way. I never thought to see you back again!"

"Yet here I am."

"Yes, here you are, and more by good luck than anything else, I take it."

"I daresay that has a great deal to do with it, my friend."

CHAPTER CCXLV.

MR. WRIGGLES TAKES HIS MEASURES FOR CAPTURING DICK TURPIN, AND SEIZES HIM IN STANHOPE-STREET.

"AH! well," ejaculated the worthy landlord, as he threw open the cunningly-contrived stable door, "luck is a very fine thing, that's certain!"

"You are right."

"But, however, here's your mare. Woe, Bess!"

The landlord patted the noble creature affectionately on the neck.

Dick, too, approached, and a faint neigh proclaimed that he was recognised.

Of course, she was quite safe and properly attended to.

Old Matthew had seen to her himself.

But Dick always felt it to be a great satisfaction to know, from personal inspection, that such was the case.

The landlord was exceedingly impatient to hear Turpin's adventures, so he hurried him off at once into the bar-parlour, where a good fire was burning, and where the landlord had been sitting awaiting his return.

To satisfy him, then, Dick briefly gave him an outline of the incidents which have been already presented to the reader in detail.

As soon as he spoke of his hurts, however, the landlord insisted upon having them dressed, so he took Dick upstairs to a bedroom, and attended to them himself, for he had an excellent knowledge of all kinds of wounds, and knew how they should be treated.

When this was over, the highwayman was completely exhausted, and laid down upon the bed to enjoy a few hours' rest and sleep.

"Don't be afraid," old Matthew said. "If anything goes wrong you shall have the alarm soon enough. Trust me for that."

"Many thanks."

"Oh! don't mention it. A good sleep is the best thing you could possibly have, and when you wake up you will find something to eat beside you."

"All right."

"I shall go and have a turn in myself for a little while."

"I should think you want it."

"I do, though, if you will believe me, I don't take so much sleep as some do. I don't require it."

"Ah, well, my friend, I can go to sleep here in security, I know. Good morning."

The landlord left the room.

Dick turned over and over upon his bed.

Somehow, although he was so exhausted, he could not sleep.

His brain was busy.

It was occupied with many distracting things.

There was his night's adventures, his failure in what he had undertaken, Tom King and his absent comrades, all running one after another through his mind.

At length he fell off to sleep, nor did he wake until the short winter's day was drawing to a close.

As the landlord had said, he found beside him both eatables and drinkables.

To these he paid the first attention.

Then, having satisfied the cravings of hunger, he saw that his old friend had been thoughtful enough to provide him with a new suit of clothes, which were hanging on a chair-back at the bedside.

The highwayman then rose.

His wound was well bandaged, and the hemorrhage had entirely ceased.

He had nothing to do now but to let it take its course.

Having thoroughly washed himself, and gone through the various operations of the toilet, the change that he affected in himself was great indeed.

Indeed, he looked as he had looked of old, as he looked upon that November night when we first introduced him to the reader.

Before he had quite finished attiring himself, old Matthew made his appearance.

He was delighted with the change.

"Is all safe?" was Dick's first question.

"Quite, I think."

"You think?"

"Yes, there is a deuce of a hubbub about you!"

"About me?"

"Your name is in everybody's mouth."

"The devil!"

"You may well say that. If you want to save your neck, you'll have to keep yourself remarkably snug."

Dick smiled.

"What are you laughing at?"

"Do you see how carefully I have dressed myself?"

"Yes."

"And what pains I have taken with my toilet?"

"Yes, yes."

"And what do you think induced me to do so?"

"I don't know."

"You don't?"

"Had you any special reason?"

"I had."

"What was it?"

"This, my friend: Black Bess is all right."

"Eh! what?"

"Of course she is. Well, Matthew, my friend, I am going out for a ride into the country."

"No—no."

"But I say, yes—yes."

"You must be mad!"

"Why so?"

"You will be captured, to a certainty."

"I will take my risk of that. Now, Matthew, you have known me some time, and so you must have noticed one thing."

"What?"

"That when I take an idea into my head, or make up my mind to do anything, nothing in the world will turn me."

"I do know it, but pray for once listen to reason."

"Not if it means stop here."

"Why not?"

"I want a ride out in the free open air. I want to feel that I am once more a knight of the road. The adventures I had last night have whetted my appetite, and I am determined to see some more to-night."

"Well, well—a wilful man will always have his own way."

"Now, Matthew, don't be offended."

"I am not offended."

"Just consider. The authorities, knowing this to be an old haunt of mine, may take it into their heads to search the place thoroughly from top to bottom, and so, for your sake, as well as my own, it will be best to be out of it."

"Yes, but——"

"Now, Matthew, will you oblige me? I ask you as a friend."

The landlord groaned as he said it.

"I know what you want."

"That's all right, then."

"You want your mare saddled."

"I do, but not just yet. Say, in an hour's time. It will be quite dark by then."

"So it will, and, in the meantime, just think over what you are going to do."

"Oh! all right. Never fear. Go and get the saddle on at once, and then all will be ready in case of an alarm."

The landlord, finding further remonstrance would be useless, unwillingly withdrew to do our hero's bidding.

The hour he had mentioned soon passed away.

As he had said, it had during that space of time grown quite dark.

And now the use of the iron bars in the wall was displayed.

Had Dick gone down the staircase, he would surely have met some one.

But as it was, the square yard we have before described was never entered by any one but the landlord and those he could trust.

It was impossible for any persons in the neighbouring houses to see into it.

Dick threw open the window, and took hold of one of the horizontal bars.

Then, placing his feet on another, he closed the window and begun to descend.

This was the easiest matter imaginable, for the bars were arranged so as to be just like the rounds of a ladder, and could be ascended and descended with equal facility.

In a moment or two Dick reached the ground.

Then he bent his steps towards the stables.

There he found old Matthew examining the trappings of Black Bess, and seeing that all was perfectly secure.

He made one more attempt to induce Dick to derelict his enterprise, but he met with no better success than he had the first time.

When all was ready, Matthew furnished Dick with six pistols.

Two were for the holsters in the saddle.

Two he placed in his belt ready for immediate service.

The other two in his coat-pocket.

He loaded them with his own hands, and placed the remainder of the ammunition in his pocket also.

Old Matthew then opened a door which led into a narrow passage.

"Take the bridle in your hand," he said, "and walk to the bottom of the place, and you will find yourself in Stanhope-street. I trust I shall see you safe back again."

"Never fear for that," said Dick. "Good-bye."

As he spoke, he obeyed old Matthew's instructions, and passed the court—for such it was, though no other doors opened into it.

Twenty steps took him to the bottom of it.

He led Bess out into the middle of the street, and prepared to mount.

But, before he placed his foot in the stirrup, he felt himself seized from behind by some one.

Releasing his hold of his mare, he wrenched himself round.

But the person who had caught hold of him kept a firm grasp, while he shouted out:

"I have him! I have him, Mr. Wriggles! Mr. Wriggles, I've got him! Make haste! Here he is!"

A sudden trampling of footsteps followed these words.

Dick knew his danger at once. It was imminent.

His old foes had got scent of where he was, and had waited til he came out to pounce upon him.

CHAPTER CCXLVI.

RELATES HOW DICK TURPIN FARED AT THE HANDS OF MR. WRIGGLES, THE BOW-STREET OFFICER.

His only chance of escaping being overpowered by numbers, was by at once disabling the man who had seized him.

Summoning, therefore, all his strength, he wrenched his whole body round, and so got out of his grasp.

[MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS ATTACK DICK TURPIN.]

But only for a moment.

The man would not be shook off, and he clung to him again.

Turpin, however, struck him a heavy blow in the face, which made him stagger slightly, while his grasp slackened.

Dick struck him again, and this time more violently than before.

He fell to the ground stunned.

But by the time he had done this, the highwayman's foes were close upon him.

Mr. Wriggles, so soon as he heard that the famous Dick Turpin had again made his appearance in his old character, had not attempted to give chase to him in any way, having already learned the futility of doing so.

Without any precise information upon the point, he had an idea that he would most likely take up his quarters at the "White Horse," his old place of refuge in days past.

Old Matthew, the landlord, however, always managed, somehow or other, to get the better of the officers

That is to say, if they went in to search for any one, they always had their trouble for nothing.

No member of the family had ever been found there.

Mr. Wriggles had from time to time experienced all this, so he adopted quite a different plan of action.

At various convenient places he had stationed his men, so that a complete circle was formed by them round the ancient inn.

Here he resolved to wait and watch.

If Turpin came, he could not enter without being perceived, and if he was in already, it was impossible for him to leave also.

But he almost did so, too, for the door leading from the stables into the narrow passage was quite unknown to the officers as being a means of exit.

One of them, however, who happened to be posted at the bottom or east end of White Horse-yard, heard the trampling of Bess's feet, and saw her rider lead her into the road.

He then darted forward and clasped Dick round from behind, while he called out to his superior for assistance in the manner we have related.

Upon hearing his voice, they had hurried forward at the top of their speed, and arrived just in time to see their comrade stretched at full length on the ground.

Turpin, however, the moment he had freed himself from his adversary, drew his sword from its sheath.

It was a long-bladed and beautiful weapon, which old Matthew had placed by the side of the apparel he then wore.

Its brightly-polished blade flashed like lightning as, the moment it was released from the scabbard, Dick whirled it round his head.

The officers, who had been advancing, halted, and drew back a step.

And during this scene Black Bess had not moved from her master's side.

She stood immovable as a rock, watching the progress of the affray.

The indecision of the officers was only momentary.

At a word from their leader, they made a rush forward.

But Turpin waved his sword again, describing a semi-circle with it.

None of his foes were within its circumference, or they would have been mown down.

Now was Turpin's time.

Taking advantage of the temporary supremacy he had gained over them, he turned with great swiftness towards his mare.

Then giving one spring, he leapt upon her back, at the same time uttering a cry which he knew would have the effect of making her bound forward at her utmost speed.

A yell came from the officers.

Up to the present, in obedience to the instructions they had received from their superior, they had not fired.

His design had been to capture the celebrated highwayman alive, and hand him over to the authorities, to be dealt with according to law.

But now he found he was slipping away from him, Mr. Wriggles gave the order to fire.

The officers, who had not been in time to cling to Dick after he had mounted, though several had rushed forward to do so, at once drew their pistols from their belts, and many shots were fired in quick succession.

But Turpin, having heard the command, did not waver.

He set his teeth hard, and struck Black Bess with his heels.

She flew along the narrow and deserted street at a terrific speed.

Its length was trifling, and he was round the corner into Lincoln's Inn-fields in the space of a few seconds.

His foes, however, raised a tremendous outcry, and followed him on foot as fast as they were able.

But the danger was now passed.

Or nearly so.

Dick had not expected to escape injury from the many shots that were fired at him.

To be sure all would, in the excitement of the moment, be discharged almost without aim, but even so, some chance bullet could scarcely fail to reach him.

Feeling no immediate effects from it, he did not stay his course, but made his way in a direct line to Bloomsbury-fields.

Here he drew rein, having ascertained that none of his enemies were within sight or hearing.

His first act was to move himself about in various ways, and exercise all his limbs, in order to learn whether he had been struck.

But the result was more than he could have hoped for.

He had not received a scratch.

Having assured himself of this, he patted his mare upon the neck in a cheerful manner, as he said:

"Well done, lass! well done! We are all right, and Wriggles is again defeated! Now, I once more feel myself a real Knight of the Road, and it is odd to me, if I do not do something to-night which shall serve to prove my right to the title. Bravo! bravo!"

Black Bess made a neighing sound as soon as these words were uttered, which almost seemed as though the gallant creature had made an effort to speak.

Turpin did not take it in that manner.

It was not the way in which she usually replied to him when he spoke encouragingly to her.

His face assumed a serious expression.

The sound to his ears sounded like one of pain.

Could it be possible?

Had the matchless animal been less fortunate than her rider when the pistols had been discharged?

Some stray bullet might have struck her.

Might even have reached some vital part.

With his heart much agitated by this thought, Dick alighted from the saddle.

"Art hurt, lass?" he asked, anxiously, stroking his hand over her glossy coat as he spoke. "Art hurt, lass—eh? What's this?"

Dick held up his hand, and in the dim night light he could see that it was smeared with blood.

He quickly found the place from which the blood had come.

There was a wound upon her croup.

Whether it was a very serious one or not he could not tell.

The blood flowed from it at rather a rapid rate, though, now she was standing still, it was fast beginning to congeal over it.

He did not try to stop this operation, because he knew when completed, that it would be a more effectual means of stanching it than any other.

The matter was a very serious one indeed, but it was most fortunate for both that the officers had not been well mounted, or the result would perhaps have been the capture or death of both horse and rider.

Dick was at a loss for a little while to know what to do.

Where could he take his mare to have her wound attended to, and what should he do in the meantime without her?

These were puzzling questions.

But it is surprising how much quicker we arrive at a decision when pressed by time, when we know there is no time for a lengthened argument pro and con.

Dick had to make up his mind quickly.

But just at that moment he heard a faint jingling of bells, accompanied by the rumbling of heavy wheels.

"A waggon," said Dick, as he heard the sound.

"Perhaps I shall learn something from the driver if I wait until it comes up."

Acting upon this idea, he took Black Bess by the bridle and led her to the side of the road, where he waited somewhat impatiently for the approach of the waggon.

It came crawling on at a snail's pace, as such vehicles usually do.

It was coming from the direction of London.

At length, when the highwayman's stock of patience was quite exhausted, it arrived.

He could just see that it was drawn by three horses; on the head of the foremost of which were some little bells, which jingled pleasantly as the horse tossed his head up and down.

"Hoy!" shouted Turpin, at the top of his lungs; "hoy! Stop!"

But the driver did not appear to take any notice.

Dick shouted again, but without further effect; so, lest the waggon should pass him after having waited for it so long as he had, he loosed the bridle, and springing forward, caught the foremost horse in the team, and made him come to a standstill.

The others, of course, stopped also, and the huge heavy wheels ceased to revolve.

A voice now cried out:

"Gee—woa—whoop! Dang it, who hist thee stopping my horse?"

The voice belonged to the driver, who had been sitting on his seat fast asleep, which accounted for his not hearing Dick when he called out to him.

Indeed, it was the cessation of motion which caused him to open his eyes.

Nothing else, hardly, would have had that effect.

"Stop," said Dick; "I want to speak to you."

"Speak, be dom'd," said the driver, in a rage, and making a slashing cut at Dick, as he uttered the words.

"Speak, be dom'd! What do ye mean by a stopping a my team?"

"Look here," said Dick, "do you see this?"

"See what?"

"A crown piece."

"Eh!" said the driver, forgetting his anger in the interest he took in what had been last said.

"A crown piece," said Turpin. "Listen a moment, and it is yours."

"All right, your honour, all right. What did you please to want?"

"Do you travel this road often?"

"Twice a week."

"Then you know it pretty well."

"Yes, I do. But what o' that?"

"My horse here has met with an accident. Now, where is the nearest place I can get a doctor?"

"What sort of a doctor do you want?"

"Why a horse-doctor, to be sure. There must be one not far off, I should think."

"Well, there is, certainly. Is your horse much hurt?"

"Well, yes; rather."

"Ah!"

"Why do you ask?"

"It's a matter of four miles further along the road."

"The devil it is! The way you are going?"

"Yes."

"Shall you pass anywhere near it?"

"Of course I shall."

"Very well, then, I'll make the crown piece half-a-guinea if you'll give me and my mare a lift as far as there."

"Will you, by gom?"

"I will. Is the waggon empty?"

"Yes, barring some straw at the bottom of it."

"That's the very thing."

"But, how can I give your mare a lift?"

"I'll show you. Stop a minute."

The man looked round with great curiosity, and Dick went to the back part of the waggon.

Jumping up on the board at the back, he drew back the tarpaulin which hung there.

Then he called to Black Bess by means of the peculiar whistle which he had so particularly taught her to obey.

She came towards him at once.

He patted her on the neck, and made her understand that he wished her to leap up.

This she did easily, for the distance from the ground to the bottom of the cart was nothing to speak of.

One bound, and she was fairly inside.

The waggoner was filled with astonishment.

He had lifted the canvas at the front of the cart, and so was able to see into the interior, which was lighted by a small oil lamp.

"Dom me," he said, "that licks all I ever seed in my life."

Dick patted Bess on the neck, and gently forced her to lie down, for he imagined she would travel easier in that manner.

Having accomplished this, he went to the front of the waggon, and said—

"Now drive as fast as you can, and the sooner you get to where I want to go, the more liberal I shall be."

"All right, your honour," replied the driver, smacking his whip, so that it sounded like the report of a pistol. "Come up, with you."

The horses put themselves in motion at once.

They went at first at a kind of trot, but that jolted the waggon in such a fearful manner that Dick could not stand it, so they subsided into a walk.

The cumbersome affair did not go more than four miles an hour, at about the end of which time the driver pulled up, and said—

"Here you are, sir. You'll find the door a little way down the lane there to the right."

"Very good," said the highwayman "Who shall I ask for?"

"Mr. Evans."

"Here's a guinea, then, for your trouble, and as soon as I get out, drive on, and the best thing you can do is to forget this night's work."

With this, Turpin scrambled out of the back of the waggon, and assisted Bess to follow him.

The waggoner, pleased enough with what he had so unexpectedly earned, and which was about equal to two weeks' wages, seemed to take Dick's advice, for he drove off at once.

Our hero watched him down the road until he was out of sight, and then he looked about him for the lane of which the man had spoken.

Sure enough, just on his right hand was a narrow turning.

Down this Dick Turpin did not hesitate to direct his steps.

He was glad to see that his priceless mare did not exhibit any outward signs of her hurt. She walked along steadily and firmly.

According as he had been told, he found, a few yards down the lane, some large double gates, which were surmounted by a circular piece of wood for a sign-board, upon which some words were written, but it was too dark for them to be deciphered.

Nor did Dick make the attempt. He merely gave a glance upward to see what kind of place it looked to be.

A little search showed him a handle by the side of the gate-post, and this he pulled downwards.

The loud clanging of a bell not far off from where he stood immediately ensued, followed by the barking of dogs.

Then he heard a heavy footstep, and a voice cried—

"Who is it? What do you want?"

Dick paid no attention to the first part of the question.

"I want to see Mr. Evans. I have hurt my horse. Open the door. Be quick."

The authoritative and off-hand manner in which he spoke, procured immediate obedience.

One half of the gate was thrown open, and a man appeared holding a stable-lantern as high above his head as he could, in order to see what the late customer was like.

CHAPTER CCXLVII.

DICK TURPIN HAS BLACK BESS'S WOUND PROPERLY ATTENDED TO.

DICK TURPIN, however, by no means wished to be closely scrutinized, be the man whom he might, so he walked forward, leading his mare by the bridle.

The man drew aside to allow him to pass, and closed the door after him.

No one was better aware of the policy of conciliating people wherever it was possible, by giving them money, than our hero. He always looked upon it as money well and profitably spent.

Accordingly, while the man was fastening the gate, he took the opportunity to draw half-a-crown from his pocket.

"I don't want to waste any more time than I can possibly help," he said, placing the coin in the man's hand. "Just ask Mr. Evans to make as much haste as he can."

"All right, sir!" said the man, touching his hat, and quite certain in his own mind that Dick was a gentleman, and consequently a customer well worth having. "He will be here in a minute, I know."

"The sooner the better. You can tell him from me that he will be well paid for his trouble."

The man hurried off to do his bidding.

Nor did he keep him long, for he soon returned, accompanied by a tall, gaunt old man, who had much of the appearance of having served in the army.

This idea was confirmed in Dick's mind by the kind of semi-military salute he made as he approached him.

Turpin spoke to him in an undertone.

"Are you a man content to do a service and be well paid for it, without troubling yourself unnecessarily about it, because, if such is the case, you can have such a job to do now."

Mr. Evans hesitated a moment, and then he replied—

"What is the nature of the service which you wish me to perform?"

"Nothing which you need shrink from doing."

"You must tell me what it is before I can give you a reply."

"It is simply this. You see my horse here?"

"Yes."

"Well, she has been hurt."

"Go on, sir."

"Are you willing to dress the wound she has received, without troubling about how she got it, and where and when?"

"Certainly," replied Mr. Evans. "That is a matter which don't concern me, and I always endeavour, as much as possible, to act up to the principle of every man minding his own business, and letting other people's alone."

"I am very glad to hear it," said Turpin, "very glad indeed. You are just the man I want. Now you shall be well rewarded, especially if you do your business well and carefully, for, I can assure you, I set great store by the animal."

"Just so, sir," said Mr. Evans.

"Have you any objection?"

"None in the least."

"Then perhaps you will have a good look at her wound, and do the best you can for it."

"You may depend upon that, sir. Here, Ike, lend me the lantern."

The man had stood a little aside during the dialogue, but upon hearing his master speak, he approached.

Mr. Evans took the lantern from his hands, and, by the aid of its light, made a good examination of Black Bess.

Turpin looked himself, for, in the darkness in the road, he could not say for certain that the wound he had discovered was the only one which she had received.

But such proved to be the case.

The blood had coagulated on her croup in a large mass.

But it had ceased to flow.

Mr. Evans evidently looked upon it with surprise.

"Will you follow me under cover," he said, turning to Dick. "Perhaps you would like to lead your horse yourself."

"I should."

"Then, if you will keep beside me, I will take you to my room, where all my things are kept, and where she can be properly attended to."

Turpin did not scruple to follow Mr. Evans. He would not have hesitated if he had known for certain that he was incurring great danger by so doing.

Indeed, it is hard to say what risk he would not have run upon his mare's account. Certainly more than he would for any other living thing.

He had not far to go, for Mr. Evans merely led him across a small yard to a door leading into a shed.

This he opened and passed through, with Dick close at his heels.

"Ike!" he cried to his man, "run into the house, and fetch a bucket of hot water."

The man went off, and nothing could be done until he returned.

But he scarcely kept them a moment.

Mr. Evans took a sponge, and, dipping it in the hot water, washed away the blood which had caked over the wound.

He continued this bathing process for some time, and then Dick saw that a bullet had ploughed up the skin on her croup, making an oblique furrow about three inches in length.

Mr. Evans looked at the wound, but, in accordance with his agreement, made no remarks and asked no questions.

No doubt he knew what had caused it.

"This must be sown up," he said.

"Is it anything serious?"

"No, not at all. You see it is merely skin deep."

"I see."

"So that all that will be necessary will be to draw the skin together. It will heal all the quicker then."

"Let it be done if that is best," said Dick.

"Oh! I will do it at once."

"Shall you be long?"

"No, a few minutes only."

"I am glad to hear it."

"The bleeding, you perceive, has quite ceased. I will try to do something that will prevent it breaking out afresh."

"It is in a good place."

"Well, yes, so far as travelling goes, it is in a good place."

"There will not be any fear of its coming unstitched, will there?"

"I should recommend you to be careful."

"You may depend I shall be."

"There is no occasion for putting her aside for such a hurt, but it would do her no harm."

"It shall be done if possible. I value her very highly."

"She is a beautiful creature," said Mr. Evans, admiringly; "a very beautiful creature."

"She is indeed."

During this conversation Mr. Evans very carefully stitched the edges of the wound together, and when he had done, there was very little of the wound to be seen.

Dick then gave Mr. Evans five guineas for the service he had done, and the horse-doctor was not a little surprised at receiving so liberal a payment, although, from what Dick had said, he expected something handsome.

A second examination was made, in order to ascertain for certain that she had received no other injury, but the result was quite satisfactory.

Bess was then led to the front gate by which she had entered, and Dick Turpin, with a heart considerably lightened, trotted her gently out into the high-road.

What the speculations of Mr. Evans and his man were does not matter. He kept to his part of the bargain, and so did Dick to his.

But when Turpin had given him the five guineas, he found that was nearly all the money he possessed.

This was a state of things which could not be permitted to continue.

"Gently, Bess," he said, as his mare made an attempt to break into a gallop, "gently, Bess. You shall not go fast to-night, if I can help it; and certainly not without there is some urgent reason for it."

It was clear, however, from the manner in which she moved, that Bess felt very little, if any, effects of her wound, which fortunately had happened where it would not interfere with her motion.

Her rider would only allow her to proceed at a very gentle pace.

Money he had resolved to have, and an adventure, too, and he would not be baulked of either, if possible.

He so went on for several miles.

The night was dark and cold, and as he got further and further into the country so did the coldness appear to increase.

The moon was not shining—or, at any rate, was not visible, though there were some indications of her presence behind a cloud on the eastern horizon.

The road was quite deserted, and Dick was beginning to despair of meeting any one that night, when the sharp strokes of a horse's hoofs beating upon the hard road met his ears.

He drew aside and waited.

The traveller, which he could tell immediately was a man mounted on a steed of good quality, came on at a rapid pace, so only a few minutes elapsed before he was up with him.

As soon as he saw his horse's head was on a level with him, Turpin darted out of his place of concealment with a cocked pistol in his right hand.

He galloped for a few yards side by side with the horseman, while he cried—

"Pull up your horse, sir. Halt! I say, and that at once, or you are a dead man. My finger is already on the trigger, and the muzzle of the pistol not more than a foot from your head. Halt, I say!"

Thus forcibly persuaded, and dreading to lose his life, the traveller, with a bitter oath, reined in his steed.

At the same moment he plunged his hand into the breast of his coat.

Turpin saw the movement, and before he could withdraw it, he clapped his pistol to his forehead, and cried—

"Move that hand, and I fire. Do you understand me? The muzzle is against your face: can you feel it?"

He pressed more heavily as he spoke, until the pistol made quite a dent in the traveller's forehead.

"Now," he continued, "you have a weapon of some sort or other handy to your grasp. Fling it in the roadway this moment if you wish to preserve your life."

"You have the advantage of me," cried the traveller, "and I am forced to submit. Besides, I place too high a value on my life to throw it away upon the high-road."

"I am glad to hear it," said Turpin. "Down with your weapon! Remember, I shall keep a sharp eye upon you, and if I see anything that looks in the least suspicious, I fire—so I would advise you to be careful!"

The traveller could tell by the firm, cool, and decided way in which Turpin spoke that he was quite in earnest in what he said, so he, without further delay, drew a pistol from his breast, and immediately threw it in the road.

"Now the other!" cried Dick. "Quick! A couple man like you would not think of travelling without a brace. Down with the other!"

The traveller gnashed his teeth, but he had no resource save to submit, so he threw down another pistol.

This showed Dick was quite right when he said a gentleman like him would not think of travelling with less than a brace.

"So far, sir, very good," said the highwayman. "Now, you will find it your best policy not to tamper with me. You are completely in my power, and if you do not wish to throw your life away, you will attempt no useless resistance, but hand me over whatever cash and valuables you have about you."

"You take this matter very coolly," said the traveller, with great difficulty controlling his anger.

"Very coolly," replied Dick, "and I trust you will be influenced by my example. It is so much better to carry out these little affairs quietly, and without making a disturbance."

"Curse your quietness. Here, take this, and be off."

The horseman held out at arm's length a good-sized purse, which Dick could see was tolerably well filled.

"I will take the purse," he said, "but as for being off, that is quite another thing. I shall want something more in remembrance of this pleasant interview before I go. Come, let me have your watch and chain and the appendages thereto. I am sure you carry one. Come, be quick!"

With another oath the traveller took off his watch and chain, and handed it to the highwayman, who then said—

"You may go now. Good evening, sir. I am much obliged to you, and I shall always look back to this meeting with gratification."

"Curse you, yes;" and as he uttered the words, the horseman stuck his spurs deeply into his steed's flanks, and galloped away.

With a gratified air, Dick Turpin felt his booty, and estimated its value by its weight.

"Not a bad commencement," he muttered; "but still not enough to be called a night's work. I must go on, there is plenty of time yet, and see what fate has in store for me."

Still he went slowly. There was no particular occasion for hurry.

Presently he saw before him some obstruction in the road, which a nearer approach and a closer observation showed him was a toll-gate.

It was closed.

He rode up to it gently, and the man came out of his wooden house and lazily swung open half the gate.

"Tuppence," he said, holding up a piece of white paper.

"Tuppence."

"Here you are."

"Why, this is half-a-crown."

"All right. Keep that on account of next time, for I may, perhaps, be in a hurry, and, if so, it won't do for me to have to wait while you fumble at the gate."

"Lor' bless you, your honour, no. I understands you. Long life to you. I'll take care you don't have to wait at my gate."

"All right," said Turpin. "Good night."

CHAPTER CCXLVIII.

A VERY REMARKABLE ADVENTURE BEFALS DICK TURPIN ON THE HIGH-ROAD.

It was always good policy for a highwayman to keep on good terms with the tollmen. They were in a position sometimes to render them a good deal of assistance.

This suffrage was in a general way easily obtained by behaving liberally to them.

Dick could mention more than one instance when he would have had much difficulty in eluding his pursuers, had it not been for a tollman hindering the officers two or three minutes while he undid the gate to allow them to pass through.

The speed of his mare was matchless beyond doubt, but then it had a limit, and, after awhile, her swiftness would abate materially.

Those behind might be indifferently mounted, but every now and then they would get more cattle, so it was only by stratagem that a highwayman had a chance of getting out of their clutches.

A delay of two or three minutes from any little circumstance, would be of immense importance.

After passing through the toll-gate, Dick still kept on towards the country and away from London, which was now about ten miles behind him.

The road was broad, level, and straight, and, when the moon broke forth, he was able to see a long way in advance.

In the far distance he could just see two tiny lights.

They were no larger than stars, or rather, looked like two glowworms.

Both were on a level with each other, and about equidistant.

Of course Turpin knew in a moment what those two lights signified.

A carriage was approaching.

If he had any doubt, the rumbling sound which soon followed would have convinced him, and, not only that, the lights, while preserving precisely the same position, continued to grow brighter and brighter.

Dick changed his mare's pace from a trot to a walk.

The carriage was coming at a very rapid rate, as though its inmates had some more than usual motive for travelling post haste.

But whatever their business might be, or however great a hurry they might be in, Dick resolved to stop them and exact a tribute.

And now the lamps shone very brightly, and showed him the forms of two steaming horses, who were harnessed to the carriage.

Dick had learned from experience that one of the most effectual methods of making the driver of a carriage stop his horses, was to fire a pistol in the air, and then cry out "Halt!"

This was the course he pursued on the present occasion.

"Bang!" went his pistol, with a report that echoed far and wide over the country, accompanied by a momentary flash of intense brilliancy, which revealed his form to the driver of the coach.

"Halt!" he cried. "Halt! or you are a dead man."

There is something remarkable about the word "halt!" Clearly enunciated, it seems to have a magical effect in arresting any one's progress.

In the present instance, its effect was heightened by the words which followed it.

The coachman stopped at once, and without any trouble brought his cattle to a standstill.

It almost seemed as though they understood the meaning of the abrupt tone of command.

The stoppage was immediately followed by a scream in a female voice, and before Turpin could reach the carriage, the door was thrown open, and a young lady alighted.

Dick could see at a glance that she was young, and, not only that, the moon's rays showed him that she was beautiful.

This was an action which astonished Dick not a little.

The young lady, the moment her feet touched the ground, ran towards him, and cried out, in the sweetest voice our hero had ever heard—

"Tell me—tell me! Who are you? What is your name? Tell me, I implore you! It is of the greatest importance to me. I guess it, but tell me your name."

She clasped her hands together as she spoke, and sank into a half-kneeling attitude.

Under the sudden impulse of the moment, Dick slipped off his mare, and tried to raise the young lady to her feet.

But she sank quite down into a kneeling posture, and said, anxiously—

"Tell me—tell me who you are! Do not delay, I pray you! Tell me your name!"

"I cannot refuse you," replied Turpin, "but I should first like to know your reasons for wishing to learn my name before I give it."

"No—no! that will take too long. No—no, tell me your name. Tell it me at once."

"Rise, then, to your feet. Let me assist you."

"Not until you have told me your name. I more than suspect who you are, but tell me—pray tell me for certain."

Dick hesitated.

In the first place, the whole transaction was of so extraordinary a nature, that he may be excused if he felt rather confused.

He was at a loss to understand what was meant.

When he had alighted and endeavoured to raise the young lady to her feet, he had released his hold of his mare's bridle, and she had, after straying a few paces onward, commenced cropping some of the short sweet grass which grew upon the roadside.

Dick had only given one glance at the carriage, the door of which had swung open.

That glance, however, had shown that it was occupied by some one, but whether male or female, he had not been able to determine.

All around was still.

The vague idea that this was some deep-laid scheme of his foes for his entrapment, glanced through his mind, but it was instantly dismissed.

He could see by the expression of the face of she who knelt before him, that she was in earnest, and that her position in life was such as to place her above joining in any scheme against him.

Besides, he could not believe that one so fair and candid-looking as she was, could be guilty of treachery towards him or any one else.

Something very urgent could alone have instigated her to do as she had done.

But what was it?

Dick was curious in the extreme.

It was useless to speculate.

The only means by which he could satisfy his curiosity would be by at once avowing who he was, and noting the effect the pronunciation of his name had upon her.

These thoughts passed with great rapidity through his mind, but during the time they occupied the young lady had renewed her entreaty.

The person in the coach had uttered some words, but what their import was, Dick neither knew nor cared.

His whole attention was absorbed by the singular behaviour of the beauteous being before him.

"My name," he said, "though I am quite at a loss to know why you wish to hear it, is John Palmer."

"John Palmer!" repeated the lady, in accents of the deepest disappointment. "Then all this time has been lost in vain—when time is so precious. But I made sure that you were the person I took you to be."

She accepted of Dick's aid to rise as she spoke.

"Surely, miss," said Dick, "after complying with your request, and telling you my name, you cannot, I should think, refuse to tell me for whom you took me."

"I took you for another."

"So I can readily judge; but what other? You have raised my curiosity excessively, and surely you will not refuse to gratify it?"

"I will tell you, sir, but pray let me return to my carriage, and resume my journey. Your surprise will doubtless be great—perhaps, even, you may be offended—but I took you for a celebrated character."

"Who, miss?"

"A highwayman."

"I do not scruple to avow that such is my profession."

"But the person I fancied you were is one who is justly entitled to be called the prince of highwaymen."

"And who may that be, with so enviable a title?"

"Richard Turpin."

Dick started, but he took off his hat, and made an elaborate bow, as he said:

"I am your humble servant."

"Ah! I was right, then. You deceived me before. Your name is not Palmer——"

"My name is Palmer, lady. I did not deceive you. I am known, however, not by that name, but the one by which you addressed me."

"All is well, then?"

"May I ask what is well?"

"You may. My behaviour seems incomprehensible and lunatic, no doubt, but it will all be explained."

Turpin bowed.

"I have heard that you have ever proved yourself a friend to the unfortunate. That you, although transgressing the laws, have atoned for many of those acts by deeds of mercy and goodness towards those who have been friendless and unprotected. Have I heard rightly?"

"It does not become any one to speak of himself," replied Turpin, "but I have certainly, as every man would, when I have seen the defenceless oppressed, interposed between them and the oppressor."

"I am right, then. I knew I was right. It was a fortunate chance that I should have met you. I was in hopes of doing so; something seemed to tell me that I should see you."

"But your journey?"

"There is no need of it."

"You have not explained yet."

"No, I have not; but I have a favour to ask of you, a great favour."

"Speak freely, and without fear."

"I am in distress, and require a strong hand to succour me—at least, not myself, but another."

"I am at your service," said Turpin. "In what way can I assist you?"

"Time is precious. I cannot tell you now. I had intended to go to London to find a friend there—a person with whom I am acquainted, but from whom I did not expect to gain what I wished. I was in hopes of finding you, and, having done so, I must beg of you to accompany me. Will you do so? At the first opportunity everything shall be explained."

Dick hesitated.

For the second time the thought had risen up in his mind that this was some deep-laid scheme for his apprehension; that the lady was only playing a part, and that he was about to follow her to his own destruction.

But, for the second time, one glance into her face was sufficient to dispel these half-formed suspicions.

He could not bring himself to believe that she could be guilty of such baseness.

She, with a woman's quickness, noticed his hesitation, and said:

"Do not fear to trust yourself with me. No harm shall come to you. Take my word for it."

"I will believe you."

"You may do so in safety. Assist me into the carriage where my attendant is waiting for me, and you can either enter or——"

"I will mount and ride by the side of the carriage," said Turpin. "But to what place are you going to take me?"

"Not far from here. You will accompany me, will you not?"

"I will, but yet, believe me, I should like to know the nature of the service which you require me to perform, and how far are you going to take me?"

"It will require too much time, and there is none to lose. All shall be made clear to you, and the distance is only trifling. I had done little more than commence my journey to London."

As she spoke, Turpin assisted her to enter the carriage, and closed the door.

Then, at her request, he bade the driver turn the horses round, and go back the way he had come.

A faint chirping whistle brought Black Bess to his side in a moment.

He vaulted into the saddle and had fixed himself in the seat before the coachman had obeyed the order which had been given him.

CHAPTER CCXLIX.

IN WHICH THE READER, AS WELL AS DICK TURPIN, BEGINS TO SEE THE LIGHT.

MUCH wondering what all this meant, and how the most singular adventure he had ever met with would terminate, Turpin trotted gently at the side of the carriage, accommodating the speed of his own mare to that of the horses who drew it.

That his curiosity was raised to the utmost pitch, the reader can doubtless readily believe, and he was anxious in the extreme to have his bewildering speculations set at rest.

There was something so mysterious about the manner of the young lady, and withal something so romantic, that he felt himself irresistibly attracted towards her.

In the positions they then occupied, conversation was difficult, and almost impossible, as the combined sound of the rumbling of wheels and clattering hoofs drowned all words not uttered in a very loud tone.

From time to time, however, the highwayman cast a glance into the interior of the vehicle at the lady who had made the strange supplicatory request to him.

He noticed opposite to her was a woman of about thirty years of age, and who was the attendant who had been alluded to.

In this way upwards of half-an-hour elapsed, during which about four miles had been travelled.

At the end of that time they came in sight of a large white stone building—a kind of residence common enough in the present day, but not so then.

On the right-hand side of the road were some large iron gates, and, adjoining them, a kind of keeper's lodge.

At the request of the young lady, Dick rode forward a little, and pulled the handle of a bell.

The summons was replied to by a man, who, as soon as he saw the carriage through the bars, threw the gate open without delay.

They then entered, taking their way along a broad, smooth, gravelled path, which wound about in a serpentine fashion.

They did not, however, continue to keep to this path, but took one that branched off to the left, leading, Dick afterwards found, to the back part of the mansion.

The night was now, of course, very far advanced, and as he looked up to the house, both at the back and front, Dick could perceive no signs of any one inhabiting it.

From one window alone, and that was high up in the building, streamed forth a faint light.

The carriage stopped before a small door, which looked like a private entrance to the mansion.

Finding that they were to go no further, Dick Turpin dismounted, and, opening the door, assisted the lady and her attendant to alight.

The former spoke.

"Will you enter?" she said, "and then I will give you the explanation which I am sure you must be anxious to receive."

"Willingly," said Dick, "but"——

"But what?"

"My mare."

"She will be quite safe. Leave her, and James will take her, and see that she is put in the stable and made comfortable."

"Exactly. Still"——

"You hesitate. Speak freely, I beg."

"I cannot feel safe or comfortable unless I know that my mare is in perfect safety. I mean without I see her stabled with my own eyes."

"Ah! yes," said the lady, "I have heard as much, and also that you love Black Bess as you would love a mistress."

"You have heard correctly," said Turpin. "I do love her. I am grateful to her because she has saved my life upon more than one occasion."

"I should much like to hear the story of your life, but this is neither the place not time for you to tell, or for me to hear it. James will show you to the stables, and then bring you back to me."

Turpin bowed.

James was the name of the man who had driven the carriage.

He had descended from his seat, and when the young lady had finished speaking, he said—

"Will you take the bridle of your mare and follow me?"

The highwayman replied by at once leading his mare forward.

He had not, however, to go many yards.

The stables were close at hand.

James left the horses in the carriage, and opened the door to allow Dick to enter.

The stable was large and well fitted up.

It was divided into many stalls, in which were several horses, which a glance showed to be of first-rate quality.

Dick, as usual, saw his mare littered down and fed.

He also conciliated the coachman by making him a present of a crown piece, and requested him to finish properly attending to her.

He then followed him from the stable, full of impatience to learn the sequel of this adventure.

As he went out, however, he carefully noted all the different objects around him, and impressed their different bearings upon his memory, so that he might, should occasion require it, be able to find his way alone and unguided.

The door leading into the mansion before which the carriage had stopped, was ajar.

James pushed it wide open, and led Dick along a passage which was dark as the grave.

But its termination was soon reached, and then Dick was ushered into an apartment to which we must devote a line or two of description.

It was spacious, and furnished with massive oak.

The walls, too, from floor to ceiling, were composed of panelled oak.

Opposite the door by which he entered was the fireplace, in which several logs of wood were blazing.

This was the only illumination in the apartment, but it was quite sufficient. The wood was dry, and of a resinous quality, so that it emitted a brilliant and ruddy light.

It revealed every object within the apartment, and, had there been a lamp, it would have been of no service, for its rays would have been quite lost.

Seated by the fire, in an oak chair of an antique fashion, was the mysterious lady.

She rose, however, as soon as Turpin made his appearance, and, with well-bred ease, requested him to seat himself in a chair that had been placed upon the opposite side of the fireplace to that where she was sitting.

She had taken off her travelling apparel, and now appeared attired in a much more bewitching manner.

Her dress was composed entirely of black serge, cut low in the neck, with short sleeves, the arms being left bare.

They were of dazzling fairness, and so, too, were her neck and shoulders—they seemed, perhaps, even more so by the contrast which her sombre habiliments presented.

Yet that fairness, great as it was, had nothing unhealthful in it. It was a pure, clear white, relieved upon the cheeks by a faint rosy tinge, which quite took off all appearance of ghastliness or disease.

Dick had thought, when he had seen her in the open air, and in the partial darkness, that he had never seen a face so purely beautiful.

Her beauty, indeed, was of that kind which the old Grecian sculptors so much delighted to delineate.

But the living original possessed something which the other lacked.

It is true the marble accurately represented the lovely contours of the cheeks and chin and curving lips, and displayed the perfect form of the square forehead, but the eyes were absent.

The eyes, the most beautiful feature in her face.

No marble could imitate them, or convey an idea of what they were like.

They were intensely black—jet black—large, full, and languishing.

Her eyebrows, too, were black, and strongly pencilled—indeed, some critics would have considered them a blemish to that otherwise faultless face.

Dick looked at her entranced, and the longer he gazed, the more apparent did her bewitching loveliness become.

For a few seconds after he had seated himself, the silence was unbroken.

Each were engaged in perusing the lineaments and noting the appearance of the other.

Dick would have spoken earlier than he did, only he knew not what to say, and whether he should be doing right by taking upon himself to speak first.

A certain amount of embarrassment could have been detected by a close observer in the lady herself.

It was evident she wished to utter something, but knew not how to begin.

The fire blazed and cracked, while a large, old-fashioned clock, which stood in a recess by the side of the grate, sent forth a monotonous tick—tack, which made itself plainly heard in the silence.

The singularity of his position had a strange effect upon Dick.

He began to ask himself whether what was taking place around him was real, or whether it was simply a creation of his disordered fancy.

It seemed unreal.

There was something altogether out of the usual course of things from first to last in the whole affair.

He was about to break the silence, which had begun to oppress him terribly, when fortunately the lady, making a strong effort, spoke.

"Sir," she said, "you have been kind enough to accede to my request so far, and I sincerely thank you. A young lady, fair, rich, and beautiful, has, by a series of cruel incidents, been placed in a position of the utmost distress. She is alone, and with but one friend in the whole world, and that friend, with all the will, has not the power to aid her. She requires a strong hand, a willing heart, and a powerful mind to free her from the meshes which threaten to involve her in destruction. These words, I doubt not, will furnish you with the clue you desired to have, but, before I enter into particulars, you must take a glass of wine. You must be cold and exhausted after your ride. It was remiss of me. I ought to have mentioned it before."

"Pray do not apologize or put yourself to any trouble upon my account."

"But you will take some wine," and, as she uttered the words, the lady rose to her feet and walked to the opposite side of the apartment, where stood an old oak buffet.

Opening one of the doors, she produced a couple of bottles and a glass, which she placed upon a salver and set down on the corner of the table where Dick was sitting, and within reach of his hand.

She, however, poured out a glass of wine, and pressed her strange guest to partake of it.

Of course, Dick complied.

It would have been churlish to refuse, and besides, he felt that a glass of generous liquor would be acceptable—for his hurts made him more susceptible of fatigue than usual.

The lady reseated herself, and Turpin turned round and leaned back in the chair with more ease and freedom than he had before done.

When she had spoken of the distressed lady, and said that she had but one friend, and that one not able to assist her in the manner in which she needed assistance, Dick was at no loss to come to the conclusion that the friend alluded to was no other than herself.

That he had determined to render all the aid that lay in his power, the reader can easily believe—since such a resolution accords so well with his character.

He waited, therefore, to be placed in possession of such facts as would enable him to act.

CHAPTER CCL.

DICK TURPIN FINDS A CONNEXION BETWEEN THE LADY'S STRANGE STORY AND THE MYSTERIOUS MURDER IN THE HAUNTED HOUSE.

"I HAVE so much to tell you," began the young lady, "and so many facts rise up in a moment in my mind, that I hardly know where to begin, or how to tell you what I wish to communicate."

"I hope you will believe, lady, that I am most desirous of rendering your friend all the assistance in my power."

"Many thanks. For my own part, I never doubted your willingness."

"Indeed!"

"I judged you by what I had heard recounted of you, and I find that I was right."

"Do not compliment me. I am the worst in the world to bear anything of the kind. I always feel uncomfortable."

"But they are merited."

"No matter, the effect is just the same; but, lady, you spoke just now of not knowing where to commence your history. Will you pardon me for making a suggestion?"

"What is it?"

"I think, for me to be thoroughly useful—to know how to act—I ought to know all. I think, then, that you had better begin at the beginning, and tell me all the particulars which you can recollect."

"Well, perhaps it will be best," said the lady, musingly; "and yet"——

"Yet what?"

"No matter, I will do as you desire, and then you will be better able to come to a conclusion."

"At last," thought Dick to himself, "I shall know the meaning of this most incomprehensible affair."

The lady was silent for a moment or so, during which period of time she seemed to be running over in her mind what she was going to say.

At length, in a clear voice, and with a distinct articulation, she began as follows—

"This house—or hall, as it is called—in which we are now sitting, is the property and residence of William Winberry, whose father was one of the richest merchants the whole city of London could boast.

"When a comparatively young man, he gave up business and retired here.

"He was then a widower, and it was the recent death of his wife, of whom he was very fond, that had the greatest share in inducing him to withdraw from the world.

"He had one child, a son—the same, indeed, who now owns the hall—the William Winberry of whom I spoke.

"He remained in a state of absolute retirement from the world for a space of three years, and he married again.

"What were the precise reasons which led him to take this step I know not, nor does it matter in the least to what I have to say."

Dick bowed assentingly, though he mentally took a note of the circumstance, for he thought it not unlikely, trivial as it seemed, that the event would turn out to be of importance in the end.

The lady continued.

"I perhaps ought to tell you that this second wife was above him in station, but not in wealth. She was, indeed, an earl's daughter, and the riches of the merchant widower doubtless swayed her choice.

"However, be that as it may, they were married.

"One child, a son, was the fruit of this union.

"It seems very strange for me to relate to you a private family history, but it is necessary that you should know all this. I can trust to your honour to divulge none of it."

"You can," said Turpin, "and it rejoices me to find that there is at least one person in the world who has not a bad opinion of me."

"There are many, I can assure you, who, while regretting that you have chosen the mode of life you have, yet cannot withhold their admiration of the many good deeds you have performed."

"Let us return to the subject under discussion," said Dick, who hated to hear anything in his own commendation.

"You have a noble heart, and that is why you wish your deeds of good to be unnoted. I have seen nothing of you until to-night, but you have at present fully borne out the opinion I have formed of you, and the more I speak to you, the more inclined do I feel to trust you, and the more persuaded am I that the step I have taken, though an extraordinary one, will be fully justified in the end."

"Proceed, lady," said Turpin.

"I will not delay you any longer than I can possibly help. Mr. Winberry, then, lived as unhappily with his second wife as he had done happily with his former one. They were quite unsuited to each other.

"His wife was haughty, proud, cruel, and vindictive to all save one, and that one was her son, who inherited much of her fierce patrician disposition.

"He was, as well, of a most overbearing temper, and passionate in the extreme, but his mother, so far from checking this vicious inclination, fostered it, and allowed his passions, whether for good or evil, to have full and unrestrained play. The latter predominated.

"The first-born son, William, was the very opposite. He resembled his mother, whom his father had so dearly loved, not only in his countenance, but also in his mental composition, though he united with it much that his father possessed.

"In proportion as the gulf of estrangement between the husband and his second wife widened, so did the bands of sympathy draw the father and his first-born together—they were inseparable.

"It would seem that the second wife noticed this, and took alarm at it, for her demeanour suddenly, and without any perceptible cause underwent a total change.

"Her son, too, whom she had named Adrian, curbed, to a great extent, the violence of his nature.

"His mother grew suddenly attentive to, and fond of her husband, but whether his own feelings changed is more than I am able to tell you.

"I ought not to omit to tell you that Adrian, the second son, was fearfully jealous of his elder brother, and hated him with the bitterest rancour.

"Things were in this state, when the second wife died of a contagious disorder, which was then decimating the the neighbourhood.

[DICK TURPIN FINDS ELLEN AND TOM DAVIS DESTITUTE AND IN DISTRESS.]

"To this scourge her husband himself fell a victim very soon after—so soon, indeed, that both were buried in one grave.

"A will was left.

"Mr. Winberry had had it drawn up with scrupulous care by a London attorney, and no one in the house was acquainted with the nature of its contents.

"There was in the chamber in which Mr. Winberry slept a cabinet of curious and antique manufacture, in which papers of value were deposited, such as mortgages, securities, and such like documents, for though he had retired from business, Mr. Winberry frequently lent money out on interest.

"The day came upon which the will was to be read.

"The keys were handed to the lawyer, who at once advanced to the cabinet I have spoken of, and in which he stated the will of the deceased had been deposited with his own hands.

"But upon looking, to the consternation of all present, no will was to be found.

"The circumstance of its having been stolen—for that was the conclusion unanimously come to—was puzzling. What motive could there have been for the deed? Surely the younger brother could have had no hand in its removal, for, of course, in the event of the father dying intestate, the whole of the property, landed or personal, would deseend to the eldest son.

"Who could have been interested in purloining it?

"The only person was the eldest son, William, to whose advantage it would be to destroy the will, if the property had been bequeathed to the younger born.

"But those who knew the deceased felt certain this was not the case. In the first place, William was known to be too highminded and honourable a young man, and too fond of his father to attempt such a deed, and, in the second, the deceased had not sufficient love for Adrian to deprive William of his rights.

"It was a very remarkable and perplexing occurrence was it not?"

"Very, indeed," replied Turpin, whose interest was increasing every moment the beautiful being before him spoke

"However, it turned out to be of no importance. Indeed, the lawyer offered an opinion relative to its disappearance different to any that had been yet expressed.

"He stated that the deceased had caused to be prepared a will, which he had seen witnessed, and which he then held in his possession.

"An exact copy of this will had been given to the deceased, who had had it deposited in the cabinet where he had gone to look for it."

"That was the copy, then?"

"Precisely. The lawyer then took from his portfolio of papers the original document, which he proceeded to read to those present.

"By this will, the bulk of the property was left to William, the eldest son. To Adrian was bequeathed an annual income of eight hundred pounds, sufficient to keep him in affluence, but no more.

"There were other minor bequeathments, but those do not matter in the least.

"After reading the will, the brothers met and quarrelled. What passed between them no one knows; their interview had no auditor.

"However, Adrian left, and went no one knew whither.

"After a time, William married. I speak now of the present owner of the hall—the eldest son.

"In due course a child was born, but, in giving it birth, the mother, who was of a very delicate constitution, lost her own life.

"This child was a girl.

"Her father never married again, consequently the girl, who is now about my own age, is the sole heir to the wealth and the estates."

"I presume, then," said Dick, "that this is the friend of whom you spoke?"

"It is."

"And what is her name?"

The question seemed a strange one for Dick to ask, and one that was of little importance.

But it was not so.

He had a motive for asking the question, as will presently be apparent.

He even anticipated the reply which would be given him, and he evinced no astonishment when the lady replied—

"Blanche!"

CHAPTER CCLI.

DICK TURPIN IS ABLE TO IMPART SOME IMPORTANT INFORMATION TO THE MYSTERIOUS LADY.

From a very early stage in the story the lady was relating—from, indeed, the time when the two brothers had been mentioned—Dick had felt the conviction creep over him that there was some kind of connexion, near or remote, between what he then heard and what he had witnessed during his brief sojourn in the reputed haunted house in Birdcage-walk.

The circumstance of the double marriage—the unhappy wife—the two brothers—and, last of all, the name of the girl proving to be Blanche, all tended to fix that conviction in his mind.

But it was a most wonderful coincidence.

As yet, however, he stood but on the threshold of the knowledge that he was about to be put in possession of—all that he had heard was but the prologue to the drama—the heart of the mystery had yet to be laid bare.

Nothing that he had listened to had enabled him to come to a right understanding of the mysterious events which had so puzzled him.

The lady saw nothing particular in Dick's asking the name of the daughter. She evidently looked upon it as a mere commonplace casual question, for she expressed no surprise respecting it.

She continued.

"After the departure of Adrian, nothing was heard of him for a long—long time. William lived here the peaceable and contented life of a country gentleman, and spending all the time he possibly could with his daughter Blanche, upon whom he doted with a double love—that which he had borne for her mother and that which was her own.

"Had you searched the whole kingdom through, you would not have found a happier and more peaceful home than this.

"Its felicity was doomed to be interrupted.

"Three months ago—or it may be longer—the younger brother Adrian made his appearance at the hall.

"He had an interview with William in the library, which was his favourite apartment when indoors, and he came forth with compressed lips and flashing eyes.

"Quite by an accident, I sometime afterwards learned the substance of what had passed between them.

"Large as was the annual income settled upon him by his father, Adrian had squandered it, and was chin-deep in difficulties. Indeed, his annual revenue for several years to come had been forestalled, and he had nothing whereon to live.

"Under these circumstances he had applied to William—not like one who requires assistance and would be grateful for it, but with the endeavour to extort money from him—to wrest away that which belonged by law to him and to no other.

"William, although rich, was a careful man. I do not mean that he was niggardly, but he was not improvident; indeed, he not only hated that, but all who were guilty of reckless extravagance.

"He dismissed his brother, therefore, who departed, and the slight cloud which he cast upon the happiness of those at the hall passed away, and things resumed their usual course.

"But the effects of his visit were soon apparent.

"Like some dark cloud on the horizon of a pure blue sky, prognosticating that ere long the bright heavens were to be clouded as with a pall and a storm break forth, so did his appearance foretell disaster and misery to this happy home.

"About a month after his visit, and when that ill-omened event had almost been forgotten, Blanche disappeared."

Dick nodded his head.

It was just what he expected.

"In vain was the closest search everywhere made for her. Her father was like one frantic. All their efforts, however, proved abortive—not the slightest trace of her was to be found.

"It was then that I heard of the interview, and what had taken place between the half-brothers.

"In a moment I connected Adrian with the abduction, though what was his motive for it I was not able to hazard a guess.

"William Winberry, her father, instituted a most vigorous search in every direction, placing himself always at the head.

"One morning, and that is about six weeks ago, he went out at the head of one of the excursions. He was mounted on horseback, and somehow or other he got separated from his companions.

"He never returned.

"You may guess this double blow plunged the whole household into the deepest grief, for William and his daughter were universally beloved for their good qualities of head and heart.

"Rewards were offered and men sent out, and every day some intelligence was hoped for and expected, but, alas! those hopes and anticipations were doomed never to be realized. Each night only brought us the tidings of a day of disappointment.

"And so things have gone on up to the present moment. I think I have told you that Blanche is my cousin. Such is scarcely the case, but we are distantly related to each other, and we fixed upon that as being both convenient and friendly.

"Between Blanche and myself there has always existed a very warm attachment, and you may think how much all these terrible occurrences have disturbed me. There is no one in the mansion save myself who is able to undertake the conduction of affairs.

"Nor have I any person to consult with, for, with the exception of the two persons I have named, I have not a relative in the world.

"I have done all in my power, and failed.

"What to attempt next I knew not.

"Suddenly, I remembered having heard of you, and how, though you and the law were at war, you had done many a good action.

"I also heard how successful you were in what you undertook, and how the very boldness with which you usually set about things generally brought success with it.

"As soon as the idea seized me, I had the horses put in the carriage, and confided my scheme to the person who was with me, and who is the personal attendant of Blanche, and also to the steward, who, for once in his life, played the part of coachman.

"Upon both these you can rely.

"I thought of your perilous position.

"I ought to tell you now that I set out with a double intent.

"I went towards London in the hope of meeting with you, but had I not have done so, I should have applied to some of the officials of the state.

"I chose night for making the journey because that was the time when I knew I had the best chance of meeting with you.

"Fortunately I have met you, and now I think I have given you the clue to all."

"You have, lady," said Turpin.

"And do you quite understand?"

"I think so, and, more than that, that something more than chance conspired to bring about our meeting."

"What mean you?"

"In the first place, it was a remarkable thing that I should be upon the road to-night. Had I listened to the urgings of a friend, I certainly should not have been."

"Indeed! then I have cause to be doubly thankful."

"You count, then, upon my co-operation?"

"Pardon me if I say I do."

"And you are quite right, lady. I would run any risk—lay down my life, even—should it be necessary to render a service to yourself, or any one who was dear to you."

There was a solemn impressiveness in the manner this speech was uttered, which allowed no doubt of his sincerity.

"I believe you," said the lady, "and thank you at the same time. I had no one I could consult with, or probably they would have dissuaded me from the project I had formed, as savouring too much of the romantic. But it so happened that for once I was permitted to have my own way, and the result is your presence here."

"I can detect the finger of that mysterious thing called fate in all this," said Turpin, earnestly. "The coincidences are so extraordinary."

"You spoke of coincidences before, but you did not explain yourself; pray do so now."

"I will. I have some tidings to communicate to you."

"Let me hear them—pray let me hear them. Do not keep me any longer in suspense."

"You must prepare yourself for a shock."

"A shock?"

"Yes, and a severe one."

"Blanche"—

"Be calm. I have little, if anything, to tell you about her."

"It is William, then."

"Be calm, I beseech you. Promise me to be calm, and to hear with patience and fortitude that which I have to tell you."

"I will—I am."

"Excuse me, but the tones of your voice, and the manner in which you speak, belie your words."

"But I am calmer now, and if you do not wish my agitation to increase, keep me no longer in suspense, but let me know the worst at once."

"I will."

"Pray begin."

"Last night—or, I suppose more correctly, the night before last, for the present one is almost spent—I was pursued by my foes through St. James's-park.

"Anxious to find some hiding-place, I remembered that there was in Birdcage-walk a house which enjoyed the reputation of being haunted.

"With a good deal of difficulty, I made my way into it, but scarcely had I reached the hall than I heard a faint rattling sound, which in the silence that was everywhere around, was very audible.

"Not knowing for a moment what it was, and anxious to ascertain, I ascended the stairs a little way, and crouching down, watched and waited.

"I soon found that the rattling sound was produced by a key being thrust into the lock of the front door.

"Much wondering who it could be at that ghostlike hour who was endeavouring to obtain an entrance into a house of so ominous a reputation, I looked more eagerly than before.

"The bolt of the lock, which seemed rusted with disuse, was obstinate, and the wards refused to act, but at length the door opened, and three men entered.

"Two were ordinary-looking personages, such as one might find in the streets of London at any moment.

"But the third person was very different.

"He was tall and stoutly built, but his figure was concealed by a long ample cloak, which added greatly to his height, and his features were concealed by a large broad-brimmed hat, which was pulled on as low over the brows as possible.

"Only the lower part of the face was left visible, and that was covered with shining black hair, so that, in point of fact, his features were invisible.

"This person called for a light as soon as he had closed and locked the door behind him, and one of the two men, who were evidently his servants or attendants, unmasked a dark lantern, and the whole party made their way across the hall to the foot of the staircase, which they began to ascend."

CHAPTER CCLII.

DICK TURPIN RELATES WHAT HE SAW AND HEARD IN THE HAUNTED HOUSE.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the younger lady, with a plainly perceptible shudder. "How terrible! You fairly frighten me! What must have been your feelings to have seen three men in such a dreadful place at night? I should have swooned at once. Were you not frightened?"

"Well, hardly!" said Turpin, with a smile. "I am used to such adventures as those, and they have long since ceased to make any impression upon me."

"Is it possible? But pray continue. You have worked my interest up to the highest pitch."

"Can such a story have such an effect upon you?"

"How? What do you mean?"

"Simply that, so far as the incidents yet related have occurred, I think it the simplest thing in the world."

"Then you have had other adventures more terrible?"

"Oh! by far."

"I would give much to have them recounted to me."

"Would you, lady?"

"I would, indeed. It is a part of my nature to delight in all stories of the wild and wonderful, and especially is my interest excited when I know the marvellous occurrences to which I listen are truths."

"I see—I see. But pardon me, lady; let us confine ourselves to the matter we have in hand. It is, I can assure you, and as you will find in the sequel, a very serious one."

"Go on, I pray you."

"Some time, perhaps, an idle hour may be found in which I can relate to you some of the adventures you wish to hear—but let us leave that now."

"With all my heart."

"Seeing, then, that it was the intention of the three men who had entered the haunted house, to ascend the stairs, I slowly and stealthily went up before them.

"There was a thick coating of dirt and dust upon the stairs which made my footsteps inaudible, or nearly so. At all events, what little sound I made was effectually drowned by the noise made by those following me, who did not attempt to keep silence, and the manner altogether in which they had acted, convinced me that this was by no means their first visit to the haunted house.

"I think I should have told you that the house in question has been deserted for many years."

"I know the place well."

"Indeed?"

"When in London, I have had it pointed out to me, and have never looked up at its gloomy walls and dirt-begrimed windows without a sensation of dread and undefined apprehension creeping over me."

"Such a feeling is only natural to sensitive organizations. But to resume. I preceded them up the stairs in the manner I have described, until I reached the commencement of the third flight of stairs.

"The three men paused upon the landing below me. That is to say, upon the second floor of the house.

"Of course, I did not go any higher, but stopped at once—for I felt extremely curious to know what was their business there at such an hour, and surrounded with so much mystery as they evidently were.

"By the aid of the lantern, which one of the men carried, I could see that several doors led from this landing, either into apartments or corridors.

"Before one of these doors they paused, and the one in the cloak, after feeling in his pocket, produced a key.

"With this he unlocked the door and passed through it, followed by his two companions.

"They did not close the door after them, but left it ajar.

"And then arose a succession of shrieks, so shrill and ear-piercing, that I felt confident they came from a woman's lips, had not a few words dropped by the men let me know it was a man."

"A man!" ejaculated the lady, as a sudden suspicion glanced into her mind; "a man?"

Up to this point in Dick's wondrously interesting narration, she had not spoken a word. All her faculties were absorbed in that of listening. She had sat with wide-open eyes and parted lips devouring his words.

It was with an effort that she asked the question.

"Yes, a man," replied Dick, "but pray do not interrupt me. I would rather you listened patiently to all I said. When I had finished, you would then be better able to draw your own conclusions."

"I should—I should."

"As I told you, then, they left the door ajar, never dreaming for a moment that there was any other living being in the house beside themselves.

"I waited a moment, in order to make sure they had fairly entered; and, as I heard the sound of voices, I descended the stairs and approached the partially-opened door.

"At first I saw nothing, and the import of the words which now came distinctly enough to my ears, was, that there was an old man confined in the apartment—that the three persons I had seen enter were his enemies. Moreover, I learned their purpose. One, who by his deep voice I recognised as the stranger in the cloak, was endeavouring both by threats and persuasions, to induce him to sign a deed which would transfer the chief part of his property to him."

"Good heavens!"

"Calm yourself—pray calm yourself."

"I am. But pray go on."

"The chief argument used to persuade the prisoner to accede to the terms he wished was that his daughter, who was also held a prisoner, should be restored to him."

The lady clasped her hands together with awe as she heard these words, and then she cried—

"His daughter! Tell me her name. Did you hear it mentioned? If you did, tell it to me. Pray tell it to me at once."

"I must again ask you to calm yourself," said Turpin, drawing his chair closer towards her. "I must again ask you to be calm; and, as I before said, prepare yourself for the worst."

"The worst?"

"Even so. Doubtless you now comprehend the motive of my apparently objectless question of the name of Mr. Winberry's daughter?"

"I fear I do."

"The name was the same."

"Blanche?"

"Yes."

"My heart told me so! my heart told me so! But continue, pray continue."

"Willingly. I would rather you had listened calmly to the end."

"I will do so, I assure you I will do so, if you will only resume."

"I may as well tell you that when I had stood at the door a little while listening, I changed my position, so that I was able not only to hear, but also to see what was going forward.

"The first thing, then, that met my eyes was the figure of an old man. His face was wrinkled and careworn, and he had about him the appearance of extreme age, yet I could tell that it was permature.

"This old man was much emaciated.

"He was held down in a chair by the two men.

"The dark lantern I have mentioned had been placed upon the table, and the door opened. It was from the light from this which enabled me to see that which I describe.

"I did not at first catch a glimpse of the one who wore a cloak. The door hid him, but presently he stepped forward and came into full view.

"I could, however, see but little more of him than I had seen before. The large cloak still enveloped him, and he still kept the hat drawn down closely over his brows.

"The lower part of his face was quite hidden by the dense mass of hair which grew about it.

"I could, though, see a little more than I had seen before, for I was able to trace a faint resemblance between him and the old man sitting in the chair."

"Mer——"

"One moment," said Dick, interrupting the lady as she was about to speak. "The one in the cloak placed upon the table a properly drawn-up deed, and wanting only a signature to complete it, in which was assigned the whole of the property the old man possessed.

"In return for signing this document, he was to receive his freedom and be restored to his daughter Blanche, as well as have a certain sum settled upon him for life.

"Some conversation then ensued between them, the one in the cloak striving to bring the other to his desires.

"The old man, however, used some words which still ring in my ears. I will repeat them even as I heard them. They were these—

"'We are brothers, but, thank heaven, the same mother did not bear us. Mine died, and when our common father took another bride, he little dreamt that he was warming a serpent in his bosom, but so it was.'"

"He said those words?"

"He did; but listen, I beseech you. After a great deal of hesitation, the old man consented, for his daughter's sake, to sign the deed.

"Fain would I, had it been in my power, have interposed to save him to prevent this consummation. But how was I to do so? I feared some ill and treachery lurked beneath his words; but I ask again what could I do? In brief, the old man seized the pen which was temptingly offered him, and signed the deed."

"Never!"

"He did. But listen further. Scarcely had he finished the last stroke, than the man in the cloak drew, with the rapidity of lightning, a pistol from his breast, and placing it against the old man's head, fired."

The lady uttered a piercing shriek, but by a wonderful effort of strength she controlled herself, and requested Turpin to continue.

"The report from the pistol sounded with startling loudness through the silent mansion.

"But the deed was so unexpected upon my part, and so suddenly performed, that I was for the space of about ten seconds, positively deprived of motion.

"It is hard to say how long this would have continued, but I was doomed to receive another surprise.

"Some heavy blows were struck upon the front door.

"I have told you that I was pursued, that I had entered the haunted house in the hopes of escaping from my pursuers. I fancied I had been unperceived, but these sounds seemed to show that somehow or other they had got upon my track.

"I should have darted forward to the old man's assistance had not this occurred, but as it was, I saw that I could not aid him, and that my own safety depended upon instant flight.

"The manner in which the blows were struck upon the front door were sufficient to show me that it was intended to break it down."

CHAPTER CCLIII.

DICK TURPIN SETS OUT FOR LONDON TO GAIN ADDITIONAL INFORMATION RESPECTING THE MURDER.

"This is indeed a fearful tale!" said the young lady. "It approaches a termination. Pray allow me to conclude it."

"Go on, sir! I can see the hand of Providence. The guilty will be yet confounded!"

"I trust so! The heavy blows upon the door discomposed the men quite as much or more than they did me. I could tell that by their hurried movements. I was, however, compelled to seek my own safety by instant flight, so I sprang up the stairs. Had I been found where I was, I should, in all probability, have been implicated in the murder, and I should have had great difficulty in clearing myself of the charge.

"Besides, my liberty was already forfeit, and had I been captured my death would have been the inevitable result.

"The interruption was a most inopportune one. Had it not been for those heavy blows, I should have sprung into the room to the old man's assistance, though I fear I could have rendered him but little aid. The pistol was placed in contact with his ear, and the discharge which followed could not have been otherwise than fatal.

"It has been my lot to witness many a cold-blooded murder, but I can say I never saw one so awful as that. I never for one moment dreamt that a human being could have acted with so much perfidy."

"Oh, it is horrible—most horrible!" exclaimed the young lady, who, prepared as she had been by Dick's words, had sat stupefied with terror from the time the revelation had been made. "It is most horrible!"

"Listen! I sprang up the stairs and gained the roof. What took place afterwards I cannot tell, nor whether the murderers were arrested. I was fortunate enough to make my way over the house-tops and to enter a window, and thence I descended into a street, having escaped the great peril with which I was so imminently threatened.

"From that time until the present moment I have heard nothing more of the extraordinary affair of which I was a witness. You will not, I fancy, be at any loss to connect it with what you have related to me!"

"I can do so easily enough! You overcome me. I am bewildered at the strange combination of incidents, producing such wonderful coincidences. It seems beyond belief!"

"It does indeed!"

"Let me think—let me try to think!"

As she spoke, the lady let her head fall upon her hands, or rather, she clasped her hands over her head in the manner of one who wishes to shut out from contemplation all external objects, and whose desire it was to concentrate the whole power of thought.

Turpin was silent.

The fire had burned down and its ruddy light had faded away. Only occasionally came a fitful flash which illuminated the apartment with a transient brightness, leaving it in deeper darkness than before.

The wood logs had burned down to a red heat.

The wierdlike nature of the scene pressed heavily upon Dick. It was in vain he tried to shake off the impression.

He, too, tried to think, and to shut out his strange fantastical surroundings, likewise placed his hands over his eyes.

But soon the desire to know what the lady would say next rose paramount above every other consideration.

He did not move from his position, but shifted his fingers slightly so that he could see between them.

She had thrown herself back in the large chair in which she sat. Her sable robe could scarcely be distinguished from the dark oak of which it was composed, but her white and beautifully rounded arms shone out in all the greater contrast.

It was evident she was perplexed and overcome by the intelligence which Dick had just imparted to her.

At length, however, she roused herself.

Looking Turpin steadfastly in the face, and even in the gloom fixing her bright eyes upon him, she said—

"Tell me, if you can, what I had better do in all this. Your intellect is more calm and logical, your judgment is assisted by experience, and therefore, I look to you for advice. It was a girlish and romantic feat to set out in the hope of meeting with you, as I did, and how many would have laughed at me for it. Yet how strangely things are brought about. Apparently by the most unlikely means Providence brings about her ends. You, in all probability, are the only person who could supply me with the information for which I sought, and I meet with you and learn all!"

"I should think a parallel could scarce be found."

"And so should I. And now do not be offended if I make an appeal to you—if I entreat a favour."

"Fear not; speak freely and without hesitation."

"I am a poor, weak, inexperienced girl, left to the management of matters which might puzzle a wiser head than mine! I have confided in you. I have been impelled to do so by the good opinion I had formed of you. I shall have to place even more confidence in you than I have done hitherto. Let me appeal to your honour not to abuse it."

"Lady," said Turpin, proudly, "as you say, you do not know me. Had you done so, you would not have needed to make the prayer which has just passed your lips. Let this content you. Bad I may be in the opinion of many destitute of honour, but I can lay my hand upon my heart, and say that I never yet proved false to those who trusted me, or even abused the confidence of the defenceless. On the contrary, I have upon every occasion done all in my power, and run the greatest risks to defend them from their enemies."

"That is sufficient. After what you have just said, I shall feel no dread of placing the utmost confidence in you. I shall trust you utterly, and if you betray me, I am lost indeed."

"I shall say no more by way of protestation—prove me. Trust me freely, and do not fear for the result."

A smile of trusting innocence appeared upon the lady's lips.

"And now," continued Turpin, "let us consider that as settled, and proceed to a consideration of what had best be done."

"With all my heart. Pour out more wine, and I will stir the fire, or we shall be quite in darkness."

As she uttered the words, the young lady stirred the fire, and made it once more burst into a bright blaze.

Dick drank some more wine as he had been desired, for it was of such a quality as he had never before tasted.

"Now let me hear what you think had best be done. The sooner we decide and act upon our decision the better."

"True. In the first place, then, the newspapers cannot fail, I should think, to contain some details of the murder, which I feel certain was discovered."

"Well?"

"From them we shall, without doubt, be able to glean some additional information, which will, ten to one, point out a plan of action."

"So it would. I see that at once. How simple, and yet I never thought of that?"

"Nor did I until the moment before I spoke. I am glad you are of the same opinion. Have you a paper here?"

"No."

"That is awkward."

"Not very. Morning is now close at hand. Supposing I called up one of the domestics, and sent him off to London to glean all the news respecting the murder he could, and then to return with such papers as he might be able to obtain?"

"A good plan, but I have an amendment to propose."

"What is it?"

"This. Instead of sending one of the domestics, let me go. Pardon me for having the conceit to think that I could manage the business best."

"I do not doubt that, but think of the fearful risk of capture which you would incur. No, no. I shall not consent to that."

"Stay! stay! Take my word for it, it will be best. Then, as for risk and danger, that for both!"

Dick filliped his fingers as he spoke, to show the small amount of estimation in which he held them.

"You terrify me!"

"There is no cause for alarm."

"Do not say that. Were you situated differently to what you are, I should have proposed your going as by far the best, but, with a price upon your head, I cannot think of permitting it."

"I will promise you, not only for my own, but for yours and Blanche's sake, that I will use all possible caution, that I will run into no unnecessary danger, but that I will pry into the matter to the utmost, and return to you without fail to-morrow night, bringing you full particulars."

The young lady's eyes glittered.

She admired true bravery and courage in a man above all other qualities, and her heart beat with a strange sensation of pleasure when she heard Dick talk so calmly and confidently, as he did, about his perilous enterprise.

The immediate consequences of his manner was that it begat a similar feeling of confidence in herself, and she no longer looked upon the excursion with the same amount of terror as she had at first beheld it with.

Dick was impatient to be gone. He explained to her the importance of his setting out at once, and if possible, of reaching London before daybreak.

He assured her that she might expect him at midnight, and, having done so, bade her farewell.

A quarter-of-an-hour afterwards he had mounted Black Bess, and was galloping rapidly along the high road in the direction of London.

But, coming to a rather steep hill, he drew rein and proceeded at an easier pace.

CHAPTER CCLIV.

DICK TURPIN FINDS ELLEN AND TOM DAVIS DESTITUTE AND IN DISTRESS.

"CAN all this be real!" said Dick, musingly, as Bess walked up the hill. "Can it all be real? Mine is a strange life; full of strange mutations and vicissitudes, but I have never yet met with any thing that will parallel this. The more I think upon it, the more wonderful does it seem! It is not so much the events themselves, but the manner in which they are connected together. How rare a chance was it that I should have overheard and witnessed what I did, and how much rarer was the chance which threw me in the way of the dear friend of the murdered man and Blanche—Blanche! I have long heard her name as yet, I wonder whether I shall ever see her! I trust so, for the interest I feel is no common one! But who is this mysterious and lovely lady, who has treated me as I have never before been treated? I have not heard her name as yet, but I shall soon! It cannot but be a pretty—but pshaw! let me leave that and turn to a consideration of the whole affair. I have not so clear a comprehension of it as I should like to have, but I shall soon resolve it, I make no doubt.

"In the first place there are two brothers, or rather half brothers, having the same father, but different mothers.

"The first of these, and by all accounts the better of the two, and the possessor of the estate and the principal portion of the wealth, marries, and has a daughter named Blanche. So much for him.

"Then there is the younger brother—the black sheep, and doubtless the cloaked stranger I saw in the haunted house, who wishes to obtain by force, or fraud, or both, that which is rightfully his brother's.

"He learns how the daughter, Blanche, is doated on, and that furnishes him with the key for action.

"She is mysteriously abducted.

"Then her distracted and almost maddened father is seized upon and confined in a solitary place, where the terms were made which I heard offered to him.

"It is truly a most delectable plot. For I feel sure I have arrived at the facts of the case. But how am I to frustrate it? I must defer that. Blanche—Blanche! What a pretty name! I must find out where her rascally relative has concealed her. Her father, alas, she will never see more, for that was her father I saw murdered in so cold-blooded a manner, I feel certain.

"For her sake I should like to bring him back to life, for if he loved her so devotedly as appears by all which I have heard, it is but reasonable to suppose that she loves her father in the same fashion. What, then, will be her grief when she learns he has fallen a victim to so horrible a fate! It will be great indeed.

"Adrian. That is the half-brother. I wonder whether I should recognize him again from what little I saw of his face? How did he get on, too, at the hands of the officers? That I know not. Perhaps both he and his two associates have been captured?"

The reader must not forget that Dick was quite in ignorance of what had happened after he crawled out on to the roof. He knew nothing of the manner in which the three villains endeavoured to elude the police, nor how the two subordinates were captured in the garden. He knew nothing of the flight of Adrian through the park, nor how he had thrown his bushy beard and moustache away, and lost his hat and cloak. With all this the reader had been made acquainted, being necessary to the due comprehension of the story; and not only that, how Adrian was mistaken for Turpin, and carried into the lodge at Newgate, where we last left him.

Had Dick been aware of all this, it would have saved him a vast deal of trouble, and made a material difference in his plans; but there was no ready means by which he could arrive at the information.

We must be content to follow him upon his hazardous journey to London, and trace, step by step, the various incidents which befell him.

As for the wound his mare had received, it was nothing more than skin deep, and would have got well if it had been left to itself, but under the judicious treatment which it had received it had got almost well.

From its position, too, it luckily did not interfere in any way with her motion.

On gaining the brow of the hill, therefore, she set off at a rapid rate, though Dick checked her speed to some extent, for he did not wish her to exert herself too much.

Soon in the distance he could perceive, like a huge black cloud, the city of London.

It was profoundly dark, being the hour before the dawn.

There was not much likelihood of his meeting with any one on his journey. Few people would be abroad. The late ones had retired, and the early ones had not yet risen.

By the time he reached the outskirts, however, a faint leaden tinge appeared in the eastern horizon, which each moment grew imperceptibly brighter.

The new day was coming.

Still full of meditation, the highwayman trotted on, and he did not allow his thoughts to pre-occupy him entirely, for ever and anon he cast rapid glances around, in order to make certain that no prying or unfriendly eyes were fixed upon him.

Brighter and brighter grew the long white streaks of light which shone in the east. Higher and higher it mounted in the sky, shedding upon all things a dim and cold gray light, and making the old fashioned houses, with their quaint roofs and overhanging stories, look spectral and ghostlike.

"Where will be my safest place, I wonder?" thought Dick. "The officers have now got a good scent of me, and the large reward which is offered for my apprehension, will preclude all hopes that they will relax their efforts. Where shall it be? I must put up somewhere. The proverb says, the nearer the church the further from heaven, and I believe it. Why, then, should not I be safest in the place of the greatest danger? They have turned me away from the White Horse, suppose I return there straight. I'll do it, let the risk be what it may. I shall feel safer there, and more at ease than I should anywhere else."

Having arrived by this train of reason at a decision, he at once turned in the requisite direction.

He slightly increased his speed, too, for he did not care to go to his place of refuge by daylight.

To get there as soon as possible he took several short cuts through narrow streets, where the poorest portion of the inhabitants of the city dwelt.

Suddenly he heard a faint, low cry.

It came from somewhere very close at hand, but ere he could think where, a thin wasted-looking figure bounded towards him, and clasping her hands together, pronounced his name.

He started with wonder, and under the impulse of the moment, reined in his steed.

The young girl who had spoken came still nearer.

At the first glance Turpin fancied he had seen her somewhere before, but where, he could not recollect.

Certainly, the circumstances under which the meeting took place, were widely different to the present.

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed the girl. "I have found you."

"Found me!"

"Can it be possible that you have forgotten me?"

The tone in which these words were spoken was touching, and heart-breaking in the extreme.

"Your voice and form seem familiar to me, but yet I am at a loss to recollect——"

"Alas! that it should be so. I had fancied—but no matter. I knew you in a moment."

"And I know you. Give me some clue to our former meeting."

"Do you remember the poor ill-used orphan apprentice whom you rescued and placed in a comfortable home?"

"Ellen?"

"That is my name."

"Impossible! This cannot be you in this condition; or if it is, by what chance do I find you destitute and in distress?"

"Alas—alas!"

"Speak. Tell me."

"It will take long. But are you still prepared to stand my friend?"

"Can you doubt it, my dear girl? I have often thought of you, and the recollection of the one good action I performed has solaced me in many a bitter hour."

Ellen sobbed, and tears ran down her cheeks.

"I am not alone in misfortune," she said. "Your old friend, Mr. Davis—my father, as I call him—is in the same abject condition."

"Tom Davis! Has evil come upon him?"

"Turn round. Look behind you. Do you see yonder doorstep?"

"I do."

"Do you see two figures, bowed down and helpless, with want and suffering, seated upon it?"

"I do—I do! But——"

"That, then, is the condition of your old friend and his worthy wife. Ought I to say that they owe all their troubles to you?"

Dick did not hear the latter part of this speech, or if he did, he affected not to do so.

He had sprang off his mare upon the first intimation that it was his old friend in such distress, and hastened towards him.

On one side of the street there was a strange looking archway, which had the appearance of leading into a large piece of ground, which was surrounded with a high stone wall.

Fitted in this archway was a ponderous door, thickly studded with large headed iron nails.

Two steps led up to this door, and seated upon them were two wretched beings.

They seemed to be absolutely perishing, either of hunger or starvation, perhaps from the two combined.

They were male and female, and both in a state of apathetic unconsciousness.

Faint as was the cold gray light which fell upon their faces, Dick Turpin was immediately able to recognise them as Mr. and Mrs. Davis, who had for so long kept the Hand and Keys at Hornsey Wood.

CHAPTER CCLV.

ELLEN FINDS SHE HAS NOT BEEN MISTAKEN IN HER EXPECTATIONS, AND DICK TURPIN, AFTER A LITTLE DELAY, REACHES WHITE HORSE YARD.

Dick Turpin was inexpressibly shocked when he beheld the condition to which his old and faithful friends had been reduced.

It was evident that they had been acquainted with gaunt poverty for some time.

The emaciation of their forms—the tattered state of their apparel, all showed that they had been, for months at least, exposed to the utmost degree of want and privation.

When Turpin last saw Davis few men could have been found to rival him in portliness of form, but now he was little more than a framework of bones, upon which the skin hung in large folds.

His hair had turned much whiter, and indeed, take him for all in all, he presented as true a picture of mendicancy as could well have been found.

Black Bess, as soon as her rider had alighted, followed him as a dog would, and when he stopped she stopped also a few paces behind him.

Ellen, too, approached.

"Tom," said Turpin, in a husky voice, "can it be possible that you are in such a state as this? Nay, do not hang your head, but look up and speak to me. I am your old friend Dick. Do you recollect me?"

Tom Davis had allowed his head to sink down upon his breast, and he made no effort to move it from that position.

He seemed as though he had totally succumbed beneath the weight of his misfortune, and nothing could rouse him.

When he uttered the words we have recorded, Dick accompanied them by placing his hand upon his old friend's shoulder. He shook him gently, too, and at length Tom looked up, with something like a look of recognition in his eyes and on his lips.

"Help us," said Ellen, whose youthful and vigorous constitution had enabled her to bear up against the privations they had suffered much better than her adopted parents. "Help us. We are perishing from cold and want of food. Help us. Pray help us."

"Help you?" ejaculated Turpin. "There is nothing on earth which I would do with greater willingness. I wish I knew how I could be of the most service to you. Let me think. Let me think."

"Only a copper, good sir—only a copper. Have pity upon us. We are hungry. Only a copper."

It was Mrs. Davis who spoke.

She had failed to recognise their preserver, and so made this appeal for alms in a whining voice.

The words cut Dick to the heart.

Between the old couple and himself there had for a long time existed a warm feeling; and those only who know what it is to be isolated can tell how much the highwayman thought of his friends, and how their manifest distress touched him.

"I must find you all a place of shelter, if I can," said Dick, addressing himself more to Ellen, who, however, listened eagerly to his words. "That is if it is in my power. I don't know where to turn to find what I require. Time, too, is precious. Chance must do it. I have trusted more than once before to its guidance, and I hope that it will once more befriend me."

"I knew you would help us," said Ellen, the tears streaming down her cheeks. "I have so longed that we might meet you, and I have my wish at last."

"You have," said Dick. "I wish that you had seen me sooner."

"I will tell you all that has happened since you saw us last at the first opportunity, but the condition of my father and mother demands attention first."

"You still call them by that title?"

"I do. My own parents I never knew—cannot in the least remember; but they have well supplied their place."

"I am glad to hear you say as much, and gladder still to find that you are grateful to them for it! But follow me. No, stay! I have a fresh idea! Here is a purse containing a large sum! Take it and make the best use of it. I should recommend you to take up your quarters at an inn for a little while, during which I will try if I cannot find you a place where you can permanently remain."

Ellen took the purse reluctantly.

Dick observed it.

"Believe me!" he said, "I have business of the greatest importance under hand, in which time is of especial importance! I have undertaken to perform something by a stated time! Do not, then, think me unkind if I do not set about it at once."

"But how shall we find you again?"

"I will tell you. Take a lodging at some quiet out of the way inn, and as soon as you have made the old folks comfortable, bend your steps to the 'White Horse,' in Drury Lane. You know the place?"

"Quite well."

"If you will recollect, I sent you there upon a former occasion. Find the same person you then spoke to, old Matthew, the landlord. Tell him where you are to be found, and I will come to you and take you to a place where the remainder of their days may be spent in peace."

"You are very—very kind!" sobbed Ellen.

"Pho—pho! Say no more, I beg! Do you quite understand the directions I have given you?"

"Quite."

"That is well, then, or rather all will be well, if you will carry them out. Now, farewell! It will not be long before you see me again! Farewell!"

"Farewell, Tom!" he added, making a last effort to rouse his old friend. "Farewell!"

But the attempt, like the preceding ones, was a failure.

With a deep sigh Dick turned round and mounted his mare, after once more bidding Ellen good-bye.

This little incident did not occupy much time, but still the dawn had now fully come, and distant objects could be tolerably well distinguished.

Another half hour and the largest portion of the inhabitants of the city would be astir.

It behoved Dick, therefore, to make what speed he could to his destination, or he would stand but a poor chance of reaching it unperceived.

The distance, however, was but short, and in something less than half an hour afterwards he trotted into Drury-lane.

That usually busy thoroughfare was now completely deserted. Not even a solitary watchman could be seen.

Upon this state of things Dick congratulated himself, and he increased his speed, for he could not tell how long it would continue.

The well-known corner was reached in safety, and as the highwayman believed, without anyone having seen him. The secret spring which rang the bell was pressed, and he waited patiently.

Some time elapsed, and as he was impatient to be admitted, he pressed the spring again.

Scarcely, however, had he done so, than the door was flung open by old Matthew, for no one else was allowed to answer that bell but himself.

His astonishment at seeing Turpin was so great, that it quite took away the faculty of speech, and he stared at him with wide open eyes and mouth.

Then the idea darted into his mind that Dick had been killed, and that it was the ghost of the celebrated highwayman and his steed that stood before him.

But that idea was dissipated almost as soon as it was engendered, for Dick cried—

"Now, Matthew! Let us come in, my friend! It's all right."

He clasped the landlord's hand as he spoke.

"Dick!" he said; "Dick! Is it really you?"

"Of course it is! Stand out of the way! Don't block the door up with that great paunch of yours, but let me come in."

But instead of responding to this in the way he generally did, Matthew held out his hand, and pushed Dick away.

"Be off!" he said. "Be off! You must be mad, clean—stark, staring mad! Be off, I tell you!"

"Won't you let me in?"

"Of course not. Do you think I want you nabbed and scragged?"

"Stuff! Let me in, I say."

"Shan't!"

"But you shall, or if you don't, I'll never come near you any more."

The implication of this threat was enough to make Matthew draw back, and Dick took advantage of the movement to walk in, and lead his mare after him.

He then closed the door behind him, and, turning to the landlord, said—

"Now, Matthew, what is the matter with you? Speak out at once. Come."

"Speak out. It don't want speaking out that I knows of."

"But it does."

"Well, then, ain't it enough you were nearly nabbed in Stanhope-street?"

"No. What of that?"

"What of it? Everything. The officers suspect my house. They will first surround, and then search it, when nabbed you will be to a certainty."

"Nonsense, Matthew, you have only just woke up from a sound sleep. That is it, I am sure. Come with me, and take Bess into the stable. I will then tell you what has befallen me since we parted, and give you my reasons for returning here."

"Oh! very well. Come on. It don't much matter. We are both done for, that's very clear."

"Stuff and nonsense. It's all right, I tell you."

Most reluctantly old Matthew fastened the door opening into White Horse-yard, and conducted the highwayman to the stable.

CHAPTER CCLVI.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN OBTAINING SOME ADDITIONAL INFORMATION RESPECTING BLANCHE AND ADRIAN WINBERRY.

Dick Turpin would have trusted old Matthew to do almost anything, but there was one exception.

He would not allow him, or any other living human being, to place Bess in the stable, and see her properly fed and littered down.

He always did this himself, and while he was so engaged, he managed in a few words to give an outline of what had taken place since they had last seen each other.

He concluded with these words—

"Now, Matthew, I want you to go over into Bow-street to your old friend the costumier's, and bring him here with you."

"I don't mind."

"Let him bring a disguise with him. Which should you think would be most suitable?"

Matthew considered a moment, and then he said—

"A lawyer's, I should think."

"So should I. That is a capital idea. Let it be a lawyer's. I should get on best with that."

"I suppose it's no good asking you not to run the risk?"

"Not a bit."

"I thought not. I am getting tired of it. I can tell you, I have never been successful as yet."

"And never will be, for when I once make up my mind to a thing, you may be sure there is no turning me."

"I think that is about the truth."

"You may rely upon it. Now, Matthew, will you do as I desire?"

"I will."

"That's settled. You had better start at once. You perfectly understand what I require?"

"Perfectly."

"Stop a moment, though! I would not let you interrupt me while I was speaking, but now I am very anxious to learn something about Tom Davis."

"Oh! ah! yes. I had forgotten that again! Well, you must know, very soon after Tom King's escape, when he was had up before the magistrate."

"Yes; I recollect that. I was at his house during the time."

"Very good, or I ought to say, very bad. Soon after that it came time for his licence to be renewed, and his application was not granted. They refused it on the ground of his having harboured dangerous characters, and that will be the way with me one of these days."

"Pho—pho!"

"It's all very well to say 'pho! pho!' Tom Davis would have done the same, I dare say, but you see the result! Well, after the licence was refused, he still lived in the old place, but the police made a regular crusade against him, and as misfortunes never come single, one night the house was burned down, and Tom Davis, with his wife and daughter, only escaped with their lives. Everything else was destroyed!"

"What became of them then?"

"No one knew, and I had never heard a word about them until you spoke to-night! Poor Tom! I am very, very sorry for him!"

"So am I!"

"Why did he not call here before, I wonder?"

"I don't know, without it was his independent spirit. I know he was one who would prefer to starve a thousand times, than ask charity once!"

"And you found him starving, Dick?"

"Yes, and reduced to such an extremity as to be quite unconscious of what was taking place around him?"

"But you gave them every assistance in your power?"

"To be sure I did."

"Then God bless you for it, Dick. It was a noble action, and I like you a thousand times better than before."

"I did no more than I ought."

"True; but yet how few would have done as you have? And you are not content, but must do more. Well, well! I hope you will succeed. It will not be your fault if Tom does not end his days in peace! I trust, too, you will succeed in the other enterprise you have undertaken."

[DICK TURPIN'S SECOND INTERVIEW WITH THE MYSTERIOUS LADY.]

"Thanks! Prove the sincerity of your words by going to the costumier's at once and bringing him back with the articles required."

Matthew started off without delay, and soon returned, bringing the old man with him, who made a most respectful bow as soon as he saw Dick.

About two hours afterwards a rather remarkable-looking individual stepped off the door-steps of the "White Horse," and walked down Drury-lane in the direction of the Strand.

He was of medium height, and a peculiar stoop in the shoulders made him look shorter than he actually was.

Upon his head he wore a carefully-brushed hat, which gave token of having seen better days.

Beneath this hat appeared a light flaxen peruke, such as was generally worn at the period.

But this had a faded and indifferent look like the hat.

The face was very smooth shaven.

The attire was that worn by attorneys, and to complete the costume, he carried a blue bag in his left hand, while he supported himself with a stick, for he seemed to have a little lameness in one foot.

Many people passed him, but few favoured him with a second glance.

Our readers can, of course, guess who this person was.

It was Dick Turpin.

So well disguised, and, to use the theatrical term, his "get up" so complete and excellent, that it would have absolutely defied detection.

Surely that was the garb under which none of his foes would look to see him.

No nervousness of step—no hasty glancing from side to side—as if in momentary dread of being seen by some one whose gaze he much wished to avoid, marred the effect of the whole disguise; on the contrary, he walked firmly and steadily, and as though he had nothing whatever to fear.

Dick made his way direct to the Strand, and reached it by passing down Drury-court, now much altered since the erection of the large printing-offices on its eastern side.

Close by St. Mary's Church were several hackney carriages waiting to be hired.

He hailed one of them by holding up his stick, and directed the jarvey to drive him to Birdcage-walk.

Off went the cumbersome and obsolete conveyance.

Dick leaned back in the seat and closed his eyes.

He did that to shut out external objects, which always disturb the train of thought, and buried himself in deep reflection.

The stopping of the carriage aroused him, and upon looking through the window he saw he had reached his destination.

"Which house do you want, your honour?" asked the driver.

"The one where the murder was committed!"

"The haunted house?"

"Yes, that is it."

"You will have to go round. It's the backs of these here houses what looks into the park."

"Drive round to the front, then, and be quick about it."

The order was obeyed; and in a few moments the carriage again stopped.

This time before the quaint and antique portal of the haunted house.

The driver got down off his box, and opened the door for Dick to alight.

He then gave the man a liberal fare and told him to drive off.

Turpin watched him down the street, and as soon as he had turned a corner and got out of sight, he (Turpin) ascended the steps and knocked at the massive door.

He had not learned it from any authority, but he came to the conclusion that the whole of the premises would be in the charge of police-officers until the inquest took place.

It was a bold and daring feat to make his way to this place, but Turpin was one who believed in the policy of going to head-quarters for information.

Certainly, here he would ascertain everything he wished to know, but by following his actions we shall learn how far his boldness carried him.

No notice was taken of his first summons for admittance, so he repeated it, and this time with much greater vigour than before.

Ere he released the knocker, the door was flung open, and a police-officer that Dick had seen many a time, and whom he knew instantly, appeared upon the threshold.

"Good morning," said Dick, in a plausible voice, and making a very deep bow as he spoke, "good morning."

At the same time he managed to cross the doorstep and stand in the hall, and with so much tact was it done that the officer gave way before him.

"What do you want, sir?" he asked, rather gruffly—it would have been very gruffly only he saw by the costume that his visitor was a member of the legal profession.

Dick made no reply—at least, no verbal reply, but introduced the thumb and forefinger of his right hand into his waistcoat pocket and drew forth a guinea.

This, with a sly dry cough, and holding up his blue bag with his left hand to conceal the action, he placed in the police-officer's palm.

The effect of the contact was wonderful and instantaneous.

His whole manner changed, and he made quite a low bow as he asked—

"What did you please to want, sir? Should you like to see the stiff 'un?"

CHAPTER CCLVII.

DICK TURPIN AT THE HAUNTED HOUSE LEARNS IMPORTANT INFORMATION.

"SHUT the door first!" said Dick Turpin, altering his voice as much as he could, so as to prevent any familiar tone reaching the officer's ears.

"Certainly, sir, with all the pleasure in life. One moment!"

The officer hastily closed the door and secured it.

Dick felt a great deal of confidence in his disguise, for this man evidently did not suspect him, and yet he was quite familiar with his ordinary appearance.

As soon as the door was shut Turpin spoke.

"My errand here is quite legitimate," he said, "please bear that in mind. My errand is perfectly legitimate."

"Of course it is, sir!" said the officer as he fingered the guinea about in his trousers' pocket. "I am quite aware of that."

"Very good. But in order that you may have no scruples at all, I will tell you at once what business brings me to this place."

"Just so, sir."

"A murder was committed here the night before last?"

"There was."

"Has the murdered man been identified?"

"No, he hasn't; leastways, not yet, though a good many have come to look at him."

"So I suppose. When does the inquest take place?"

"In about half-an-hour, sir."

"Where?"

"Here."

"In this house?"

"Yes."

"Oh! well, my friend, my business here is the same it seems as several more. I want to look at the body and identify it if I can."

"I thought so, sir. Please to come this way. The body is on the second floor. A good many persons have been to look, but you are the first gentleman."

Probably Dick was the first who had given him anything.

In a most amiable and obsequious mood, the officer preceded him up the stairs.

He was rather stout, was that officer, and the going up stairs took all his wind, so he said nothing during the ascent.

The landing where Dick had stood and seen the murder committed was reached in a few seconds.

The door leading into the room was closed.

The officer tapped at it, however, and it was opened from the inner side by one of his companions.

"Here's a gentleman come to 'dentify the body, Jim," he said, and then, turning to Turpin, he added, "my post is downstairs in the hall; but Jim here will show you every attention."

With that the first officer left the room and went downstairs again.

Dick glanced at the officer who had been called Jim.

His face was familiar to him likewise.

The success which he had achieved with the first guinea encouraged him to invest another in the same manner, so he went through exactly the same performance.

The munificence of the gift produced an immense amount of morigeration upon the part of the officer.

He touched his hat and muttered his thanks.

Dick's eye then fell upon an object in the middle of the floor.

The shutters had been thrown open, and some of the dust cleaned off the window panes, which allowed the light to penetrate, but otherwise not a single article in the apartment had been touched.

The table and the curious high-backed chair in which the old man had sat were just in their former position. The dark lantern was lying overturned upon the floor.

Between the table and the chair was a huddled-up mass of something covered over with a white sheet.

Although no portion of the object itself was visible, yet Turpin knew very well what it was.

The officer advanced, and turned down the sheet a little way, so that the head and shoulders of the dead body were exposed to view.

During his strange career, it had been the lot of Dick Turpin to look upon many horrible and ghastly spectacles, yet he thought this was more horrible than any he had ever seen, without it was that of the man he had found in the subterraneous appartment beneath the woodman's hut.

The face was shattered terribly, so much so indeed, as almost to destroy all the features.

The pistol had been discharged within half an inch of his ear, and one half of the face was literally blown away.

Dick turned away. His heart heaved at the awful sight.

The police-officer covered the white sheet over it again.

"Do you know him, sir?" asked Jim.

"It is hard to say from what I have just seen."

"Very true, sir. He's an awful object, that's certain!"

"Dreadful!"

"I could see it gave you a bit of a turn. But, lor' bless you, sir, you will soon get used to it!"

"Has the body been searched?"

"Yes, sir."

"Who searched it?"

"The surgeon."

"What did he find?"

"Nothing, sir."

"Nothing?"

"No."

"Not a card, or a scrap of paper, or anything of that sort?"

"No, his pockets were quite empty."

"That is strange. Then, beyond the face, there is nothing by which he can be identified?"

"Nothing at all, but leastways, I forgot, there is his clothes."

Oh! ah! to be sure, there's his clothes."

"Should you like to see them, sir?"

"No, no, never mind. Have you anything to sit down upon? I don't feel very well."

"Not in this room I haven't, sir," replied Jim. "I am keeping guard in the next. Would you like to step in there?"

"Yes, if you will allow me."

"Oh! certainly. Please to walk this way."

"There is a question or two I should like to ask you."

"All right, sir; I am sure it will give me very great pleasure to give you all the information I possess, for you are a real gentleman and no mistake."

With this complimentary speech upon his lips, Jim, the officer, ushered Dick Turpin into the adjoining room, through which, it will be recollected, the cloaked stranger and his two accomplices had effected their retreat.

A fire was burning in the grate, and the room had altogether quite an inhabited look.

There was a table and two or three chairs.

In one of the latter, which Jim placed close by the fire-side, Dick sat down.

On the table was a pipe and a stone jug, with which the officer had been regaling himself, and beguiling the tediousness of his employment.

He looked rather shyly at them for a moment, and Dick perceiving it, soon put him at his ease.

"Have you anything to drink there?" he asked. "If you have, I shall be glad, for I can't get that sight out of my head,"

"Yes, here is a drop if you would like it"

"Thank you."

Dick took the proffered jug, and found its contents to be some excellent old ale, to which he did ample justice, and then handed it to Jim, who, with the characteristic salutation, "I look towards you, sir!" took a hearty draught.

After this they felt quite old friends, and the officer resumed his pipe.

"Your companion in the hall told me the inquest would be held here in half-an-hour," began Turpir.

"Yes, that is the case."

"But where are the jury to sit?"

"Oh! they won't sit here. They will come and view the body, and sit in the club-room of the 'Bull and Gate,' round the corner."

"Oh! ah! I thought so. Well, now I may as well tell you that a client of mine, an old gentleman, is missing. I don't say that is him in the next room, but I couldn't swear that it is not. However, I shall stay here to watch the case, you understand, in case anything should turn up in the evidence."

"Quite right, sir."

"In the meantime, I should be very glad if you would favour me with an account of all you know of the murder, as it may be of the utmost importance to me."

"Of course, sir. You have, I fancy, come to the right party, for I know all about the affair from beginning to end."

"Oh! do you, indeed? Then I am very glad to hear it."

"Very good, sir."

The officer, who was an intelligent man of his class, then proceeded to give a full account of the affair, but as the reader is already acquainted with the particulars, we need do no more than say, that he was the very man who had seen the cloaked stranger and his followers enter the house, and who had returned the moment after the commission of the murder.

Much of this was quite new to Dick, especially that part where Adrian was caught and taken to Newgate, under the belief that he was the famous highwayman.

But the reader's knowledge only extends to a certain point, and therefore we shall resume Jim, the officer's, narrative at that place.

It will be recollected that we have described how the mistake was discovered, and how the cloaked stranger had demanded to be released, and how, at that moment, there came a violent knocking at the wicket of Newgate.

At this point we resume.

CHAPTER CCLVIII.

A VERDICT OF WILFUL MURDER IS RETURNED AGAINST ADRIAN WINBERRY AND HIS TWO ACCOMPLICES.

"Of course," continued Jim, the officer, "everybody stopped still, and the governor—that is Mr. Cawthorne, you know—shut his mouth in the middle of what he was saying.

"The man on the lock, however, turned the key, and opened the door at once.

"In came a party of officers with two prisoners.

"The moment they got inside, the two prisoners, who were men, uttered an ejaculation which showed that they and the man who had been brought to Newgate in mistake for Dick Turpin, were acquainted with each other.

"The outer door was closed, and then, in answer to Mr. Cawthorne, who asked who the prisoners were, one of the officers stated what had taken place in the haunted house, and how they had captured two of the culprits, while one had made his escape into St. James's-park, and the other over the house-tops."

"But," interrupted Turpin, "I thought you told me that three men only were seen to enter the house?"

"Quite right, sir, but then there might have been one left inside. At any rate, there is very good evidence that there were four of them altogether."

"Oh! indeed."

"Yes—but let me go on."

"Oh! yes, go on. It is the most wonderful story I ever heard in my life. Take a pinch of snuff."

"Thank you, sir. Well, this man—I mean the one who was taken in mistake for Dick Turpin—disclaimed all knowledge of, and acquaintance with, the two prisoners, and with all that had taken place."

"Did he?"

"Yes; but yet it was thought there was sufficient grounds for keeping him in custody, and bringing him before a magistrate."

"And was this done?"

"Yes, sir. All three were locked up in separate cells, and brought before the magistrate in the morning."

"And what then?"

"All three were committed to take their trial. His worship would have allowed bail for the one, but nobody came forward, so he was carried off along with the rest."

"And do you think he had any hand in the murder?"

"Well, that's more than I can tell."

"Did you find anything of the man who escaped over the roofs?"

"No."

"Had you any idea of who he was or what he was like?"

"None at all. It was quite dark at night, and we lost sight of him almost directly."

"It is a strange piece of business altogether?"

"Very, sir. Now, I have had a good deal of experience, one way and another with murder, but this beats them all."

"I should think we shall learn something at the inquest that will give a clue. I was in hopes some paper had been found, but you tell me there has not?"

"No; there was nothing. Suspicion is very strong upon the three men in custody, don't you think?"

"On two, certainly. They declare that they merely acted by the directions of the man in the cloak; but he altogether disowns them, and says he never saw them in his life before."

"Very odd. What's that?"

"The jurymen, I suppose. At any rate there is some one knocking at the door."

Jim rose and so did Dick.

"I will go now," said the latter.

"There's no occasion, sir. Perhaps you had better be here when they view the body, in case anything should turn up?"

"Well, perhaps it will be better. Tom will let them in."

At this moment there came a tapping at the door of the chamber of death, and the officer hastened to open it.

As he expected, the jurymen were outside, and the whole body of them, headed by the coroner, and the rear brought up by the beadle, entered.

The coroner perceived Dick, and made a slight inclination of his head, while a look of inquiry appeared upon his face.

The highwayman understood what it meant, so he, too, bowed, and then said—

"Pardon me for this intrusion, but I am a solicitor, and hearing of this murder I came up to town this morning in order to look at the body, as desired by a client of mine."

"Oh! indeed, sir."

"Yes; that is it."

"And do you identify it?"

"Not at present, sir."

"What do you mean by not at present?"

"I mean that the features are so much destroyed as to make recognition, by means of an inspection of them merely, quite impossible; but I think it probable that something may transpire, and therefore wish to be present at the inquest."

"Oh! certainly, sir—certainly. I have no objection whatever; and if this fearfully dark affair can be cleared up, no one will rejoice more than myself."

"I, too, shall be glad."

"Now, gentlemen," said the coroner, addressing the jurymen, "be good enough to stand round, and we will proceed to view the body. Mr. Tripp, turn down the sheet."

Mr. Tripp was the name of the parish beadle, and as soon as the coroner spoke he bustled forward and did his bidding, after which he stood looking on in a majestic attitude.

One by one the jurymen looked at the cold and hideous corpse, and Turpin, though he strove to look another way, found it impossible to withdraw his gaze.

This ceremony occupied but little time. Most took but one glance, though some of a more morbid turn of mind made a close examination.

This done, the party adjourned to the public-house Jim, the officer, had spoken of.

Turpin followed.

He shrunk a little, though, when he got to the bottom of the stairs, for several police-officers were in the hall, and among them was his old enemy, Mr. Wriggles.

The two officers, who had been left in charge of the house, were relieved from their duty as their presence was required at the inquest.

It was only the first sight that startled Dick. He recovered his composure almost instantly, and walked steadily forward.

His disguise was about to be put to a severe test, but if Mr. Wriggles did not recognise him, he should feel tolerably certain of escaping detection altogether.

The individual in question gave a good look at him, but Dick returned his gaze without flinching.

But the redoubtable police-officer took no further notice, from which the highwayman inferred that he was unknown.

The distance from the haunted house to the "Bull and Gate" inn was only about a couple of hundred yards, so that Dick was not for long exposed to the gaze of the people in the street.

The inn was one of those rambling, comfortable places which our forefathers delighted to build.

It was tolerably full of company, for the murder had caused what would now-a-days be called a "sensation."

The large room on the first-floor had been set aside for the inquest.

With as little delay as possible the jurymen seated themselves round the table, and the coroner sat down in the arm-chair at its head.

The investigation was commenced.

In the examination of the different witnesses, however, very little additional information was gathered.

Turpin was seated at a little side-table where he could see and hear all that was going forward.

He was much struck with the appearance of Adrian Winberry, for such he announced his name to be.

In him he could scarcely recognise the cloaked stranger, who wore so conspicuous a black beard.

His face was smooth-shaven, in accordance with the prevailing fashion.

A lawyer defended him.

But all his eloquence, and he was a perfect master of the art of rhetoric, failed to remove the suspicion which hung around his client.

The two men when they were examined endeavoured to set aside what they had previously said.

That they had witnessed the murder they did not deny, but they stated they had been employed by a stranger to accompany him to the house where they were found, and that the murder was committed without their having any idea of it and without their being able to prevent it.

Adrian Winberry smiled in a triumphant and defiant manner when this statement was made; but there was not so much importance attached to it as he evidently expected.

The former words which they had made use of were distinctly sworn to by several witnesses.

That they had been tampered with somehow or other, and induced to depart from their original declaration, there could not be much doubt, and the coroner expressed an opinion to that effect.

A verdict of wilful murder was then recorded against the three prisoners.

The lawyer engaged by Mr. Winberry then rose, and in an eloquent speech proposed that his client should be released on bail; but the application was peremptorily refused.

Dick had taken rough notes of the chief events which had transpired, but otherwise he took no part in the proceedings whatever.

When all was over he, having full confidence in his disguise, went to different places and purchased all the accounts of the murder that were published.

By the time he had finished it was nearly dark, so he bent his steps in the direction of the "White Horse."

By virtue of the previous committal, Adrian Winberry and his two accomplices were conveyed to Newgate.

But the unnatural brother had by no means lost hope, and his peculiar line of conduct will quickly become apparent.

CHAPTER CCLIX.

DICK TURPIN REPORTS THE SUCCESS OF HIS MISSION TO THE MYSTERIOUS LADY.

THE hour was verging upon midnight when a single horseman took his way, at a rapid pace, along the western road.

The clattering of his steed's hoofs was the only sound that broke the silence which reigned around.

There was no moon as yet, but the stars shone brightly over head, and in the eastern horizon could be seen some faint indication of the coming of the queen of night.

Occasionally the horseman shifted his riding whip—which he carried more for defence than aught else—from his right hand to his left, and when he did so he would pat his steed on the neck and speak to it in an encouraging tone of voice, and by the way in which the beautiful creature tossed her head and neighed, it would seem as though she perfectly comprehended what he said.

Our readers cannot be at a loss to recognise this horse and rider.

It was Dick Turpin, mounted on his bonny mare, Black Bess, on his way to keep his appointment with the young and beautiful lady, whose name was unknown to him at present.

His thoughts, however, ran greatly upon the daring scheme which he had formed and almost carried out.

He was thinking of the young prince and the disappointment he would feel.

Some means or other must be found of communicating with him.

It was not possible for Dick to think of this without remembering his three friends, from whom he had been so long separated.

He wondered what they were doing and where they were.

They might not even have reached the shores of France in safety.

He had not heard a single word of them from that morning when they parted on the little plateau in front of the entrance to the cavern which had been the scene of so many remarkable events.

Between Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack and himself there had not existed that feeling of intimacy and friendship that there did between him and Tom King.

The latter he felt the warmest possible interest in, and the feeling could not have been greater if he had been his own brother.

It would have been a satisfaction to him of no ordinary character if he could have felt certain of his welfare and his safety.

He would, too, have much liked to have had his assistance in the affair he had then under hand. It would have been invaluable.

He determined, however, as soon as he had brought it to a conclusion, provided he did not hear or see anything of his comrade in the meantime, to set out at once in quest of him.

The moon rose.

Her beams at first were sickly, few, and faint, but they soon increased in power, bringing out the different objects in the landscape with marvellous distinctness.

"The road is empty to-night," muttered Dick. "I have not met a single person since I fairly got clear of London. Well, perhaps it is as well, for I should not be able to resist the temptation of stopping them, and it might only serve to place the officers upon my track, and I shall have sufficient trouble with this business without that. Woa, mare. Gently, lass—gently. What is it?"

Black Bess had reared suddenly when Dick spoke.

He was paying no attention to what he was about, and had he been a less practised rider than he was, he would inevitably have been thrown.

As it was, he retained his seat in the saddle with great difficulty, for his usually docile mare paid no attention to the soothing words he uttered, and the attempts he made to calm her by patting her upon the neck.

Much surprised at this extraordinary behaviour, he looked up to see what it was which had produced it.

His eyes fell upon a spectacle that was quite enough to fill the heart of any one with dread and horror.

Just where a narrow winding lane turned off from the high-road was a gibbet.

From its blackened cross-beam depended a ghastly and horrible burden.

It was the body of a man.

Many and many a long year must have elapsed since that malefactor was suspended there as a terror and a warning to others.

Spring winds, summer suns, autumn rains, and winter frosts, had all wreaked their repeated effects upon it.

The long and massive iron links, with which the body was held together and hung from the top, were corroded with rust.

They creaked and clanked dismally, however, as the fitful gusts of cold night air blew upon it, and made it swing slightly to and fro.

Here and there the bleached bones of the doomed man glistened with a sickening lustre in the moonlight.

In one or two places, too, something that looked like long strips of clothing fluttered in the wind.

It was loathsome to the eye—to the ear—to the smell—and well indeed may the highwayman's mare be excused for the alarm she manifested.

Turpin himself, although a shudder of horror swept over his whole form, could not for a moment remove his gaze, which seemed to be riveted and fascinated.

By an effort, however, he broke the spell, and turned his eyes in another direction.

But he was unable thus easily to remove Bess's fear. She pranced and reared, nor could he by any means calm her down.

His way lay directly past that gibbet, but his mare resolutely refused to pass.

To have punished her for this natural alarm would not only have been cruel, but futile, and he knew it.

He dropped the reins, therefore, upon her neck, and placed his riding-whip between his teeth, where he held it firmly.

This left both hands at liberty, so, stooping forward, he placed one over each of his mare's eyes, thus shutting out entirely from her view the horrible object which had so much alarmed her.

The ruse succeeded.

He struck her flanks lightly with his heels, and she obeyed the impulse forward readily.

The road was level and unobstructed, so he allowed her to go for some distance in this manner, and then he gradually removed his hands, and resumed his hold upon the reins.

The alarm of Black Bess had ceased as soon as the gibbet was shut out from her view, and she went on now quietly enough.

In a little while now the stone front of the house came in view, and he quickened her speed slightly, for he feared he was behind his time.

Orders had been left at the lodge for him to be admitted, for, so soon as he reached the entrance gates, they were flung open.

Dick trotted up the gravelled path, taking the same route precisely as he had done the preceding evening, when in company with the carriage.

The little door before which they had stopped was soon reached, and at it stood the steward who had played the part of coachman.

Seeing this, Dick alighted, but scarcely had his feet touched the ground, when a slight figure, shrouded in a large dark cloak, bounded forward.

It was the mysterious lady.

The steward led Black Bess towards the stables.

"Pardon me," he said, "I must see her housed."

"Ah! yes, I had forgotten. But I am so impatient."

"I will be back as quickly as possible. I have much to tell you."

Turpin hurried off after the steward as he spoke, who had almost got out of sight.

We need do no more than say that Dick saw his mare properly attended to, and then, in company with the steward, returned.

Under the direction of the latter, he was led to the same apartment as before.

The steward knocked lightly at the door, and in a low, sweet voice the lady said,

"Come in."

The steward opened the door and ushered Dick in.

The lady was standing near the fire.

With her left hand she leaned rather heavily upon the corner of the massive oaken table.

There are some faces which look beautiful when first seen, but which fade under a second examination.

But the lady's was not one of these.

On the contrary, Dick thought she looked even more lovely than before.

Anxiety—the most intense anxiety and suspense—were depicted upon her countenance, and she looked into Dick's face with the utmost intentness, in order to gather something from its expression, if possible.

The highwayman advanced, and in obedience to a sign given him, seated himself in the antique arm-chair by the fireside.

The lady, too, sank back into a seat.

As on the preceding occasion there was no light in the room save that which came from the fire.

But its beams were very, very bright, though somewhat flickering and unsteady.

It was only after two efforts that the lady found her voice to ask for the news which Turpin brought her.

"Tell me—tell me all at once, I beg. Pray do not keep me any longer in suspense. You cannot tell what a fearful state of anxiety I have been in all day, and how I have longed for night to come. I have learned the worst, surely. You cannot have any more evil intelligence to communicate. Speak, and tell me!"

"Willingly, lady; but I must ask you to be calm. You have nothing further to dread."

"And Blanche—Blanche, where is she? What have you learned respecting her? Where is she?"

Turpin shook his head.

"That is more than I can tell; but for your sake, lady, I will know no rest until I find out."

CHAPTER CCLX.

DICK TURPIN FINDS A PLACE OF REFUGE FOR TOM DAVIS AND ELLEN, AND FOR HIMSELF AS WELL.

A slight flush suffused the lady's cheeks as Turpin uttered the words with which the last chapter concluded.

"Thanks," she said, with a faint smile, which was the only notice she took of the highwayman's bold speech.

We have followed Turpin through all his adventures in London, and therefore we will not force the reader by repeating them.

Let it suffice to say he told the lady all with which the reader has been made acquainted, confining himself, of course, to that which had especial reference to her affair.

"And now," said the lady, when she had heard him to the end, and expressed her thanks for all which he had done, "And now what am I to do?"

"That is a very serious question to answer."

"I know it."

"Yet a course of action must be decided upon at once, for the trial will take place, I believe, to-morrow."

"To-morrow; surely not so soon as that."

"I think so; but midnight has passed, and to-day is here."

"Oh! I see. It is then the day after to-morrow."

"Exactly, if you take it so."

"I thought it could not be so soon as I imagined. Now what is to be done? Is such an unnatural villain as he has proved himself, to be allowed to escape the penalty due to his crime? Is he to come away from the trial in triumph and usurp my cousin's rights? Oh! no, no! that would be monstrous in the extreme."

"Do not excite yourself so much, I pray you. Such a flagrant wrong is of course not to be permitted."

"But how am I to prevent it?"

"Let us consider first and weigh the matter over, and then without a doubt we shall be able to come to a decision."

"I am much beholden to you. Your words are wise."

Turpin bowed.

"You flatter me. However, don't let us waste time in trivialities. I think in your narrative you mentioned a lawyer?"

"The one who prepared the will?"

"Yes. Is he living?"

"No."

"Is his son?"

"I believe so."

"Who is the family solicitor? for, of course, there is one."

"I am sure I cannot tell you, but I will ask the steward."

"Stay; never mind. The name is of secondary importance. You are sure there is a family solicitor?"

"Oh, yes."

"Then my advice is, you send for him at once and let him see me."

"See you?"

"Yes, it will be running a great risk, but I shall trust to his honour not to betray me."

"No, no! I cannot—will not consent to that. You have already exposed yourself a thousand times too much for my sake" ——

"Pardon me, lady, for interrupting you. Do not think I made this proposal without having calculated the probability of danger. I have done so, and do not find it so great as you seem to imagine. The solicitor to a family like this cannot, I should think, but be of honourable principles. He will have the interests of it at heart, and would do all that lay in his power. Do you think I am right in surmising this?"

"Doubtless you are, but" ——

"Nay, do not raise objections. With your permission, I should propose that you sent off for him at once—indeed, I ought to have suggested the adoption of so obvious a course before: yet still it is not too late. When he arrives I will see him—that is, with your permission. I need not reveal myself in any way, and that he will be able to recognise my features, I think hardly likely. I have had a wide experience in human nature, and I am not afraid to say that I shall be able to correctly estimate how far it will be safe to trust him at first sight. If I find that full confidence is to be placed in him, I shall relate what I have seen, and the information I have gathered respecting the murder. At the last, should circumstances require it, I shall not scruple to disclose myself and tell him who I am."

"Oh you make me tremble with dread for your safety. No, no! This cannot be. You must think of something less dangerous to yourself."

"I am afraid, lady, I cannot."

There was a pause, during which the lady appeared to be thinking deeply.

At length she spoke.

"I cannot think of any other plan so good, but yet I am reluctant, most reluctant, to accept it. Can you not think?"

"I cannot. It seems to me that is the only course to be pursued."

"And so it seems to me."

"I am glad. As for the danger, dismiss it from your thoughts, it is no more than I incur daily. I shall be able to judge best. Let me remind you of the importance of what we are about. The circumstances are most singular. You are alone in the world—have no one to whom you can appeal for assistance and advice. It seemed like the work of Providence that I should be cast into your way as I was. It looks as though I was predestined to set this dark matter right. Most fervently indeed, do I trust that it is so! Mine has been a life in which has been enacted many a dark deed, but here and there I have had a chance of doing a good action, and I have always embraced that chance, for I have always clung to the belief that those good actions have atoned, in a great measure, for the others."

"I have heard this of you," replied the lady, who listened to all that Turpin said with the most profound interest, "and I fully believe in the correctness of your philosophy."

"It rejoices me to hear it, for it encourages me to pursue the plan of action which I had worked out. In all the good actions which I have performed there has never been so glorious a chance afforded me as this. I shall be the means, I trust, of bringing to justice as great a miscreant as could be well conceived. I shall be the means of avenging his brother's death, and keeping from him not only these estates, but also the poor girl Blanche, whose fate, though yet enveloped in obscurity, I am determined to discover."

"You speak like one who has a brave and noble heart, and in such an undertaking as this, let the past be what it may, I do not think you can come to any harm."

"I, too, have a similar conviction. And now let me request you to send off to London for the solicitor. There is no time to lose, if our efforts are to be successful."

"There is not, indeed. I will call him."

She rang a bell as she spoke.

The summons was responded to by the steward.

He was a gray-headed, honest old man, who had been in the service of the family from his birth, and he looked up to every member of it with reverence and affection.

"Shockley," said the lady, "who is the family solicitor?"

"The family solicitor?"

"Yes; what is his name—where does he live?"

"That is more than I can tell you; but I have no doubt you will find it in the library."

"Ah! A good thought. I shall find it there, surely. Fetch me a lamp."

The steward departed upon his errand, and quickly returned, bringing with him one of those curious old oil lamps, some of which may be seen in our museums.

Holding it high above his head he led the way, the lady and Turpin, by her desire, following.

A large corridor was crossed in a diagonal direction, and then an antique door was reached.

This the steward opened, and then the highwayman found himself in a large gloomy apartment, the recesses of which the light of the lamp was quite unable to reveal.

A chill air, too, seemed to come from it and strike to the blood, so that he fairly shivered.

The steward crossed the library and stopped before a shelf, upon which were several boxes containing documents of various kinds.

He placed the lamp on the table, and then took down one of these.

The lady produced a bunch of keys, and in a little while had the box open, and commenced searching among its contents.

Dick stood a few paces in the rear, for he by no means wished to appear intrusive or inquisitive in things that concerned him not.

The search in the box continued for some time, but at length a packet of letters was found.

"This will tell us what we want to know," said the lady, addressing Turpin.

As she spoke she locked the box, and rose to her feet.

Returning then to the chamber, in which they had before sat, she drew a letter from the parcel.

"The name of the solicitor appears to be Kersey—John Kersey."

"And from what place is the communication dated?"

"The Temple."

"That is enough. Does it say from what part of the Temple?"

"No. 'The Temple,' merely."

"That will be quite sufficient, and now, Shockley, you will start at once, and make all speed to this gentleman's office. You had better take the carriage. Tell him his presence here is desired upon the most urgent business, and ask him to return with you."

The steward looked at the young lady inquiringly for a moment, in order to know whether he should be doing right by taking the commands of a stranger.

She understood him, and at once added—

"Yes, that is right, Shockley. You will do precisely as this gentleman has told you, and for your late dear master's sake, and for the sake of his dear daughter Blanche, let me implore you to make all the speed you can, but do not return without bringing the lawyer with you."

"I understand you," he said. "It shall be done, and I will be as quick as it is possible for any human being to be."

"Thanks, Shockley. Depart at once."

"I am off, lady," replied the steward.

A short silence followed his departure during which both listened.

Presently they heard the trampling of hoofs, and the rumbling of wheels, which told them that Shockley had already commenced his journey.

CHAPTER CCLXI.

SOME MORE COMPLICATIONS OF THE VILLAINOUS PLOT AGAINST BLANCHE AND HER FATHER ARE MADE APPARENT.

THE remainder of the night was spent in conversation.

The lady could not retire to rest, and as for Turpin, he felt no need of it.

When morning came, breakfast was served, to which Dick and the lady sat down together.

It was while they were discussing this meal that a carriage drove up the gravelled path, and stopped before the front door.

Both started eagerly to their feet, for they, of course, supposed that it was Shockley who had returned, bringing Mr. Kersey with him.

A loud summons for admittance was given upon the knocker, and the lady, when she heard the sound, turned with an inquiring look upon her face.

"Strange visitors at the hall," she said; "that is never Shockley!"

"Who can they be?"

"I have no more idea than yourself."

"What is to be done?"

"How?"

"Will they enter here?"

"Most likely."

"But—but—you comprehend me?"

"What?"

"I must not be seen by any one."

"True—true. How foolish of me to forget."

"Nay, nay. It is natural. Who can it be I wonder?"

Tap—tap.

Some one knocked gently upon the panel of the door

"Come in."

A servant entered.

"Mr. Josiah Skinner."

"Who?"

"Mr. Josiah Skinner."

"What does he want?"

"To see you, my lady."

"I am astonished," said the lady, turning to our hero. "Do you not know him?"

"No. What shall I do?"

"I should recommend you to give him an interview, by all means You know not what important intelligence he may have to communicate."

"And you?"

"Never mind. Give your servant orders to show the gentleman in here."

The lady did so, and as soon as the domestic had left the room, she turned to Dick, and said—

"Now tell me what you intend to do. Pray do not be rash, or bring yourself into danger."

"Trust me. With your permission, I should like to be a witness of this interview."

"But you must not expose yourself."

"I know it."

"What do you propose?"

"To conceal myself."

"Here?"

"Yes."

"But I see no hiding-place."

"I will soon find one if you will give me your permission."

"You have it freely."

"Well, then, if I mistake not, that is a fire-screen folded up in yonder corner?"

"It is."

"Unfold it, then, and I will hide myself behind it. I shall then be able to hear all that is said without being seen."

"Agreed. Quick! or he will be here."

The fire-screens in use in those days are not often seen now, and therefore a few lines, to convey an idea of what they were like, will not be out of place.

They were made in narrow strips about five feet high, and one in width, hinged together so that they could either be folded up into a small compass, or stretched quite across the fireplace, generally then no inconsiderable width.

They were painted with many curious devices.

A better hiding-place than that which one of these would afford could scarcely be found

It was unfolded, then, and placed across the recess at the side of the fireplace.

Turpin stepped behind it, and scarcely had he done so, than the door opened and Mr. Josiah Skinner entered.

He was a tall, stout man, dressed in a suit of solemn black, and he made a low bow on his entrance, as he said—

"I beg you will excuse me, lady, for thus breaking in upon you, but I have some important business to transact here."

"Important business?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Skinner, coolly taking a chair, and seating himself in it. "Very important business, and I trust you will give me your attention for a few moments."

The young lady bowed.

She was too terrified to reply in any other way.

Turpin peeped cautiously and curiously through a little crevice in the fire-screen, for he anticipated that something of more than common interest was about to occur.

"In the first place," said Mr. Skinner, his tone becoming at every word more authoritative and overbearing. "In the first place, I want to know what other members of the family are in the house besides yourself?"

"By what right do you ask that question, sir?" said the young lady, assuming as much boldness of behaviour as she possibly could, though inwardly she was almost ready to sink to the ground with terror. "I think your behaviour very extraordinary, indeed."

"Do you, indeed! I will so far satisfy you as to say that I have a statement to make, and I wish it to be heard by the whole of the family, so, perhaps, to save me the trouble of continually repeating the same thing, you will call them in."

"Speak to me, sir."

"Am I to understand, then, that you are the only member of the family at present in the house?"

"You can, sir."

"Very good. Then have the kindness to listen to me."

Mr. Skinner's mode of speech kept getting more and more offensive and insolent.

"I am listening to you, sir; and perhaps you will be kind enough to put what you have to say in as few words as possible, in order that I may be relieved from your presence, which I can assure you is most distasteful to me; nor can I see anything to warrant your intrusion here."

This was a very courageous speech for the lady to make, and she would never have ventured upon it had she not felt how close she was to Dick Turpin, and that he would effectually shield her from all harm.

"Ha! ha!" said Mr. Skinner. "Very good—very good, indeed. Can't see anything to warrant my intrusion. Capital. Ha! ha! I like that. But wait a minute—wait a minute."

Mr. Skinner commenced rummaging his pockets as he spoke.

"I have already waited long enough," replied the lady. "Let me know your business here, and then depart."

"Ha! ha!" Now don't, miss; please don't. I shall die of larfin'. I know I shall. Depart? Lor' no; not yet, I hope. Bless you, miss, you and me are fated to become a great deal better acquainted with each other before I depart. We are, I can assure you. Ah! that's it."

Mr. Skinner alluded to a crumpled-looking document.

While speaking he had taken several packets of papers from his pocket, and he selected one out of the miscellaneous heap when he uttered the satisfactory ejaculation.

The lady looked on in surprise and terror.

She dreaded that something terrible was about to happen—that the presence of this insolent man heralded some calamity.

Her forebodings were right.

"You see this paper, miss," said Mr. Skinner, as he held the document in his hand. "Very well, then; that's my authority for what I'm doing, do you understand that?"

"Go on, sir."

"Very well, ve—ry well. Then listen. I, Josiah Skinner, attorney-at-law, hereby take possession of this house and all the estates and appurtenances thereto belonging, as well as everything in this house, without any exception whatever. Do you understand that?"

"I quite understand your words, sir, but on whose behalf do you take possession of this house and premises?"

"That of my client."

"And who is your client?"

"Mr. Adrian Winberry, to whom the whole has been assigned for a quid pro quo."

"Indeed."

"Yes, indeed, and in fact, too. I have the fullest authority for what I come to do, and you will please to remember that it is your duty to obey me in all things."

"I shall do nothing of the kind."

"Won't you? We'll see about that. Call the servants, and save all bother by telling them all about it. Do you hear me?"

"I hear you, certainly."

"And will you not obey?"

"Never! Quit the house this moment, sir. I refuse to recognise your authority. Begone, and do not let me see you another moment, or I will call the servants as you suggest, but it shall be to have you turned out."

"Turned out," said Mr. Skinner. "So it's come to turning out, has it? Then we'll soon see who is to be turned out. Now, my lady," he cried, jumping off his chair, "I have had enough of your impudence. I know who you are. You needn't think to impose upon me. Troop off this very moment. Leave the house, and never enter it again. Do you hear? Be off."

The lady uttered a faint shriek, and cried for help.

"Ha! ha!" exclaimed Mr. Skinner. "It's all very fine. Call for help as much as you like. You have confessed there is no one in the house but yourself, so I shall be able to have it all my own way without any trouble. Be off with you, I say. I take possession."

The lady drew further back, but it was towards the screen behind which Turpin was concealed.

"Go," continued Mr. Skinner, following her. "Go—go of your own free will, or I will thrust you forth. Go, I say. What—you won't? then I'll make you."

He endeavoured to grasp the lady's wrist as he spoke, but ere he could do so, Dick Turpin glided from behind the screen like an apparition, while he said quietly—

"No you won't, Mr. Skinner. Just let the lady alone, if you please."

CHAPTER CCLXV.

TOM KING AND HIS COMRADES, SIXTEEN STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL, COMMITS A ROBBERY UPON THE FRENCH HIGHWAY.

Such a long time has elapsed since we either saw or heard anything of Dick Turpin's three comrades—Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack—that we feel ourselves now in duty bound (albeit, we leave Turpin himself in rather a peculiar situation) to turn our attention to them for a little while, and describe the adventures which befel them.

The reader will remember that when we saw them last was after their shipwreck upon the rocky islet, when Claude was fortunate enough to perceive a sail.

It was only just in time.

The limit of their endurance had been reached.

Hunger, thirst, heat, cold, all had done their work as they alternately oppressed them, and on that evening of the second day after the shipwreck they were in such a deplorable condition that it is very questionable whether they could have survived till sunrise.

The cold upon that barren sea-washed rock during the long winter nights was most intense.

But Claude had been fortunate enough to perceive a sail, and as soon as he felt sure that it was no delusion of the senses, he had stripped off his shirt, and holding it by the sleeves let it flutter out like a flag.

Fortunately for them the signal was perceived, and the ship's course was turned towards them.

They approached as close as they could with safety, and then a boat was lowered.

When they hailed the ship, they did not think of the danger of their position in case it should prove to be an English one. That danger was prospective—the present was immediate.

But it seemed as though at last the tide of fortune was to turn in their favour.

The ship was not an English one, but the French man-of-war of which the boatman had spoken.

He knew it again in a moment, and lost no time in communicating the joyful intelligence to our friends.

In a little while they were all on board, and as soon as they stated who they were, the greatest attention was paid to them.

The surgeon was sent for to examine their hurts, but they were nothing to speak of; and after partaking of some refreshment and enjoying a long sleep, the three highwaymen woke up, feeling very little the worse for their adventure beyond a sensation of weakness, which would at times seize upon them.

In the morning they came on deck.

They were making all speed for France.

Our friends felt very far from satisfied with their position.

Now and then they would wish they had never seen the Pretender, or embarked themselves in his cause, but being in they determined to go on, and never once thought of beating a retreat.

The young prince himself, whose frame was not so hardened as those of the highwaymen were, was still below in his hammock.

As evening was coming on the three friends strolled aft, and leaning over the taffrail conversed together upon various topics, chiefly the adventures they had severally in the course of a long career met with.

While thus engaged, they perceived in the distance something, which a closer investigation showed them to be a ship.

They looked at it for a long time unthinkingly.

Tom King was the first to notice that it was sailing dead in their wake, and evidently sailing at a much greater rate of speed than they were.

Then the idea suddenly darted into their minds that it was a vessel in chase of them, and they were about to hint as much to the captain, when they found that the sail had already been seen, and its character made out.

A scene of great apparent confusion now ensued, as the sailors sprang into the rigging to execute the orders which were given them to crowd all sail.

And now the ship came close enough for the highwaymen to be able to make out her character.

She was an English man-of-war, and one of the largest they had ever seen.

An encounter would be inevitable.

They saw that at once.

The excellence of the English over the French ship in point of sailing, was evident; for despite all the efforts which the latter made, they could not increase their distance from her.

On the contrary, little experienced as our three friends were in nautical affairs, they could see that the English man-of-war was rapidly gaining upon them, and that an engagement was imminent.

The captain of the vessel upon which they stood evidently by no means wished to tackle the enemy. His policy was to run away.

He had only one chance in favour of doing this, and that was, night might come upon them and enable them to get away from their adversary under cover of the darkness.

This was rather a forlorn hope.

Night was coming on, it is true; but then some hours would elapse before it was actually dark, and during that time the English vessel would be able to come up with them.

Every stitch of canvas they carried was spread to the breeze, and the masts cracked and bent to the strain.

Whether their escape had been discovered, and the ship sent out to re-capture them, was of course more than the highwaymen could tell, yet it looked very probable.

If so, the utmost exertions would be made to overtake them.

It might, however, merely be an English vessel or a privateer.

At any rate, on it came, and with extreme rapidity.

Preparations were made upon the French vessel for a fight.

The guns were run out, loaded, and put ready for immediate service, while small arms, such as swords, pistols, etc., were served out to the crew.

The shades of evening drew on.

The sun sank behind an immense bank of clouds on the north-west horizon.

Still on came the pursuing vessel.

"Look! look!" exclaimed Claude Duval to his two comrades, and pointing to the English vessel as he spoke, "they have fired the first shot!"

"Down with you, then, every one!"

"They are too far off to injure us."

"You don't know that. Down! down!"

The highwaymen crouched down, and the moment they did so, the sullen boom of a cannon reached their ears.

Tom had seen the wreath of white smoke, and had given the warning in time.

As it happened, it was not needed, for the ball fell far short of the mark. The shot was fired long before they were in range.

But it showed the enemy to be in earnest, and after a short interval another shot was fired.

This, like its predecessor, did not reach its mark, but it came nearer, and served to show how fast the enemy was gaining on them.

A deep silence reigned on board the French vessel. Everything which would serve to urge them through the water at the utmost speed had been done, and nothing remained but to wait patiently for events to take their course.

An anxious glance was occasionally cast up to the rigging, as the masts cracked or bent more than usual, but that was all.

Another shot was fired from their enemy, and this time it carried away some of the tackle at the stern.

It was easy to see that these were nothing more than trial shots.

As soon as they found they were fairly within range, they would have something more to expect.

Still the dusk came on, and one singular effect of it was by rendering the outline of the enemy's ship less distinct, it made it seem as though it had not gained upon them.

But this was a delusion, as the shots proved.

The excitement under which our friends laboured was most intense.

Were they, after all, to be overhauled when they had succeeded in escaping so far?

It would be most vexatious, after taking so much trouble and running so many risks.

But there was a strong probability of it.

They had long been aware of the superior powers of the English ship as a sailer, and now they saw she was larger and better appointed in every way.

By the aid of a glass, dense masses of men, all armed and ready for action, could be seen swarming her decks, and all apparently full of eagerness for the prospective contest to begin.

The French man-of-war was well manned and well provided with guns, though certainly in every respect inferior to the English one.

To be sure, a battle is at all times a rather uncertain thing; but anyone looking at the two vessels would declare in favour of the English winning the victory.

And now through the deepening gloom there came a vivid flash of light, followed by a roar like thunder, with which mingled the sound of broken woodwork.

The English ship had fired a broadside at her opponent.

It was aimed rather too high, however, for it whistled through the top part of the rigging without doing any very serious damage.

Then the highwaymen heard the French captain give orders to return the shot.

The order was obeyed instantaneously, for the men were all in readiness.

After this, the firing began to grow continuous and incessant.

The vessels came nearer and nearer to each other.

A thick smoke, too, enveloped them, and it was only occasionally that a glimpse of the enemy could be obtained.

The slaughter on board the French ship was terrible.

The cannon seemed all to be fired with a life-destroying aim, for while but comparative little injury was done to the ship itself, the men were cut down by scores.

Suddenly the mainmast was struck near its junction with the deck.

It trembled, and before it could recover itself, another ball buried itself close to its predecessor, and the tall mast, with all its intricate tackle in the shape of rigging, sails, yards, and spars, fell bodily over the side into the sea.

The natural result of this was that the ship keeled over to that side in an alarming manner.

But men were at hand provided with hatchets, and by the aid of these the whole mass of cordage was cut away, and the ship, as soon as it was freed from this incumbrance, righted itself beautifully.

Their sailing powers were now, however, very much diminished; indeed, what little hope they might hitherto have had of outstripping their adversary was now destroyed—it was a matter of impossibility.

But it must not be supposed that the English ship had altogether escaped the effects of the encounter.

Her rigging had been seriously injured, and many of her crew killed or desperately wounded.

CHAPTER CCLXIII.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN, AFTER MANY PERILS, SUCCEED IN REACHING THE COAST OF FRANCE.

When the three highwaymen saw the critical turn which affairs were taking, they, after a brief consultation, went below, in order to speak with the Young Pretender.

He had risen from his hammock, and was sitting in one of the cabins.

He looked very weak and ill, and there was upon his face that wearied, heart-broken expression, which was distressful in the extreme to see in one so young.

Now that the bright and glorious dream, with which he had from boyhood indulged himself, was swept away, he felt that he no longer cared to live.

In a few words our friends managed to make him thoroughly acquainted with the state of affairs above, and seeing the desponding state in which he was, endeavoured to rouse him from it.

To a partial extent they succeeded.

"And now," asked Tom, "it remains for us to devise some plan by which we can escape or avoid capture."

"Is there no chance of our obtaining a victory over our antagonist?"

"I fear none."

"Or, if there is," interrupted Claude Duval, "it is too slight for us to count upon it."

"Just so. The contest may be prolonged, but eventually I think there can be no doubt about the result."

"And what do you advise?"

"I can hardly tell what would be the best. On the water I am entirely out of my element. Had we been on land I should have known what to do at once."

"Are we far from France?"

"I have not the least idea, but it is a point which ought to be ascertained, so I will go up on deck at once and inquire."

It was Sixteen-String Jack who spoke, and as he uttered the words he left the cabin and made his way on to the deck again.

Darkness had now completely set in, and he had great difficulty in picking his way through the debris which strewed the deck.

At length, however, he was fortunate enough to find the captain, who was standing with his back against one of the masts, issuing orders to his men with unabated valour and resolution.

For a long time Jack found all efforts to speak in vain, but an opportunity presently occurring, he said—

"How far are we from the Coast of France?"

"The captain understood English, for it was in that language that Jack had asked the question, and he replied—

"I don't know."

"But you can give us some idea."

"I should think about thirty miles."

"No more?"

"It might be forty."

"That is enough."

The captain resumed his occupation of giving orders.

"We are between thirty and forty miles from France," said Jack, as he re-entered the cabin.

"That is good news, then," said Tom King. "Some other vessel may come to our assistance."

"But that is a forlorn hope."

"Well, yes it is, and scarcely one to be relied on."

"By no means. We may be taken prisoners before then. I consider our great question is, 'How are we to escape?'"

"And leave the vessel to its fate?"

"Why not?"

"Oh! I don't know why not."

"Yes, let it be that," said the Young Pretender, looking eagerly at the idea.

"Desert the ship?"

"Yes."

"But how?"

"That I leave to you."

"I will think of it."

"We can do no good here. Our aid will not reverse the side of battle."

"True."

"Then let us seek safety in flight."

"But that is no easy matter."

"There is the boat."

"We might get in one and lower it over the side of the ship furthest from the enemy."

"To be sure we might."

"And then row off. We shall not be out of danger, but still I think we could manage a distance of thirty miles."

"Is that agreed upon?"

"It is."

"Come on deck, then, and get the boat in readiness. We shall see, too, how the battle is progressing."

The three highwaymen made their way on to the deck again, which presented about the same general appearance.

More of the dead and dying lay about than there did when they left it, and the deck itself was redder with blood.

A scene of the greatest slaughter and devastation met their view.

Yet the firing from both vessels continued with unabated fury.

The English had made more than one attempt to board them, but each one had failed.

Another effort was being made, however, just as our friends reached the deck, and every one was intently occupied in repelling it.

But grappling-irons had been thrown, and the vessels were firmly lashed to each other in many places.

Indeed, it seemed as though the crisis of the fight had come, and that a very little while would suffice to show who had the victory.

Seeing this, our friends hastened their preparations.

On the opposite side of the vessel they found three boats, and selecting the largest one, they lowered it into the water.

The sea was tolerably calm, though there was a good stiff breeze blowing. Still the boat would be able to carry itself in it, beyond a doubt.

Tom returned to the cabin to tell Charles Stuart all was ready.

He found him in the same dejected, melancholy attitude; but he arroused himself upon Tom King's approach, and said—

"Is all ready?"

"Quite."

"Come, then."

"There is, indeed no time to lose."

"Which has the advantage?"

"The English. They are superior in every respect, and have had it all along."

They reached the top of the ladder as they spoke, and the Young Pretender, as he cast a glance upon the field of battle, turned away with a shudder.

"This way," cried Tom King. "Quick—quick! or I fear, after all, we shall be too late."

The din of the battle was terrific.

Tom led the Young Pretender across the deck to where the boat awaited them.

Then with all speed they entered it, and cast off.

It was a four-oared boat, and the requisite number of oars to propel it had been placed in the bottom part.

One was taken by each, and they pushed off as rapidly as they could, being anxious in the darkness of the night to escape all possible observation.

They had every reason to believe that their departure was unnoticed.

And now, when they had drifted some distance from the vessel, our friends with one accord looked earnestly up into the sky, in order to ascertain, by an inspection of the stars, whereabouts they were, and what was the course they had to take.

They looked up for the north pole star, for they knew that when they had found it, if they kept their backs towards it, they must, in time, reach France.

It was Claude Duval who was the first to point out its position to his comrades.

The two ships, though lashed together, were by no means at anchor, but were sailing along with great speed; so the consequence was, that when the boat had been cut away they had swept rapidly away from them, and now the two vessels seemed miles off in the darkness.

Their situation was made quite palpable by the intensely bright flashes of light which shot from them.

It was the best policy of the fugitives, for such they might with propriety be designated, to keep as far away from the ships as they could, lest, after all, they should be captured.

Suddenly, however, their senses were assailed by a bright flash, immediately followed by a loud report.

An intense darkness succeeded—the two ships vanished from their view, and there was not so much trace left as a faint glimmer, to show where they had been.

"The powder magazine of one of them has exploded," said Tom King, "and all is over now. Perhaps both ships have been involved in a common destruction. If so, we had need be thankful that we are here."

They bent to their oars still more steadily as they spoke.

The three highwaymen rowed.

The Young Pretender sat at the tiller, keeping the little bark as well as he was able in its proper course.

Time passed on and our friends grew tired, still they were very loath to acknowledge the abatement of their strength.

No more reports or flashes came from any point of the horizon to indicate that the ships had renewed the conflict. Tom King was quite right, doubtless, when he said that all was over.

Beyond the vague piece of information which they had got from the captain, they had no idea whereabouts upon the wild waste of waters they were.

But by keeping as much as possible in a southerly direction they could not do wrong.

Still a long time might elapse before they reached the port.

The little boat, which looked like a nutshell upon the immense expanse, bounded bravely over the crests of the waves as she was urged forward by the rowers.

But little was said, for each one was busily occupied in looking for the dawn, which came at last.

Gradually over the whole surface of the sea there stole a faint and misty light, which made those in the boat look like spectres wearing the human form.

But the light brightened, and that effect departed.

Well pleased were the three highwaymen as they bent their backs to the oars to find that the dawn had come first in that portion of the sky which lay to their right hand,

Up to the present, then, they had been going in a right direction.

They had some assistance now from the wind, which blew a gentle breeze from the north, and made their passage over the waves much easier.

At last the sun showed his bright face above the horizon's verge. There were no dark clouds to dull the glory of his majesty, and his bright golden beams fell with a beautiful and sparkling effect upon the rippling ocean.

CHAPTER CCLXIV.

OUR FRIENDS MEET WITH MORE PERILS AND ADVENTURES ON THE DEEP, BUT AT LENGTH ARE FORTUNATE ENOUGH TO REACH THE SHORE.

"No land in sight," said Tom King, with a sigh of disappointment, as he turned round and looked eagerly to southward as soon as there was light enough. "No land in sight!"

"No," said his comrades, who had turned to look with him; "but we are holding on a proper course, and have done so, I think, from the commencement. Patience! patience!"

Tom King said no more, but again bent himself to his task.

All three, however, from having had the oars so long, were horribly fatigued; but it would never do to give in so soon, so neither said a word about it.

The Young Pretender was silent and moody.

And so more time passed.

The sun climbed up in the sky higher and higher, and began to make not only his light but his heat manifest.

From time to time our friends cast anxious glances behind them to the southward, in the hope of seeing land, but there were no more signs of it than at first.

This was terribly disheartening.

Yet they would not give way until Sixteen-String Jack spoke, who said in a voice of grave concern—

"I am very hungry. Who put any provisions in the boat?"

There was a silence for a moment, and then Tom King said—

"That was forgotten. We are without provisions, and without water too."

"Then I trust we shall soon reach land."

"And so do I, indeed, or else our case will be most desperate. In the hurry and bustle of our departure, I forgot all about food and water."

"So did I!" exclaimed the others.

"And even if I had remembered it, I should not have known where to look to find what I wanted; and a vain and bootless search would probably only have had the effect of hindering us until too late."

"True—true!"

"Our best plan is to think as little of our convenience as we can, and make all speed for land, from which, surely, we cannot be very far distant now."

"I see no signs of it as yet, Tom," said Claude Duval, as shipping his oar he stood upright in the boat, and looked long and keenly in a southerly direction, "I see no signs of it yet."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure."

"Then we have no resource but to keep on as we have. Land must come in sight ere long."

"And soon I hope," said Jack, "for my arms and back are so stiff and tired, that I feel as though I could scarce draw another stroke."

"Mine are the same," said Claude Duval.

"Mine too," said Tom, "but it will never do to despair. Say, shall we rest awhile? One will be sufficient to keep the boat's head in its proper course, and we can drift with the tide."

His two comrades hesitated.

"You had better rest now," he added, than when you are too fatigued to feel the benefit of it."

There was sound wisdom in this, and they felt it, so without another word they shipped their oars and rested, while Tom kept the boat's head as near due north as he was able.

Oh! how sweet was that rest! but as their bodies grew cooler, another want began to make itself apparent, an awful want.

It was thirst!

But not one mentioned it. Neither said a word respecting the fierce thirst which burned within him.

They looked all round them, but they seemed to be the only living creatures on the sea. They were far from easy in their minds. Some English vessel might come up and put out a boat to take them aboard, but this they determined, if possible, to prevent.

It was for about the space of one half-hour that they rested, taking in turns the duty of guiding their little vessel, and then they fell to their work again.

They did not know how long it was since they left the ship, but fancied it must have been eight or ten hours, and if they were correct in this they ought ere now to have had a glimpse of land.

But nothing whatever of the kind was visible.

And now the sun reached almost the highest point in the heavens to which he would attain, and as the heavens were free from clouds, the heat that he sent down upon the heads of our friends seemed absolutely scorching.

It materially increased their thirst. Their tongues were dried up and parched, and their lips cracked, but there was nothing wherewith to moisten them but the salt sea, to drink of which would be nothing but utter madness.

The Young Pretender, perhaps through the influence which the conduct of those by whom he was surrounded afforded him, bore his sufferings with a fortitude which elicited the warmest admiration.

And so the time passed on—passed on without bringing to their sight that which they so longed to see.

Not a word was spoken.

They found that to utter words dried their mouths and aggravated their thirst, therefore they wisely abstained from speech.

In this condition things remained until the sun declined—and declined—until his disk almost dipped beneath the horizon.

It was now quite clear that either the captain was very far out of his reckoning when he said they were only thirty or forty miles from the coast of France, or else our friends, in some incomprehensible manner or other, had been sailing in a wrong direction.

Which of these two it was it would be impossible to say as yet.

The sun sank.

A cold wind seemed to sweep across the waters as soon as he disappeared, but the sudden chill which was felt by all, was to be attributed to the withdrawal of the light as much as anything.

Was another night of horrors to be passed through?

It seemed so.

The fair and beautiful daylight faded away.

One by one the stars came out, according to their different degrees of brightness, and they resumed their old mode of steering.

Rather anxiously they looked up to note the position of the north pole star.

They found it where they hoped to find it, and this set their minds tolerably well at rest that they had not come out of their course.

The captain, then, must have been in error about the distance.

It was impossible to say how far he was wrong. Perhaps they had still more than forty miles to go before they could touch land at its nearest point.

Should this be so, what were they to do for food and drink?

Already they thought the utmost limit of their endurance had been reached.

The cravings of hunger and thirst were really terrible.

A whole volume might be filled with the depiction of their sufferings.

To add, too, to their perplexities, the wind changed and began to blow fiercely from the north-east.

This increased their labour and made the task of keeping in their proper course a most difficult one. Each moment, too, the wind increased in violence, while clouds began rapidly to come up from the windward quarter.

Our friends marked these things with a feeling which might almost be called dismay.

They were no sailors, and quite inexperienced in nautical affairs.

Up came, too, the clouds with great swiftness and in prodigious quantities.

Very soon the whole face of the heavens was covered by them.

The stars were completely blotted out.

They had now no compass whatever to steer by.

The wind increased to a gale.

The waves swelled and rose to a great height, while their crests were tipped with a white foam, which glistened faintly through the darkness.

What were they to do now.

To hope to keep in their proper course, without some fixed object to guide them, was quite impossible, and, knowing it, did not even make the attempt.

Their whole attention, too, was demanded for the care of the boat, which every moment seemed in the most imminent danger of sinking.

They soon found they had but one chance of keeping her afloat, and that was to let her head be before the wind.

They scudded then before the wind with fearful speed.

Weak and exhausted, our friends threw their oars into the boat, and in a manner of speaking resigned themselves to that adverse fate which seemed to pursue them so malignantly.

Away, away they scudded with terrible velocity over the rapidly rolling foaming waves; but the little boat seemed strong and taut, and bounded freely on its way.

With anxious blood-shot eyes, throbbing pulses, burning brains, parched lips, and exhausted frames, the four inmates of the little boat endeavoured to pierce the obscurity around them.

But all was of one uniform blackness, and they could distinguish nothing.

That they were now going out of their course considerably, all felt certain. They might, perhaps, never come near the coast, but be drifted out to sea, and so be lost.

On board of a large ship the wind, that blew with so much force upon our friends, and seemed to them a hurricane, would but have been a breeze to waft them on their course.

At length the ears of Claude Duval heard a sound with which he was familiar.

It rose plainly above the wind.

"Breakers!" he shouted. "Breakers! we are near the land now with a vengeance!"

Looking in advance, they saw a white line of foam

The next moment they swept over it.

Fortunately at a lucky moment.

The boat was light, and they shipped one wave, but that was all.

They were now riding in comparatively smooth water.

The oars were resumed with a better spirit, and in a few minutes they felt the keel grate against the sand.

They were so exhausted and overcome that they could scarcely find strength to crawl out of the boat.

But at length they did so, and all four together made their way wearily towards a light which they saw in the far distance.

They had, indeed, reached France.

The Young Pretender quickly made himself known to the authorities, and then our friends had every attention paid to them which their condition demanded.

CHAPTER CCLXV.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS RESOLVE TO RETURN ONCE MORE TO ENGLAND, AND COMMIT A HIGHWAY ROBBERY ON THE CALAIS ROAD.

THERE is, or rather there was, at the period of which we are writing, behind the convent of Carmes Deschaux, Paris, a piece of waste ground much used as a spot where duels might be fought, or meetings take place without much fear of an interruption.

Indeed, it had rather a bad reputation, that convent of Carmes Deschaux, which was a stone edifice, rapidly crumbling to decay.

It was one morning rather more than a week after the events which we described at the end of the preceding chapter, that four persons stood upon this piece of waste ground behind the convent to which we have alluded.

Had any one seen them they would at once have come to the conclusion that a duel was about to be fought, for all were well armed and had serious countenances.

The time, too, would have favoured that supposition, for it was early morning, and the huge city yet slumbered.

The early rays of the morning sun fell with a beautiful and picturesque effect upon the moss-grown crumbling walls of the convent, and upon the attire of the four persons.

They were old acquaintances of the reader.

One of them stood a little apart from the other three, who he was addressing in a rich, calm, but sad voice.

His words will be quite enough to explain all, and we need do no more than simply chronicle them.

"My friends, for such from the first you have proved yourselves to be, I have appointed to meet you at this place in order that we may have a little conversation with each other, which shall be heard by no one but ourselves."

The others bowed, and the speaker continued—

"I need hardly tell you that I am a disappointed man. The dream of ambition wherewith I have beguiled myself is utterly dispersed. I have made, in the face of the most discouraging circumstances, an attempt to recover that which I cannot help considering my rightful inheritance. In that attempt you have aided me like brave men But fortune was against us. The enterprize failed. Never mind. Let us hear no more of it. We have escaped from our enemies. Our lives are yet our own. But it was not to tell you that which you must know well already that I called you here. No. It was in a few words to say that I must retire into an obscurity from which I can never emerge. I am poor. I have no money. All the wealth we possessed was lavished upon this enterprize, and has been lost. It is, then, very unwillingly that I confess that I have nothing wherewith I can reward you but my thanks. Those you can have. Believe me, they are most cordial and sincere ones. You have done all that men could do, and who could accomplish more? But I wish you to understand me. In this obscurity to which I am about to consign myself, I shall have only my poverty for my companion. I must, therefore, part from you, for when I withdraw from the world there is no reason why you should withdraw with me. It grieves me exceedingly that I should have to part with you—to dismiss you from my service without rewarding you. But it cannot be avoided. To your companion I owe my present life and liberty. The daring scheme which he had the boldness to attempt to carry out, and of the success of which he spoke so confidently, he may perhaps, though it is somewhat doubtful, bring to a successful termination. Should he do so, I shall consider the reward offered by the English government for my dead body as lawful spoil. Therefore, when I leave you, I must beg of you to return to England and rejoin your comrade. Should he have been lucky enough to obtain the reward, it is my particular desire that it may be divided equally among you. You will then have, each of you, enough to live upon, and you will be able to quit that mode of life which is derogatory to you. Courage and honour. I shall never forget you, and the zeal you have displayed in my cause, and I shall be eternally grateful for it.

The Pretender paused.

Respect forbade either of the three highwaymen to interrupt him, so he spoke on to the end in the manner we have recorded.

But though we set down the words, we are wholly unable to represent the tone of deep pathos in which they were uttered.

"We shall ever remember you," said Tom King, at length; "and you do not yourself regret the failure of this enterprize more than we do. But it is past. And now, my prince, allow me to dissent from you. Let us stay here until we hear from England."

"No; I am firm. I have decided upon my course. If you respect me, as I believe and hope you do, show that respect by not prolonging this to me most painful scene, but bid me farewell, as I requested."

"If such is your wish, prince, we of course obey."

"It is my wish. Farewell! farewell! We shall meet no more. Let me give each of you some souvenir by which you can remember me. The gifts are simple; would that they were of greater wealth."

He took four rings from the fingers on his left hand as he spoke, and gave one to each of our three friends.

Then, holding up the fourth, he said—

"This is for your companion. I must beg of you, when you rejoin him, to place it upon his finger in my stead, and with my best wishes. Now, farewell! Do not prolong the parting. Farewell!"

The Young Pretender turned rapidly away as he spoke and was quickly lost to sight round an angle of the building.

"And so this is the end," said Claude Duval, after a pause; "and we are free to return to England. Well, for my own part, I am glad of it."

"And so am I," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"I know you both joined the enterprise chiefly because Dick and I did so. Well, we have come to no great harm, as it so turns out, and there is a chance that we may come to some good, for I have great faith in Dick."

"So have I; and I should not wonder if, after all, he does not succeed in carrying off the reward."

"I trust he may, for the sake of us all; but I am afraid too many inquiries will be made, and too much delay will take place."

"Time will show us.

"I am anxious to know. There is nothing to keep us here; and since we are free to do so, let us set off for England at once."

"With all my heart."

"Come on, then!"

"Stop a moment. How are we off for funds to prosecute our journey?"

"Badly."

"I thought so."

"But how are we to remedy that? In the old fashion?"

"Why not?"

"I see no reason why not."

"Nor I."

"Nor I."

"But where are horses and accoutrements to be found?"

"Yes, that is a serious question."

"Not very, either. We present a tolerably decent exterior."

"Thanks to the prince, yes."

"But what has that to do with getting horses?"

"Everything. We will go to a livery stables somewhere and hire three for a day."

"A day?"

"Yes, and stick to them."

"Rather dangerous. We should soon have them in pursuit of us."

"What does that matter?"

"Oh! not much."

"We are going to make our way straight out of France, only stopping to pick up money by the way. We shall be off before they can catch us."

"Well, we will try it."

Having resolved upon this plan of action, the three highwaymen immediately bent their steps to the city, and soon reached a place where horses were let out on hire.

Being so early in the morning, there was no one about but the ostler in charge of the cattle, and our friends immediately propitiated him by giving him a liberal gratuity—so liberal, indeed, that he jumped to the conclusion they were gentlemen.

It was no unusual thing for strangers to come there and hire horses for a time, so that our friends got what they wanted with even less trouble than they had anticipated.

They were quickly in the saddle, and trotted off down the street.

The ostler stood at the entrance of the stable-yard and looked after them, jingling the money he had received from them in his pocket.

He little thought that he was never fated to see those horses again.

The steeds of which our friends had got possession seemed of excellent quality, but desiring to attract as little attention as possible, they trotted gently along the streets until Paris was left behind them.

Upon gaining the open country, they increased their speed, and stopped at the next town to refresh the horses while they purchased pistols and ammunition, for they were wholly unprovided with those necessaries.

They were easily obtained, though the people of whom they were purchased, finding them to be foreigners, charged them a most extortionate price.

Sixteen-String Jack, too, bought some cloth which he divided into three portions.

In these holes were cut to see through, and being placed upon their heads, and their hats used to keep them in their places, formed excellent masks.

Thus provided, they kept upon the road all the day, resting occasionally at quiet inns, so as not to knock the horses up too soon.

During daylight they offered no molestation to the persons they met upon the road, but when it grew dark they prepared for action.

A dispute then arose as to who should stop the next conveyance that looked worth the trouble.

All were anxious to have the honour.

Finding it could be agreed upon in no other way, they determined to draw lots for it.

The chance fell upon Claude Duval.

Scarcely had this little arrangement been made, than the rumbling of wheels upon the silent road came to their quick ears.

"Here goes," said Claude. "Keep back all of you, and do not interfere without you find my safety demands it."

He trotted forward towards the carriage, which was a huge affair drawn by two horses.

"Halte là!"* he shouted to the coachman, and in an agony of fright the driver pulled up in a moment.

"Au secours!"† he yelled at the top of his voice, but Claude discharged his pistol in the air, and the man fell to the ground as though dead.

The carriage window was let down at this moment, and a voice cried—

"Voleurs de grand chemin. Au secours. Au secours."‡

Claude was at the window in a moment, and holding his pistol in a threatening attitude, commanded silence.

He saw the occupants of the carriage were well dressed, and male and female.

CHAPTER CCLXVI.

MR. JOSIAH SKINNER UNDERGOES A LITTLE DISCIPLINE AT THE PUMP, AND IS DESERVEDLY WHIPPED OFF THE WINBERRY ESTATE.

THE expression of Mr. Josiah Skinner's face when Dick Turpin stepped so unexpectedly from behind the screen was really a sight to see. It was a most absolute picture of ludicrous fright and horror.

He released his hold upon the mysterious lady instantly, and alarmed excessively at Dick's hostile appearance, sank in a collapsed condition in the chair which was nearest to him.

"Now, Mr. Skinner, if such is your name, be good enough to explain the meaning of your intrusion here, and when you have done that you will have to account to me for your behaviour to this lady here!"

"Oh! I shall, shall I?" asked Mr. Skinner, assuming a courage though he felt it not. "I shall, shall I."

"You will, and bear in mind I am not to be intimidated by you. What is the meaning of your intrusion here?"

"Here's my authority," said Mr. Skinner, slapping the letter he held in his hand in the most approved melodramatic fashion. "Here's my authority to enter this house and to take possession of the same."

He rose from his chair as he spoke, and elevated the document in his hand.

"Oh! indeed," said Dick. "That authorises you to enter here, does it? We'll just see."

As he spoke, and before Mr. Skinner could have divined his intentions, Turpin snatched the paper out of his hand.

The attorney uttered a howl, and made an attempt to recover it, but Dick was not so easily taken by surprise.

He took a pistol from his coat pocket, and deliberately cocking it, he held it in the face of the man of law.

"Sit down," he cried, "and don't move, or so sure as this is a loaded pistol you are a dead man."

"A dead man! Oh! lor!" ejaculated Mr. Skinner, who had a mortal dread of firearms. "I'll sit down, sir; I'll sit down."

Dick opened the paper, and saw it was signed and sealed in a very imposing and legal manner; but as for the contents, they were a little beyond him, and, indeed, he made no attempt to interpret the mass of legal jargon.

"And so this is your authority, is it?"

"It is."

"And am I to understand that it is by virtue of this you act?"

"You are."

"And that if you had not this document you could not act."

"Certainly not, it would be informal."

"Ahem! Thank you. Now, Mr. Skinner, attorney-at-law, what do you think of that?"

As he asked this question, Dick Turpin rapidly and skilfully tore the paper to shreds, and then threw them in the lawyer's face.

"Murder! Murder!" he shouted, "Oh! murder!"

"Sit still and hold your row!" cried Dick, again presenting his pistol.

Mr. Skinner sank back.

"Now how can you act? Where's your authority?"

"Murder! murder! I have that paper, I legally take possession of this house and all that belongs to it, in the name of my client, to whom they have been assigned."

* Halt there

† Help

‡ Highwaymen! Help! help!

"Who is your client?"

"Mr. Adrian Winberry."

"Oh! you avow that?"

"Avow it? Of course I do."

"Very well. Where is he now?"

"I decline to answer that question."

"I daresay you do, but it is all one."

"How all one?"

"I know."

"You know, do you?"

"Yes I know."

"And where is he, pray?"

"In Newgate, committed to take his trial on a charge of murder."

"Pho!—pho!"

"Which he committed."

"Eh!—eh! Committed? Take care what you say. You may have to prove your words."

"I am quite ready to do so."

"Eh! what?" ejaculated Mr. Skinner, a look of alarm overspreading his countenance. "Ready to prove that he committed the murder?"

"Is what you have just attempted to do quite legal?"

"Quite legal?" Of course it is. Why?"

"Nothing. Only it is a good thing for you if it is. Now, why did you inquire so particularly whether there was anybody in this house besides the lady?"

"That's my business."

"It may be, but it looks to me as though you were doing something not exactly on the square. Now, suppose any one else had been in the house, should you have taken possession?"

"I—a—I—why—oh! yes—that is—no! Of course I should."

"Very good, that is quite clear and satisfactory."

"Of course it is."

"As you very justly observe, of course it is. Now, Mr. Skinner, just listen to me."

"I'll listen; but I am not going to be bullied, I can tell you that," exclaimed the lawyer, once more endeavouring to show a valorous front.

"It seems quite clear to me that your authority for acting in the manner you have was never very good, and now you have no authority whatever. And now that we have settled that part of the business, just look here. You came like an unprincipled villain as you are, the agent or tool of a villain, an unprincipled villain. You thought to find this house in the possession of this lady, and intended to abate into it. But I am here to defeat your abominable schemes. I have told you that you should answer to me for your conduct, and so you shall."

"Mercy, mercy! I assure you, sir, that it is quite right and legal—quite right and legal. Mercy!"

"Silence!" said Dick, who had caught the unfortunate lawyer by the nape of his neck. "Silence! You shall not depart hence until you have received condign punishment."

"What would you do with him?" asked the lady.

"Leave him to me. The steward has gone to London. What other male domestics have you got in the house?"

"The butler and the keeper."

"Capital; they will do."

"What for?"

"Call them."

The lady did so.

The two men hastily obeyed the summons, for they found something unusual was taking place, and were on the alert accordingly.

"You will please obey me," said Dick.

The lady nodded her head assentingly.

"What is it, sir?"

"You see this man. He has offered an insult to the lady here, and has illegally tried to take possession of your master's property; and would, no doubt, have succeeded, had it not been for my presence."

Mr. Winberry was much loved and respected by his servants, and they gave a bound forward, which terrified Mr. Skinner exceedingly.

The intelligence of their master's death had not been imparted to them for several reasons.

"Where is master?" they asked.

"He is dead," said Dick.

"Dead!" they exclaimed, horror-struck. "How?—when?—and where?"

"That you shall know presently, but not in the presence of this man. He has endeavoured, however, to despoil Miss Blanche of her father's possessions. Now, what does he deserve?"

"Let me get at 'un," said the keeper, "and I'll show him what's what."

"Murder!"

"Stop a minute," said Dick; "have you got such a thing as a horsepond?"

"Yes! yes!"

"Duck him in it, then!"

"I am afraid there is not water enough."

"Oh!"

The lawyer's countenance brightened.

"But there is a beautiful pump."

"A pump!"

"Yes."

"The very thing."

"Oh! it is such a pump! It draws nearly two gallons at every stroke."

"Excellent."

"And then the water!"

"What of the water?"

"Why, it comes out a well that is I don't know how many yards deep!"

"Yes—yes."

"And I do believe it's colder than ice."

"Capital! Show the way to the pump, and I'll bring the lawyer. We will have him under it for half an hour."

"Bravo! Hurrah!" shouted the servants, in an ecstacy of delight.

"Murder! murder!" yelled the lawyer, making frantic struggles to escape his impending fate. "Murder! murder!"

But it was all in vain.

The lawyer was but a diminutive, shrivelled-up specimen of humanity, and possessed of about as much strength as a cat.

The grasp Dick had of him was a tight one, and he could no more wriggle himself out of it than he could fly.

His struggles were, however, most desperate.

He clung frantically to every object he came to in his way, movable or fixed.

To prevent this confusion, Dick took hold of him with his other hand, and this time by the seat of his breeches.

He shifted his hold from his neck to his coat-collar, and fairly carried him before him into the hall.

He kicked, he writhed, he swore, but it was all to no use.

Out of the back-door he went into the yard, and at length the pump was reached.

Dick deposited him, breathless and exhausted, in the capacious trough beneath.

"Now keep him there, my men," he said, "and I will use the pump."

"All right, sir," said the servants, seizing the unfortunate Mr. Skinner, and compelling him most reluctantly to remain in his uncomfortable position.

Dick went to the pump-handle.

It was a massive affair, and of great length.

He raised it, and brought it down with hearty goodwill.

He was rewarded by seeing an immense gush of water follow the application, and certainly when the keeper said two gallons were thrown at every stroke, he did not much exaggerate.

Mr. Skinner howled and screamed, but Dick was deaf to his cries.

Up and down, up and down went the pump-handle, as fast as his muscles could make it, and he never paused until, utterly exhausted, he was unable to work it any longer.

CHAPTER CCLXVII.

DICK TURPIN MAKES A STARTLING COMMUNICATION TO MR. JOHN KERSEY.

MR. SKINNER was thoroughly exhausted, too.

When the two men released him, he never offered to move, but lay like a limp piece of rag in the trough under the pump.

The dressing he had had was a very severe one.

It was a cold winter's morning in the first place, and the air was quite frosty.

The water came from a very great depth, and was proportionably cold.

"What shall we do with him now, sir?"

"I think he has almost had enough."

"But he must not stop here."

"No, he must not. Run into the hall and fetch a horse-whip, and whip him off the estate."

The alacrity with which they ran off showed their extreme willingness to obey this order.

Indeed, they enjoyed the sport mightily.

Back they came, cracking the whips most formidably.

Still Mr. Skinner did not offer to stir.

The keeper, however, upon reaching the pump, gave his whip a "flick," as he called it, and the extreme point of the lash caught the lawyer on the tender part of his person.

Mr. Skinner had been in a state of partial insensibility up to that moment, but that roused him.

He uttered a most awful yell, and scrambled to his feet.

Crack—crack! went the two whips, as soon as he was fairly on his legs.

His natural impulse was to run, which he did with a speed that was really astonishing.

The two servants followed, answering his cries for mercy with loud peals of laughter.

Away they went, the lawyer quite blinded with the water which ran down out of his hair into his eyes, bounding on like some india-rubber ball.

The servants kept well up to him, and when he flagged, a stroke with the whip accelerated his speed in a manner wonderful to behold.

More than once he caught his foot against or fell over some obstruction, and on such occasions he really did not stop to pick himself up, but kept rolling on and on until he rolled on to his legs again.

Dick stood on the steps leading into the hall, from which elevated spot he had an excellent view of the chase for a long time.

The men literally obeyed the orders they had received. They whipped him off the grounds.

They got him at last to the high-road, but he was in a meadow, and to reach it he would have to surmount a very high and very thick hedge.

Away he went at it, never seeing what was in his course until he was close to it, and then he gave a frantic bound to get over.

But he fell short of the mark.

He alighted in the most prickly part of the hedge.

Here, to the intense delight of the servants, he struggled and fought like a madman, until at length he rolled into the dusty high-road in a most deplorable condition.

Unfortunately for him just as he reached this place, which he did with a bang sufficient to break every bone and knock all the wind out of his body, there came along a drove of boys who were on their way to the village to school.

Directly they saw him they set up a yell.

The lawyer heard it.

The pursuers were close behind, he thought.

Up he scrambled.

Bruised, covered with weals from the whip, soaking with water, caked with dirt, and his clothes hanging about him in shreds, he looked just like an animated scarecrow.

The boys, astounded at the sight, pursued him along the road to the village, pelting him with stones as they went.

On reaching the houses, however, he saw the door of one standing open, and made a rush into it.

"Murder!" he yelled. "Call the police! Call the police! Murder, murder!"

It was into a little cottage that he rushed, and the woman who occupied it was busily engaged in scrubbing the floor on her hands and knees.

At this sudden intrusion her fears and alarm were so great that she put her head into the pail of water instead of the scrubbing-brush.

The neighbours soon came up, and among them, of course, the parish constable and beadle, who put an end to Mr. Skinner's persecutions.

But we have other and more important matters to attend to, and therefore direct the attention of the reader to the proceedings of Dick Turpin.

When he had watched Mr. Skinner until he could see him no longer, he turned into the hall again, and made his way to the room in which he had left the lady.

To his surprise he found her seated near the fire, and crying bitterly.

She looked up as she saw him enter, and, mastering her emotion, said, in a voice broken by sobs—

"Oh! what is to be the end of this? I am terrified to death. Where is Blanche? Oh! I shudder when I think what may be her fate."

"Calm yourself," said Dick. "Calm yourself, I beg. This violent agitation will do nothing but unnerve you. I pray you now be calm. There is no fresh danger."

The lady dried her tears and looked at Dick.

"I do not know what I should have done," she said, "had not chance thrown you in my way. Think of this morning."

"Yes, the rascally attorney has met with the treatment he so richly merited. He will keep his distance of this place for the future, I'll warrant."

"But what do you understand by his presence?"

"I think I can easily explain it."

"Pray do so."

"Adrian Winberry would send for this man in Newgate. He would tell him that this charge against him is a device to keep him from an inheritance, and, to prove his words, would show him the deed which his brother signed. He would then employ this lawyer to abate, that is, to enter upon possession of these premises on his behalf, in order to prevent any one else doing so, for 'Possession,' as the proverb says, 'is nine points of the law.'"

"I see."

"Upon further thoughts, however, I am inclined to think that Adrian Winberry has taken this Mr. Skinner more into his confidence than I at first imagined, as some of his words prove. If so, then the punishment he has received is indeed most richly merited."

"It is a terrible affair."

"It is, indeed: but I trust I shall be able to set it right. But, hark! What is that? More visitors?"

At this moment there came a loud knocking at the front door.

"It is, perhaps, Shockley returned from London with Mr. John Kersey, the lawyer."

"Most likely. I had forgotten that."

The lady was right, for the steward soon appeared, ushering in the individual mentioned.

Mr. Kersey was a man of about fifty years of age.

His hair, what little there was upon his head, was quite white.

His face had a kind benevolent look, and this was most perceivable in his eyes.

But yet he was a man of acumen and intelligence.

Dick was favourably impressed with his appearance directly he saw him.

He felt that he was a man to be trusted.

"You have sent for me, miss," he said politely.

"Yes, sir, upon very serious business. I pray you be seated."

Shockley handed Mr. Kersey a chair, and then left the room.

"This gentleman," said the lady, indicating Turpin, "will make you acquainted with the nature of the business upon which we have summoned you for your assistance and advice."

The lawyer bowed, and assumed an attentive attitude.

Dick then related those facts with which the reader is already acquainted, and which it will be unnecessary for us to repeat.

We ought to observe that he most carefully concealed who he really was.

"This is a very serious business, indeed," said the lawyer. "My father used to say that Adrian would come to no good. I have seen the account of the murder, but never knew until this moment that my client William was the murdered man."

"Yet such is the case."

"And you saw this murder committed, you say?"

"I did.

"Then why did you not proclaim at once all you knew, and step forward boldly."

[THE ENCOUNTER BETWEEN CLAUDE DUVAL AND THE GENDARME.]

"There are reasons."

"No matter, you must give your evidence. It will be indispensable."

"Stop a moment, sir!"

"For what?"

"I will tell you. I believe you are much attached to this family."

"I am."

"And you would do a great many things to benefit it."

"All in my power."

"Enough. Would you receive a communication in confidence, and keep it inviolably secret, provided that by so doing you perform an inestimable service to your clients?"

"I would, indeed. Try me! You can trust me."

"I think I can, sir. Well, then, the reason that I did not come forward is because I am inimical to the laws of this land."

"Inimical!"

"There is a reward offered for my apprehension."

The lawyer looked very grave.

"I have it in my power to save this family, to defeat the machinations of a villain. Will you listen to me? Will you receive, in solemn confidence, the communication I am about to make to you? Answer me, yes or no!"

"I will. I may have scruples, but the magnitude of what is at stake is enough to induce me to set them aside."

"I am glad to hear it."

"Now then, sir, for your communication."

"Prepare yourself for a surprise—an overwhelming surprise; and in the astonishment which my avowal will elicit, do not forget the terms under which I make it to you."

Mr. Kersey looked rather anxiously at Dick, as he replied—

"Begin, sir. I am ready."

"What I have to say will take but a moment to utter."

"What is it?"

"I AM DICK TURPIN, THE HIGHWAYMAN!"

CHAPTER CCLXVIII.

MR. KERSEY RECOVERS FROM HIS ALARM, AND GIVES HIS ATTENTION TO DICK TURPIN.

It is quite certain that no other announcement would have produced such a startling effect upon Mr. John Kersey as the one did which ended the last chapter.

He opened his mouth to its full extent, and drew his breath in strange, hurried gasps.

Had he been standing, he would, doubtless, in his astonishment, have started back several paces. As it was, he gave his chair an impulse backwards, and its legs grated as it moved over the polished floor.

Dick Turpin enjoyed the amazement of the lawyer excessively, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that he controlled himself from laughing aloud.

Mr. Kersey's speech entirely deserted him.

His first shock of astonishment over, he endeavoured to say something, but the effort was a complete failure.

His lips moved, but no sound came forth from them.

His eyes glared.

"Come, come, Mr. Kersey," said Dick, at length, "do not look so much alarmed and astonished. There is no occasion for it, I assure you. But let me remind you of the conditions under which the avowal was made."

Mr. Kersey spoke at last.

"Do—do you really mean to say that you are the des—no, I mean the noto—that is, cele"——

"If you mean am I really and truly Dick Turpin, the highwayman, I say yes."

"Oh!"

"Remember your promise."

"I will, but"——

"But what?"

"How came you here in this place, and how came this lady to know you?"

"I have already told you, Mr. Kersey, that, pursued by my foes, I took refuge in a deserted and reputed haunted house in Birdcage-walk, St. James's-park. While there, as I related to you at length, I heard the conversation which took place between the half-brothers, and witnessed the murder of the elder by the younger."

"Yes, I know all that."

"And do you clearly comprehend it?"

"Most clearly. It would be impossible to mistake it."

"I am glad of that. You understand what I have since learned in London?"

"Fully."

"Then, Mr. Kersey, the reason we have sent for you is, we want to know our best course of action. Give us your advice as to the plan to be adopted to preserve these properties and recover Blanche, and how to punish the perfidious half-brother for his black-hearted villainy."

"It is a matter requiring much deliberation," said Mr. Kersey, "and the circumstances are altogether of so extraordinary a nature that I own myself completely at fault."

"I like you all the better for making that admission," said Turpin, bluntly, "but you must think how much more you would have been at fault had it not been for my presence here, and having accidentally witnessed what I have."

"True, and yet there lies the difficulty."

"In what way?"

"Ahem—well—a"——

"Speak plainly, Mr. Kersey. You need not be afraid of offending me by what you say. Pray speak plainly."

"Well, then, I will. You cannot very well walk into the witness-box, and give your evidence."

"No, that is the worst of it."

"I presume you would not care to do that?"

"Not if it could be avoided."

"Certainly not. But supposing that it could not be avoided?"

"Why, then," said Dick, in a tone calm but resolute, and which left no doubt of its sincerity behind, "then I should not scruple to step forward in the cause of justice, let the consequence to myself be what it might."

"Is this possible?" said Mr. Kersey, full of admiration.

"I fully mean what I say; but of course you will understand that I should do this not from choice, but from necessity."

"Certainly."

"The peril to myself would be doubtless great; but I should think the sacredness of my cause would shield me from capture."

Mr. Kersey shook his head.

"I don't know that," he said. "I am afraid not."

"No, no," said the lady, "I will not permit that. Some other means less dangerous to yourself must be found. I cannot consent that for our sakes you should peril your life, as you would do if you were to act in the manner you propose."

"Can any other means be found?" said Dick. "If so, then no one would be more glad to embrace them than myself, for I confess myself to be by no means tired of my existence, though in it there is little of happiness and enjoyment. However, that is neither here nor there."

"It is not."

"Mr. Kersey."

"Sir."

"You have been put into possession of all the facts of the case. You agree with me that it would be little short of madness for me to make my appearance in the witness-box."

"I do."

"But you also agree with me that it would never do to let Adrian Winberry escape the punishment which is his due for lack of sufficient evidence; nor would it do to let his nefarious scheme of taking possession of this place succeed."

"I cannot do otherwise than agree with you."

"I have been told, Mr. Kersey, that you are the solicitor to this family, and that your father had that situation before you. Such being the case, you cannot fail to feel a more than common interest in the welfare of its members."

"I cannot, sir."

"For myself, I hardly know why I feel the very great interest I do; probably I could find a cause for it in the strange manner I have been mixed up in it, and the detestation I feel for the monstrous villainy of Adrian Winberry."

"Just so, sir."

"Then, Mr. Kersey, I once more ask you to advise us. I am willing to do all, but yet I do not wish to expose myself unnecessarily."

"I think I may venture to say that I comprehend you perfectly in all that you have said. The worst of it is, we have so little time before us."

"You are right; the trial will take place to-morrow."

"I am aware of it. You see that leaves us with hardly any time before us."

"Well, Mr. Kersey, what is your advice?"

"I must really refrain from saying just at present. I wish I could advise you, but at this moment I am unable—that is to say, I do not see how anything could be proved against Adrian. To be sure, he might be convicted of the murder, but that is not all. No one saw him commit the crime, with the exception of yourself and his two accomplices. Now, if those two men—and from what I can hear, I think they are unscrupulous enough—if, I say, they choose to deny that Adrian had anything to do with the transaction, we shall obliged to call upon you for your evidence."

"I see all that quite clearly. But would my evidence be received?"

"The question may be raised. Have you ever been convicted of any offence?"

"Once in my boyhood."

"That is a pity. What was its nature?"

"Nothing important. I was tried for deer-stealing, and at the time of my conviction, considerable doubts were raised whether I really was or was not guilty."

"And were you?"

"What?"

"Guilty?"

"That is almost beside the question, I think."

"So it is. But were you convicted?"

"I was."

"Then your guilt or innocence don't much matter. I don't think that will damage your evidence in any way."

"I am glad of that. And now there is one thing more."

"Name it."

"Could I not give my evidence by proxy?"

"No; certainly not."

Turpin was silent a moment. Then he added—

'But suppose it was stated to the court that there was an important witness in this case whose evidence would be sufficient to prove the guilt of the prisoner, but circumstances prevented that witness from standing before the court and delivering his testimony."

"Well, sir."

"Do you think in that case the court would be induced to throw the shield of its protection before this witness, and allow him to enter the witness-box and give his evidence, and after doing so, permit him to depart unmolested?"

"I cannot precisely answer that question. I do not know whether it would be in the power of any judge in this kingdom to do such an act."

"Well, then, suppose the reasons for the non-appearance of the witness which I just now uttered were given to the court, and that you produced a document signed by me, which contained a narrative of all that had taken place, do you think that document would be received as evidence?"

The lawyer shook his head.

"I am afraid not, and more especially in a case of murder."

"And so, you think, neither of the proposals which I have made practicable or feasible?"

"I could hardly go so far as to say they were, not but I am afraid that they are not."

Turpin looked disappointed, and a brief silence ensued, in which all those three who were present at this singular conference gave themselves up to deep and earnest thought.

Dick was the first to speak.

"But, Mr. Kersey, if you think that neither of my schemes will answer, there is no reason why they should not successively be tried."

"None whatever."

"Then by all means let them be tried. If they are successful, then so much the better. If they fail, we shall be none the worse off, and the last resource will still remain."

"Very true. But I should be sorry to see you driven to it, because your liberty, and necessarily your life, would most certainly be the forfeit. The judge would have no power to prevent your capture."

CHAPTER CCLXIX.

MR. KERSEY AND DICK TURPIN COME TO A DEFINITE UNDERSTANDING.

DICK TURPIN'S lips were curled with a dissenting smile when Mr. Kersey said that his capture must of necessity follow his appearance in the witness-box; but, except by this smile, he did not in any way contradict what he said.

As to the latter part of his speech, that might have been, and doubtless was, correct.

"If the object so much wished for cannot be attained by any other means, I am willing to run the risk."

"But, my dear sir—"

"Mr. Kersey!"

"Listen to me"——

"Nay, sir; you listen to me."

"I will, since you wish it; but"——

"No buts. As you must already know, I am a man of rather an uncommon kind. I am one who never suffer danger to dismay him or turn him aside from the execution of any purpose upon which he had determined.

"That may be; but still I consider it to be the duty of every one to preserve himself."

"And so do I," said the lady, "and I will never consent to this sacrifice, for I can call it by no other name."

"It is a sacrifice," said Mr. Kersey, "and however much you may be admired for making it, or offering to make it, still I think it is one which ought not to be permitted."

"I am sure it ought not."

"I am in your hands," said Turpin, "and nothing is further from my wishes than to act contrary to your inclinations. I have merely made these proposals; and if anything else can be suggested, I shall be pleased, for you must not think that I wish to expose myself for the mere sake of doing so."

"That is a very sensible speech," said Mr. Kersey. "It seems very strange, I can assure you, sir, for me to be sitting down in your society; and I can hardly bring myself to believe that I am awake or in my senses."

"I dare say it does seem strange, sir. I have trusted you. I have taken your word; I shall rely upon that as a guaranty that you will not betray me."

"I am offending against the law," said Mr. Kersey, with a smile. "I ought, if I did the strict letter of my duty, to denounce you with all speed possible to justice; but, then, circumstances alter cases."

"You are right, sir."

"You can trust me, then, and safely."

"I believe you. I came to the conclusion that I could do so as soon as I saw you. Your countenance is the countenance of a man who can be trusted."

"You flatter me."

"Not at all—not at all. And now, Mr. Kersey, should you like a few hours for reflection? If so, I am sure you can have it."

"Oh! yes, Mr. Kersey," said the young lady.

"No, no; I shall not require it. I should like to find some other means of bringing Adrian to punishment, but I am afraid I shall not be able. The trial coming on so quickly as it does, leaves us no time for deliberation, and very little for action. With your permission I will return to London and hold a consultation with one of my brethren."

"But, Mr. Kersey"——

"Rely upon my discretion. I will take care that you are not jeoparded in any way."

"I spoke for fear you should forget my peculiar position."

"I will recollect it. I shall have to instruct counsel; indeed, I shall not have a spare moment from now to the commencement of the trial."

"You will not, indeed."

"Both of you had better see me to-morrow morning, before the commencement of the trial."

"Very well, sir."

"And you," added Mr. Kersey, addressing himself more especially to Dick, "I should recommend you to employ all the time between now and then in writing down on paper all that has taken place, omitting no particular, no matter how trivial. We may have no want for such a document, but still it will be far the best to be prepared with it in case it should be required."

"I will sit down and do it immediately after your departure, and will make it as complete as I can. But there is one thing more before we part."

"What is that?"

"Where are we to meet in the morning?"

"At my house."

"Your private residence?"

"Yes."

"Where is it situated?"

"No. 7, Red Lion-square."

"I shall recollect: and what time shall we be there?"

"Not later than eight, I think."

"Oh! yes."

"Well, eight be it, then. And now, Mr. Kersey, it so happens that, being in my way a rather celebrated character, I am known by sight to many persons in London."

"I daresay."

"You will, then, I hope, see the necessity of having no prying domestics about."

"You can leave all that to me with perfect confidence," said Mr. Kersey. "At eight o'clock to-morrow morning I shall be at my front door waiting to receive you."

"I shall be there."

"With this I think all is quite arranged."

"I think so."

"Do you, lady?" asked Mr. Kersey, turning to the mysterious female, who had taken so little part in what had been going forward.

"I shall leave that for you two to decide, as I have all the other," she said. "I consider you are by far more competent to do it than I am."

"Well—well; but you will be at my house in the morning?"

"I will."

"That is enough. And now, could Blanche be found, all would go well. The overthrow of the villain Marlac will be complete; but I am afraid"——

"What—oh! what?"

"That, standing as she did in the way of his possessions, and likely as she would be to interfere with all his future projects, that he has disposed her somewhere in so safe a place that we shall have great trouble in finding her, if we ever succeed."

"I will find her," said Dick, "if she is upon the earth. I have previously determined to strain every nerve to do so."

"Then all I can say is, may you be successful. It is monstrous that a father should be ruthlessly murdered and a daughter abducted from her home."

"It is; but the crime shall not go unpunished."

"I am glad to hear you say as much, for I can tell you are a man who always carries out what he resolves upon. From this day I shall alter the opinion I had formed of you."

"Doubtless you believed I was all that is infamous and bad in human nature. If so, I rejoice at having the opportunity of showing you I am not."

"I am already satisfied; and now let me depart. You set about performing your part, and I will do the same."

The lawyer then exchanged farewells with the unknown lady and Dick Turpin.

Shockley, the steward, drove him back to town.

Soon after his departure, the lady had brought into the apartment where Turpin was sitting materials for writing, and left him to commence his task.

Now Turpin had received but a small amount of education. To be sure, he could read and sign his own name; but his accomplishments did not go much further than that.

When it came to writing down, and succinctly and deliberately writing all that had taken place, he found himself completely at fault, and he spoilt many sheets of paper in the attempt.

At length, after about an hour had been spent in this fruitless manner, the lady entered to see what progress he had made.

"I have undertaken what I cannot perform," he said, "without you will lend me your assistance."

"In what way can I assist you?"

"If it would not be too much trouble, I should like to tell you what occurred, and for you to write it down correctly."

"I shall have no objection," replied the lady; "indeed, I consider myself bound to do all I can in return for the services you have rendered me."

"Do not speak about that."

"I will not, since you do not wish it. But if I write this, you will have to read it over and sign it."

"So I am aware, and I can do that."

"Very well. Let us commence at once."

The lady sat down, and as Turpin spoke, put down upon paper one of the most extraordinary adventures he had ever met with in the whole of his career.

As Turpin entered into every detail, it of course occupied a great deal of time, and it was dusk before the lady's task was finished.

It is not necessary to give the contents of this document, because the reader is already acquainted with every detail which it contained.

When finished, however, the lady read it over aloud to Dick from the beginning to the end, and having pronounced it quite correct in every particular, the highwayman affixed his name to it.

The evening meal was then prepared, and Dick did full justice to it.

When over, he made his way to the stables, where his mare was placed, and as he had expected, found she had been treated with every care, and that, had he done it himself, she could not be more to his satisfaction than she was.

The groom was there, and Dick gave him a liberal present, for he considered the man fully deserved it.

Then, returning to the hall, he found the lady in the same apartment as that in which he had left her, but he could see that she was suffering greatly from fatigue.

At his request she retired to her apartment, for in the morning they would have to rise early to be in London at sight.

She was glad enough to yield to his request, and soon afterwards Shockley, the steward, entered, and showed Dick to a sleeping chamber where he could pass the night.

Dick was very weary and greatly in want of repose, and besides which, he wished to recuperate his energies as much as possible, to be in readiness for the ensuing day.

It must not be thought that Dick either underrated or was blind to the amount of danger he would incur.

CHAPTER CCLXX.

DICK TURPIN AND THE MYSTERIOUS LADY SET OUT FOR LONDON, AND REACH IN SAFETY THE LAWYER'S RESIDENCE IN RED LION-SQUARE.

Long before daybreak Dick Turpin awoke.

The lamp, which he had left upon the dressing-table, was burning dimly.

A momentary confusion followed his awakening, for he was at a loss to think where he was.

That feeling, however, quickly vanished, and springing from his couch, he trimmed the lamp, and looked at the time.

It was just five.

Even as he looked there came a faint tapping at the door, and the voice of old Shockley, the steward, said—

"Rise, sir, please. Breakfast is ready, and we shall have to start to London soon."

Dick replied, and hastily apparelled himself.

He was one who, in a general way, bestowed but little trouble upon his personal appearance.

The present occasion, however, proved an exception to the general rule.

He took the utmost pains possible with his toilette, and as there was every convenience necessary to the purpose ready to his hand, he succeeded marvellously.

Still he did not consume much time over the process, but when he descended, the unknown lady was waiting for him to make his appearance.

The breakfast was soon despatched, and then they prepared for their journey.

The care of the equipage was given to Shockley, who, as before, acted as coachman.

Dick rode inside.

It was barely light, and bitterly cold when they started.

But as they travelled on, the dawn advanced with rapid strides, though the sun did not show his face above the horizon until they had almost reached London.

When he did break forth the light he gave was trifling, for his brilliancy was hidden by the fuliginous exhalations which hung upon the horizon.

The time passed quickly enough, for during the whole of it, from the time they started, the two strangely-assorted occupants of the carriage were busy in talking over the momentous events of the day.

Punctually at eight o'clock, the vehicle drew up before the residence of Mr. Kersey, in Red Lion-square.

According to the promise which he had made, the lawyer was standing upon his threshold waiting to receive them.

Shockley got down off the box—it was a plain travelling carriage—and opened the door.

Previous to his doing so, Dick had taken a cautious peep all round him, and, to his satisfaction, no one was in sight.

He alighted, therefore, with confidence, and, turning round, assisted his companion to alight also.

To cross the pavement and pass through the lawyer's door did not take a moment.

According to instructions which had been given him before starting, Shockley took the horses to livery-stables close by.

Mr. Kersey closed the door behind his strange guests without uttering a word, and then led them across the passage to a room which he had had fitted up like an office, and where he transacted a great deal of private business when he was at home.

To the intense surprise of Turpin, here was seated a gentleman, who rose from his seat as soon as they entered.

He was thin and pale, and seemed at first sight to be sadly deficient in physical energy, but that was far more in appearance than in reality.

A second glance would have shown that, though the frame was thin, yet it was wiry and muscular.

But his head was really remarkable.

Across his forehead, from temple to temple, it was an enormous width, and was circular in shape; but this width of forehead was in some measure taken off by its height, which was proportioned to it.

From this great width at the temples, his face tapered off like the two sides of a triangle, of which his chin formed the apex.

His eyes were small and deeply set.

The frontal bone projected over them to an unusual distance, and his cheek bones were high and prominent, so that the eyes seemed literally buried in two deep sockets.

But, nevertheless, despite the smallness of their size, and the peculiarity of their position, they were intensely bright and piercing

They had in them always a particular sparkle when they were directed to anything.

The above outline—for description it cannot be called—imperfect as it is, will serve to give the reader some general idea of what kind of man it was with whom Dick so suddenly and unexpectedly found himself face to face.

He turned an inquiring glance towards Mr. Kersey, who shut the office-door, and said, indicating the singular-looking individual we have mentioned—

"This is Mr. Serjeant Nuttall, the gentlemen to whom is intrusted the case for the prosecution."

Dick bowed.

Mr. Kersey saw that the highwayman was not at ease, so he added—

"I have had a long conference with him, and placed him in possession of all the facts which you communicated to me yesterday. I have also entrusted him with the secret of who you are. But you need fear nothing. It was indispensable, and I obtained from him a promise that he would keep your secret, and do nothing whatever calculated to cause your capture."

Mr. Nuttall had risen when Dick entered the room, but it was more out of habit than politeness and respect that he did so.

He resumed his seat immediately, and fixed his sparkling eyes upon our hero's countenance, as though he would read him to the soul.

It was evident that he was not inclined to be very friendly.

The words that he first spoke, however, will serve better than anything else to indicate the state of his feelings.

"Mr. Turpin," he said, "what my learned brother has just stated is quite correct in every particular. I have given such a promise as he has mentioned, and I shall consider myself in honour bound to keep it; but I can assure you that nothing but the sacred cause of justice, and the desire I feel that the guilty should be punished, would have induced me either to give or make such a promise."

"I am content, sir, so that you do keep it. Of course, I desire to do this service, and preserve my liberty at the same time: though, as for your motives, they are not of the slightest consequence to me."

Mr. Nuttall was too old a practitioner to allow anything to disconcert him; and though he winced under Dick's words, and the half-contemptuous manner in which they were uttered, yet he did not permit the muscles of his face to indicate it in any way.

He spoke, and the tones of his voice were as calm and unruffled as it was possible for any human being to be under the least exciting circumstances.

"I can hold out no hope to you of retaining your liberty. If you come into court it will be entirely at your own risk; I shall be quite powerless to assist you in any way."

"I cannot help that, sir. I do not wish to expose myself, as you can readily believe; but I am resolved to do so should there be no other means of making the heinous guilt of Adrian Winberry apparent."

"Much as I may and do detest you in your general character," said Mr. Nuttall, "still, in this instance, your behaviour is so praiseworthy and noble that I almost forget who you are; and, indeed, it seems quite inconsistent and impossible for a highwayman to speak as you have just spoken, and announce his intention of acting in the manner you have just stated."

"I am glad that I have been the means of showing you that a highwayman is not wholly and utterly bad—that he has his natural impulses as well as others, and perhaps as good a notion of honour as many of those have who rank themselves above him."

"Come, come, gentlemen," interposed Mr. Kersey, "we ought not to go to work in this spirit, we ought not, indeed. Mr. Nuttall, pray bear in mind what Mr. Turpin is about to do; and let me ask you, where could you find any one who would have come forward and acted as he has offered, and I firmly believe intends to do."

"I cannot withhold my admiration of his conduct," said Mr. Nuttall; "it would be impossible to do so; and I shall feel heartily sorry if any harm comes to him."

"That is better. Now let us proceed. Have you the document written which I spoke to you about?"

"Yes; here it is."

"And does it contain all the particulars?"

"I think it contains them all."

"Let me see it," said Mr. Nuttall, extending his hand for the paper.

Mr. Kersey, who had taken the paper from Dick, placed it in Mr. Nuttall's, who opened it, and became immediately absorbed in its contents.

Mr. Kersey addressed Dick and the lady in a low tone of voice.

"Mr. Nuttall, here," he said, "is a very singular but clever man, and when I heard that the case for the prosecution had been confided to him, I brought him here and had a long conference with him, which, indeed, could scarcely be said to have ended when you arrived. He feels a more than common interest in the case, especially now I have put him in possession of so many facts of which he was previously in ignorance. But you must understand that his prejudices are all against you. When I first mentioned your name he ripped out dreadfully, but I partially calmed him, as you may see. That his feelings should be like this is nothing more than natural. All his life he has been occupied against such as you are."

"I quite understand all that."

"You may rest assured that you have nothing to fear from him; he will not betray you. On the contrary, I should not feel surprised if he does not warmly interest himself in your favour."

"And what course is going to be pursued at the trial?"

"That which you yourself proposed. Namely, that this document you have written be endeavoured to be given in evidence instead of you; and if that does not succeed, for an application to be made to the court to shield you from the consequences of coming forward."

"Very good, sir; and should both these fail, you will, as I before told you, find me ready to come forward and give my evidence, taking whatever risk I may incur in doing so upon my own head."

CHAPTER CCLXXI.

DICK TURPIN IS MENACED WITH GREAT DANGER IN MR. KERSEY'S HOUSE IN RED LION-SQUARE.

During the brief silence which followed this speech, there came distinctly to the ears of all present the low murmuring of voices.

Dick Turpin, although the others heard the sounds as well as himself, was perhaps the only one who attributed them to their proper cause.

His face paled slightly, and he put his hand in his breast-pocket, as he strode towards the door of the apartment.

The two lawyers and the lady looked at him in surprise, and were about to speak, but Dick held up his hand with so expressive a gesture that they checked themselves and were silent immediately.

The murmuring sounds continued, and Turpin put his ear against the panel, but he could not make out what was said. The conversation was carried on in too low a tone of voice—

Finding this to be the case, he looked down and saw the key was sticking in the lock.

To turn it was the work of a moment, and then he crossed the room and beckoned Mr. Kersey towards him, who came at once, and so did Mr. Nuttall and the lady.

"Mr. Kersey," said Turpin, "who is in your hall talking?"

"I have no idea, but I will quickly see."

"Nay, stay! Who is there in the house that you have made acquainted with my secret?"

"No one but Mr. Nuttall here."

"Do you occupy this house yourself?"

"Yes, why?"

"Who have you in it?"

"My wife and servants, and my private clerk."

"Private clerk?"

"Yes."

"And who is he?"

"A young man who attends to my private business."

"Does he know anything about my being here?"

"No. At least, not that I know of."

"You have not told him?"

"Certainly not."

"What sort of a young man is he?"

"Oh! ordinary kind."

"Do you think he might have found out who I am, and that I am here?"

"He might; but yet"——

"You may depend he has. The large reward which is offered for my apprehension has tempted him, and he has called in the police. Now if I am taken, not only will it seriously compromise you, but it will nullify my evidence. Besides which, I have made a resolution never to be taken prisoner, but to die with my sword in my right hand."

The face of the mysterious lady looked the picture of dismay when she heard the words Dick spoke.

But she had presence of mind enough to control any impulse which she might have felt to cry out.

She only gazed with clasped hands and half-open lips into his countenance.

But Dick himself was perfectly self-possessed.

"Do you think they are really officers in the passage?" asked Mr. Kersey.

"I have very little doubt about it."

"Then it is a most perplexing circumstance. What is to be done?"

"I should think the best thing would be to ascertain whether you are right in your suppositions," said Mr. Nuttall. "They might not be officers after all."

"But who would be likely to be carrying on a whispered conversation in your passage, Mr. Kersey?" asked Dick.

"No one."

"Very well, then. However, if they are officers they will quickly make their presence manifest."

There was another silence after this, during which all stretched their senses of hearing to the utmost.

About Mr. Nuttall and Mr. Kersey there was a certain amount of excitement visible, which they could not conceal or subdue.

Dick had his eye upon the door.

Presently there was a faint sound.

Some one turned the handle cautiously, and tried to open it.

But they were unsuccessful, in consequence of Dick having had the prudence to turn the key in the lock.

The handle turned round in the opposite direction, and that attempt to enter the room was abandoned.

Dick exchanged glances with the two lawyers, as they perceived this surreptitous attempt to enter.

But he motioned to them to be silent, and watch further.

Some one now tapped lightly upon the panel.

"That's Francis," said Mr. Kersey, in a whisper.

"Who's Francis?"

"My clerk."

"How can you tell?"

"I know his knock."

"Oh!"

Tap—tap—tap!

"What does he want?"

"To come in."

"So he shall, and then we shall find out all about it."

Dick crossed the room as he spoke.

He gently and carefully turned back the key in the lock.

Then he turned the handle.

The moment he felt that this was done.

The moment he felt he could draw the door open swiftly, he did so with his left hand.

His right hand he held in readiness, and as soon as the door was open he thrust it outwards like a tiger's claw, and caught hold of something

Then, with the same speed, having once got his grasp quite firm, he dragged this something into the room, and closing the door, locked it again.

So suddenly was all this done, that those who witnessed could scarcely believe their own eyes.

It seemed as though the door had been swiftly opened, and as swiftly closed, without an appreciable interval of time taking place between the two actions.

But, to their astonishment, the something which Dick had managed with so much adroitness to drag in, was a young man, who in a moment flopped down upon his knees in a supplicatory attitude.

"That's Francis!" said Mr. Kersey.

Dick did not pause, nor did he release his hold upon the trembling, abject wretch.

Ere he could open his mouth and cry for help, Dick thrust the barrel of a pistol into it, at the same time he dragged him to that portion of the room farthest from the door.

"Speak," he said, in a low whisper, but which sounded most alarmingly distinct in the ears of the lawyer's clerk. "Speak, and tell me all I ask, or I will blow your brains out this very moment!"

The clerk's teeth chattered against the barrel of the pistol, and he endeavoured to say, mercy!

"Silence!" said Dick again. "Now tell me, on pair of death, who is in the passage?"

He removed the pistol a little.

"No one, sir," moaned the clerk.

"No one! Be careful what you say. Who was whispering?"

"No one, sir. Oh! good sir, let me go! I'll declare there was no one whispering."

"You lie! We heard them."

"No! no! you are mistaken. You can look in the passage if you like; there is no one there; indeed there is not."

Certainly there was one thing which looked as though the clerk was speaking the truth.

No notice was taken of the attack which had been made upon him, and Dick argued in his mind that, had the officers been there, they would then have immediately made some demonstration of their presence.

But the stillness of the grave now reigned outside.

Dick was puzzled.

In the shifting glance of Francis, the lawyer's clerk, Dick could perceive an immense amount of duplicity and cunning.

He mistrusted him.

But it would be no good to remain in that state of uncertainty, so he resolved upon a bold and daring plan of clearing up his doubts.

He had never released his hold upon the collar of Francis's coat, and, uttering the most awful threats, he drew him across the room against the door.

The clerk's legs trembled beneath him.

His knees smote each other.

But not heeding him in the least degree, Dick unlocked the door and flung it wide open.

He had a pistol ready to his right hand, and he grasped it with the rapidity of lightning.

But to his unbounded astonishment, when the door was flung open, not a soul was to be seen in the passage beyond.

Dissatisfied, however, he dragged the clerk completely into the hall.

He was followed by the two lawyers and the lady, all of whom were much bewildered and alarmed at the strange events which were taking place.

But in the hall all was quite still. There were no traces whatever of the presence of anyone.

Dick's face assumed an expression of great uneasiness.

He was sure he had heard voices, and now where were the speakers?

He looked all around him, but nothing was to be seen.

He distrusted that calm however.

There was a mystery in it.

But what was its character?

It was important he should know, and that at once, for it would never do for him to be detained by anything, and his presence at the trial made impossible.

"Back into the office," he said. "We must have this affair well looked into before we go any further. Back into the office, I say."

He addressed these words to Francis, the clerk, who made a feeble resistance to accompany him.

The whole, then, once more entered the office.

There was a large arm-chair in which Mr. Kersey habitually sat, and into this Dick flung his prisoner.

He fell into a strange huddled up position, for he seemed as though what little animation he was blessed with had deserted him.

Once more Dick held his pistol threateningly before him.

Francis glared at it with a look that would have been rather difficult to interpret whether it was abject terror or assumed fright.

"Mr. Francis," said Dick, "your life hangs upon a thread. One touch with my finger, and you quit this world for ever! Of the two, I would rather not take your miserable life. It is not worth the having. Now tell me, at once, who was whispering at the door, and what the whispering meant? You won't answer? Well, then, I will count three distinctly, and as I pronounce the last word, if you do not speak, I will plaster that chair with your brains as sure as you now draw breath."

CHAPTER CCLXXII.

DICK TURPIN TRIUMPHS OVER FRANCIS AND MR. WRIGGLES.

A very peculiar, dusky-yellow kind of tint overspread the countenance of the lawyer's clerk, as Dick Turpin enunciated these menacing words.

"One!" said Dick.

The yellow tint deepened, but Francis did not speak.

"Two!"

His lips opened.

Dick put the pistol on full cock, and carefully examined the priming.

Then, finding all quite right, it could be seen by his resolute eye that he would say the word, and keep his promise, too."

"Mercy—mercy!" said Mr. Francis.

"It is useless to ask for such a thing, yet it is in your power to earn it. Confess all."

"I will—I will."

"Do so, then, at once. It is the only chance you have of saving your life. What was the meaning of the whispering in the passage? Who was it?

"Mercy! mercy!"

"Speak! I say."

"I am—I am—I listened at the door."

"Go on! I suppose you heard my name mentioned, and thought you would like the reward."

"Mercy!"

"Is that it?"

"Yes."

"And what did you do?"

"I cannot tell you."

"You can either do so or die."

"I will tell you, then. But you will promise not to take my life?"

"If you tell me, I will not."

"I called in the officers."

"Just as I thought."

"Eh?"

"Just as I thought."

"Did you think it?"

"Of course I did."

"Oh! mercy."

"No more of this delay. You called in the officers. What did you do next?"

"We came in the hall, and I told them you were in this room, but they would not come in. They would rather wait outside and take you as you came out, when you were not aware of it."

"Oh!"

"That's it."

"Is it?"

"I assure you it is."

"Then why did you tap at the door?"

"I wanted to come in."

"For what purpose?"

"To stay in here if I possibly could, in order to keep a sharp eye upon you. But it seems I am done."

"You certainly are. I wonder you had so little respect for your life as to attempt such a thing. You will yet live to repent of it!"

"You promised to spare my life."

"I have, and I will do so."

"Thanks—thanks. Let me go now, I beg of you."

"No, sit still. If I made the promise I did, I did not intend for you to get off scot free—neither shall I."

Francis uttered a hideous groan.

"Silence!" cried Dick, who was fearful the sound would reach the ears of the officers, for he did not know where they were hiding; "silence, on your life! Tell me this moment, in a whisper, whereabouts the officers have concealed themselves."

"Just outside, in the doorway."

"Oh! the front doorway?"

"Yes."

"And how many of them are there?"

"Four; but they have sent off for more."

"Oh! have they?"

"What is to be done?" asked Mr. Kersey, for the little episode between Dick and Francis had happened so quietly, that neither of the spectators were able to interfere or interrupt. "What is to be done? Time is speeding fast. We ought to be at the Old Bailey now."

"We ought indeed," said Mr. Nuttall. "But how in the world are you going to get there?"

"Leave that to me," said Dick. "You start, and never mind me. Yet stay. A thought strikes me."

"What is it?"

"Come here, Mr. Kersey, and I will whisper to you, and you can communicate it to the rest."

Francis's curiosity was roused to its utmost pitch, but he could not hear what the highwayman said, though he strained his ears to the utmost.

Whatever it was Dick said, met with Mr. Kersey's approval, for he smiled and nodded, and then drew the two others aside to relate it to them.

"He proposes," he said, "to get a long cloak, and, enveloping Francis in it, take us out with him. This he calculates will deceive the officers. Seeing some one muffled in a cloak, they will make sure it is the man they want, and will pounce upon him. Turpin himself will be prepared, and take advantage of that moment to leave the house by another door which opens into a court, and he will then make all speed to the Old Bailey."

"It is a hazardous scheme," said Mr. Nuttall; "and I fear, through your clerk's meddling, we shall get into some bother, and be compromised in this highwayman's affairs."

"It cannot be helped now. As for the scheme, it will answer, I am confident. I will go and fetch the cloak."

Mr. Kersey left the office and quickly returned, bringing with him not only a long horseman's cloak, but a felt hat also, of a very similar description to that worn by Turpin.

Under threats of his life, Francis was compelled to rise from the chair, and wrap himself in the folds of the cloak, and to put the hat on his head.

He seemed to have a good deal of fear of Mr. Kersey, his master; but that was doubtless, in a great measure, the effect of habit.

As soon as he was equipped, Mr. Kersey spoke to him in a very stern tone of voice, and took his arm beneath his own.

He led him to the front door.

Then he drew aside, to allow Mr. Nuttall and the lady to pass him, he judging it would be best that he and Francis should come out last.

The position of the private door was pointed out to Turpin, and he stood at it in readiness to depart as soon as the officers made their capture.

As for Francis, he was getting bewildered. He could not comprehend what was about to take place.

All being quite ready, Mr. Nuttall unfastened the front door, and opening it, walked out with the lady leaning on his arm.

His eyes glanced all round, and he saw the faint shadow of the men.

But he did not look, for fear of arousing their suspicions.

Mr. Kersey and his clerk followed closely.

No sooner, however, did they appear, than a number of men—eight at least—darted forward, and laid their hands upon the latter.

One, who was very stout and had a purple-looking face, cried out exultingly—

"Hurrah—hurrah! Caught at last! I knew it would come to this. Caught at last! Hurrah!—ah!"

The last ah! was anything but a cry of exultation.

The cloak fell from the person of the lawyer's clerk.

The hat was knocked from his head.

Then the recognition was instantaneous.

"Done!"

"Help! help shrieked Francis. "Let me go! help! help!"

Mr. Wriggles—for that was the name of the officer with the purple face—caught hold of Mr. Kersey by the sleeve of his coat.

"Stop, sir!" he said. "Stop!"

"What for?"

"There's some mistake."

"Mistake! what do you mean? Release me, sir!"

"Shan't! I am a police-officer."

Mr. Wriggles flourished his staff, with the little gilt crown on the top of it, as he spoke.

"And I am a solicitor," said Mr. Kersey; "so I should advise you to be careful what you are doing."

Mr. Wriggles drew back a little on receipt of this announcement, but he said, rather fiercely—

"I have received information, sir, that the notorious Dick Turpin was in your house—Dick Turpin, the highwayman, and that he would come out with you, sir."

"Don't be violent!"

"I am violent."

"I see you are. But your information must be wrong. Do you think it likely that Dick Turpin would be in my house, and that I should walk out of it with him having hold of my arm? Absurd! absurd!"

Mr. Wriggles released his grasp, and glared in the lawyer's face.

It did seem absurd.

"Some one has been playing you a hoax," continued Mr. Kersey; "that is my clerk, Francis."

"Yes," said one of the officers, "and it was he who told me that Turpin was in the house, and would come out with you."

"Then he must have been amusing himself at your expense."

This idea took root immediately, and the officers were, in their wrath, about to make a unanimous attack upon Francis, when that individual cried—

"It's all right! What I told you is all right! They have only brought me out here to play you a trick. They found it out, and Dick Turpin is in the house now! I have seen him myself!"

No sooner did the police receive this intimation than they rushed simultaneously into the house, with Francis at their heels.

Mr. Kersey smiled, and so did Mr. Nuttall and the lady.

The ruse had succeeded to admiration, and by this time Dick was doubtless far on his way to his destination, and quite out of the reach of all pursuit.

Just at this moment, in accordance with Mr. Kersey's orders, a carriage drove up to the kerb-stone.

All three then seated themselves in it, and the order was given to drive to the Old Bailey with all speed.

The house was left to the officers.

With great expertness, they searched the house from top to bottom, and then they came to the private door.

Francis assured them that it was through that which Dick had made his escape.

But in the court not a soul was in sight, and Mr. Wriggles was so convinced of the futility of getting up a pursuit against him that he did not even attempt it.

He uttered some curses, though, in a very diabolical tone of voice, while his face changed from purple to black, as he thought how neatly he had been done.

CHAPTER CCLXXIII.

DICK TURPIN IS RECOGNISED AT THE CORNER OF RED LION-STREET, AND HAS TO FLY THROUGH THE STREETS FOR HIS LIFE.

If Dick Turpin had been aware that it was his old enemy Mr. Wriggles he was about to defeat, his glee and satisfaction would have been much greater than they were,

Of all the rest of the Bow-street officers he had made himself conspicuous for attempting the capture of the redoubtable highwayman.

Every attempt which he has hitherto made has, as the reader well knows, signally failed; but whether this is a state of things that will always continue is more than we can tell at present.

Certain it is that, after every defeat which he experienced, Mr. Wriggles grew more and more exasperated, and more determined to devote his whole energies to bringing the daring offender to justice.

We shall see what success his future exertions met with.

When the officer caught hold of Francis, Dick flung open the private door leading into the court and darted out.

He had previously possessed himself of the key of it, and now he thrust it into the lock on the outer side, and tried to turn it in the lock.

But, some how or other, whether from long disuse or some other cause, the wards would not act, and he could not shoot the bolt; so, fearing to lose any more time, he left it as it was, and ran down the court at the top of his speed.

The court wound round about in a rather intricate manner, but in all its windings Dick took good care to preserve the proper direction.

At length he emerged at the lower end of Red Lion-street, close to its junction with Holborn.

He paused here a moment, and resolved to hail a hackney-coach, which would take him all the more quickly and safely to his destination.

But at this moment a man lounged past him.

The circumstance was a trivial one.

But this man—who was a kind of hanger-on, or supernumerary police-officer, at Bow-street—no sooner caught a glimpse of Turpin than he uttered a cry which had the effect of arresting the attention of everybody who happened to be within a hundred yards of where he stood.

At the same time he made a dart forward and endeavoured to clutch Dick by the throat, but the highwayman was too quick for him.

Doubling his fist, he struck the man a blow with the whole strength of his arm.

It alighted on the man's forehead exactly between his two eyes.

He fell down as though shot.

But many people had witnessed this, and Dick found himself almost surrounded.

No one, however, seemed to exactly understand what was amiss, and Turpin was elbowing his way through the crowd, and was in a fair way of getting off.

But, unfortunately, it so happened that a police-officer, who had been drinking at the bar of a public-house at the corner, came out to see what was the cause of the tumult.

He knew Dick and the prostrate man at a glance, and at once guessed what had occurred.

"Stop thief!" he cried, in stentorian tones. "Stop thief! Dick Turpin, the highwayman! A thousand pounds reward, dead or alive! Stop thief! Stop thief! Dick Turpin, the highwayman! Whoever catches him has the reward!"

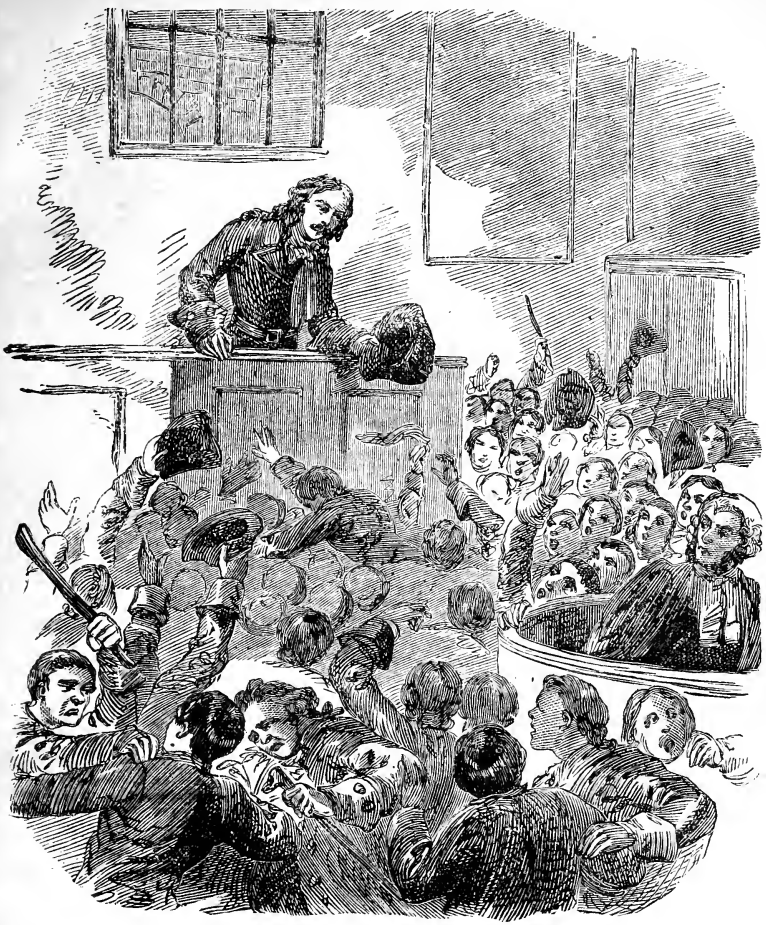
A roar came from the populace as they heard these words.

An instant and universal desire to possess the reward flamed up in the hearts of every one.

They dashed forward in pursuit of the highwayman.

But Turpin never for a moment lost his presence of mind.

When he saw what occurred he knew what would be the consequence.



With one effort of strength he broke away from those who held him, and ran up the street ere the officer had finished his vociferations.

But the concourse of people, hooting, yelling, shouting, and screaming, were quickly after him.

Every moment, too, saw fresh persons joining in the chase.

It was up Red Lion-street, in the direction of the open country, that Dick ran.

To have turned down Holborn would, he knew well enough, be nothing short of absolute madness, for, in so crowded a thoroughfare, it would not have been possible for him to go at any speed, besides which, there would have been all the greater risk of capturing him.

[DICK TURPIN MAKES HIS APPEARANCE IN THE WITNESS-BOX AT THE OLD BAILEY.]

Accordingly, we say, he made his way up Red Lion-street to escape from his foes.

But from the courts and alleys that branched off from this thoroughfare the people came in shoals.

Dick had got a good start, and being a swift runner he was able to maintain it.

Just as he reached the corner of Guildford-street he saw what he had first looked for.

A hackney-coach.

It was empty.

Turpin dived his hand into his trousers-pocket.

He drew forth two guineas.

He held them aloft in the air.

The driver saw them, and stopped.

"Two guineas for your fare," said Dick. "Be quick! Two guineas. Drive round the next two corners like the devil, and they are used."

"All right, sir."

Dick gave the man the coins.

Then opening the door, he sprang into the coach.

The jarvey—as the drivers of hackney carriages were generally called—stimulated by the large sum of money which had been given him, whipped his horse, and made them go at a speed that no one to have looked at them would have thought them capable of.

A hundred people at least saw Dick get into the coach, and they hastened forward to intercept him.

But they were too late.

The coach rolled before them and turned a corner.

For a moment it was out of their sight.

But they soon had it in view again, but only to lose it round a second turning.

When he was out of sight of his pursuers, Dick projected his head from the carriage window, and cried—

"Round the next corner on your right, and then keep on. Don't stop. I will get out and shut the door. You will be caught, I daresay, and they will find no one inside, you know."

"All right, your honour! Lor' bless you! it ain't the first time I've done this trick for gents in distress. Out with you, and I am off like a shot!"

Dick was pleased to find that the driver so well understood what he meant, and was so willing to aid him.

He unfastened the coach door, and let it swing open on its hinges.

He looked behind him.

His pursuers were out of sight.

The entrance to a court was just before him.

Such a favourable opportunity might not occur again.

He sprang instantly off the step into the roadway, and ran for a moment by the side of the coach while he refastened the door.

The clumsy vehicle lumbered on down the street, which was a long, straight one, and quite empty, so that it formed a very conspicuous object.

Dick in one more moment was within the mouth of the court.

It was a narrow, dark archway, and he felt that he should be almost well enough concealed if he remained just where he was.

Besides, he wanted to see the sport.

A minute elapsed.

Then there came upon his ears the roaring of a vast multitude.

His pursuers had much increased in numbers, and were close upon his track.

They rushed into the long, empty street.

In the distance they could see the object of their pursuit.

The coach.

Another roar came from their lips, and then yelling, shrieking, swearing, fighting, they kept their eyes upon it, and tore along at full speed.

There was a rush, and then the mob passed by the archway in which Turpin was concealed.

He pressed himself as close to the wall as he could when they swept by.

But he need not have troubled himself.

Had he stood in the street, they would scarcely have noticed him, so intently were their eyes fixed upon the coach, inside of which they felt sure he was, for had they not seen him enter it with their own eyes?

When the last stragglers who brought up the rear of the main body who went by had passed, Dick ventured to look out from his place of concealment.

The mistake had not been discovered.

The mob still held on to the pursuit of the coach, which baffled all their attempts to catch it.

Dick stood for a moment reflectively.

He hardly knew what to do.

He leant rather heavily against the wall.

He was breathless and exhausted, for the short ride he had had in the coach had not enabled him to recover from the immense exertions which he had made.

He took off his hat and wiped the perspiration from his forehead, which stood there in huge drops.

Drawing his breath rapidly and painfully, he half-muttered—

"Curses on this accident, which has produced so much delay. After all, now, I may be too late, or, what is quite as bad, the court may be so crowded that I shall find it impossible to enter. What shall I do? Perhaps the whole affair may have got wind, and, if so, I shall find plenty of officers outside the prison waiting to pounce upon me the moment I make my appearance."

This was a very likely supposition.

How much the clerk Francis overheard, was more than he could tell, but most probably he knew all.

"Never mind," said Dick. "I have sworn to appear in the witness-box if events should make it necessary, and I will do so if a thousand officers bar the way, or if my immediate capture is the result."

With this resolution firmly fixed upon his mind, Dick looked about him, in order to ascertain the direction he ought to take, and then made his way at a rapid pace to Newgate.

CHAPTER CCLXXIV.

RETURNS TO TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK, AND RELATES HOW THEY WERE PURSUED BY THE GENDARMES.

In order that the remarkable events which are about to be related should be properly understood, it will be necessary to leave Dick Turpin in his perilous position for a little while, during which time we must turn our attention to the proceedings of his three intimate acquaintances, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack.

We have said that Claude Duval, upon looking into the interior of the carriage, saw that its inmates were male and female.

His acquaintance with the French language was but slight; still, from having occasionally resided in that country, he had become familiar with those expressions in colloquial use.

Consequently his orders for silence, uttered as they were in a deep, stern tone of voice, met with immediate attention.

The female occupant of the carriage, and who fell back into a half-fainting attitude, was a woman about fifty years of age.

She was thin even to scragginess, and her pretensions to beauty rested upon a very slight foundation.

On the opposite seat was a man about a match for her in age, but not in slenderness, for he inclined rather to corpulency.

We will translate what took place.

"Be silent!" cried Claude, in French. "Offer no resistance. Hand over as quickly as possible all the valuables you carry about you, and you will avoid all further ill-usage, and be allowed to continue your journey without interruption."

The gentleman—for such by his dress he appeared to be—to whom these words were addressed, made no other response to Claude's speech than to utter, with extreme volubility, some very diabolical French oaths.

But Claude put an end to them before the old Frenchman had exhausted his vocabulary, which seemed to be unusually copious, by thrusting his arm into the carriage, and placing the muzzle of the pistol against his forehead.

"Quick!" he said. "Quick! I cannot afford to waste time like this listening to your foolish words. Quick! I say, or you will repent it. Hand out your purse, watch, rings, and what other valuables you may carry about with you."

The old Frenchman very unwillingly put his hand into his pocket, and withdrew a purse.

With still greater unwillingness he handed it to Claude, who transferred it to his own pocket with a dexterity which could only have been acquired by long practice.

"Now your other valuables," he said. "You carry a very fine ring on your finger, I see. Pass it this way."

The old Frenchman looked wistfully at the article which Claude had mentioned.

It was a diamond ring, and a glance was enough to show that it was worth a considerable sum.

Just, however, as Claude was about to take it, he was startled by the rapid trampling of horses' hoofs in his rear.

Still he did not allow that to disconcert him, but took hold of the ring.

At the same moment, however, he heard Sixteen-String Jack cry at the top of his voice—

"Fly, Claude—fly! Do not wait on any account. There is a party of armed men behind us, and I believe they are gendarmes. At all events, they are armed, and doubtless in pursuit of us. Fly at once!"

Even as Sixteen-String Jack spoke, he and Tom King swept past the carriage at a rapid gallop.

The old Frenchman appeared to be well acquainted with the English tongue, for he gave vent to a cry of exultation when he heard what Sixteen-String Jack said.

Claude, however, took no notice of it.

He judged, by the actions of his comrades, that the danger must be imminent.

Therefore he turned his horse's head away from the carriage-window, and gave it a sharp impulse forward.

He was by the side of his companions instantly.

Glancing behind him, he saw the glitter of accoutrements, and heard the loud trampling of many horses' hoofs.

A momentary halt of the whole body took place, however, when they reached the carriage, and our friends took all the advantage of that moment which they possibly could.

The road was rough and uneven, so that to travel over it with any great speed was to run a great amount of risk.

That danger, however, great as it was, under the present aspect of affairs, was a minor one, and the highwaymen thought but little of it.

It would seem that the gendarmes stopped at the carriage only just long enough to ascertain what had taken place, and then they set off again at full speed, which showed clearly enough that our friends were the objects of their pursuit.

And now a word is necessary to explain how it was that they had approached so closely without Tom and Jack giving the alarm.

While Claude rode forward to attack the carriage, they, as we have already stated, kept in the rear.

They had just passed a rather broad cross-country road, which intersected the highway which they were travelling, but no more than a passing glance was bestowed upon it.

The fact was, however, that this, though not very much frequented, on account of its evil reputation, was a much nearer way from Paris than that by which they had come, so that, had they taken it, they would have reached the spot upon which they now stood a considerable time earlier.

Down this lane, however, there came a party of gendarmes, or military police, who had been dispatched in pursuit of our friends.

In consequence of their taking this route, and as the miry state of the lane necessitated their going at a slow pace, they were actually upon the highway before they had the slightest idea that enemies were so near.

Upon perceiving it, they, as we have seen, lost no time in giving the alarm to Claude, and bidding him to fly without delay.

Their horses began ere long, they found, to evince the most unequivocal symptoms of exhaustion.

But upon each occasion the poor beasts received a sharp application of the spur, which stimulated to a great extent their failing powers.

They proved themselves nevertheless to be steeds of an excellent quality, and our friends were in nowise deceived in the estimate they had formed of them.

This rapid pursuit was a thing which they had not counted upon.

In a long race a little start is a great matter, and so the present occasion proved.

Of course, from the first our friends had had the advantage, though certainly it was not much.

They gained again when their pursuers halted at the carriage—though that halt was about as brief a one as well could be.

In addition to this, they were not so heavily mounted as the gendarmes.

Having all these things in their favour, it is scarcely anything to surprised at that they should keep well ahead of them.

The rate at which they were going had the effect of quite taking their breath away from them, so that no conversation passed between them.

Besides, the whole attention of each one was centred on his steed.

Unfortunately, so far as their chances of getting away were concerned, there was a peculiar white misty sort of light, which made distant objects easily perceivable; but, had it not been for this, it is scarcely probable they would have gone so far without meeting with an accident of some kind.

This idea occurred to Tom King, and even as it was passing through his brain, his horse, from some cause or other, stumbled, and fell heavily to the ground.

Of course, the rider went down too, but Tom was so accomplished a horseman that, quickly and suddenly as the whole affair had occurred, he had had time to disengage his feet from the stirrups.

The consequence was that personally he received little or no injury, but the accident was a most serious one.

The horse, from the time it tumbled, made not the slightest effort to stir. It had, in fact, all the appearance of being thoroughly overpowered.

Had not this been the case, it might have recovered its footing, but, once down, it did not seem to have the strength to make an attempt to rise.

The other two highwaymen, upon perceiving what had occurred, reined in their own steeds as quickly as they possibly could, and turned the whole of their attention to succouring their comrade.

But Tom was on his feet before they had time to do that reach the spot where his horse lay.

"The horse is quite done for," said Tom King. "It is hopeless to think of getting him up again."

"What are we to do, then? In a few minutes the gendarmes will be upon us."

"I know it, and a hand to hand conflict would not suit us. Claude, you have the strongest horse. Let me mount behind you."

"Agreed. But be quick about it. The gendarmes have gained upon us tremendously, and, whatever slight advantage we may have gained by our furious galloping, we have lost again."

Tom did not need telling to make haste. He knew the peril of their position, and was aware of the imminency of their danger quite as much as his comrades were.

He was on the back of Claude's horse in a moment, and in this manner they resumed their flight.

Tramp, tramp, tramp, came the sounds of the pursuing gendarmes behind them, and each beat appeared to sound louder than its predecessor.

The tired horses, under the repeated application of the spur which they received, kept up wonderfully, though now and then a dangerous stagger would show how much their strength was spent.

The double burden which it carried soon began to make a difference to Claude's horse, so that, after a few miles, they were compelled to halt again, while Tom King dismounted, and took his seat behind Sixteen-String Jack.

CHAPTER CCLXXV.

IN WHICH CLAUDE DUVAL HAS A SWORD COMBAT WITH THE GENDARME, AND THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN SEEK REFUGE IN THE RUINED MILL.

THIS, of course, produced another delay, and, slight as it was, the difference was perceptible.

But, though they goaded the poor animals to make fresh exertions, it must be apparent that their chances of out-distancing their pursuers were very slight indeed.

Indeed one might say that it was impossible, for the gendarmes had had a relay of horses since they left Paris, and those horses, though strong and heavy, were yet capable of making excellent speed.

After the change had been made, however, they got on much faster than before.

Away they flew over the ill-kept roadway, their horses' hoofs continually striking fire as they caught against the flint stones which bestrewed it.

Somewhat to their astonishment, our friends soon afterwards found that, despite the adverse circumstances which oppressed them, they still maintained their distance from their foes, if, indeed, they did not slightly increase it.

But this is not so much to be wondered at when we give the subject a few moments' thought.

Without calling in the musty adage that a stern chase is a long chase, we will call the reader's attention to a little circumstance which otherwise might have escaped them.

When a troop or body are in motion, and in pursuit of some object, one of the first things that is observed is for all to keep together, each one having his particular place, and each keeping pace with the others.

Now, in a number of horses, there will always be found a difference of quality. They may be all apparently up to one standard, and, for a certain distance, all of equal fleetness, but, after a time, when endurance is called into question, they will vary.

So it was with the horses upon which the gendarmes rode.

There were several in the troop who, singly, would quickly have caught up with the highwaymen, but by far the greater majority were quite incapable of it.

Such being the case, in order to keep together, those who could go fast had to accommodate their speed to those who went slowly, and thus our friends were able to keep ahead of them.

The gendarmes were not slow to perceive this, nor were they ignorant of the cause of it. Still it did not give them much disquietude, for they confidently calculated upon running down their prey in the long run.

The second in command of the troop, however, who was perhaps the best mounted of all, spoke to his superior officer, and requested leave to ride forward singly and overtake the fugitives, and if possible delay them until the main body of the troop came up.

The proposal was received with immediate favour, and accordingly this officer, who was quite a young man, struck his horse sharply upon the flank with his spurs, and quickly shot ahead of his companions.

The highwaymen soon became conscious of what had taken place, and they could hear this single horseman coming along at a furious pace behind them.

He was gaining, too, upon them, and that most rapidly.

Claude quite understood the tactics of this young officer, and could not but admire his bravery; still his own safety demanded that his attempt should be defeated.

Still he went on at the top of his speed, taking no further notice, while Sixteen-String Jack did the same.

Tom King, from his awkward and uncomfortable seat, looked back with very great anxiety.

On came the gendarme at a speed that was really terrific.

At length he reached them.

Quick as thought, Claude Duval at that instant wheeled his horse round, while he called to his companions to continue their flight.

This injunction, however, was not obeyed.

Sixteen-String Jack halted, though, of course, from the awkward manner in which he was situated, he was not able to render the least assistance.

Claude Duval held his drawn sword in his hand.

The gendarme was similarly armed.

At the instant, then, that Claude wheeled round and made a desperate slash at his adversary, the gendarme put up his own weapon, and received the blow upon it, immediately giving Claude a blow back in return, which he only escaped by a movement of his horse.

This at once let Duval know that he had no novice in the use of the sword opposed to him, and it would require his utmost skill to bring the encounter to an end in a few seconds.

Of course, if it was prolonged, the main body would come up with them, and then resistance would be futile.

There were very few, however, who could match with Claude in the use of the broadsword.

He had made it his particularly study, and had brought the art to the summit of perfection.

In addition to this, he had the advantage which a huge frame and immense personal strength gave him, so that every blow he gave, while it was delivered with great skill, descended with a force almost sufficient to break through all guard opposed to it.

Knowing, then, the importance of being speedy in what he was about, Claude attacked this young gendarme with great force and fury.

Their weapons clashed together with that sound which can be likened to nothing else, while the long blades of their swords gleamed with a faint radiance in the misty light.

The horses tramped, and neighed, and reared, and, like their riders, seemed in the excitement of the moment to forget the fatigue which they had undergone.

The combat did not last above eighty seconds.

During that brief interval of time, however, an incredible number of blows were given and received; but at the expiration of it, Claude, perceiving his opportunity, rose up in the stirrups, and brought down his sword with full force upon his opponent's head-piece.

The violence of the blow may be imagined when we say that it shivered Claude's sword like glass.

But it was effective for all that.

To be sure, the weapon did not cut through the steel helmet and reach the gendarme's head, but the concussion was so great that it completely stunned him, and he fell to the ground like a log of wood.

The horse stood still, trembling with fear.

Throwing away his now useless sword, Claude Duval caught hold of it by the bridle.

"Here, Tom!" he said. "Quick! mount. Here is a capital steed for you!"

Tom King slipped off Sixteen-String Jack's horse in a moment, and ran towards Claude.

He was in the saddle instantly.

"Now forward. We have a better chance now. Spur your horses, or they will yet capture us."

Neither of his comrades required much urging to do this.

Their position was now considerably improved, and they began to indulge in the hope that they would, after all, succeed in baffling their foes.

But there seemed no signs of their being tired yet. They paused when they came to the body of the officer lying across the roadway, and one dismounted to attend to him, while the others swept on in pursuit, now much more exasperated against the highwaymen than they were before.

Previously they had acted merely because it was their duty. Now a kind of personal feeling was infused into the matter.

A personal feeling is always to be dreaded.

This young officer was much liked and respected, and they all pressed forward eager to avenge his death, for they jumped to the conclusion that he was either killed or fatally wounded.

And now our friends saw with dismay not only this additional impartment of vigour to their pursuers, but also that the two horses were in such a frightfully exhausted state that they threatened to fall down every moment.

The result of a hand-to-hand contest on foot, with four or five times their number opposed to them, could not be doubtful.

And as if the measure of their inconveniences should be full, they came to a long steep hill, up which they, with the greatest difficulty, urged their exhausted cattle.

Within about twenty yards of the top, Sixteen-String Jack's horse fell, and almost at the same instant that of Claude Duval.

Tom King was now the only one mounted.

His friends urged him to fly and make his escape while he had the opportunity, but this he refused to do.

"We must leave the high-road," he said, "and seek a shelter somewhere. We have a minute or two to do so, for the gendarmes will not be easily able to ascend this hill."

"They will not, indeed; but they are already at the foot."

"We must be speedy, then. Let us run to the brow of the hill, my friends, and endeavour to look around us. Perhaps we shall be able to see some place that will serve us for a shelter."

"Or, at all events, for a place which will enable us to intrench ourselves, and so give us a better chance with our foes than we should have upon even ground."

All three now ran to the summit of the hill, and looked about them, as well as the darkness would allow them.

Over a low wooden fence on their right hand, and about a hundred yards off, was a building of some sort or other, but what they could not tell.

They could only see an undistinguishable mass of something, the outlines of which were confused and dim.

But it was the only thing in sight, so they resolved to make their way towards it.

The gendarmes were now about half-way up the hill.

Tom King let go the bridle of his horse, and, hitting sharply, sent him at a gallop down the hill.

He and his two companions then leaped the fence, and, alighting, found themselves in a kind of meadow.

Upon a closer approach, they found the building to be a windmill.

It was built quite upon the brow of the hill.

But even in the night as it was, they could perceive that it was in an advanced stage of ruin and decay.

One of the long arms had been half broken away, while round about its base was spread an accumulation of rubbish, such as one always finds in places deserted by human beings.

"This will be the very place," said Tom King, "provided we can only make an entrance; and that I doubt not, from the appearance of the place, will be an easy enough matter."

"You must be quick," said Claude, "or the gendarmes will be upon us."

CHAPTER CCLXXVI.

DICK TURPIN REACHES THE OLD BAILEY IN SAFETY, AND IS TAKEN INTO COURT BY MR. KERSEY.

A cold frosty wind was careering through the streets when Dick Turpin, after his narrow escape from capture turned in a direction which would lead him towards Newgate.

His body being greatly heated made him more sensible of this coolness in the atmosphere than he otherwise would have been, and he drew his apparel more closely around his person.

As he did this the natural thought occured to him, that if he walked into the first clothier's shop he came to, and purchased one of the long ample cloaks at that period so much in vogue, it would not only shield him from the cold, but also serve as an admirable disguise.

Having come to this conclusion, and feeling the necessity there was for him to conceal his personal appearance in some way, Dick looked about him for a clothier's.

In London then, as now, he had not long to look for what he wanted.

Just a little lower down on the other side of the street he saw a tailor's.

It was no flaunting, pretentious establishment, such as might be seen now-a-days, but a quiet place, where only a little business appeared to be carried on.

But this was in appearance only.

Dick crossed over the street, and entered the shop without hesitation.

It went down a step from the street, and the highwayman was far from displeased when he found that the interior was quite dark—so dark, indeed, that he did not see the man who was minding the shop, until he spoke to him.

Dick quickly signified his wishes, and the man, taking his measure with his eye, soon supplied him with the article he required.

Turpin put it on, and making some remark about the coldness of the morning, drew it close up in his neck, and sallied out of the shop, looking quite a different personage to what he did when he entered it.

In a few minutes afterwards he reached Holborn, and this time the lower part.

The distance to Newgate was still considerable, so that if only for the sake of the time it would save, he sprang into a hackney-coach.

Having entered this unperceived, the chance of his being recognised was but slight.

Soon afterwards the cumbersome but really comfortable vehicle turned out of St. Sepulcher-street into the Old Bailey.

A large number of persons were loitering about, while near the entrance to the vestibule of the prison, an unusual commotion appeared to be taking place.

But Turpin knew not the cause of it, though he might have hazarded a pretty good guess.

Passing by this, they came to that part of the huge, heart-chilling structure where the witnesses enter at such time as the court is sitting.

Before these doors the hackney-coachman halted, and then, gymnastically descending from his seat, came to the door and opened it.

Dick paid him about six times his proper fare before he alighted, so the driver was civil accordingly.

According to immemorial custom, several police-officers were lounging about the steps, or parading to and fro, but there was not one whose face was familiar to Turpin.

Wrapping his cloak around him, he descended from the carriage, and then almost the first person upon whom his eyes lighted was Mr. Kersey.

The lawyer had a very anxious look upon his face, and he was glancing up and down the street in a fidgety manner, as though he was waiting for some one who ought to have made his appearance earlier.

He did not recognise Dick, muffled up as he was, but the highwayman tapped him on the shoulder.

"Thank goodness you are here!" said the lawyer, with a sigh of relief; "I was beginning to get terribly alarmed about you.

"And well you might; I can assure you I have had a narrow escape of capture."

"But you are free?"

"Yes."

"Come this way, then."

"Have the proceedings commenced?"

"Yes, the court is opened."

"Then I am late?"

"Yes."

"But not too late, I hope?"

"Oh! dear, no."

"I am glad to hear that."

"The trial in which you feel so great an interest has not come on yet, though it stands next on the list. The one they have on now is a trivial one, and will not occupy much time."

"That is a great relief."

"And so was your presence to me. Come this way. The court is crowded to excess, but I shall be able to find a corner for you to stand in."

"That will do, and the more I am removed from public gaze the better I shall be pleased."

"Of course you will. I think I can manage that for you, and now understand, as we shall not have another chance of speaking together, that you will not be called upon unless it is absolutely necessary. Mr. Nuttall will do all he can to prevent it, but if he is obliged to call you, he will not do so until he has made an appeal to judge and jury to protect you."

"Enough, Mr. Kersey, I feel sure you will do all you possibly can for me."

"Rely upon that. Now, this way."

Mr. Kersey pushed open the door, and then Dick found himself within the precincts of the court.

It is scarcely possible for a stranger to enter this place without emotion.

The semi-darkness.

The strange, hushed silence.

The low monotonous voice of the judge.

All conspire to produce a benumbing influence upon the spirits.

The breath even is drawn painfully and by stealth, while every one has his sense of hearing stretched to the utmost.

The judge was passing sentence when Dick entered, so the court was unusually and profoundly silent.

The case, as Mr. Kersey had said, was a trivial one, and, indeed, it looked as though it had been arranged as a kind of prologue to the after part of the day's proceedings, as theatrical managers, when they produce any important drama, first have performed a piece of minor excellence, which serves as a foil to the one that follows it, and makes it seem all the better by comparison.

No such idea as this entered the minds of the officials, still the appearance to the breathless spectators was the same.

The prisoner—a woman—was removed from the dock, after which a brief interruption took place.

But soon all was still and orderly again.

The different counsel at the table busied themselves with their briefs.

The clerk of the arraigns turned over his parchment documents.

The oath was administered to the jury.

The judge took a fresh pen in his hand, and prepared paper, as though he anticipated he should have to take copious notes.

He was a venerable-looking man, with thin white hair scrupulously brushed, and having a benevolent expression of countenance; but his occasionally contracted brow, his steady glance, and firm compression of his lips, indicated that he was one who would administer justice with an impartial hand.

His decisions would be just and legal. There was neither leniency nor harshness; he was what is seldom to be found—an upright, strictly conscientious, and honourable judge.

Would there were more like him!

Then, when all these preparations were completed, there was a momentary pause in the proceedings.

But it was only momentary.

Then there came into the dock—

First, one of the men who had been captured in his attempt to escape from the haunted house.

Secondly, his companion.

Then Adrian Winberry.

His appearance created in the court an immense sensation.

Every eye was in a moment riveted upon his countenance.

Considering the important part he has played lately in our narrative, and, as he has appeared disguised, we think a few lines descriptive of his personal appearance cannot be out of place.

On the present occasion he had evidently taken immense pains with his toilette.

Perhaps he was desirous of winning the suffrage of those who might chance to see him.

In height, then, he was close upon six feet.

His form was in proportion to his height, for he was exceedingly muscular in appearance, and well built.

His hair was black, and his face of a dark, tawny colour, as though his skin had been for some time exposed to the fierce heat of a tropical sun.

The same thing was observable with his hands—they were almost the hue of a mulatto's.

His face was clean, and closely shaven.

The slight moustache that was upon his lip when he was examined before the magistrate had now disappeared.

But the most singular characteristic of his face has yet to be noticed.

His forehead was very broad, and very high.

Indeed, the hair seemed to have been removed from it, or else he was partially bald.

This portion, in consequence of being always covered, was quite white, and in contrast to his swarthy face seemed dazzlingly so.

At this singular appearance no one could help looking.

Having been once fully seen, he could be ever afterwards identified.

Upon taking his stand at the bar, he drew himself up with a haughty movement to his full height, and glanced round him proudly and calmly.

Then he made a deep and courteous bow to the judge, who unconsciously returned it.

A smile either of assured innocence or else of desperate hardihood was on his face.

Which of the two it was the reader knows.

But a human tribunal, like all other things human, is fallible and erring.

The guilty, when brought before it, are not always punished, nor are the innocent invariably set free.

CHAPTER CCLXXVII.

IN WHICH THE COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION STATES THE CASE AGAINST ADRIAN WINBERRY AND HIS TWO ACCOMPLICES.

Amid a profound and deathlike silence, the clerk of the arraigns rose from his seat.

The faint rustling noise which he made as he turned over his papers, was plainly audible to every one within the crowded area.

Then, in a rapid voice, he read the indictments against the prisoners.

It is not necessary to trouble the reader with the contents of this document, full as it was of the technicalities of legal phrascology.

The substance of it will appear in the speech for the prosecution.

And every one appeared to think so—so very little attention was paid to what the clerk said.

It seems to be always a point aimed at by these gentry to read over the indictment without pausing once to draw breath, and without making any stop between their words.

Why they do this is best known to themselves, but if they think it makes them better understood, they labour under an extraordinary delusion.

But perhaps they look upon it as a necessary but troublesome form they have to go through, and they feel that the sooner it is over the better both for themselves and those who have to listen to it.

Be it how it may, the clerk quickly gabbled over it, and then sat down looking very red in the face, and very much out of breath.

Then there was another pause.

The spectators drew a long breath.

They felt that the trial was now about to begin in good earnest.

All three of the prisoners put in the plea not guilty.

With breathless expectation they waited for the counsel for the prosecution to commence his speech.

Mr. Nuttall and Mr. Kersey whispered together, and then the former rose.

He settled his gown about him, and took from the hands of one of his assistants a folded paper.

Then he commenced his address as follows:—

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—

"It is my duty on the present occasion to lay before you the details of one of the most remarkable cases that have ever fallen under my notice, and I have no doubt you will coincide with me as regards its singularity.

"The charge against the three prisoners at the bar, as shown by the indictment, involves abduction, conspiracy, and murder, three of the most heinous crimes they could possibly commit.

"The evidence that I shall bring before you is of a character that will fully bear out and substantiate all that I am about to say.

"My province is as briefly and as clearly as possible, to lay before you a succinct account of all that has taken place.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury, the best way in which I can do that is to begin at the beginning, and relate things as they occurred.

"Between the villages of Hendon and Hampstead there stands a large stone residence surrounded by spacious grounds, which was in the possession of a gentleman much loved and respected in the neighbourhood in which he lived, for the consistent kindness and urbanity of his behaviour to all persons, and upon all occasions.

"The name of this gentleman was William Winberry, commonly called by his tenants and the residents around, Squire Winberry.

"This house and estate had been bequeathed to him by his father, who was one of the richest merchants in the city, and amassed a large fortune by his industry and frugality.

"William Winberry was the eldest son, and consequently the heir. He had a brother some years younger than himself. I should, perhaps, say half-brother, for they were by different mothers, Mr. William Winberry having been twice married.

"As has been the case from the earliest times, and as the case always will be, these two half-brothers were not friendly with each other. Yet, in impartiality, I must say, that this unfriendliness was wholly and solely caused by the younger brother, Adrian Winberry, the prisoner at the bar."

Upon hearing these words everyone, without a single exception, who was in the court, bent their eyes upon Adrian, who shrank slightly before so close and undivided a scrutiny.

He was much paler than he was when the investigation commenced, and those who were near noticed he pressed his teeth closely together.

He had never expected the revelations that had just been made.

Nothing that had previously taken place in the proceedings gave him any clue to it, and his guilty heart told him that the counsel for the prosecution, from the manner in which he had commenced, was in full possession of all the facts of the case.

He felt his position to be a very dangerous and awkward one.

But he was not master of his own actions. He would have to stand where he was, and abide by the result.

Mr. Nuttall continued, and his whole attention was absorbed by what he said. He literally hung upon every word.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—

"It ill becomes any one to speak ill of the dead, but there are certain things which I cannot pass over without making some allusion to them.

"Mr. William Winberry, senior, then, the father of the prisoner at the bar, lived very unhappily with his second wife. The circumstance is well known, and the motives which caused unhappiness need not be mentioned here. These are unimportant.

"Suddenly, however, it is not known from what cause, Mrs. Winberry totally altered her behaviour to her husband, and they seemed once more to live happily together. But soon after this she fell a victim to an epidemic which was decimating the neighbourhood.

"To this disorder her husband likewise fell a victim, and died a few days after. Both were interred in one grave."

"My lord," said one of the barristers, rising to his feet, "I must really protest against the manner in which my learned friend is opening the case for the prosecution. This family romance to which he is now treating us is most irrelavent to the case and prejudicial to my client, the charge against whom is that of murder upon the person of an old man whose body is not known."

The judge looked inquiringly at Mr. Nuttall, who hastened to reply.

"My lord, my learned brother, who appears to be intrusted with the case for the defence is slightly in error with respect to the statements he has made, for I shall bring witnesses to prove the relevancy of this piece of family romance, as my learned brother calls it, and also witnesses who will identify the body, and give such evidence as will in every respect bear out what I say.

"That is enough," said the judge. "Proceed."

"But, my lord"—— said the counsel for the defence.

"You will have an opportunity given you for making whatever remarks you may think proper as regards this case now under investigation."

The counsel sat down with a mortified look upon his face.

Adrian Winberry scowled.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury," resumed Mr. Nuttall, "I will continue my narrative from the point at which it was interrupted.

"After the funeral of Mr. and Mrs. Winberry, of course the will was sought for.

"This, the lawyer stated, he had seen put by the deceased into a cabinet of antique workmanship, which stood in his bed-chamber.

"But, on going to this cabinet, no will was to be found.

"This, however, proved to be of no consequence, for the lawyer stated that, in anticipation of some such occurrence, two wills had been drawn up, both of which were exactly the same. One of these was in his possession, and accordingly he produced it.

"By virtue of this document the bulk of the wealth and property was bequeathed to the eldest son, William, and to Adrian was left a clear annual income of eight hundred pounds, and no more.

"After reading the will, the brothers met and quarrelled. What passed between them, of course none can tell. After it, Adrian departed, and was not seen at his brother's house for many years. What became of him during that period no one knows.

"And now William Winberry, about two years after his father's death, married, and the issue of that marriage was one child, a daughter, whose mother died in giving her birth.

"And passing over a long period of years we come to the things which have recently happened, but which could not have been properly understood without this allusion to the past.

"During this interval, Mr. Winberry led the calm and happy life of a country gentleman. His daughter grew up in grace and beauty, and he doated upon her with a rare affection.

"But this happy state of things was destined to be interrupted.

"After all this long absence Adrian returned.

"He sought for and obtained an interview with his brother.

"It afterwards transpired what took place between them on this occasion. Adrian, large and sufficient as his annual income was, had squandered it all, and had come back, not to ask his brother for assistance, but to endeavour to wrest money from him.

"This William Winberry refused to permit, and for a second time did the brothers part in anger.

"About a month after this, Blanche—for that was the name of the daughter—disappeared.

"She had last been seen walking out in the grounds alone, as was her wont, but although the closest search was made, not a trace of her could be found.

"On one of the occasions, when all hope of finding her had been abandoned by all but the father, the bereaved parent set out alone upon his melancholy search.

"That night he never returned.

"Nor the next, nor the next, and from that time nothing could be heard of either father or daughter.

"The only person left in the house besides the domestics was a young lady, a playmate and companion of Blanche's, who will come forward as one of the witnesses in this dark and intricate affair."

CHAPTER CCLXXVIII.

IN WHICH THE COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENCE CROSS-EXAMINES THE POLICE-OFFICER, AND ACCUSES DICK TURPIN OF THE MURDER.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—

"I am well aware that my opening speech has already exceeded the limit considered usual in these cases, but I must beg of you to bear in mind that I have used no circumlocution, but have confined myself to a bare recital of facts.

"But much as I have said, more remains to be told. Indeed, my speech here naturally divides itself into two portions, each of which bear equally upon the other.

"I now come to the part which seems, nevertheless, more intimately acquainted with the matter in hand.

"Without saying how or by whom these persons were abducted, I will take up the thread of my narrative at the point where the charge against the prisoner begins.

"In the Birdcage-walk, as that broad road leading through St. James's-park is called, there stands a row of mansions.

"Not one of you, perhaps, have failed to see them.

"These houses are all well built, commodious residences, and from their desirable position and splendid prospect, command a large rent.

"But the property has recently deteriorated in value from a rather remarkable cause.

"One of these houses to which I am alluding incurred very many years back the imputation of being haunted.

"Whether the grounds upon which this imputation rested were well or ill-founded it is not for me to say, but at all events the house was shut up and abandoned to ruin and decay, for no one could be found to live in it.

"From this cause, then, the adjoining property suffered abatement in value.

"And now, on the twenty-seventh of the past month, and close upon midnight, one of the police-officers employed at Bow-street, whose name is Pursford, was walking along in front of the houses mentioned, when his attention was suddenly arrested by the stealthy and mysterious approach of three persons.

"Secrecy was evidently desired by them, from the manner in which they walked along the street.

"Two of these men were attired in ordinary costumes, the third was enveloped in a cloak which completely concealed his form.

"Perceiving the suspicious appearance of these persons, Pursford, the officer, shrank back into the shadow of the houses, and resolved to keep a watch upon their actions.

"What was his surprise to see them, after cautiously looking round to ascertain whether they were observed, cross the road and disappear beneath the projecting doorway of the haunted house.

"This looked more suspicious than before.

"Pursford left his place of concealment, and came to the doorway of the haunted house.

"It was closed.

"The three mysterious individuals had entered it.

"Convinced that something was wrong, Pursford, being alone, ran off for assistance, and returned about half-an-hour afterwards, bringing a strong force with him.

"Finding the door fast, they broke it open, and ascended the stairs.

"In a room on the second floor they found the body of a man weltering in his blood, his head being almost shattered by a pistol-ball—the features were so disfigured as to make identification by them impossible.

"Seeing a door before them, the officers rushed through it, and captured the two men—one in the gardens, and the other in the act of leaping over into St. James's-park, whither the one in the cloak, and doubtless the principal in the crime, had already made his way.

"But in that large space there was little hope of finding any one, so they gave up the attempt, and contented themselves with leaving the house in charge of the police, and escorting their two prisoners to Newgate.

"And now I must break off to say that on that particular night a notorious criminal had concealed himself in the park, all the avenues from which were guarded, while others searched the grounds.

"Suddenly the man who was on duty at Spring-gardens' gate heard some one approaching, and pounced upon him.

"The other party of searchers now came up, and labouring under the idea that he was the person of whom they were in quest, they carried him straightway to Newgate.

"In the vestibule of the prison, however, the mistake was discovered. They had not caught the person they thought, but Adrian Winberry, the prisoner at the bar, who thereupon indignantly demanded his release, and was about to be set free, when the officers arrived, bringing the two men they had captured at the haunted house.

"Between them and the prisoner at the bar a mutual and immediate recognition took place, which will be distinctly sworn to by several persons.

"Afterwards, however, the recognition was disclaimed by the prisoners, the one asserting that he knew them not, and the others saying that they had made a mistake, as the officers themselves had.

"At any rate, the governor of Newgate thought fit to retain Adrian Winberry a prisoner, and on being brought before a magistrate in due course, he, in common with the men beside him, was pronounced guilty of murder, and sentenced to take his trial in this court, at the bar of which he now stands.

"Such, my lord, is the case against the prisoner at the bar, who stands accused of obtaining a document from his brother, William Winberry, by force, in which the whole of his wealth and estates were made over to him, and also of sending down an attorney to his brother's house, and commissioning him to take possession of the place in his name.

"And now, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, I have brought to a conclusion the longest address I have ever before delivered; but it ought rather to be termed a statement of bare facts than an address.

"It now remains for me to call such evidence as will substantiate that which I have stated to you, after which it will be your province to decide."

Mr. Nuttall sat down amidst a slight hum of applause, which was immediately stifled by the crier.

Mr. Nuttall was quite exhausted, and therefore one of his assistants rose to call the witnesses.

The first witness called was Shockley, the steward.

It is not requisite to give his evidence in full—it is enough to say that he deposed to the main facts in the life of William Winberry, and also how both his master and daughter had been carried off, all which entirely agreed with what Mr. Nuttall had stated, so that that part of the question was disposed of.

The next witness called was the police-officer.

"Abel Pursford!" said the crier.

In obedience to this call, and in an off-hand, every-day manner, the police-officer entered the witness-box, and swore to the facts which the counsel for the prosecution had related.

The counsel for the defence had not troubled Shockley, the steward. Perhaps he felt that there was nothing to be made out of him.

But as soon as the junior counsel for the prosecution had done asking Pursford questions, he was upon his feet in a moment.

Assuming a loud dictatorial manner, he said—

"Now, Able Pursford, listen to me, if you please."

"Yes, sir."

"You saw three men enter the haunted house, you say? Now, what sort of looking men were they?"

"I could not see very well, because it was dark. They were ordinary-looking men, and one wore a long black cloak."

"Oh! ordinary-looking men, were they? Now, what do you mean by ordinary?"

"Ordinary?"

"Yes; do you mean they were just such looking men as you would find in London streets at any time?"

"Yes, sir; with the exception of the one in the cloak."

"Oh! very good. With the exception of the one in the cloak? Now, what was there not ordinary about him?"

"The cloak, sir."

"Oh! and was it a very extraordinary looking cloak?"

"Well, no, sir; not very."

"Not very? Not a very extraordinary looking cloak? Just so. Now, it was quite a common-looking cloak, I dare say, and such as any gentleman might put on to keep him warm on a cold winter's night?"

"Well, yes, sir, it might."

"I thought so. There turns out to be nothing remarkable about it, after all. It was a little bit heightened by your imagination, I dare say. You admit that the three men you saw enter were just such as I might meet in the street at any time?"

"Well, yes, sir."

"Exactly," said the counsel for the defence, looking round him with a triumphant air.

He had certainly achieved a great deal, for he had destroyed the identity of the prisoners. Mr. Pursford could not swear they were the same he had seen enter, after making such an admission as that.

"Stop a moment, Mr. Pursford, I have not done with you yet. After you watched these three men in—by-the-by, will you swear they are the three prisoners at the bar?"

"Well, sir, I"——

"Will you swear the men you saw enter are the prisoners at the bar? Recollect you are on your oath, and perjury is punished heavily, both in this world and the next. Can you swear to them?"

"Not by their looks I can't, sir."

"Of course not. Then how else can you swear to them?"

"I'll swear that those two standing this side are the same that I captured in the house when I broke into it, and that is much the same thing to my thinking."

"Oh! but it isn't. It's quite a different affair altogether. Will you swear to the other prisoner?"

"No, sir, I can't swear to him."

"Very good, then, that is just what I wanted to come at; but stop a moment, I have not done with you yet. I have a question or two more to ask you Mr. Pursford."

CHAPTER CCLXXIX.

THE COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENCE TRIES TO BOTHER THE JURY, AND CHARGES DICK TURPIN WITH THE MURDER OF WILLIAM WINBERRY.

THE counsel for the defence inflated his cheeks as he spoke, and looked very knowing and pompous, while the spectators looked anxiously to see what piece of cleverness was going to follow.

But Pursford, the police-officer, preserved an unruffled demeanour.

It was not the first time he had stood in the witness-box, nor was it the first time he had stood the test of a cross-examination.

His coolness seemed to aggravate the counsel slightly, for the officer seemed to say by his looks, "Proceed, I am quite ready to answer any question you may think proper to ask me."

"Now, Mr. Pursford."

"Yes, sir."

"You say you saw three ordinary-looking people enter the house in Birdcage-walk, to whose identity you do not like to positively swear?"

"I have already answered that question."

"Oh! very good—very good. You have already answered that question. Well; perhaps you will have no objection to answer another. When you watched these persons in, you went to the door yourself, did you not?"

"Yes, sir."

"And found it fast?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you set out for assistance. Now, how long do you think you were away?"

"About half-an-hour."

"Just so; and, during your absence, did you leave any watch upon the door of this said haunted house?"

"No, sir."

"Oh! you did not leave any watch? Just take a note of that, if you please, gentlemen of the jury. He left no watch at the door while he went away. Then, Mr. Pursford, it is just possible that some other persons might have entered the house during his absence, and that those he saw enter might have left it."

[TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ARE BESIEGED BY THE GENDARMES IN THE OLD MILL.]

"Really," interrupted the judge, "I cannot see the drift of these questions."

"I beg your pardon, my lord," said the counsel for the defence, not abashed in the slightest, for his object was to bother the jury, and get them into a kind of fog. "I beg your pardon, my lord, it concerns the identity of my client."

"Not at all—not at all. The witness says he cannot swear positively that those were the men he saw enter the house, though I believe I am right in saying that such is his impression. But this the witness does most distinctly swear to—the two prisoners at the bar are the men he captured while endeavouring to escape from the haunted house, therefore I cannot help considering these questions unnecessary and irrelevant."

"I bow before your opinion, my lord," said the counsel, "and will take up my questions at another point, and I trust I shall be able, not only to remove the imputation of guilt from my innocent client, but fix it upon the real culprit."

These words were spoken with great emphasis, and had the effect of attracting the attention of every person in court, while the jury nodded their heads, and looked preternaturally wise.

"Now, Mr. Pursford, said the counsel for the defence, as he adjusted his gown to his satisfaction, "when you broke into the haunted house—I believe I am right in saying you broke in?"

"Quite right, sir."

"Just so, Mr. Pursford—just so! Now, when you broke in you were on the ground floor of the house, of course."

"I was, sir, in the entrance-hall."

"Exactly, as you say, in the entrance-hall. Now, such being the case, will you be good enough to inform the jury what circumstance induced you to go upstairs, because it appears to me by my notes that you found the dead body on the second floor."

"You are quite right about where we found the dead body. It was upon the second floor."

"Then what induced you to go up there, for it appears to me that you did go up, and that direct, too. Be good enough to answer that question, Mr. Pursford."

"Certainly, sir. Before we struck a stroke upon the door we all heard the loud report of a pistol."

"Who do you mean by we? Take care, sir; you are upon your oath, recollect."

"Myself, and the police-officers I had got with me."

"Oh! am I to understand that you heard the report of the pistol yourself?"

"Yes, sir, I did hear it."

"Very good. You swear that?"

"I do."

"That is enough, then; hearing the report of the pistol I suppose, coupled with the suspicions which had arose from what you saw, removed whatever scruples you might have had, and you at once proceeded to demolish the door?"

"You are right, sir; that was just it."

"But am I also to understand that as you stood outside of the house, and heard the report of a pistol, you could tell precisely from what portion of the house the sound came, and that you mounted to the second-floor accordingly."

"No, sir."

"How was it, then?"

"When we got inside, the first thing we all did was to unmask our lanterns and look about us. The first thing we noticed was the dust on the floor."

"What made you notice such a trivial thing as that? Gentlemen of the jury, don't be impatient, I shall get the piece of information I am short of directly."

"The house had been shut up for a considerable length of time," said the police-officer, in reply to the question propounded to him by the counsel for the defence, "and the consequence was that the dust had accumulated in it in the most surprising quantities, and on the floor of the entrance-hall it lay almost as thickly as snow."

"Oh! indeed, very singular, but if it lay as thickly as snow, I presume it was of rather a different look."

"It resembled snow in this respect—it left the distinct impression of every foot that trod upon it."

"Oh! did it."

"Yes, and upon looking down on the ground we saw by the aid of the light which the lantern afforded us, that there were the impressions of very many feet, and we at once followed them."

"Then, I suppose it was these footprints in the dust that conducted you so quickly to the second floor?"

"It was, sir; and not only that, we could smell the gunpowder, and hear the rapid tramping of footsteps, as of persons attempting to escape."

"And then, according to the evidence you have given, you entered the room and found the dead body of a man, and you captured two men escaping from the premises."

"That is right, sir."

"And did you look at the faces of the men you captured?"

"I did."

"When and where?"

"At the time of capture and at the time I gave them into custody of Mr. Cawthorn, in the vestibule of Newgate."

"And now, looking at the two men at the bar, are you prepared to swear that they are the two you captured?"

"I am, sir, quite ready."

"Which are the two?"

'Those standing nearest me."

This was conclusive, and the counsel for the defence could say nothing to it.

And now several persons in the court witnessed Mr. Kersey and Mr. Nuttall sending mysterious little billets one to another, and at the end Mr. Nuttall said, addressing the judge:

"My lord, I am instructed by the attorney for the prosecution to ask this witness one or two more questions of very great importance, which will serve to throw considerable light upon the question of the identity of the prisoners."

The judge bowed his head assentingly, and amid a general curiosity, Mr. Nuttall asked Pursford, the officer, the following questions, to which he replied readily enough.

"When you arrived at Newgate with the two prisoners was not something of rather an unusual character taking place there?"

"Yes, sir."

"Be good enough to explain, as briefly as you can, what was taking place."

"Mr. Cawthorn, the governor, and several turnkeys, and other persons were in the vestibule all engaged in talking about something very excitedly, and the subject of the conversation was Mr. Adrian Winberry, the prisoner at the bar, who was there a prisoner."

"Just so. Now you are quite ready to swear you make no mistake. Is it the same who now stands at the bar?"

"It is, sir."

"Well, now, something else took place, did there not?"

"Yes, sir."

"What is it?"

"The moment the two prisoners caught sight of Adrian Winberry, they uttered ejaculations of recognition."

"And did Adrian Winberry recognise them in return?"

"I cannot swear so positively to that, but it is my belief he did, for he started and looked extremely vexed when the two prisoners said they knew him."

"That is sufficient. There were several others present who noticed the recognition?"

"Oh! yes, sir."

"And are you prepared to swear that the prisoner at the bar, Adrian Winberry, is the same person that you found in custody in the vestibule of Newgate upon the occasion in question?"

"I am, sir."

Mr. Nuttall sat down.

But the counsel for the defence was on his legs again instantly.

"Now, Mr. Pursford, attend to me. It appears you have a tolerably good recollection of what took place in the vestibule of the prison?"

"I recollect all the circumstances quite well."

"Then did it not transpire that Mr. Adrian Winberry had been taken prisoner by mistake?"

"Yes, sir. They had taken him under the idea that he was another person."

"And pray who was the other person they mistook him for, Mr. Pursford?"

"Dick Turpin."

"Dick Turpin, the highwayman?"

"The very same, sir."

"Now, gentlemen of the jury," said the counsel for the defence. "Now, gentlemen, I have arrived at the point of which I spoke. Please to bear in mind that this witness distinctly swears that my client, Mr. Adrian Winberry, was taken prisoner in mistake for Dick Turpin, the highwayman."

CHAPTER CCLXXX.

THE MYSTERIOUS LADY REVEALS HERSELF, AND HER BEAUTY CAUSES HER TO BE A POPULAR FAVOURITE.

Now, if the truth must be told, the jury themselves did not see anything in this to make such a rumpus about; but they said nothing, and waited in dignified silence to hear the rest.

More imposingly than before did the counsel for the defence arrange his robes and settle his immaculate peruke upon his head.

"Mr. Pursford, have you ever seen Dick Turpin, the highwayman?"

"Yes, sir, once."

"Only once?"

"That is all, sir."

"Should you know him if you saw him again?"

"I think I should. Once seeing a person is generally enough for me."

"I have no doubt. That, of course, is a part of your profession. Well, will you swear that the person in the cloak was not Dick Turpin?"

"Which person, sir?"

"The person who was enveloped in a cloak, and accompanied by two others, you saw cross the road and enter the haunted house."

Mr. Pursford hesitated.

The counsellor saw it, and the question was repeated in a louder and more emphatic tone of voice.

"I won't swear that is was not——"

"There! The witness won't swear that the man in the cloak was not Dick Turpin, from which I think the inference is clear, that this villainous highwayman, who has made all England ring with his crimes, is the author of this murder!"

This announcement, uttered as it was with extreme vehemence, took the court by surprise.

Dick Turpin, however, was the one who was the most astounded.

Never in all his life had he felt such an inclination to knock any one down as he did to knock down the counsel for the defence.

Knowing all the circumstances from first to last, of course the reader is well aware how utterly groundless was this charge which the counsel brought against him.

Nothing but the thought of the service he should be able to render the mysterious lady and Blanche, whom he had never seen, could have kept him back.

As it was, however, he remained immovable.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I proclaim my client to be perfectly innocent of the crime wherewith he is charged, and Dick Turpin, the highwayman, guilty of it."

Hearing this, Mr. Pursford was about to step out of the witness box, but Mr. Nuttall, with a wave of his hand, stopped him.

"You seemed to break off in what you were going to say just now, is it not so?"

"Yes sir."

"Finish your sentence, then, if you please."

"I intended to say, that, though I could not swear that it was not Dick Turpin I saw with the two men cross the road and enter the haunted house, yet I did not for a moment think it was him."

"Oh! very good, that will do."

"May I stand down?"

"Yes, provided my learned brother does not want to ask you any more questions."

"No, there is nothing more," said the counsel for the defence.

"Mr. Pursford," said Mr. Nuttall, struck with a sudden thought, and preventing the officer accomplishing his escape from the witness-box, which he seemed very desirous to do. "You can go now, but, in all probability, I shall want to call you again at another stage of the proceedings."

With this injunction, Pursford was allowed to take his departure.

"So far there was very little elucidated, though all that they had heard served but to stimulate the desire they felt to hear the sequel.

After Pursford several more witnesses were called, who did no more than corroborate what he had said, but it is not worth while to give all in detail, since it would be nothing but a recapitulation of what has gone before.

We pass on.

"Maud Gouldman!" said Mr. Nuttall's assistant.

The name was repeated by the crier.

Dick Turpin looked up when he heard this name pronounced, curious in the extreme to know who would respond to it, though he more than half suspected who it was.

Nor were his anticipations wrong.

The mysterious lady, in whom Dick felt so much interest, was ushered into the witness-box.

She commanded the instant and universal attention of the whole court.

She was attired as she had been during the whole of the time Dick Turpin had known her—that is to say, in deep black.

The dazzling fairness of her alabaster skin was displayed to the utmost advantage by it; and her extreme beauty drew many a sigh of envy from those females who were in the court, and many a sigh of admiration from those of the opposite sex.

Judge and jurymen alike turned round and gazed upon her while they prepared themselves to listen to what she was about to say with more than ordinary attention.

Such is the influence which personal beauty will always produce.

From where he stood Dick had an excellent view of her.

He had seen her very many times during their brief acquaintanceship, and under many aspects.

In all she had looked extremely beautiful.

Her beauty, too, was of that kind which never fails to win the human heart, and elicit its warmest sympathies.

Her beauty was of that bold attractive character which some so much admire.

One expression was ever on her countenance, and so plain a one that no one could mistake it.

That expression was pure, candid, truthful innocence.

Her features were small and somewhat Madonna-like in their general configuration, especially when she was pensive.

Her forehead was broad, but not particularly high—still high enough for the peculiar style of beauty.

No Parian marble could have vied in whiteness with it, and the contrast between it and her dark—almost black hair, which was parted smoothly upon it—made that whiteness all the more apparent.

Upon finding herself in so conspicuous a position, and with so many eyes fixed upon her, a flush of colour mounted up into her cheeks, and remained there, enhancing in a very great degree her wondrous loveliness.

Mr. Nuttall considerately paused a few moments before questioning her, in order that she might recover her composure somewhat, and be able to reply to him with clearness and precision.

At length he spoke.

"Your name is Maud Gouldman, I believe?"

She inclined her head.

"That answer is not deemed sufficient. You must be good enough to reply in words."

"It is, sir."

"That will do. Will you be good enough to relate what you know as touching this case now under investigation?"

She began thus.

Her voice at first was low and almost inaudible, but as she proceeded she gathered confidence, and spoke in a louder tone.

But so desirous was every one to hear every word that came from her lips, that the silence of the grave prevailed in the crowded court.

"I am distantly related to the family of the Winberrys Between Blanche Winberry and myself there has always existed a strong attachment—it dates from our infancy. We are not, strictly speaking, cousins, but from our intimacy we have assumed that title."

"Does this bear upon the case?" asked the judge, looking towards Mr. Nuttall.

"It does, my lord. But should you prefer the witness to tell her story in her own way, or shall I elicit the testimony I require from her by questions?"

"By questions, I think."

"Very good, my lord. I have no doubt it will save time." Then, looking at Maud Gouldman, he said—

"From your infancy you have resided with the deceased Mr. Winberry, have you not?"

"I have. I was an orphan, and he adopted me."

"Will you be good enough to look towards the prisoners at the bar?"

The witness turned her eyes in that direction.

"Do you know either of them—I mean, have you seen either of them before?"

"I have sir."

"Which one?"

"Mr. Adrian Winberry."

"Point him out to the court."

"He is the one standing furthest from me. The dark one with the white forehead."

This was so prominent and distinguishing a feature that there could be no doubt whatever about the identification.

"When have you seen him?"

"Only once."

"And when was that?"

"About six weeks ago."

"What was the occasion?"

"It was at the Hall."

"You mean the residence of Mr. William Hampstead."

"Yes sir."

"Under what circumstances did you see him?"

"I was in the library with Blanche and her father, when the servant announced Mr. Adrian Winberry."

"Continue, please."

"Mr. Winberry desired us both to leave the room, saying as he did so, that he did not wish us to take any notice of him."

"What then?"

"We obeyed—that is, Blanche and myself—but, in crossing the hall, we encountered him."

"Mr. Adrian Winberry?"

"Yes."

"Did he speak?"

"No, he merely bowed and passed on."

"But you saw him very plainly?"

"Oh! yes, he had his hat off as he has now, and I noticed the difference in colour in the upper and lower parts of his face."

"So you can swear to his identity unhesitatingly."

"I can sir."

"That point, then, I presume is settled. Can you tell what took place between the brothers at the meeting spoken of?"

"I was not present, but, after he had gone, I returned with Blanche to the library, where we found her father much agitated. His daughter, of whom he was extremely—doatingly fond, questioned him closely respecting his agitation, and tried her best to soothe him, when he told her, in my presence, that his brother had squandered away the income left him by his father, and had endeavoured to compel him to advance him money, which he refused to do. High words rose between them, and he said that he had forbidden him ever to enter his doors again."

CHAPTER CCLXXXI.

MAUD GOULDMAN'S EVIDENCE PROVES TO BE VERY IMPORTANT INDEED.

It is questionable whether there could have been found in the whole court a single person who did not implicitly believe every word which Maud Gouldman uttered.

All, save one, bent upon her looks of approval and admiration.

That one was Adrian Winberry.

With folded arms and lowering brows, he stood at the bar and scowled at her.

No stranger was he to those effects by which the human heart is swayed, and he saw with execration the feeling of favour with which this witness was received.

He knew how fearfully every word she uttered would militate against him, and how hopeless would be the attempt to disprove a single one of her statements.

But, like a straw upon the surface of the water, he had no control over himself, but was forced to drift with the tide.

Mr. Nuttall made another pause, affecting to be searching for something among his papers, in order that Maud should quite recover herself, and not lose her presence of mind and say something which would at all tend to throw discredit upon her evidence.

"Now what is the next event which happened in connexion with the present matter? Did you see Adrian Winberry again?"

"No, sir; he did not come near, and Blanche's father particularly requested us never to mention his name to him, because he wished to forget that he had so unworthy a brother in existence."

"Those were his words, I presume?"

"Yes, sir; as nearly as I can remember them."

"Just so; and now what happened next?"

"It was about a month after the visit of Adrian to the hall that Blanche went out to walk in the grounds in the evening, as she was frequently in the habit of doing."

"Alone?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you see her go?"

"Yes; she kissed me before she went, and I stood at one of the windows and watched her across the lawn."

"What time was that?"

"I do not remember exactly, but it was some considerable time before sunset."

"What then?"

"I have never seen her since that time."

"Then, I understand you to say that she walked out alone in the manner you have described, and never returned again."

"Yes, sir, that is it."

"Now continue, if you please.

"When it grew dusk her father inquired for her, and then it was discovered that she had not come back from her walk. Her father, whose affection for her knew no bounds, got terribly anxious and alarmed, but suspecting no ill, I went out with him in search of her."

"And that search was resultless?"

"Quite; not a trace of her could we find. We returned to inquire whether she had come back, and were replied to in the negative. It was then quite dark, and we all grew frightened. Her father, accompanied by the menservants on the estate, and provided with lanterns, set out again in search of her, bidding me keep the house. They returned some hours afterwards, tired out, and unable to find the least trace of the object which they sought."

"And she was not found, you say?"

"Never! The neighbours all—for they knew and loved her—joined with her father in the search for many days ensuing, but at last all except her father gave it up in despair. He, however, continued it alone, being all the time distracted with grief for the loss of his daughter, whom he loved more than he loved his own life."

Upon reaching this point in her evidence, Maud broke down.

More than once she had stifled the sobs which rose up in her throat, and restrained the tears which were ready to gush from her eyes.

But at length she found she could do so no longer.

Her emotion could no longer be subdued, and she wept bitterly.

There were many moist eyes in the court, for the simple, clear, and truthlike manner in which she had given her evidence touched the hearts of all, and even the stern judge, under the pretence of wiping the perspiration from his forehead, wiped a tear from the corner of his eye.

A chair was called for and placed in the witness-box for her to sit down upon.

A glass of water was brought for her to drink.

Indeed, all seemed to vie with each other in offering her attentions.

But after a brief pause, during which she composed herself, she rose to her feet to show that she was ready for her examination to continue.

"Would you like a longer rest?" asked Mr. Nuttall, kindly.

"No, sir, I thank you; I do not wish to waste the time of those present; I am quite ready, if you will resume your questions."

"Very well, then; I will do so, and as briefly as I can, in order to release you from your unpleasant situation."

Maud bowed.

"You were speaking of Mr. Winberry?"

"Yes; I said that though his friends and neighbours gave up the search in despair, he did not, but continued it himself."

"Did he go alone?"

"Not at first; he took the servants with him, but in a little while he tired them completely out. As for himself, he seemed unconscious of fatigue, and rather than relinquish the search, continued it himself alone and unaided."

"For how long did he continue it?"

"Only a few days. Like Blanche, he went out and never returned."

"How strange."

"Very strange. I was then the only one left at the hall with the exception of the domestics, and what to do I knew not."

"What did you do eventually?"

"I asked for advice, and was referred to Mr. Winberry's solicitor, Mr. John Kersey, who came down to the Hall, and to whom I related all the particulars."

"Just so; then that, I presume, is sufficient so far. Now, be good enough to tell me what followed."

"By Mr. Kersey's advice I came up to London to his house. He then took me to view the body of a man who had been found murdered in a house in the Bridewalk."

"Well."

"The features were much disfigured—obliterated I might say—but I recognised him instantly."

"And who was it?"

"Blanche's father."

A strange sound in the crowded court followed this announcement.

Everybody expected the reply which would be given to the question, and the moment the simple words, "Blanche's father," were uttered, every one in court drew in his breath involuntarily, and it was this simultaneous inhalation of breath into so many lungs, which produced the strange sound we have mentioned.

United, they formed a kind of gasping sob.

But Mr. Nuttall, after waiting a moment for this reply to have its full effect, resumed his interrogation.

"You are quite certain that you were not mistaken in the identity of the dead body?"

"Quite sure."

"It was he whom you had known in life as Mr. William Winberry?"

"It was."

"But if the features were, as you say, almost obliterated, how is it you can be so positive with regard to his identification?"

"I went by his general appearance to some extent, and besides, I was shown the clothes, which I could swear to as being those worn by him when I last saw him."

"And was there anything more to assist you in this identification?"

"Yes, something which put it beyond all reasonable doubt."

"Will you tell us what it is?"

"Mr. William Winberry was slightly lame in his left foot, and was in the habit of walking with a stick. The lameness was caused by a heavy weight once falling upon his foot and almost crushing it. I believe some of the bones were crushed, but at any rate it left the upper part of his foot a purplish-black. The accident happened when I was a little child, though I remember it perfectly well, and have seen his foot as I have described it to you a thousand times."

"And did the left foot of this dead body exhibit the appearance which you have just described?"

"It did."

"And therefore you dismissed all doubts from your mind?"

"I did."

"And when did you see this body?"

"This morning, just before the commencement of the trial."

"Where?"

"In an adjoining room."

"My lord," said Mr. Nuttall, "I have done with this witness for the present. The evidence she has given, you cannot fail to see, is most important. In my humble judgment there should be a pause made in the proceedings here, in order that the jury may have an opportunity of inspecting the body of the deceased, and ascertaining whether it presents the appearance she has described. Of course, I say this without prejudice to my learned brother for the defence, who may wish to cross-examine Miss Maud Gouldman."

The defending counsel rose up—

"I have no questions I wish to ask Miss Maud Gouldman. I would not be guilty of the rudeness of insinuating that she has misstated or perverted any fact."

This sentiment, concurring so well as it did with the opinion of the mass of spectators who thronged the court, produced a loud demonstration of applause, which no one attempted to check.

The counsel for the defence sat down with a smile on his face.

A politic man was that counsel for the defence.

He knew well enough that he shared in the odium which hung over his client.

He knew that the popular feeling was against him.

He knew the unfavourable nature of the comparis on which would be instituted between Adrian Winberry and Maud Gouldman.

To have asked a single question—to have made the least attempt to throw discredit on her testimon y—would only have increased the public dislike.

But his object was to win for himself and for his client as much suffrage and sympathy as possible, and that object was gained.

By the refusal to cross-examine, and by the utte rance of that sentiment, he had ingratiated him self more than he could possibly have done by any other means, and he cannot but be admired for the tact and management with which he had successfully achieved his end.

And though his cause appeared so hopeless, yet he by no means despaired of gaining the acquittal of his client, Adrian Winberry.

CHAPTER CCLXXXII.

THE COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION MAKES AN APPEAL TO THE JUDGE FOR PROTECTION FOR HIS WITNESS, WHICH IS REFUSED HIM.

THE suggestion made by Mr. Nuttall to the effect that there should be a temporary suspension of the proceedings while the jury went to view the body, was immediately acted upon.

The corpse of the deceased Mr. William Winberry had been removed to the Sessions-house, Old Bailey, and placed in one of the ante-rooms adjoining the court.

Mr. Kersey was aware of this, and though he would fain have spared Maud Gouldman the additional horror of gazing upon the disfigured corpse, still the sacred cause of justice rendered it imperatively necessary.

Nerving herself, then, as well as she was able, to bear the revolting sight, she had, as she had stated in her evidence, entered the room and identified the body of the murdered man.

As soon as the jury had left their seats, Mr. Kersey made his way towards the witness-box, and, taking Maud by the hand, led her to an obscure seat.

The prisoners, too, were allowed to sit down, while in the body of the court there arose that hum and murmur which ever takes place upon such occasions.

All was confusion.

The jury, however, were not long absent.

They were satisfied with one glance at the ghastly and horrible form.

Then they turned away sickened and disgusted.

The foot, however, was shown to them, and its appearance entirely corresponded with the description which the fair witness had given of it.

Moreover, one of the jurymen, who by profession happened to be a surgeon, gave it to be his deliberate opinion that what they saw had been caused by a weight falling upon it and crushing it.

This, then, was satisfactory in the extreme, so far as the identification of the body went, and this also established the connecting link between the two divisions of the counsel for the prosecution's address.

They then all returned to the court, and took their seats.

Silence was restored.

Mr. Kersey was next placed in the witness-box.

The facts he swore to were unimportant, but still corroborative of what had been stated in connexion with him.

The counsel for the defence was asked whether he wished to put any questions to this witness, and he replied in the negative.

Then there was a pause.

The judge spoke.

"Is this the case for the prosecution?"

Mr. Nuttall rose.

There was something he wished to say, but he did not know how to give it utterance.

"It is, and it is not, my lord."

"What do you mean?"

"This, my lord. If you consider the evidence we have adduced sufficiently conclusive to substantiate the charge against the prisoners at the bar, the case is ended: but if we should be of a contrary opinion, and think the evidence not sufficient to support the accusation, we have another witness to call."

"This is something very extraordinary. I am not in a position to express an opinion. I should be taking the function out of the hands of the jury. Why not call this witness at once?"

"My lord, I wish sincerely that I could, because the evidence that he would give would be so much to the point, and so terribly conclusive, inasmuch as he was positively a spectator of the murder of which the three prisoners at the bar stand accused."

This announcement, which Mr. Nuttall uttered in a loud, clear, and distinct voice, created a profound sensation in the court.

The counsel for the defence looked doubtful and anxious, though he was on the watch to lay hold of any circumstance that might take place.

But as for the three prisoners, they were the most affected by this speech.

It was easy to see that the self-possession which they had hitherto preserved forsook them, and Adrian Winberry, turning ghastly pale, grasped the front of the dock with a nervous grip.

Who was this witness? he asked himself.

Who was in that foot-forsaken place at the same time as he was.

What invisible eye had witnessed the foul murder?

These were the questions which succeeded each other with lightning rapidity in Adrian's mind.

But all those questions, terribly and vitally important as they were, were unanswerable.

With straining eyes and bated breath, he glared at the counsel for the prosecution, anxious to catch the next words which came from his lips.

"This, then," said the judge, "is an all-important and indispensable witness. Why do you hesitate to call him?"

"My lord, there are cogent reasons for it. Chance alone—Providence—call it what you will, caused his presence in the haunted house when the murder was committed. But he was there, and an unsuspected witness of the murder which was perpetrated."

"Then why did he not come forward on the inquest? This conduct, you will find, will have the effect of throwing discredit on his evidence."

"I trust it will not, my lord, when you hear the reason of his non-appearance."

"What is that reason?"

"Personal danger."

"Personal danger!" repeated the judge, in accents of the utmost surprise. Believe me, I am curious in the extreme to know what personal danger a witness can incur in coming into court to give his evidence."

"My lord, he does incur very great personal danger. It was hoped that he would be spared the necessity of coming forward. That hope, however, which was a frail one, has turned out fallacious."

"Be good enough to come to the point, brother Nuttall."

"I will, my lord. Do you think that the personal attendance of this witness could be avoided?"

"Certainly not."

"I am sorry to hear you say as much, my lord. I thought if he put down in writing what he had seen, and swore to it before witnesses, that the reading of such a document would enable you to dispense with his appearance."

"It might under some conditions, perhaps, but decidedly not where so grave a charge as the present is at stake. It would be most prejudicial to admit written evidence of such a kind."

"I am in duty bound to bow to your decision, my lord."

"What is the nature of the personal danger which the witness will incur by stepping into the witness-box?"

"Capture by the police, my lord."

"Ahem. That is awkward. Why is he liable to capture?"

"He is liable to a charge of felony."

"Oh! indeed."

"That is precisely the case, my lord; or rather, to have it in full, thus. The witness of whom I speak, being pursued by the police, took refuge from them in the haunted house, which has to-day so frequently been made mention of. While hiding there he saw the three prisoners enter, and also saw the murder committed. Then, as Pursford, the officer, has related, he broke in; and this witness was again compelled to fly for his life, and only escaped capture by making his way over the housetops, to the imminent hazard of his life."

The judge glared at Mr. Nuttall while he made this statement, and, not knowing what else to say, uttered his former ejaculation of—

"Oh! indeed."

Mr. Nuttall held up a small folded paper.

"I have here," he said, "in writing, and sworn to in the presence of two witnesses, an account of what the person witnessed, to whom I have alluded; and as he cannot make his appearance without exposing himself to the certain risk of capture, I think your lordship would not be doing wrong in permitting this document to be read as evidence."

Before the judge could reply, the counsel for the defence rose to his feet.

"Pardon me, my lord, one moment," he said. I have not spoken before, because I wished to see how far my learned friend for the prosecution would go in this matter. Surely, my lord, you will not do my client—of whose perfect and entire innocence I feel convinced—I say you will not do him such an injustice, nor establish in this court so dangerous a precedent, as to receive the written evidence of a witness who dares not come forward. The mischief that would hereafter ensue is incalculable."

"I beg your pardon," said the counsel for the prosecution, "the witness of whom I speak does dare to come forward; but, as he perils his liberty by doing so, it was wished to try whether it cannot be dispensed with. My lord, I wait for your decision."

"Has this man been guilty of many serious crimes?"

"He has not been tried and found guilty of any, though several have been laid to his charge."

"Is there a warrant out against him authorising his apprehension?"

"I believe so, my lord."

"It appears to me that the evidence you say it lies in his power to give is indispensable, and such as no other person can give?"

"Just so, my lord."

"It is very awkward."

"My lord, I have yet another proposition to make to you. If this document cannot be received as evidence, would you throw the shield of your protection round this witness, and prevent his capture?"

"I fear I have no power. My jurisdiction is confined within the four walls of this court."

"But, my lord, if this man comes here voluntarily in the cause of justice, and at the peril of his own liberty, surely, I should think, he ought to be protected."

"You say he will come forward?"

"Yes, my lord; he is in the court at the present moment awaiting your decision."

There was a visible commotion all over the court, caused by each person looking earnestly and eagerly into the face of his neighbour.

Dick did not shrink back and strive to avoid detection. Such a course would, he knew, immediately ensure detection, so he assumed as much curiosity as those who happened to be standing near him, and who returned his gaze without suspecting him to be the person alluded to.

"My decision is this," said the judge. "If the witness chooses to come forward and give his testimony, it will be entirely at his own risk—I am powerless to protect him. Still, should he be captured here, the circumstances under which the capture took place will doubtless have the effect of mitigating the rigour of his punishment."

Mr. Nuttall shook his head.

"That is poor encouragement. Still, I cannot help your decision. Of its justice I do not say a word. The witness is here, and has overheard all that has passed. If he likes to step into the witness-box he can. If he does, the punishment of the guilty must follow, and it appears to me his capture also. The risk is to be run. He can come forward or not, just as he may think proper. Only I think he ought to be warned what will be the result."

"If a warrant is out against him," said the judge, "I cannot interpose between him and the officers of justice."

CHAPTER CCLXXXIII.

DICK TURPIN, AT ALL RISKS, ENTERS THE WITNESS-BOX, AND IS RECOGNISED BY MR. WRIGGLES.

A STRANGE hushed silence followed this decision, which was enunciated in a low tone, yet with extreme distinctness.

It will be seen that this last speech of Mr. Nuttall's was intended entirely for the edification of Dick Turpin, so that he should not come forward in ignorance of what would be the consequence.

There was little very tempting in it, and Dick asked himself the question whether he should be justified in throwing away his life—for it would be doing nothing less for one chief good of some one he had never seen—namely, Blanche Winberry.

His eyes roamed round the court after the counsel had spoken, and they rested upon the countenance of Maud Gouldman.

That decided him.

She did not perceive his glance; her attention was rivetted upon the judge and Mr. Nuttall.

But that one glance decided Dick.

Drawing his cloak close up to his chin, he moved aside those who were before him, and strode in a direct line towards the witness-box.

The movement of this one cloaked figure from among the mass attracted immediate attention.

All eyes were fixed upon it.

Those who could not see so well rose up and craned their necks over the heads of those who sat before them.

A lane was opened.

Every one stood aside.

Seeing this, Dick availed himself of it to make all speed possible, and then, not without a strange fluttering at his heart, which he tried in vain to subdue, he stood within the witness-box.

He held his hat in his hand.

The lower part of his face, however, was covered with his cloak.

A faint cry came from the lips of Maud Gouldman as she saw him, and she said:

"No, no, it must not be—the sacrifice is too great."

"Nay," replied Dick, "I am here."

The full, rich tones of his voice penetrated like music into the utmost recesses of the court.

The curiosity of all persons received a fresh addition, and no small degree of attention was directed to Maud, who, covering her face with her handkerchief, shrunk back from the public scrutiny.

It would be hard to say who looked at Dick with the greatest amount of eagerness.

Adrian Winberry glared at the cloaked and unrevealed character which was to utter such conclusive and condemnatory evidence against him.

The judge was the first to recover himself.

Looking at Mr. Nuttall, he said:

"Is this the witness of whom you spoke?"

"It is, my lord. You see, despite the warning words I uttered for his special behoof, he has, of his own free will, made his way into the witness-box. He knows the penalty of what he has done, but he is there to further the ends of justice, and take the responsibility of his own actions."

"Then," said the judge, with some degree of fervour, "be he whom he may, such behaviour is in the highest degree praiseworthy and commendable."

Dick bowed deeply in reply to this complimentary speech.

"Let the witness reveal himself," added the judge.

"One moment, my lord," said Mr. Nuttall. "Ere it be too late, let me make a last appeal, that as he has come forward in the manner you have seen, you will screen him from the consequences."

"I have already said it does not lie within my power. If it did, I should only be too glad to act in the manner you request."

"There is no resource, then. Witness, are you willing to reveal yourself?"

Dick made no reply by words.

He released his cloak, which he held around him with one hand only, and it fell flutteringly to his feet.

He drew himself proudly up to his full height, and stood exposed to the gaze of all.

But there was no sudden cry of recognition, as he had more than half suspected.

The book was handed to him, and the customary oath proposed.

It was taken.

Then was propounded the first and vitally-important question:

"What is your name?"

A breathless silence followed the utterance of this query.

A silence that was positively painful.

Dick once more glanced around him.

Then he said, quietly:

"John Palmer."

Scarcely had the words passed his lips, than a man near the door of the court gesticulated furiously, and cried:

"False—false! A thousand pounds reward! I claim it! False—false! That is not John Palmer, but Dick Turpin, the highwayman! Seize him! seize him!"

The scene of confusion that now ensued is perfectly indescribable.

As if by magic the interior of the court was converted into Bedlam.

For a long time all attempts to restore order were in vain.

The judge stood up.

"Clear the court!" he cried, "clear the court! Am I to be insulted in this manner? Clear the court!"

These words had the effect of restoring silence.

"Where is the man who cried out just now?" exclaimed the judge, as soon as he could make his voice heard. "Bring him before me! Where is he?"

"It is me, my lord. Here I am," said a voice, and some one struggled forward to the centre of the court.

Dick knew him at a glance.

It was his old foe, Mr. Wriggles.

Now the judge, when he saw this man was a police-officer, was not so wrathful, still he demanded what he meant by breaking the peace of the court.

"Pardon me, my lord," said Mr. Wriggles, "but that man in the witness-box is no other than the notorious and desperate highwayman, Dick Turpin, and for whose apprehension I have a warrant now in my possession. May I seize him, my lord?"

"Certainly not, Mr. Officer, certainly not. He stands here in the sacred position of a witness on the side of truth, and as such he is entitled to protection, at all events until he leaves the place where he now is, after which I have no power to prevent you from exercising the duties of your office upon him."

The former part of the speech was greeted with applause by the spectators of the court, but the latter portion with loud expressions of disapproval.

It was easy to see that Dick was a favourite, and that the popular feeling was entirely on his side.

He bowed several times to the mass of people during the manifestation of their suffrage.

This appeared to give them unqualified delight, while abuse of all kinds was levelled at the head of Mr. Wriggles; nor could silence be obtained until they set about clearing the court.

The desire to hear the rest of the remarkable proceedings, which had now reached their most interesting point, triumphed over every other consideration, and seeing the officials fully in earnest, they suddenly became as quiet as mice.

Mr. Wriggles gradually worked his way to the witness-box, until he got so close that he could, by reaching out his arm, have touched Dick Turpin, had he been so minded. There was on exultant grin upon his features. He had entered the court, still smarting under the defeat he had just experienced, and wondering how he should get the highwayman in his clutches, when suddenly he appeared before his very eyes.

And now this interruption and excitement over, the business of the court resumed its ordinary manner.

The judge himself addressed our hero.

"It appears, then, that you are the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin. I can now understand your reluctance to coming forward as a witness; and that you should do so at all risks fills me with admiration."

Dick bowed.

"I am not afraid to say that this is the first time such a thing has occurred," continued the judge, who could not overcome his surprise; and I am scarcely able to believe it. However, not to take up the time of the court, for this case has been prolonged for a considerable length, be good enough to state what you know about this transaction. Speak freely and fully."

There was an intense desire to catch the first words from the highwayman's lips.

"My lord," he began, in a calm voice, and not like one who stood in so perilous a position. "My lord, as you have already been told in court, I wrote down the whole of the particulars of this business, so far as I was concerned in it."

"Yes, we have had that stated already by the counsel for the prosecution."

"I was about to ask whether you would permit me to have that paper to refer to, so that I shall not make any mistake, or omit any detail. It was written with great care and attention."

The counsel for the defence rose to his feet.

"My lord," he said, "will you have the kindness to inform me whether it is your intention to receive what this man says as evidence?"

"Assuredly."

"Then, my lord—pardon me for my boldness in saying so—I consider you have decided very improperly."

"Sir!"

"Pardon me, my lord, but this man is a common felon—his life is forfeit to the hangman; besides, I accuse him of being the perpetrator of this foul murder."

"You are slightly in error, I think, brother," said the judge, calmly. "You wish to throw discredit on what this man is about to say."

"I consider he ought not to be believed upon his oath, my lord."

"And I am of an entirely different opinion. The very fact of his forfeiting his liberty, and consequently his life in the manner that he has, is sufficient proof, I should think, that he comes here on the side of truth and justice."

A loud cheer from the spectators greeted this speech, but it was immediately checked by the criers.

"I shall certainly hear what this man has to say," said the judge, "and shall note carefully how what he says corresponds with the evidence which has formerly been given."

"Shall I hand him the paper for which he asked?" inquired the counsel for the prosecution.

"No; give it to me. I will myself peruse it, and question him from it, which will be imposing a severer test."

In accordance with this determination, the paper was handed to the judge, who looked at it for some moments in silence.

The substance of it seemed quite satisfactory, so he turned round to Dick and prepared to question him.

As he did so there was upon his face too plain an expression of interest and compassion to be mistaken.

Seeing what was going to follow, it must of necessity be full of interest. There once more reigned in that court the death-like and oppressive silence which had more than twice marked the day's proceedings.

CHAPTER CCLXXXIV.

DICK TURPIN GIVES HIS EVIDENCE AGAINST ADRIAN WINBERRY, AND SWEARS TO THE IDENTITY BOTH OF HIM AND HIS ACCOMPLICES.

"On a certain night," said the judge, "you, Richard Turpin, the highwayman, were pursued by the police, and took refuge in St. James's-park. Is that so?"

"It is, my lord," replied Dick.

"After you had gained the inclosure, be good enough to relate what took place."

"My foes were hard upon my track, and I ran across the Mall, which brought me to the palings protecting the inclosure containing the piece of ornamental water. I had previously sprained my ankle, and I suffered acute pain. I intended to climb over these palings, but owing to the pain, I was not able to do it at the first trial."

"Go on; that exactly corresponds with what is set down here."

"While standing here to recover myself, I heard the loud blast of a bugle somewhere within the park, which was presently answered by another on my right, another on my left, and another before me."

"Just so. Please continue. These are minor particulars, but still they may turn out to be of importance as the evidence proceeds. What next?"

"I was at a loss to think what this meant, until the thought occurred to me that my foes, knowing I was somewhere in the park, had communicated with the soldiers who guarded the various exits from the park, for them to allow no person to pass out."

"Precisely."

"Having come to this conclusion, I succeeded in climbing over the palings, and made my way to the ornamental water. To have gone round it would have taken me too much time, so I swam across it."

"Yes, Proceed, so far you are quite right according to the paper."

"Upon reaching the opposite bank, I felt I had a few minutes' rest and reflection left me, so I paused, and thought what means I should adopt to get out of the park. I then all at once remembered that one of the row of houses which are in Birdcage-walk was shut up and deserted, being haunted. To this I determined to make my way, and try and effect an entrance to it, for I feared my foes more than apparitions."

"Go on."

"Having taken this resolution, I made my way with all speed to my destination, and, as the distance is not great, I reached it in a few moments. My desperate emergency lent me strength, and I mounted those palings also, and dropped into the garden of the haunted house, for such it has all along been called.

"I need not describe all the difficulties I encountered in seeking to effect an entrance to this deserted mansion. Let it suffice I entered through the door leading into the lower kitchen.

"From this last-named place I made my way up to the floor above, which was, of course, the ground-floor of the mansion.

"The whole place was intensely silent, and the only thing that can be compared to its silence is its profound darkness.

"Upon reaching the entrance-hall I could, by the aid of the fanlight over the front door and the two narrow windows which were upon either side of it, see tolerably well about me.

"On my left hand, as I stood facing the front door, was a flight of stairs very noble in their appearance and with richly-carved balusters.

"I had now to consider what should be my next step to escape, so I determined to ascend the stairs, and try and find (if I could) some hiding-place above."

Dick paused for breath.

"Go on," said the judge. "You are quite right so far."

"I ascended the stairs, then, but before I reached the first turn in the staircase, I heard a slight sound which in the stillness of that empty house sounded like a loud one.

"At first I did not know what produced it, but I soon remembered it was a key rattling in a lock, as though some one was rather impatient about unfastening it.

"This, considering the reputation of the house, was a strange and suspicious occurrence, so I crouched down upon the stairs to see what was about to take place.

"I was not kept long in suspense, for the door was thrown open and three men entered."

"Will you swear distinctly that you saw three men?"

"I will, my lord; for, having entered and closed the door behind, one called for a light, and immediately a dark lantern was produced. By the aid of this I saw them, though not so distinctly as I did afterwards. One, however, (he who had called for a light), wore upon his head a large felt hat with slouching brim and a long black cloak muffled up in his neck."

"You saw that?"

"Yes, but more distinctly a little while after, as I will relate to your lordship."

"Go on, then."

"As you may suppose, my lord, I felt so much interest in this stealthy visit at the hour of midnight—for, as I take it, it was somewhere about that time—that I forgot to a great extent my own danger, and the occasion of my presence in that house, and became quite absorbed in watching their actions.

"I was well hidden where I was, and thought I should not have to move, but in this I was mistaken, for the three men came directly towards the stairs, and commenced ascending them.

"This, of course, necessitated a change of position, and, therefore, I silently ascended the stairs before them, and did not pause until they stopped upon the second landing.

"Here there was a massive-looking door, and it was before this they all halted."

"I presume," said the judge, "from the position you occupied upon the lower portion of the third flight of stairs, you had a full view of the door of the room in question?"—"I had, my lord."

[MR. CAWTHORN IN TRIUMPH ESCORTS DICK TURPIN TO THE NEWGATE CELL.]

"Continue your narrative."

"The one in the cloak pushed aside his cloak and felt for the key which he presently produced. I mention the displacement of the cloak because I then saw the clothing beneath it, which was of a rich and costly material, and such as would be worn by gentlemen."

"Did you see the face of the person who wore the cloak?"

"I saw the lower portion of it, my lord, as he stooped down and fitted the key into the lock. The beams of the dark lantern, which one of the others carried, fell full upon it."

"Now look carefully at the prisoners at the bar, and tell me whether you recognise either of them as the person you saw fitting the key into the lock of the door?"

"My lord, the one standing furthest from me, with his hand clutching the front of the dock, is the one. He has made some changes in his personal appearance, but I can swear to him, for all that. I saw him so distinctly, not only at the time now referred to, but afterwards."

"In what respect has he changed his appearance?"

"My lord, you now see him with his face smooth-shaven. When I saw him he wore a profusion of hair upon the lower part of it."

"That will do, and now continue your narrative, which, up to the present time, you have given with remarkable clearness and accuracy, so far as corresponding with this document goes. The principal, and by far the most important portion of your evidence, I see, remains to be given, but do not be hasty. Let us have the whole straightforward."

"I will try my best, my lord. I left off where I stood watching them fit the key into the lock. The door was opened, and the moment it was I heard some one within the room into which it led utter some words in a shrill and shrieking tone of voice, and so strained was it that I could not tell at first whether it was a man or whether it was a woman who spoke."

"What was the purport of those words?"

"That, my lord, I can hardly tell you, they were so disjointed and incoherent; but they were to the effect that he would not listen or be persuaded to do something."

"And you do not recollect any of them?"

"No, my lord."

"Continue, then."

"The one in the cloak bade those with him to enter, saying, at the same time, he would follow. All three passed into the room, the door of which they left ajar.

"Immediately upon their entrance the shrieks ceased, and I, more curious than before, stole down the stairs, and stood close to the partially open door.

"From where I stood I could not see into the interior of the room, but I could hear every word that was said. The exact words I cannot remember, but the substance of what was said is this. The tall man in the cloak, who I could recognise by the deep and peculiar tones of his voice, was endeavouring, by threats and persuasions, to induce some one to sign a deed transferring his property to him.

"Stop a moment," said the judge. "You swear that is the substance of what passed?"

"I do, my lord."

"I will make a note of it, then."

"The person to whom he addressed himself, and who appeared to be kept in this room as a kind of prisoner, refused to accede to what was demanded of him, but the argument that the one in the cloak brought forward oftenest, and laid the most stress upon was this. If he would sign the deed, his daughter should be restored to him. He also agreed to leave sufficient to keep them both in comfort, provided he would sign the deed."

"Was the name of this daughter mentioned?"

"Yes, my lord."

"What was it?"

"Blanche."

"Indeed! This affair grows blacker and blacker. And was this daughter Blanche spoken of by the one in the cloak as being in his power?"

"She was, my lord; and he also held out threats as to what her fate should be if he refused to do as he required."

"What next?"

"Some harsh recriminating words followed, in the course of which things which had happened in the past were referred to. This conversation let me know that the one in the cloak and the person to whom he addressed himself were brothers—or rather half-brothers, being sons by the same fathers but different mothers."

"You could not repeat that conversation?"

"No, my lord, I cannot recollect it word for word, but what I have just said is what it all amounted to."

"Proceed, then."

"Up to this point, my lord, I had heard without seeing, but it occurred to me that if I made a change in my position, I should be able to see into the interior of the room, which would materially assist me to comprehend what was taking place."

"And could you see?"

"Yes, my lord; I moved, and then found I could see the chief actors in the interesting scene I had overheard."

"Be good enough to describe what you saw."

"My first ideas respecting it, my lord, were quite realized. The door led into an apartment, at one end of which, and full in my view, was seated in an old-fashioned chair an emaciated, white-headed old man.

"His arms were held down on either side of him by the two men, who kept a firm grasp upon them—for every moment the old man strove to rise from his seat, but each time they forced him back into it."

"Stop," said the judge; "I will make a note of that."

CHAPTER CCLXXXV.

DICK TURPIN IS CROSS-EXAMINED BY THE COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENCE.

Not a single word in the shape of interruption had been uttered from the time when Dick Turpin commenced to give his testimony.

From the mere fact of the judge having questioned him all through in the manner he did, it can be seen how deep an interest he felt in all that fell from his lips, and how much value he set upon what he said.

Himself and Dick, then, were the only speakers in the court, and had been so for some time.

As for the spectators, their first excitement over, they had sat mute and motionless, listening to the romantic narrative which Dick related with breathless and feverish interest.

The reader is, of course, acquainted with it all from first to last, but it was deemed expedient to set down in this place the words exactly as they came from Dick Turpin's mouth, because the counsel for the defence afterwards cross-examined him upon many of the points upon which he spoke, being engaged all the time Dick was speaking in taking down his words in shorthand.

The judge finished his note, and turned over a fresh page.

"Now," he said, "I have written here, that from where you stood, you could see the men as they held the old man down in the chair. Is that right?"

"Quite right,"

"Be careful, please, for this is a serious business."

"I am aware of it, my lord, and am relating to you just what I witnessed, and no more."

"Exactly; now tell me, could you see the faces of these two men?"

"I could, my lord; and their forms also."

"Indeed. Well, then, look at the prisoners at the bar attentively, and then tell the court whether you can see the two men who held the old man down in the chair."

The two accomplices of Adrian Winberry looked very uneasy upon hearing these words, and screwed up their faces so as to baffle Dick if they could.

But they failed in their attempt.

Like the police-officer, Pursford, who, in giving his evidence said that when he once saw a person he always knew them again, Dick had a remarkable memory of faces.

When he looked at the two men, then, he knew them instantly—for, of course, while he stood at the partially-open door, he had had an ample opportunity of studying their countenances.

"My lord," said Dick, "I am quite prepared to swear that those two men, who are standing nearest this way, are the same I saw in the haunted house, holding the old man down in the chair."

It was easy to see that these words, uttered as they were in a tone of firm and earnest conviction, produced a great effect on the jury.

"That is quite conclusive. Now relate what else you saw and heard."

"I will, my lord. The means by which I saw the old man and those who held him was afforded me by the dark lantern, which they had placed on the table with the door open, so that the light which it emitted was diffused, and not concentrated, as it would have been if the lens had been before the light.

"At first I did not see the one who wore the cloak. He was standing where the door had hid him from my view. Presently, however, he stepped forward, and I saw him as distinctly as either of the others, and that is the reason why I swore so positively to his identity before when you asked me."

"I will make a note of that," said the judge.

Several of the jury did likewise.

The judge, having finished his writing, looked up to Dick, who understood from the action that he was to continue.

"I saw him with a paper in his hand, which he spread out and put upon the table. From its general appearance, seeing it from the distance, I took it to be a deed. The one in the cloak rested one finger upon it, and renewed his solicitations to the other to sign it.

"Still the old man refused.

"As the conversation went on, I soon found that the conditions were that the old man should be released from his present place of confinement, his daughter Blanche be restored to him, and an annual income settled upon him if he would sign this deed, and transfer the whole of his wealth and property to him."

"But you say that this proposal was rejected?"

"Yes, my lord, for a long time; but at length he did consent. In order to be reunited to his daughter he sacrificed everything. With a hasty hand he seized the pen and affixed his signature to the document."

"Did you see him do it?"

"I did not see him write his name, my lord. I was not near enough, but I saw him take the pen and write something rapidly."

"Yes, that is what I thought."

"My lord, I ought to tell you that I anticipated the perpetration of some atrocious treachery, and, could I have done so, I would have warned the old man not to sign. But I was powerless to interfere."

"What did you see next?"

"Scarcely had the old man finished making the few strokes with his pen, than the one in the cloak with great rapidity pulled a pistol from his apparel, and holding it against the old man's head, fired it."

A lond cry of irrepressible horror rose from all in court upon hearing the particulars of this cold-blooded assassination.

But, seeing the judge's lips move, all were again instantly silent.

"Did you not, then, seeing what was his intent, spring forward, and prevent the consummation of the murder?" asked the judge.

"My lord, I had no time. You could not have drawn breath between the time when the deed was signed and the pistol fired. Nevertheless, I started forward, and was about to dash into the room, when my footsteps were suddenly arrested."

"Arrested? How? By whom?"

"By a loud knocking at the front door. In a moment I thought of my pursuers, and the wish to preserve my own life and liberty rose superior to every other consideration."

"I understand."

"The sound of the blows told me that they were attacking the front door in good earnest, and that they would soon have it down I felt sure, so, without further hesitation, I sprang up the flight of stairs leading to the third story, intending to make my escape by the roof. In this I succeeded, though not without great peril."

"And does that conclude your testimony in this case?"

"It does, my lord. Chance threw me in the way of those who were sufferers by the villainy I had witnessed. Without my testimony it was considered the guilty could not be convicted. At the same time, it was quite certain if I did come forward and state what I knew, it would be at the sacrifice of my life. However, I resolved for the sake of the family of the murdered man, to come forward at all risks, and I have done so, as you see. If you will believe me, it was not without the hope that when all the circumstances were known, I should be allowed to go forth unmolested. I am well aware that I stand charged with committing several offences against the laws, and that a warrant has for a long time been issued empowering my apprehension. Still, for all that, I trust that the evidence I have given will be received, and that the guilty will be punished, while I am allowed at least a chance for my life, for all know that I have perilled it voluntarily, and in a righteous cause."

There was a hum of applause in the court as Dick thus spoke.

He was popular with those who were assembled there, beyond all doubt, and he felt hopeful, for they might yet be able to render him assistance; for, from what the reader knows of Dick's character, he must be aware that he was not likely to submit tamely or give in easily.

But, if the truth must be told, Dick cherished in his heart the hope that some protection would be afforded him—that, in fact, he would be set free.

Whether this hope was doomed to realization or disappointment time only can determine.

"Silence!" cried the usher.

Then the judge spoke in answer to Dick's appeal.

"I have no power to protect you from the officers except while you are within the precincts of this court, during which time you will be regarded in the sacred light of a witness, and free from the grasp of any officer."

"I sincerely thank you, my lord. Have you any further questions to ask of me?"

"No, none; what you have said entirely corresponds with what is here set down. Perhaps, however, one of my learned friends may wish to put a few questions to you."

Both Mr Nuttall and the counsel for the defence rose instantly to their feet, but Mr. Nuttall, from the fact of his being on the side of the prosecution, was allowed the precedence.

"I have nothing further to say just at present," he said, "though I may, perhaps, have occasion to recall you. You can stand down now so far as I am concerned."

"Wait a moment, please," cried the counsel for the defence, "wait a moment; if my learned friend has done with you, I have not."

Dick bowed, and a very perceptible hiss arose in the court somewhere.

"Turn that man out of court," said the judge.

But all were suddenly silent again, so the order was rather a difficult one to carry out.

The counsel took no notice; he was a man not very easily disconcerted, and went on with what he intended to say.

"Ahem! Mr. Dick—or, perhaps, I ought to say Mr. Richard Turpin—it appears to be quite admitted on all hands that your character is none of the best, doesn't it?"

"Bad or good," said Dick, "I would much rather stand here before my fellows in the capacity I do than appear as the accomplice of a murderer."

The counsel turned very red in the face and for a moment speech was denied him, so great was his rage.

The audience applauded.

"My lord," he cried, "my lord, I must request you to call the witness to order."

"I consider," said the judge, "that you fully deserve what you have got."

"Hear! hear!" said a voice, and the judge issued no order for the speaker to be turned out of court, but continued—

"If you had begun to cross-examine the witness properly, he would not have replied to you in the manner he did. I questioned him, and he treated me with no rudeness. My learned brother overlooks the circumstances of the case. You should bear in mind, not that he is an offender against the laws, but as one who has nobly—for I can call it by no other name—one who has nobly come forward at the peril of his life to give evidence in the cause of truth."

A loud burst of applause followed this speech from the judge, and he made no attempt to suppress it until it became too boisterous.

The time that elapsed, however, before order was obtained, permitted the counsel for the defence to recover himself from the confusion into which he had been thrown.

But he resolved not to quit Dick, though he began questioning him in a far different tone and manner than he did before, though there was a good deal unpleasant in it.

"I have some notes here," he said, "a few notes that I took down while you were giving your evidence just now, and I wish to ask you a few questions respecting them, in order that this matter may be cleared up a little. Yours is a very plausible and well got-up story, but we are not going to take all you say for gospel, Mr. Turpin, if you are a highwayman, and a witness on the peril of your life."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVI.

IN WHICH THE COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENCE COMMENCES HIS ADDRESS TO THE JURY, AND MAKES THINGS LOOK VERY BLACK AGAINST DICK.

DICK TURPIN did not condescend to make any reply to this offensive speech, but looked up at the ceiling attentively.

However, the counsel for the defence had the good sense to take no notice of it, and he at once asked the question to which he had made such obscure allusion.

"You say that on the night in question you were in St. James's-park?"

"I was," replied Dick.

"Why were you there?"

"I have already stated that I took refuge in that place from my pursuers."

"Very good; and after that you made your way into the haunted house?"

"Just so."

"Just so! Well now, Mr. Highwayman Turpin—you are on your oath, please to bear in mind—personally, I have no doubt you attach but small importance to that little circumstance, but I take occasion to remind you of it, nevertheless."

"You might have saved yourself the trouble. The 'little circumstance' has not escaped my memory. I am here to speak the truth, and I will speak it without the slightest reservation."

"I hope you will," said the undaunted counsel; "because that will make matters so much simpler. Begin at once, then, by confessing that you were the person seen by Pursford, the officer, wearing the long cloak and accompanied by two companions, enter the haunted house."

"Who? I?" said Dick, staggered for a moment by the question. "Certainly not. I most indignantly deny it."

"I thought so. I knew how far your confessions go. You are determined to put me to the trouble of proving it, I see."

"You will have a great deal of trouble to prove it, it strikes me," said Dick.

"I shall do it," said the counsel; "not by attempting, in the course of a cross-examination, to entrap you into making a wrong answer. I feel you have got your tale too well conned over for that, so you can stand down now, so far as I am concerned, until you are wanted again."

Hearing this, Dick gladly enough descended from the witness box.

Upon reaching the floor of the court, however, he found his old foe, Mr. Wriggles, standing in disagreeable proximity to him, and the officer nodded and winked in a satisfied manner, as much as to say, "I have got you safe at last."

There was a pause.

Mr. Nuttall turned over his papers anxiously.

He could see that the battle was not won, and that he should have a great deal of trouble in achieving the victory.

"Does this terminate the case for the prosecution?" asked the judge.

"It does, my lord."

The judge looked across to the counsel for the defence, who was busy with his papers.

Seeing him not prepared, he rose and retired to an adjoining room for refreshment.

Only a partial silence was reserved after his departure.

The jury bent down their heads, and talked earnestly together.

This state of things continued for about ten minutes.

Then the judge resumed his seat upon the bench.

The counsel for the defence rose.

Amid a profound stillness, which was caused by the universally felt desire to know what he said, he commenced his address in the following terms—

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—

"When my learned brother for the prosecution, commenced the delivery of his address to you, he spoke of the present case as being one of the most remarkable that had ever fallen under his notice.

"Without arrogating too much to myself, for, of course, I have not had the lengthened experience which my learned brother has enjoyed, I think he would not have gone too far if he had styled it the most remarkable in all the annals of criminal jurisprudence.

"The time occupied already has been immense, yet reluctantly enough I say it, we have not got half way through the more simple part of this difficult business.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I am here to-day as the advocate for the cause of Adrian Winberry, now standing at the bar of this court.

"I have been deputed to rebut the charges brought against him, and this is the defence.

"My client distinctly and emphatically pleads three things.

"Firstly, that he is innocent of the crime of which he stands accused.

"Secondly, that he was never in the so-often-mentioned house in the Birdcage-walk in his life.

"Thirdly, that he never had any dealings with the men who stand beside him, and that the first time he saw them was in the vestibule of Newgate, to which place he had been taken prisoner by mistake, for Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

"Now, gentlemen of the jury, while pending upon these three several and distinct denials, let me draw your attention to one important fact.

"I allude to the words which terminated the third negation—

"My client was taken to the vestibule of Newgate in mistake for Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

"Now, who was it made the mistake?

The officers?

"Now, in the evidence for the prosecution it was stated with particular emphasis, by the witness Pursford, that when the two men who had been captured in the haunted house were brought into the vestibule of Newgate (which happened while my client was there), I say the witness Pursford stated that mutual recognition took place between them.

"This I deny.

"When the two prisoners, who were undoubtedly captured in the haunted house, were brought in, they appeared to recognise my client.

"But that was in consequence of an error.

"The prisoners took him for another person who it may be presumed he resembled, but upon a second look they acknowledged their mistake.

"From this it will appear that the recognition was all on one side.

"My client could not have recognised them, because he had never to his knowledge seen them in his life before.

"Now, my lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I will ask you what is the most natural deduction to be inferred from this?

"My client was mistaken for another person.

"First, by the officers.

"Secondly, the two men.

"This is strange.

"We know, from the evidence which has just been given, who it was that the police-officers mistook him for.

"It was for Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

"That they did fall into this mistake is certain.

"If they did so, it is easily supposed that the two men did the same, and that both made a precisely similar error.

"By their confession these two men declare that they were hired by an unknown person, for an unknown purpose.

"That person might have been Dick Turpin for the reasons I have just stated.

"But let the person be whom he might, he accosted these two men, and offered them a certain sum of money to accompany him; and they, having no idea that murder was intended, consented to receive it. When the officers broke in, which, as you have been told in evidence, was almost simultaneous with the firing of the pistol, they, having the example of their employer before them, and the consequences in view, overcome with horror, attempted to escape, but were captured in the attempt.

"So far, then, gentlemen of the jury, such is the true state of affairs, and I wish in the next place to explain the presence of my client in the park at the time mentioned when he was mistaken for the murderer, and under that impression conveyed to Newgate.

"I shall bring before you in evidence a witness who will prove to your satisfaction that on the night in question, and at the time spoken of, Mr. Winberry was at his house in Birdcage-walk, and having transacted some business together, Mr. Winberry, wishing to make his way as quickly as possible to Charing-cross, was let out by a gate leading into St. James's-park, and when last seen was crossing the enclosure in the direction of Spring-gardens.

"Upon reaching this gate, however, in consequence of the order which had been issued to the soldiers on guard, he was stopped, and, in spite of all his protestations, carried off to Newgate, where he has remained until the present moment.

"Such, gentlemen of the jury, is a simple statement of the whole case, and I trust that when you have heard the evidence which I shall bring forward, you will find my client innocent, and give your verdict accordingly.

"In conclusion, I would wish to remind you of the strange manner in which the highwayman, Dick Turpin, is mixed up in the business.

"He first comes before you as a witness for the prosecution.

"Then it appears that he was in the haunted house.

"A mutual mistake was made.

"My client was taken for Dick Turpin by the officers of police.

"He was taken to be the individual who had employed the two men to go with him to the haunted house.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, it is while asking you to bear these things well in mind that I call upon my first witness, Mr. Josiah Skinner."

Dick started.

He recollected the name.

There was another person, then, more intimately mixed up in the plot than he had at first imagined.

The witness called was the rascally attorney, to whom he had caused to be administered such a well-merited punishment.

Mr. Kersey, too, who was acquainted with all the particulars concerning him, likewise remembered who he was, and hastily wrote down something on a slip of paper, which he handed to Mr. Nuttall, who perused it, and nodded his head.

"Mr. Josiah Skinner," cried the usher of the court.

In reply to this call, the attorney stepped forward, and entered the witness-box.

Upon the book being presented to him to kiss, after he had taken the oath, he smacked his lips loudly, in order that no one in the court should make any mistake about his not having kissed the book.

The counsel for the defence began his examination by asking the apparently useless question—

"What is your name?"

"Josiah Skinner."

"Very good. Where do you reside?"

"I have apartments on the ground-floor of a house, the back windows of which overlook St. James's-park."

"Is the house situated in the Birdcage-walk?"

"I believe that is what it is called."

"Just so. Have you a door through which you can gain access to the park if you wish it?"

"Yes; there is a gate in some pailings which divide the garden at the back of the house from the park."

"Very good, Mr. Skinner. Now, look at the prisoners at the bar."

Mr. Skinner did so.

"Do you know either of them?"

"Certainly."

"Which one?"

"The one standing furthest from me."

"What is his name?"

"Mr. Adrian Winberry."

"Very good, again, Mr. Skinner; so far that is quite satisfactory. Now—please be careful—do you recollect when you last saw him?"

"Certainly I do. I recollect the occasion perfectly well."

"When was it?"

"On the twenty-seventh of the last month."

"Gentlemen of the jury, please pay attention to the date mentioned by this witness. The twenty-seventh of last month."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVII.

MR. NUTTALL MANAGES TO FIND SOME FLAWS IN MR. SKINNER'S EVIDENCE.

DICK TURPIN took note of the date as well as the jury.

How the case was to end in consequence of the recriminatory defence set up by Adrian Winberry, was more than he could tell.

The twenty-seventh of the last month was, he knew well enough, the date when the murder was committed.

Was an alibi about to be proved?

Was he, after all the risk he had run in his effort to do good, to be convicted of a crime of which he was perfectly innocent?

It looked very much like it.

With a breathless interest he watched the unfolding of the schemes of the opposing counsel.

He knew not how far he would be involved in them.

Well might Dick Turpin tremble for his safety.

The defending counsel was a man who would stick at nothing.

"Mr. Skinner," he said, resuming his interrogation, "you say it was on the twenty-seventh of the last month when you last saw Mr. Winberry?"

"It was."

"Do you remember what time in the day it was?"

"No, I do not."

"You do not?"

"No, for a very simple reason."

"What reason?"

"It was not day at all."

"Oh!"

"It was night."

"This is quibbling, Mr. Skinner."

"No, no—not at all. I like to be exact."

"Just as you like, but please do not take up the time of the court unnecessarily."

"I will be careful not to do so, sir."

"Then it was at night when you last saw my client, Mr. Winberry?"

"Yes, sir."

"Late at night?"

"Yes, very late."

"Can you recollect the time?"

"Not exactly."

"That is a pity."

"I can form an idea."

"Let us have it, then."

"It was after midnight."

"After midnight?"

"Yes."

"Much after?"

"No, very little."

"How can you tell?"

"I remember hearing the clock at Westminster Abbey strike twelve."

"You swear that?"

"Yes."

"Where were you when you heard the clock strike?"

"At my house."

"And was Mr. Winberry with you?"

"Yes. He came to pay me a visit."

"Very good; and how long was it after the clock struck twelve that he left you?"

"Only a few minutes."

"Only a few minutes?"

"It might be a quarter of an hour."

"Well, say a quarter of an hour, then.'

"When I heard the clock strike, I said to him"——

"Said to who?"

"Mr. Winberry, my visitor."

"Well, what did you say?"

"Something about it having struck twelve; and he said something in reply about his not knowing it was so late, and that he had an appointment at Charing-cross, and he feared if he did not make haste he should be late."

"What next?"

"He stayed chatting some moments, and then I suggested to him that his nearest way to Charing-cross would be across the park, and through Spring-gardens gate."

"Please to go on with your statement."

"He inquired how he could gain the park, and I told him there was a gate in my garden leading into it, and he agreed to avail himself of that means of egress; and he did so."

"And you have not seen him since?"

"No, sir."

"That is all you know about the matter?"

"It is, sir."

"Then you can stand down, without my learned friend for the prosecution wishes to put any question to you."

Mr. Skinner did not stop to hear the last part of this speech, but hurried out of the box.

He would fain have avoided a cross-examination, but Mr. Nuttall called him back.

"I won't keep you long, Mr. Skinner," said Mr. Nuttall, "as you appear to be in a hurry."

"I am in no hurry, sir, only I thought the evidence I gave was so simple, I was done with."

"Oh! the error is of no consequence. Now attend to me, if you please."

"Yes, sir."

"What is your profession?"

"Profession?"

"Yes—avocation, or what you please to call it—or are you one of those favoured few who are not dependent upon their exertions for their livelihood?"

"I am an attorney, sir."

"Oh! indeed. You did not mention that before, I think?

"No, sir. I was not asking the question."

"Have you known Mr. Adrian Winberry long?"

"Not very long."

"How long should you think?"

"About four months, as nearly as I can remember."

"Oh! indeed. Then I might say the acquaintance is quite recent?"

"Just as you please, sir."

"And in what capacity did you become acquainted with Mr. Adrian Winberry?"

"What do you mean, sir?"

"Did you become acquainted with him as a client, or as a friend?"

"As a client."

"Oh! as a client. What was the nature of the business that brought you together?

"I decline to answer that question."

"Do you?"

"I do, most emphatically."

"Very well. I will not press it, being of no great importance, but will ask you another question. Was it a friendly or professional visit that Mr. Adrian Winberry paid you on the evening, or rather night, you referred to, while giving your evidence a little while ago?"

"A professional visit."

"Oh! indeed. But are you in the habit of transacting business at your house in Spring-gardens? I understood you to say that was your place of residence."

"So it is, sir; though I sometimes transact business there if it happens to be of a private, urgent, or important nature."

"Oh! indeed; then we may come to the conclusion, I suppose, that the business you had with Mr. Adrian Winberry may be classed under one of those heads?"

"It might, sir."

"Then, perhaps, you might tell us exactly under what head?"

"The business comprehended all three."

"Ah! It was private?"

"Yes."

"Urgent?"

"Yes."

"And important?"

"Very."

"Did any one else see Mr. Adrian Winberry at your house on the occasion referred to?"

"I think not."

"You think not. Can you not speak with certainty?"

"I do not know of any one who saw them. We entered together. I have a latch-key, so that I can gain admittance at any hour."

"Oh! I see."

"Some one might have observed us. I am not prepared to swear that no one did."

"Oh! and did no one see his departure?"

"No one but myself, for I took him, as I told you, to the little gate in the pailings, and I soon lost sight of him in the darkness of the park."

"And that is the last time you saw him?"

"Yes."

"You are quite sure you have not seen him since that time until you were brought face to face with him in the court to-day?"

"No."

"No! What do you mean by no? Have you seen him since?"

"Yes."

"Why, you have twice distinctly sworn that you have not. Let me remind you to be careful, Mr. Skinner; you are on your oath."

"I saw the prisoner at the inquest. I thought you meant the last time I saw him to have any dealings with him."

"Oh! Now, Mr. Skinner, please to refresh your memory. Are you prepared to swear that you have never seen him either between his visit to your house on the twenty-seventh of the last month and the inquest, or between the inquest and his appearance here this morning?"

Mr. Skinner shifted about uneasily, and hesitated.

The whole of his evidence, from beginning to end, was a tissue of falsehoods, and he began to tremble, for, from the manner in which the last few questions were put, he suspected that something was known.

Therefore, and from that sole cause, he hesitated to reply in the affirmative, lest he should immediately be detected in his perjury.

"Answer me!" said Mr. Nuttall, in a tremendous voice. "Answer me without hesitation or prevarication. You are on your oath. Have you, or have you not, seen the prisoner between the times I mentioned?"

"Once," replied Mr. Skinner.

"Oh! once since," said Mr. Nuttall, raising his voice to a still higher note. "Once since; and pray when was that?"

"I decline to answer."

"Decline to answer! That reply will not do, sir. I command you, answer my question."

"The counsel for the defence rose.

"My lord," he said, addressing the judge, "I must really appeal to you to interpose between my learned friend and the witness."

"Interpose!" said the judge. "Wherefore, I should like to know?"

"He is using intimidation, and trying to frighten replies out of him."

"Nothing of the kind. I call upon the witness to reply at once to the question he has been asked, and I take this opportunity of warning him to be careful what he says. As it is, I do not know whether I ought not to commit him for wilful perjury, since it is plain to see he must have told an untruth somewhere."

Upon hearing these words from the judge, the defending counsel sat down, and Mr. Skinner turned biliously white, and trembled visibly.

"Answer my question," said Mr. Nuttall. "When did you see the prisoner at the bar?"

"After the inquest."

"Where?"

"In his cell in Newgate."

"In his cell in Newgate, eh? Now, under what pretence was it you visited him in his cell? Tell me that."

"It was under no pretence at all," said Mr. Skinner, plucking up a little courage. "I visited him as his legal adviser."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVIII.

AN UNEXPECTED, BUT MOST IMPORTANT, WITNESS APPEARS FOR THE PROSECUTION.

MR. JOSIAH SKINNER, attorney-at-law, was making a sad bungle of his evidence, and up to the present time he had done Adrian Winberry more harm than good.

Mr. Nuttall saw that he had gained an advantage, and he improved upon it to the utmost.

"Dear me!" he said; "it is very singular that you should have done that, and then sworn positively that you had never seen him since the night of the twenty-seventh of last month, when he had an interview with you! Please be careful. Now, just be good enough to tell me the nature of the business you transacted with him."

"I have before said that I decline to answer that question."

"But I shall insist upon your answering, sir."

The counsel for the defence got up again.

"I object to that question, my lord."

"The witness must answer it, nevertheless," replied the judge. "I should not have decreed so had it not been for his tergiversation. He must give a clear account of all his dealings with Mr. Adrian Winberry."

The counsel sat down again, with a mortified, discomfited look upon his face.

Mr. Nuttall resumed—

"Now, Mr. Skinner, answer me this. Was not your business with your client in the first instance to draw up a transfer of all the Winberry property from his brother to him? Answer me, and don't take up the time of the court."

Mr. Skinner glared despairingly around him.

But stern immovable faces, with their eyes fixed upon him alone, met his gaze.

"Answer me, I say," said Mr. Nuttall, raising his voice till it became a shout, "and don't prevaricate."

"It was," said Mr. Skinner, in a feeble voice.

"I thought so," said Mr. Nuttall, triumphantly. "Note, gentlemen of the jury," he added, "first the tergiversation of this witness, and then the collusion between him and the prisoner at the bar."

"And did you make out this deed of transfer?"

"I did."

"And what were the conditions of the bond? Quick—tell me."

"The whole of the estates and personal wealth of Mr. William Winberry were to become Mr. Adrian Winberry's absolutely."

"And what was Mr. William Winberry to have in return for this transfer?"

"There was nothing mentioned."

"And when was the deed to take effect?"

"Upon the death of Mr. William Winberry."

"Oh! indeed. Upon his death? That looks very suspicious—most suspicious. That would make his death very advantageous to your client, would it not?"

Mr. Skinner was silent.

Mr. Nuttall did not press him for an answer, simply because an answer was needless.

He took up his examination at another point.

"Then, Mr. Skinner, I understand you to say that you visited your client in his cell in Newgate in the capacity of his legal adviser?"

"I did, sir."

"Well, then, after that interview, will you swear that you did not go down to the residence of Mr. William Winberry, and try to make an abatement into it?"

"I went down to take possession of the property in his name."

"Oh! then, Mr. William Winberry must have been known by you to be dead, or else the step you took would not have been a legal one."

"I was informed he was dead."

"By whom?"

"By my client."

"While he was in Newgate?"

"Yes."

"How did he know it?"

"It is not in my power to answer that question, for I don't know."

"Who would convey the information to him while he was in his cell?"

"I cannot tell."

"Yes, you can; you know very well no one did."

"I don't."

"No one would be permitted, so I think it only fair to infer that your client knew of his brother's death before he was incarcerated in Newgate; don't you?"

"I am not bound to tell you what I think."

"But you are bound to depose to facts. Now, answer me this."

"What, sir?"

"When you saw your client in the cell, and he empowered you to go down and take possession of the property for him, what authority did he give you for doing his commands?"

"He showed me the deed."

"The transfer-deed?"

"Yes."

"I think you said you had drawn up that deed?"

"I might have said so."

"Then, of course, you knew it was all right—I mean without a flaw, or anything of that sort?"

"I might."

"We want positive replies here, Mr. Skinner, not conditional ones. Please bear that in mind.

"You say your client showed you the transfer-deed, which had been properly drawn up by yourself, and which was quite free from all flaws?"

"Yes," said Mr. Skinner, faintly.

"Was the deed signed?"

"It was, sir."

"By William Winberry?"

"By William Winberry."

"Did you see the signature?"

"Yes."

"Did you examine it?"

"No."

"Are you acquainted with Mr. Winberry's writing?"

"No."

"But you saw the deed properly signed, and did not hesitate to go down according to your client's instructions, to take possession of the property?"

"Certainly not. Such a proceeding was quite legitimate."

"Did you take possession then?"

"No."

"No? How was that, when you were armed with such powers?"

"I had been told"——

Mr. Skinner checked himself, but Mr. Nuttall insisted upon his completing the sentence he had began.

"I was told that the only person in charge of the property was a young girl."

"Well?"

"But when I got there"——

"Go on."

"I found she had got a sweetheart, or somebody hidden in the room, and"——

"And what, Mr. Skinner?"

"He interfered, and would not allow me to take possession."

"Oh! indeed. And pray how did he interfere?"

"In a very bullying manner."

"And how was it he prevented you from taking possession?"

"He used force."

"Describe the nature of it."

"He used force."

"Did he not call the servants to his assistance?"

"Yes, he did."

"And did they not carry you out into the yard, and put you in the trough, and pump on you till their arms ached, for the insulting manner in which you behaved to the young lady?"

Mr. Skinner was silent.

"And did they not horsewhip you off the grounds for your rascally behaviour, and dare you ever to show your face there again, under pain of being subjected to the same punishment?"

Mr. Skinner was silent still.

"Of course they did, and you know it, and you also know that you fully deserved what you got. And now, in the next place, where is the deed about which so much has been said? Where is it? Produce it."

"My lord," said Mr. Skinner to the judge, imploringly; "you will not compel me to give up the deed?"

"Certainly," said the judge, who seemed to see through Mr. Skinner's lies and subterfuges without much trouble. "Hand it over to me at once."

Mr. Skinner would have refused if he had dared, but he had not the courage to do so, and he knew the consequences too well to think of defying a judge on the bench.

Therefore, with an ominous groan, which echoed through the court, he drew from the breast-pocket of his coat a small parcel tied up with red tape, which he surrendered into the hands of the usher with another groan.

The usher handed it to the judge, who unfolded it, and soon became immersed in its contents.

Mr. Skinner seemed to collapse.

"What is this?" said the judge.

"What, my lord?"

"This deed is signed by two witnesses. What are the names of the two prisoners at the bar?"

The clerk of the arraigns referred to his documents, and then said—

"John Norman and Richard Sare, my lord."

"I thought so," said the judge. "Here, then, is a most important and unlooked-for piece of evidence. This deed, the purport of which has been correctly described, is signed by William Winberry, and the signature has been witnessed by John Norman and Richard Sare, the names, it appears, of the two prisoners at the bar."

These words caused a profound sensation throughout the court.

The judge had the deed handed to the jury, who, one by one, examined it.

"I have done with you," said Mr. Nuttall to Mr. Skinner. "You can stand down."

Mr. Skinner did not need telling twice.

He was out of the box like a shot.

But the judge was not going to let him escape so easily, so he said—

"Officers, detain that man. Do not let him leave the court until I give him permission."

Mr. Wriggles was close at hand, so he made himself useful by taking the rascally attorney into custody.

The counsel for the defence looked very wrath at Mr. Skinner for the woeful botch he had made of the affair.

But instead of giving up, as one would have thought, he resolved to stick to the battle to the last.

"Call Robert Hood," he said.

"Robert Hood," repeated the usher.

All looked eagerly and anxiously to see who the next witness for the defence could be.

They were rather disappointed when they saw a Bow-street police-officer enter the witness-box.

The oath was administered, and then the counsel for the defence said—

"Is your name Robert Hood?"

"Yes, sir."

"You are a police-officer, employed at Bow-street?"

"I am, sir."

"Do you recollect the night of the twenty-seventh of the past month?"

"Quite well, sir."

"Be good enough to tell the jury what happened on that night which causes it to live in your memory.

"Take your time, and be careful."

"Yes, sir."

CHAPTER CCLXXXIX.

THE COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENCE MAKES A BEWILDERING SPEECH TO THE JURY, AND THE TRIAL MEETS WITH A STARTLING INTERRUPTION.

THERE was not a person present who did not wonder what this officer could have been called to swear to.

But their wonder was soon satisfied.

The officer proceeded to give his evidence in that mechanical kind of way for which such gentlemen are noted.

"I was at the station in Bow-street, when Pursford, the officer, came in and asked for assistance."

"Well."

"I was one the inspector sent with him."

"What did he want assistance for?"

"He said he had seen three suspicious-looking persons enter the haunted house in Birdcage-walk."

"And you were one who accompanied him, you say?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then be good enough to relate what took place."

"We made our way to our destination as fast as we could, and, on arriving, we went straight up to the front door."

"Well?"

"We had scarcely gained it when we heard the loud report of a pistol from somewhere within, and we considered that sufficient to authorize us to break down the door, which we did with implements we brought with us for the purpose, in expectation that we should have some such work to do."

"Please to continue what you saw and did."

"When the door was broken down, we of course found ourselves in the entrance-hall of the house.

"With our lanterns we looked all about us, and the first thing we noticed was a number of footprints on the floor, the dust upon which had left the impressions just as snow would."

"What next?"

"We followed these traces, and found they all, without deviation or exception, led to the bottom of the stairs. Up these we ascended, until the footprints terminated—some at the door of a room on the second-floor, while others went up to the higher portion of the house."

"Yes;—what of those which went up to the upper portion of the house?"

"I stood at the bottom of the stairs, by Pursford's orders, in order to see that no one either went up or came down, while the others went into the room."

"Never mind their proceedings, continue your own."

"Some were left at the bottom of the stairs, while I and several more ascended them to see what was above."

"And what was the result of your search?"

"We found by the prints in the dust that one person, and one only, had ascended the stairs, and those footprints terminated at an attic door, which we broke down.

"We were, however, rather too late. Whoever it was had managed to get out of the window, and most perilously draw himself up on to the roof."

"Did you see this man?"

"No, at least when I say no, I did just catch a glimpse of him, but that was all."

"What next?"

"We went out on to the landing, and got out on to the roof by means of a trap-door; but we were too late, our prey had escaped, nor could we find the least trace of him, although we hunted closely all over the roofs."

"And then you returned to your companions, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir."

"That will do, then. I have no further question to ask you."

"Stay," said Mr. Nuttall, as the officer was about to leave the box. "When you came down after your unsuccessful search, you went to your comrades, you say?"

"Yes, sir."

"Had they made any prisoners?"

"Two, sir."

"Did you see them?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you notice their faces?"

"Yes, sir, for I thought perhaps I might be called upon to swear to their 'dentity."

"Well, then, look at the dock, and tell me whether either of those men you see standing there are the same as you saw in custody at the haunted house."

"Yes."

"Which are they?"

"The two standing next me, sir."

"Did you accompany them to Newgate after their capture?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you notice them recognize the other prisoner?"

"Yes, they cried out when they saw him, as though they were surprised to find him there."

"Oh! did they? Now, did you notice whether the other prisoner responded to that recognition in any way?"

"He looked angry. That was all."

"Very good. You can stand down, Mr. Hood. I have nothing further to say to you."

The counsel for the defence, who had been eagerly engaged in a whispered conversation with a barrister who sat next to him, now rose to his feet.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—

"The witness just dismissed is the last one I shall call for the defence, and I shall do no more than crave your indulgence for a few moments, while I recapitulate a little, and call your attention to one or two points in the evidence, both defensive and prosecutive.

"In the first place, you cannot have failed to have perceived that the most militatory evidence against my client is that given by a person to whom you ought to be most careful how you give credibility, since he avows himself a highwayman, and a violater of those laws by which society is banded together.

"At the same time, it must not be forgotten that he is obnoxious to the charge of murder, as the evidence produced has testified.

"The presence of my client in the Birdcage-walk has been most satisfactorily accounted for.

"His capture followed as a matter of course.

"And now, as to the deed, which I maintain should never have been given into the hands of the court.

"I consider that altogether beyond the question.

"What arrangement might have existed between my client and his deceased brother is more than I can say, but that the deed was signed by him cannot be disputed.

"This empowers him, of course, to take possession of all.

"But, my lord, and gentlemen of the jury, you must see that there are certain persons whose interests would suffer greatly by such a state of things as this, and that they would endeavour to set aside this deed of assignment if they possibly could do so.

"The treatment which Mr. Skinner received when he went to the hall on a perfectly legal errand will serve to bear out what I say.

"The hypothesis I humbly submit is this.

"By some means or other it got to their ears that Mr. William Winberry had made a deed of assignment of all his property and personal effects to his brother Adrian.

"I then assume that they called on the assistance of the notorious Dick Turpin, and concerted with him as to what means should be adopted to set this deed aside.

[DICK TURPIN IN HIS CELL IN NEWGATE.]

"They then, with great ingenuity, devised the death of Mr. William Winberry, under such circumstances as would tend to fix the guilt upon Adrian.

"But they rather reckoned without their host. The capture of my client so soon was what they scarcely expected, and was brought about by accident alone.

"What they would have wished, no doubt, would be, not to bring the case to the light of day in this court, but compel my client to flee the country.

"But that object failed.

"Such, my lord, and gentlemen of the jury, is the theory for the defence, and it will be for you to decide how far it is borne out by the facts that have been brought before you.

"That it carries upon the face of it a certain amount of plausibility is certain.

"With confidence, then, I leave the case to you, gentlemen of the jury, for your decision, under the firm conviction that you will acquit Mr. Adrian Winberry of the crime imputed to him, and also the two men from any complicity in the murder, since they were hired without having the remotest idea that any such crime as murder was intended."

The counsel for the defence sat down.

Every person in the court drew a long breath.

They looked at each other with a puzzled air as they seemed to ask the question—

"Are we dreaming, or are our intellects so stultified that we have quite misunderstood this case from the first, and is Adrian Winberry innocent, after all?"

Certainly the counsel's extraordinary speech was rather bewildering.

The jury looked at each other like men in a dream.

They were fairly puzzled.

The intellects of jurymen are never over keen. Indeed, those who are gifted with the smallest modicum of intellectual powers are usually selected for the office

Those on the present occasion were, for the most part, men whose brains or minds were capable of holding but one idea at the time.

The counsel for the defence knew this.

He knew, too, that his cause was hopeless, or nearly so.

He knew, however, that the jury would be most impressed with those facts which came last before them.

The trial had lasted for very many hours.

Of a necessity, he argued, they must by this time have got confused on the subject.

But if such was the condition of the minds of the jurymen and spectators, it certainly was not of two persons at least.

One was Mr. Nuttall.

The other the judge.

Their acute, well drilled, and logical minds retained everything tangible from beginning to end.

Still they were staggered by the audacious statements put forward by the counsel for the defence.

But that effect soon evaporated.

Mr. Nuttall rose to his feet.

It then became apparent that he was about to exercise his right of reply.

Much has been said both for and against this right of reply, and it is only occasionally that the prosecuting counsel enforce it; but surely, if ever it was needed, if ever it was justified, it was in this instance.

An intense desire to hear what Mr. Nuttall was going to say took possession of all without reservation—judge, jurymen, counsel, spectators, prisoners, officials—every one, indeed, who stood within the crowded area of the court.

He waited a moment before he commenced speaking, in order that every noise might be allowed to subside.

Seeing why he paused, everyone became immediately silent.

Then he began.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—"

But before he could do more than utter those few, oft-repeated, stereotyped words a great hubbub and confusion took place at the door of the court.

The judge rose.

An angry look was on his face.

"Silence!" he said. "Silence! or no matter at what cost or trouble, I will clear the court."

But his words, although they were uttered in firm, decided tones, were without effect—the noise grew louder and louder.

CHAPTER CCXC.

BLANCHE WINBERRY MOST OPPORTUNELY MAKES HER APPEARANCE IN COURT.

OUR powers of description are quite inadequate to describe the scene of confusion which now raged in the heretofore quiet court of justice.

The tumult, too, instead of lessening, perceptibly increased—one by one the spectators joined in it.

The judge himself, although much annoyed at the unseemly interruption, could not control or subdue the curiosity he felt to know what had caused it.

That it was no ordinary event he felt sure, and with his hands resting upon the desk before him, he leaned forward, and strained his eyes to the utmost, in order to be the first to catch a glimpse of what it was that had caused the disturbance.

But he could see nothing.

The people swayed to and fro, and uttered cries.

That was all.

Suddenly, however, the door of the court was thrown open.

The din increased.

But above all the clamour a voice rose.

Its tones, let it belong to whoever it might, were absolutely stentorian.

"Make way, good people, make way," it said, "make way, in the name of justice and the dead! Stand aside! There is another witness—another witness for the prosecution! Stand aside gently, good people all, and leave a path to the witness-box. It is a young girl. The witness is a delicate young girl. Let her have clear way! Stand aside! stand aside! She is here!"

These words reached the ears of the judge.

They reached, too, the ears of everyone in that court, which was now so crowded that one would have declared it an impossibility for another person to be squeezed into it.

They reached the ears of the three prisoners at the bar, and what little hope they might have entertained up to the present moment was dissipated.

They had no longer any hope to cling to.

Their guilty hearts told them who the witness was that was coming, and whose advent had caused so great a sensation.

But crowded as the court was, the people pressed back.

A kind of lane was formed extending to the witness-box.

It was a narrow passage, it is true, but still it was wide enough for one person to squeeze through.

And here it should be stated that the crowd in the various avenues leading to the court was quite as great as was the one within it.

Whoever the witness was that was coming, we know that she was a female from the words uttered by the man with the stentorian voice. She had to force her way through these.

Her progress was slow.

But it was sure.

At length she passed through the doorway, and stood fairly within the court.

Then the judge, from his elevated and advantageous position, saw her.

The jury, too, who had one and all risen to their feet, could see her also.

She was young.

She was fair.

She was beautiful.

That they could see at the first glance.

But her hair was dishevelled.

Her apparel torn.

There were traces of the deepest anguish upon her countenance.

But, despite of these drawbacks, her beauty was visible.

Then Maud Gouldman, who, like the rest, was full of interest to know who the witness was, at last caught sight of her.

She recognized her.

She clapped her hands together.

Then in a tearful voice, she exclaimed, heedless and forgetful of those by whom she was surrounded, and the strange manner in which the meeting took place—

"Blanche!—Blanche! It is Blanche! It is Blanche, my dear cousin, come back again! I had given up all hopes of seeing her; but she is here. She is here, and her evidence will suffice to complete the conviction and prove the guilt of her father's murderers. Blanche!—Blanche! It is Maud, your cousin, who calls to you! Blanche!—Blanche!"

These words were spoken with hysterical vehemence and volubility.

They produced an electrical effect upon the mass of spectators who crowded the court.

It might have been that very many of them, from the facts they had become familiar with during the progress of the trial, had something more than a suspicion of who this witness was who had made so strange an intrusion into court at the eleventh hour.

But the words which Maud Gouldman spoke were quite sufficient to set all doubts at rest.

The mysterious Blanche, of whom they had heard so much, was to appear before them.

As we said, a kind of lane was formed, extending from the door of the court to the witness-box.

Along this Blanche passed, until the words her playmate and companion uttered struck upon her ear.

But she did not pause a moment after those words were uttered.

She seemed fully conscious of the fact that there was no time to spare.

Merely waving her hand to Maud, she passed on.

To reach the witness-box, however, she had to pass very near to the dock at which the three prisoners stood.

The expression of Adrian's face when she came so near him was awful to behold.

Its expression even struck the turnkey who was in the dock on guard over him, and kept a watchful eye upon his actions, for he feared that he would offer some violence to the witness, whose evidence could not be but most prejudicial to his case.

But Blanche passed on in safety, and now she came close to where Dick stood, and he had a full view of her.

It might have been said with perfect truth that every one in court looked at her with the greatest curiosity. But let their curiosity have been as great as it might, it fell far short of that felt by Dick Turpin.

He saw before him the being about whom he had heard so much but never seen, and whose fortunes had become so strangely interwoven with his own.

He saw before him the being to whom he was utterly unknown, and yet for whom he had perilled his liberty and his life.

He was much struck with her appearance.

Despite the unfavourable circumstances under which they met, he could see that she was of surpassing loveliness—yet loveliness altogether different in style to that of Maud Gouldman.

She stepped into the witness-box.

In modest confusion she bowed her head before the myriad eyes that were fixed upon her.

The crier stepped forward.

He had a small book in his hand.

We have already reverted to the extraordinary silence which several times had taken place during the trial—remarkable, because even the breathing of the closely-packed mass made an audible sound.

But thrice had even that sound been hushed into silence.

That phenomenon again took place at this moment.

It might have been that judge, jury, counsel, and spectators, all held their breath for a short time.

But let it be how it might, that remarkable and profound silence again prevailed.

The judge sank back in his chair.

Mr. Nuttall, whose speech had been so strangely interrupted, sat down likewise.

The jury regained their seats.

Then the oath was formally proposed to Blanche, and when she kissed the book, she did it with so much grace that it won the hearts of even the least susceptible who saw it.

The judge looked towards Mr. Nuttall, and the worthy barrister, who perfectly understood the meaning of that glance, rose to his feet.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—

"I must once more crave your attention to this remarkable case, upon which, I doubt not, a clearer and better light is about to be thrown.

"Much that we could only have surmised at, and stated as the result of surmises, will be made quite patent.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury. Believe me, I must unfeignedly rejoice in the appearance of this witness for the prosecution."

Mr. Nuttall had got thus far when the counsel for the defence rose.

Turning to the judge, he said—

"My lord,—In the course of this investigation I have frequently been compelled to rise to my feet, and protest against the manner in which it has been conducted.

"I cannot refrain from doing so again, and I trust your lordship will not be offended by this attempt to recall you to your duty."

The judge frowned, but said nothing.

Not in the least daunted, the counsel for the defence went on—

"My lord,—I must humbly recall to your notice the evident fact that the case for the prosecution is closed—entirely closed—and it is now too late for them to call any witnesses. I have made my speech for the defence."

The judge replied.

His voice was low and calm, but the words he uttered were stinging ones, and made even the counsel for the defence wince again.

"My learned brother could not, with an hour's rhetoric, have furnished us with a better exemplification of the unsoundness of his case than he has done by the few words he has just spoken. Truth fears nothing, and additional evidence can only serve to elucidate it. I hold that, in this case, I have executed my duty fairly and impartially; at any rate, I have endeavoured to the best of my ability to do so. Far be it from me, because the case for the prosecution is closed, and the speech for the defence made—far be it from me, I say, on such grounds as those, to set a seal upon the lips of the witness who now stands before the court. Let us patiently hear all that she—the daughter of the man whose murder we have assembled to adjudicate upon—may have to say; and let us hope that what she says will enable us to come to a better understanding of this intricate case—prevent us from falling into error, and assist our fallible and prone to err judgments to come to a proper and just decision, that the real culprit may not escape, but receive the penalty which attaches itself to the perpetrators of the heinous crime of murder."

CHAPTER CCXCI.

MR. NUTTALL EXAMINES BLANCHE WINBERRY, AND EXTRACTS SOME IMPORTANT EVIDENCE.

THERE was a universal and spontaneous burst of applause when the judge concluded this speech.

When he commenced, there was not the least excitement visible either in the tone of his voice or in his gestures, but as he proceeded he warmed with his subject, and no longer spoke with the slow, measured accent he did at first. On the contrary, his voice rose, and as his utterance became more rapid, so did his whole body participate in what he said, and at the conclusion of his address he was dramatic and impassioned.

But not even this, nor the expression of approval with which his speech was greeted, had the effect of intimidating the counsel for the defence.

He rose, and before Mr. Nuttall could commence his examination of Blanche Winberry, he spoke as follows, in a voice of deep, affected humility—

"My lord, with what you have just now said, I and all in this court most fully and cordially agree. But in the administration of justice, though the main object must always be to elicit truth, yet in the elicitation of that truth there must be certain forms observed, or else the whole would become a chaos. But, my lord, I trust, you will excuse me if I say that I have noticed throughout this day's proceedings that the personal beauty of the witnesses has exercised an improper influence upon the judgment. Let me, then, caution you, gentlemen of the jury, to shut your eyes to all attractions and blandishments of form and feature, and take the evidence of the witnesses for just what it is worth, and no more."

The counsel for the defence sat down.

The judge evidently considered the speech as not calling for reply; at any rate, he made no reply to it.

Mr. Nuttall had not sat down during this little discussion between the judge and the opposite counsel, and, at a sign from the former, he continued his speech.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—

"The counsel for the defence thought fit to interrupt me in the remarks I was making to you. The objections he raised as to the examination of this witness have been set aside by his lordship; therefore I shall proceed with my questions, in the first place promising to take up no more time than I am compelled.

"First, however, let me cordially endorse what my learned brother for the defence has said with respect to not allowing our judgment to be biassed by the personal attractions of the witnesses.

"He has gone so far as to accuse us of having already given way to that natural feeling, but on my own part let me state that the cause referred to has had no effect whatever upon me.

"But the caution, nevertheless, is a wise and good one, and with him I trust that it will be borne in mind by all when the time for decision arrives."

After thus speaking, Mr. Nuttall turned towards the witness whose evidence he deemed sufficiently important to justify his questioning her himself.

"What is your name?"

"Blanche."

The accents of her voice were low and musical.

"That is only your Christian name," said Mr. Nuttall; "what is your surname?"

"Winberry."

"Thank you. And now tell me your father's name."

"William Winberry."

"Where did he reside?"

"At the Hall."

"Where is the Hall situated?"

"About midway between Hendon and Hampstead."

"Upon what occasion did you see your father last?"

"It was at the Hall, sir."

"How long is it ago?"

"A long time it seems to me, sir—so long, indeed, that I cannot tell when, for in my solitary prison I have lost all count of time."

Blanche sobbed convulsively.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the jury—Excuse me for interrupting myself to make a remark relative to this witness. Having only just made her way into the court, she must of necessity be altogether ignorant of all that has transpired in the course of these long proceedings, which fact cannot fail to impart additional importance to all she says."

Then turning to Blanche, who had somewhat recovered her composure, he said—

"You cannot recollect how long it is since you last saw your father?"

"No, sir, I cannot, but it is a long time."

"You saw him at the Hall, I think you said?"

"Yes, sir. It was one afternoon—or rather evening. I left him in the library, while I went out to take a ramble through the grounds, as was my usual custom."

"Alone?"

"Yes."

"What was your destination?"

"A walk."

"Oh! simply a walk."

"Yes, sir."

"Who was the last person you saw, after leaving the Hall?"

"My cousin Maud."

"Where was she?"

"At a window which overlooked the lawn, across which I took my way. She watched me, and waved her hand repeatedly."

"Exactly. We were acquainted with all these particulars. Now be good enough to tell the court what happened to you after you got out of sight of your companion Maud."

Blanche hesitated.

From what source no one could tell.

"I presume, sir, you do not wish to know all that took place after the time you mention, but simply wish an account of the manner I was abducted, which was while I was on my way back home?"

"If anything of a private nature took place during your excursion, not relating to the subject in hand, we have no wish to press you."

Blanche looked relieved.

It then became clear that there was some secret in connexion with her solitary rambles.

It was noted by several that the counsel for the defence took a note of this circumstance, so it was clear he had not lost all hopes of winning the battle, or that, at all events, it was still his determination to fight to the last gasp.

"You say it was while you were returning home, after your walk, that you were carried off?"

"Yes, sir; I was passing through the shrubbery, which adjoins the lawn, when suddenly I heard a crackling noise, but before I could turn round to see what it was, or utter a cry for succour, something was thrown over my head."

"What was this something like?"

"It seemed to me, sir, to be a kind of cloak, such as are sometimes worn by gentlemen in cold weather, either when riding or walking."

"And something of that sort was suddenly thrown over your head?"

"Yes, sir, and drawn closely over my shoulders, so that I could neither see who my assailants were or cry for help. Nor was I able to struggle, for my arms were seized with a powerful grasp."

"What happened next?"

"One of my captors spoke, and threatened to slay me on the spot if I refused to accompany them. I was terrified and half-fainting. I was carried away without being wholly conscious of what was happening to me."

"Pray, go on."

"I was hurried along for some distance on foot, and then we came to a halt. Immediately I was raised up and set down again. I could not see, but the feel told me I was in a carriage or a vehicle of a similar description."

"And all this time you did not so much as catch a glimpse of the countenances of your abductors?"

"I did not, sir. The cloak was kept close down over my face."

"Then the vehicle in which you had been seated was, I presume, set in motion?"

"It was, sir, and I was taken some distance; how far I know not, nor do I know how long a space of time the journey lasted, so extreme was my agitation. At length the carriage stopped. The cloak was still over my face, so I could not tell where I was. However, they led me forward a few paces, and then a door was closed."

Blanche paused a moment, and the usher handed her a glass of water, which she drank with evident pleasure.

The interest that was felt in her narrative far transcended any that had been felt that day, when so many strange transactions were brought to light. All she said not only presented all the glowing attractions of romance, but it also had the additional charm of being true.

After a brief pause the witness resumed.

"I heard a door closed behind me," she said, "and securely fastened. Then I was forced to ascend a great many steps, so many, that when I reached the top I was quite breathless. Here another door was opened and then closed.

"I remained immovable for several minutes, until the deep silence with which I was environed terrified me. Then I made a desperate attempt to remove the cloak, and succeeded.

"I should have done so more easily if I had gone more gently about the task. However, as soon as the cloak was removed, I looked as well as I could about me.

"I was alone.

"I was in darkness.

"But the darkness was only partial, and doubtless, in consequence of my eyes having been kept from the light so long, I was able to see tolerably well about me, and to define the kind of place I was in.

"It was a small apartment, rudely furnished, like a bedchamber. The roof was low and irregular in shape, as though it was immediately beneath the roof.

"The light came in through a small window, and I at once hastened towards it in the faint hope of accomplishing my escape.

"But on a closer approach I found the aperture, which was scarcely large enough to admit the passage of my body, was strongly defended by a network of iron bars.

"I then burst into tears, and wept till daylight.

"When the dawn came, and the different objects in the room became more distinguishable, I looked out of window in the hope that I might form some idea whereabouts I was.

"Nothing, however, met my gaze, but a number of roof-tops and little attic windows, packed as closely as possible together, and extending as far as I could see in every direction.

"I then felt sure that I must have been carried to London; and while I wondered what was the cause of my abduction, I wept when I thought how slight a chance my father would have of finding me in a huge place like London.

"As I had fancied in the night, the room in which I was confined was an attic immediately beneath the tiles. The door through which I had been brought was opposite the window. I had not been to it; I had not tried to open it and endeavour to make my escape that way, because I felt certain that it was securely fastened.

"However, as a kind of forlorn hope, I crossed the room in that direction, but before I could reach it, I heard someone removing the fastenings."

CHAPTER CCXCII.

BLANCHE WINBERRY CONCLUDES HER EVIDENCE, AND IDENTIFIES THE BODY OF HER FATHER.

AGAIN did Blanche Winberry pause for breath in her wondrously interesting narrative.

She had spoken with considerable rapidity, being anxious to take up no more time than she possibly could help; but it seemed that there were times when the recollection of the dangers and the difficulties she had gone through overpowered her.

With a perceptible effort, however, she regained her composure, and continued—

"When I heard those sounds I knew that some one was about to enter the apartment, and instinctively I drew back as far as possible from the door, while my heart beat so painfully that I could scarcely breathe.

"One of my abductors was doubtless about to make his appearance. Perhaps I should learn the reason why I had been carried off.

"The door was thrown open and a man appeared upon the threshold.

"At first, however, I scarcely obtained a glimpse of his countenance, for he turned round the moment he entered, and carefully closed the door behind him.

"Then he stood with his back to it, and looked at me attentively.

"I returned his gaze as well as my terror would allow me.

"I knew him in a moment, although I had only seen him once before; but the circumstances of our meeting were of such a character that it made it impossible for me to forget him."

"What were those circumstances?" asked Mr. Nuttall.

"I was in the library with Maud and my father, when Mr. Adrian Winberry was announced. My father desired Maud and myself to leave the room, and let him have his interview in private, for it was not his wish that we should make the acquaintance of our uncle."

"And did you leave the room in accordance with his desire?"

"Yes, sir."

"And yet you saw him then?"

"I did."

"How was that?"

"We left the room——"

"Your companion and yourself?"

"Yes. We determined to take a ramble together in the grounds, and, while we were crossing the hall, we encountered my uncle, who was then going in the direction of the library."

"And that was when you saw him?"

"Yes; he had his hat off, and I saw him very plainly. I looked at him more attentively than I should have done, but I felt curious about this uncle whose acquaintance my father did not desire me to make."

"Did your uncle speak to you?"

"No, sir; he merely bowed and passed on. When we returned from our walk we found father in the library very much agitated. He was a long time before he would tell me the cause of it, until I elicited from him that my uncle, having squandered away the annual income left to him by my grandfather, had endeavoured to extort money from my father."

"But he did not succeed in his endeavours?"

"No, sir. My father refused him, and solely on account of the manner in which the demand was made."

"And you say the person you saw in the hall announced himself as your uncle, Mr. Adrian Winberry, and was acknowledged by your father to be such?"

"Yes, sir."

"And you saw his features distinctly?"

"I did, sir."

"And you recognized the person who came into your room as your uncle, Mr. Adrian Winberry?"

"Yes, sir."

"You are sure you made no mistake?"

"Quite sure, sir."

"Well, then, be good enough to look carefully at the three prisoners at the bar, and then tell the court whether you recognise any one of them as being the individual you saw upon the two occasions referred to, namely, your uncle, Mr. Adrian Winberry."

As directed, Blanche turned her eyes towards the bar at which the prisoners stood.

As she did so, the eyes of every person in the court followed hers, and settled upon the prisoners with a concentrated gaze.

It was observant that all three shrank before it.

They looked like three miserable objects in whose breasts all hope was dead.

The gaze which Blanche fixed upon the prisoners was a clear and steady one,

She was slightly puzzled with the change which Adrian had made in his personal appearance.

But that white mark upon his forehead, which seemed set there like the brand of Cain, that he might be known of all men, prevented her having any serious doubts of his identity.

She raised her arm and pointed towards him, while he cowered down in the dock like a guilty wretch before the finger of the accusing angel.

"That is the man!" she said.

"Which?" asked Mr. Nuttall.

"The third one from me! He who stands furthest off!"

There could be no mistake as to who the fair witness meant.

"Will you swear positively to his identity?"

"Most positively. He has made some changes in his personal appearance since I last saw him, but nevertheless I have not the least doubt upon my mind!"

"That is quite sufficient; continue your relation. Yet, stay! Do you know the other two prisoners at the bar?"

"Yes, I have seen them both before!"

"Indeed! where? Under what circumstances? In company with the other prisoner?"

"Yes, sir; I have seen them both at the house where I was confined. They appeared to live in it."

"You are sure of that?"

"Perfectly sure!"

"And it is a long time since you saw them first?"

"Oh! yes; but I saw one of them on the first day of my incarceration. He brought my food!"

"Indeed!" Then turning to the judge, Mr. Nuttall said—

"My lord, this portion of the evidence given is most important, since it serves to altogether demolish the theory set up by the counsel for the defence, and of which this witness knows nothing. You must couple, too, with this the fact of their names being upon the deed, which I think clearly shows them to be accomplices, and criminal in the highest degree."

"I have not allowed any of the facts to escape my observation, brother Nuttall. The case is now rapidly becoming clearer, and I think we shall have but little trouble in bringing the guilt home to the right parties. Be good enough to continue the examination of this witness."

Mr. Nuttall bowed assent, and then turning to Blanche, he said—

"You swear, then, to the identity of all three prisoners at the bar?"

"I do, sir, most unhesitatingly."

"Then we will leave that point. Will you be good enough to return to that portion of your narrative at which you broke off, namely, the intrusion of Adrian Winberry into the room in which you were confined?"

"I will, sir."

"What happened after he entered and closed the door?"

"He stood with his back to it, and regarded me attentively, until at length he spoke. I cannot pretend to repeat what he said, word for word, but the substance of it was this. He told me that he had carried me off because my father had refused to accede to his demands to furnish him with money, and that he was resolved he should comply with his wishes—that he would compel him to do so, in fact. He knew the deep love my father bore me, and he determined to use that as a weapon to carry out his ends. Hence my abduction."

"Was he candid enough to avow all this to you?"

"He was, and the circumstance much amazed me, for until then I could not conceive that any one would be bold enough to avow such villainy. But he did, and moreover endeavoured to force me to write a letter to my father, telling him my circumstances, portraying my horrible fate, and entreating him by his love for me to accede to his brother's demand."

"This is monstrous," exclaimed the judge. "Do you swear to all this?"

"I do, my lord," replied Blanche, firmly, and somewhat haughtily, for she did not like the question.

"It surpasses all belief! Continue, I beg."

"I resolutely refused to assist him in his infamous designs in any way whatever. I dared him to do his worst. I did not fear him, and that neither threats, arguments, or ill-usage would bend me to his purpose."

"Did he renew his solicitations?"

"Not then, sir. He left me with the idea that my firmness would soon give way. But he was mistaken. He did not know the person with whom he had to deal. On the next occasion he found me as at first."

"And did you never give way?"

"Never; but when I was alone devoted the whole of my energies to making my escape. But, alas! my prison was too strong for me to break out of it."

"And you saw the three prisoners frequently?"

"Oh! yes. The two standing nearest to me brought me food, and appeared to occupy the house. Though whether they did so or not, is more than I can say for certain."

"But you made your escape?"

"Oh! yes; but not unaided. All at once my three jailers disappeared. On the last few occasions my uncle told me that he had my father securely in his custody in a place where he would never be found, and that if he did not consent, he should slay him. But this threat I heeded not, because I did not believe my father was in his custody. I thought that was only said to terrify me."

Here Blanche again burst into tears, but by a powerful effort she controlled her emotions, and continued—

"After this, days passed, and I saw nothing of my jailers. No one came near me. Fortunately I had been left with a tolerable stock of provisions, or I should inevitably have died of starvation; but I eked them out as well as I could.

"Last night, however, or rather, I should think, very early this morning, though it was not light, I was aroused from a light sleep I had fallen into by hearing a tapping at the window of my prison.

"I ran towards it instantly. I felt sure it was a friend who had come to rescue me. My heart told me so! No enemy would have come in such a fashion! On reaching the window I found I was right, that a friend had indeed found me, and was about to rescue me.

"I threw open the window, and then we could speak to each other——"

"Pardon me," said Mr. Nuttall; "but was this person who appeared at the window known to you?"

Blanche looked distressed.

She hesitated.

She stammered as she had done on a former occasion.

She glanced furtively at Adrian Winberry.

Then her eyes roamed over the court as though she was in quest of something.

But that something, let it be what it might, did not seem to meet her gaze, and once more she glanced at Adrian Winberry.

This behaviour was strange.

It was noticed by all.

Various interpretations were put upon it.

And though the trial had lasted so long as it had, yet it could be seen that the interest which was taken in the proceedings increased rather than diminished.

CHAPTER CCXCIII.

IN WHICH A FRESH CHARACTER APPEARS UPON THE SCENE OF ACTION, TO THE DISMAY OF ADRIAN WINBERRY.

THERE was some mystery in this behaviour of Blanche Winberry, but what that mystery was, was more than the acutest intellect there present could surmise.

She wished to speak.

Yet some consideration made her hold back.

Mr. Nuttall, whose interests lay solely with her, and who knew that her hesitation and disinclination to speak arose from no improper motive, was desirous to remove as much as possible the injurious effect which it could not fail to have upon the minds of all.

He addressed himself to her in a calm and gentle voice.

"You hesitate to reply to the question I have asked you. You hesitated upon a former occasion. It may be that such hesitation is quite natural, and that you have a good reason for it, but I must request you, for your own sake, and for the sacred cause of justice, to speak freely and fearlessly. Make no reservation, lest that which you should hold back should militate against you. Tell me, in a word, whether the person who attracted your attention by tapping at the attic window was known to you?"

"He was known," said Blanche, faintly. "That is—"

"What?"

"I had seen him many times."

"Then you must have known him?"

"Yes, I did know him."

"That is all we wished to ascertain," said Mr. Nuttall.

Blanche gave an evident sigh of relief.

The mystery was not elucidated yet, though doubtless it soon would be.

"When I opened the window we spoke to each other. He told me how he had been searching for me ever since my disappearance, but that he had only just succeeded in finding me. To the bottom part of the house he could not obtain access, nor could he force away the iron bars which guarded the attic window. At length he determined to make a breach through the roof, and this, after incredible labour—for he had no tools—he accomplished. He drew me through the aperture on to the roof, and from thence without much trouble, we made our way to the ground. With all speed I made my way to the hall, and, upon arriving there, learned what had happened, and what was taking place here to-day, and, in spite of all obstacles and objections, I made my way here, and, as I hope and trust, not too late to be of service."

One of the jurymen rose.

"I have to suggest that this witness, having identified the prisoners, should, in order to make her evidence complete, be taken to view the dead body, and identify that also."

"I would fain have spared the witness so painful a task," said Mr. Nuttall, "but if you think it necessary to the ends of justice, I am sure she will not hold back."

"I leave the matter with his lordship," said the juryman.

"I think it will be best to identify the body."

"I am ready," said Blanche, in a low, firm voice.

We will not linger upon this painful portion of our story.

Let it suffice to say, simply, and once for all, that Blanche was taken to the anteroom where the corpse lay, and that she of course identified it as being that of her father.

She returned to court, and then the trial was continued.

"I have no more questions to ask this witness," said Mr. Nuttall, "and she may stand down, without my brother for the defence wishes to put any questions to her."

The counsel for the defence rose to his feet.

"Really," he said, "this case has been conducted in such an extraordinary manner—there has been such a complete abrogation of all existing forms and precedents, that I very candidly confess I hardly know how to act. The first thing that strikes me, however, is that we have nothing to prove the identity of the witness, who has just given what I may call the most romantic narrative for evidence that was ever heard within the four walls of this court."

Mr. Nuttall rose.

"If the identity of this witness presents any difficulty to my learned friend, and he would like to have her sworn to, there are at this moment a dozen persons in court who are willing to do so."

"We will pass over that point, then," said the counsel; "I merely adverted to it because it was the first that occurred to my mind. Admitting that the witness is what she professes herself to be, I think it quite evident that she has not told the whole truth in the matter. I am the more sure of this, because once or twice during her examination by my learned friend, she faltered and hesitated, either like one who had something to conceal, or else like one who had but imperfectly learned the part she was to speak. Which of this two it is, as you are aware, is out of my province to decide."

"The witness awaits your cross-examination, if you wish to put any questions to her," said the judge.

"Then, my lord, I will just ask this witness to tell the court what took place after she left her father's house on the occasion referred to."

Again came that distressed and agitated look over the countenance of Blanche.

Again did she glance furtively at Adrian Winberry.

Again did her eyes roam over the sea of faces in the court, as if in search of a particular one.

But this time she seemed to succeed in seeing that for which she looked, for, upon her eye resting somewhere, the expression of her face underwent a total change.

She looked up into the face of the counsel for the defence calmly, and as though quite prepared to answer any question he might ask her.

This little bit of bye-play had not been lost on any one, though it was inexplicable to all who saw it.

The counsel took a note of it in his own mind, and then seeing Blanche apparently waiting, he repeated the question he had previously asked.

"After crossing the lawn," said Blanche, "I entered the shrubbery which adjoins it. Passing through this I came to a stile, where I waited."

"For what reason did you wait?"

"I had an appointment."

"Indeed," said the counsel for the defence, with a triumphant look at the jury, as much as to say, I have got hold of something important at last. "Indeed!"

"Yes, sir."

"Would you be good enough to say with whom?"

"I cannot."

"Cannot?"

"No."

"But you must."

"I cannot."

"Why not?"

"Because I do not know."

"That is a very satisfactory reason; but excuse me for making the remark, it seems a little singular that you should have an appointment, and not know with whom!"

"I did not know his name."

"Oh! Then it appears the appointment was with one of the masculine gender, whose name you did not know? I am afraid, now, if the whole truth is told, your disappearance from home will be very easily accounted for."

"I do not understand you, sir!"

"Will you save trouble now at once by confessing that the story of the abduction, with all the romantic incidents belonging to it, is a fiction?"

"Certainly not, sir."

"Oh! you won't save trouble?"

"What I have sworn to, sir, is the truth, and I call upon heaven to witness it."

The counsel shrugged his shoulders and continued—

"Well, then, be good enough to say what took place while you waited at the stile."

The person for whom I waited came."

"And you had some conversation with him?"

"Yes."

"What next?"

"We parted."

"Parted?"

"Yes."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Quite, sir."

"What caused you to part?"

"Our meeting was a secret one—it had already lasted some time, and I was afraid we should be discovered, so we parted."

"With a promise to meet again?"

"Yes, sir."

"And what took place after your parting?"

"What I have previously related to you."

"That a cloak was thrown over your head, and you were carried off?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, now, then, was not the person you met at the stile the one who carried you off?"

"What, Mr. Adrian Winberry? Oh! no."

"It was not Mr. Winberry who carried you off?"

"That is not what I meant."

"What did you mean? I should really advise you to be careful, for you are trifling with your evidence in a very improper manner."

"I am not, sir. It is you who wish to pervert and put a wrong construction upon all my replies. What I said was, that the person I met at the stile had nothing to do with my abduction, and it was he who rescued me, and without whose aid I could not possibly have been here to day!"

Blanche spoke with great spirit and energy, and a hum of applause followed her words.

But the ushers soon hushed it by uttering their monotonous cry, "Si—lence, Si—lence!"

"And do you positively swear to that?"

"I do, sir."

"Then why did you hesitate and appear confused when you were questioned upon this point by my learned brother for the prosecution?"

"Because"—

"Because what?"

"The person had requested me to avoid, if possible, all mention of him."

"Indeed, then, there is something mysterious in that, and it is always a safe rule to call anything or any one mysterious, suspicious likewise."

Blanche's eyes again roamed over the court.

"Now, witness," said the counsel for the defence, "look at me, and tell me whether the person you speak of is in court?"

Blanche looked appealingly at the judge.

"Must I answer that question, my lord?"

"It will be best to do so."

"Then he is in court."

"Then," said the counsel for the defence, "I trust, my lord, you will give orders for no one to be allowed egress from this place. This mysterious individual, of whose identity, however, I have more than a suspicion, must be brought forward."

"You may save yourself the trouble," said a voice from the body of the court. "I am here, and am quite ready to step forward."

The voice that pronounced these words was stern in its tones, and yet anyone could tell it was a youth who spoke.

But the effects of that voice upon two persons was marked and extraordinary.

Blanche Winberry started, and a crimson glow overspread her countenance.

Adrian Winberry started, and at the same time uttered such a horrible cry, compounded of rage and fear, that every one shrank back appalled.

It was evident he recognized the voice of the person who was willing to come forward.

But what was there in that recognition to cause him to utter such a cry? Why should it have produced such a remarkable effect upon him?

These are questions to which the next few lines will afford an adequate answer.

CHAPTER CCXCIV.

IN WHICH THE MYSTERIOUS WITNESS REVEALS HIMSELF, AND THE JUDGE COMMENCES SUMMING UP THE CASE TO THE JURY.

THAT the person who said he was ready to come forward fully meant what he said could be seen by the vigorous manner in which he set about forcing a passage through the crowd.

He made his way in a direct line towards the witness-box.

From the judge on the bench, down to the meanest official or the most uninterested spectator among the audience, there was not one who did not feel the keenest desire to see what this person was like.

Those, too, with whom he came in contact, gave way right and left before him.

It took him but a moment to reach the witness-box, and as soon as he did reach it, without waiting for Blanche to descend, and without being told what he ought to do, he pulled open the little door, and stood in the narrow place by her side.

Then he looked fearlessly round the court.

All saw, then, that he was a young man about twenty years of age—that time of life when the high aspirations and poetry of youth have not become lost in manhood.

He was strikingly handsome, not merely in his features but in his form, which was manly and robust, while he carried himself with an air which could not fail to win the admiration of all who saw it.

But though his eye was bright, and its expression fearless, yet it could be seen that if he had been left to his own choice in the matter, he would never have revealed himself, though for what reason none knew.

The attention of all in court was so much fixed upon this young man, that very few, if any, noticed the expression of Adrian Winberry's countenance.

It was awful in the extreme.

He glared at the young man who stood in the witness-box with the deadliest hatred in his eye.

In fine, the expression was such that if he had been possessed of any means of taking away his life he would not have shrunk from doing so.

As they stood in the witness-box Blanche and this mysterious youth formed a well-matched pair; nor did it require much foresight to see that they loved each other.

But it was against the usage of the court for two persons to stand together in the witness-box, so the usher held open the door for one of them to descend.

"Who do you wish to remain?" asked the judge.

"The young man," said the counsel for the defence, "though I may probably wish to recall the other witness."

Blanche had no resource but to quit the witness-box, and which, to tell the truth, she was by no means unwilling to do.

The counsel for the defence looked for a long time at this young man, and then he said—

"What is your name?"

Mr. Nuttall rose.

"Pardon me," he said addressing the judge, "but as this is a witness for the prosecution, though somewhat strangely brought forward, it is my right to be the first in putting any questions to him."

"Certainly."

"But I claim him for a witness for the defence, my lord!" said the opposing counsel, "and I maintain that I have the right to question. My learned friend for the prosecution may cross-examine at his discretion."

"If you will listen to me," said the young man from the witness-box, in a clear but sad tone of voice, "I can give an account of all I know without being questioned by any one."

"I decide in favour of the counsel for the prosecution," said the judge.

The counsel for the defence sat down with a bang.

Mr. Nuttall turned his attention to the witness, and of course put the same question as the other had done.

"What is your name?"

"Be good enough to understand that though I am acquainted with Miss Blanche Winberry, yet she is not only in ignorance of who I am, but does not know even my name. Chance brought us together in a simple manner, which need not to be told here. I had a reason for concealing my name."

"That reason cannot hold good here," said Mr. Nuttall, "so you will be good enough to tell the court what it is."

"I intended to do so. Only I thought it would be best to make that statement."

"Very well, sir. Now tell us your name?"

"Adrian Winberry!"

Had a bombshell fallen into the court it could not have produced a greater sensation than the mere utterance of that name did.

All were positively aghast.

As for Blanche, she uttered a faint scream, and shrunk back when her unknown preserver revealed himself.

Mr. Nuttall, it seemed, could scarcely credit his own ears, for he said—

"Did I understand you to say that your name is Adrian Winberry?"

"You did, sir. Such is my name."

"Then you are a relative?"

"I am, sir."

"In what degree do you stand related to her?"

"I am her cousin!"

"You are, then, a relative of the prisoner at the bar?"

"I am, sir."

"You are sorry for it, no doubt? Be good enough to tell the court in what precise degree of relationship you stand to him?"

There was a moment's silence after this question was propounded, during which the spectators looked from the Adrian Winberry who stood at the bar and the Adrian Winberry who stood in the witness-box.

As they did so, all could trace certain points of resemblance between the two, so that when the witness, in a sad and unsteady tone, said—

"He is my father!"

None were surprised. They had anticipated the reply.

"Your father?" exclaimed Mr. Nuttall. "Then of course you will give no evidence against him?"

"I trust I shall be spared that trial. Yet I can corroborate a portion of Miss Blanche Winberry's statement without doing so."

"Then we shall be very glad to hear you."

"I suppose it does not matter in what way the acquaintanceship between Miss Blanche Winberry and myself began. It was, as I before stated, in the first case the result of a mere chance accident."

"We are bound to believe that part of your testimony. But I think you said Miss Winberry was unacquainted with your name until you now pronounced it. Is this so?"

"It is, sir."

"But, on the occasion of your first meeting, I presume you knew who she was?"

"I did, sir. She told me. Then I knew that my father had an ill feeling towards this part of our family, and he strictly forbade me ever to make the acquaintance of any member of it."

"But how came you to be near Hampstead on the occasion in question?"

"I had not long returned from Spain with my father. I was born in Spain. I accompanied him to Hampstead. He said he was going there on business with this brother whom he so detested, and would not allow me to enter with him, so I had to wait in the lane until he came to me."

"I understand. It was then, while waiting, I presume, that chance threw you in the way of Miss Blanche Winberry?"

"You are right in that surmisal, sir."

"And were your meetings afterwards continued?"

"They were, sir; and with that perverseness which so often manifests itself, a mutual affection sprang up between us which neither could control."

"But did you not confide the secret of who you were to the lady?"

"No, sir. On the contrary, I implored her to keep all that had passed between us a profound secret, because I argued that, as the hate was mutual, she would only draw much ill usage upon herself."

"Indeed."

"That is precisely it. I saw her many times, and when I last left her, it was with a promise upon her part to meet me at the same place on the following evening. I went, but she came not, and then I learned the intelligence, from various people I saw in the neighbourhood, that she had mysteriously disappeared."

"And was that all the intelligence you possessed upon the subject?"

"It was, sir."

"Where was your father?"

"I cannot tell, sir."

"Why not? Do you refuse to do so?"

"By no means. I simply say I cannot tell you, because I do not know; he said he should be absent for some time, and desired me to remain at the hotel at which we had taken up our quarters during our stay in England."

"And did you?"

"Not altogether. When I heard of the mysterious disappearance of Miss Blanche Winberry I directed the whole of my attention to finding her. I could not join in the search in a legitimate manner, as I could have wished, because of revealing myself. But I worked in solitude and secrecy, and after infinite trouble, succeeded in finding her almost dead with cold and hunger in the garret of a house in Lambeth."

"Well, sir?"

"I freed her from that place, and accompanied her to her father's residence, with the intention of avowing who I was, and of asking the hand of his daughter. Upon arriving, however, we found the whole place in an uproar, learned that Mr. Winberry, her father, had been murdered, and that the trial was even then in progress. Accordingly, at the urgent request of Miss Winberry, I brought her here, and with what has happened since you must already be acquainted."

The young man paused.

It will be noticed that not one word of the evidence he gave criminated his father in any way. All he did was to corroborate the statements made by the being whom he loved and valued more than any one in the world beside.

Mr. Nuttall made a sign that his examination had concluded, and the counsel for the defence, on being asked whether he had any questions to ask, gave a surly reply in the negative.

CHAPTER CCXCV.

THE JUDGE SUMS UP THE CASE AGAINST ADRIAN WINBERRY IN A VERY CLEAR AND LOGICAL MANNER.

THE aspect presented by this trial at the present juncture was certainly without all precedent.

But the protracted proceedings were now close upon termination.

The counsel for the defence had, beyond doubt, fought his client's battle well.

He had fought it in the face of the utmost opposition, and in defiance of common sense.

Such a battle might be prolonged, but victory would be quite hopeless.

It will be recollected that when Blanche made her sudden and somewhat dramatic appearance in the court, the counsel had made his speech for the defence, and Mr. Nuttall had began to make his reply.

In what way, then, were the proceedings to be resumed?

The evidence which had just been given, so complete as it was, and bearing, as it did, so intimately upon the case, was altogether against him, nor could his acute intellect perceive any point upon which an attack could be made with any prospect of success.

If he had, he would have cross-examined his client's son, though perhaps he thought it quite as well to leave him to himself.

The judge, however, passed the compliment of asking him whether he had any more to say.

He replied in the negative.

"I quite ignore the latter part of this case," he said,

"I have made my speech for the defence, and the matter now rests awaiting the verdict of the jury."

With these words he sat down.

Mr Nuttall rose.

"Since this is the determination of my learned brother, I shall not trouble the court with my reply, but leave the case to his Lordship to sum up."

Mr Nuttall sat down.

The judge turned over his notes.

They were more than usually voluminous, and it would speak well for the clearness of his intellect if he was able to have them all in view, and give a luminous summary of the whole.

Those who had listened to the proceedings thus far felt like those who have watched at the bedside of a loved one laid prostrate with a lingering illness, and then been told that the time for the crisis had arrived, and that the patient would either recover or die.

There was no occasion, then, to call for order while the judge looked over his notes. Indeed, all were intently occupied with gazing upon his countenance, as though they could see there the shadow of coming events.

But the attempt was a futile one.

His stern face, compressed lips, and clear bright eye, were inscrutable.

At length he commenced the delivery of his address in the following terms.

His voice, when he began, was low and somewhat indistinct, so that his hearers were compelled to stretch their senses of audition to the utmost to catch at the purport of what he said.

But as he proceeded his voice grew stronger, until eventually it filled the whole of the courthouse, and every one could hear with perfect distinctness.

"Gentlemen of the jury—

"When opening their speeches, both the counsel for the prosecution and the counsel for the defence adverted to the singular nature of the case upon which you are now called upon to adjudicate.

"I cannot refrain from commencing in the same manner, and endorsing what they have said. The case is certainly a most singular one, and there is nothing in the whole course of my recollection like it.

"It is complicated, too, to a most extraordinary degree, and I much regret that so much feeling—so much romance—so much extraneous matter has been imported into it.

"The difficulty of separating the incidents is great, and that the incidents do require separation is evident, in order that some kind of clear conclusion may be come to.

"It is my duty to put the case before you in this manner, gentlemen of the jury, and if I do not properly accomplish that important duty, I hope you will do me the justice to take into consideration the perplexing character of the evidence, and the voluminousness of the notes I have been compelled to take, which conspire in a very great measure to increase the difficulty of my task.

"However, I will do the best I can, and occupy as short a space of time as I possibly can.

"In the first place, then, we have the clear evidence to show that a murder has been committed.

"The body of the murdered man has been seen and sworn to by two witnesses who ought to be relied upon. One was the daughter of the murdered man, and the other the constant and intimate companion of that daughter.

"We may then, I think, safely say that the question of the identity of the murdered man is beyond all cavil and dispute.

"And now, it having been settled who this man is, the question naturally arises, what circumstances led to his death? and by whom would the crime most likely be committed?

"With respect to the first of these questions, it has been shown you in evidence that Mr. Winberry was a gentleman residing on his own estate, which has been stated to be situated about midway between Hampstead and Hendon.

"It has also been deposed that the deceased Mr. Winberry had a brother—or rather a half-brother—named Adrian, who, it is admitted on all hands, stands at the bar of this court, in company with two other prisoners.

"It is also clear that a certain amount of ill-will or dislike subsisted between the two brothers, the cause of which hatred has been ascribed to the father's will, by which the bulk of the property, both real and personal, was left to the elder brother William, and merely an income of eight hundred pounds a year to Adrian, the younger brother.

"With the terms of this will, whether just or unjust, we have nothing whatever to do, nor does it signify whether the will was the cause of the ill-feeling, or whether the will was sufficient cause for it.

"With all this, I say, you have nothing whatever to do, so that you will bear in mind the clearly established fact that the brothers were unfriendly with each other.

"In consequence of this unfriendliness, the younger brother, Adrian, appears to have left England, and according to a statement made by his son, while under examination, took up his residence in Spain, in which country there is every reason to suppose he remained for a considerable length of time.

"At length, however, having made away with the allowance granted him, it would seem he returned to England, and sought out his brother, demanding of him some kind of pecuniary assistance, which was refused him, and the two brothers separated greater enemies than ever, Mr William Winberry strictly prohibiting his brother Adrian from entering his doors again.

"But upon the occasion of this visit, the younger brother was distinctly seen by two witnesses, who have both sworn to his identity in the most unhesitating manner.

"So far all is, I think, very straightforward and satisfactory. Unfortunately, the complications have yet to come.

"You have been told how, after these events, Blanche, the daughter of William Winberry, went out one evening for a walk in the grounds, and never returned.

"By her own evidence you have been shown that she had, by chance, made the acquaintance of the son of her father's younger brother, and that dating from the commencement of that acquaintanceship, a mutual affection sprung up between them, though this Adrian Winberry, junior, carefully concealed who he was, the probability being that had he not done so his suit would have come to an end there and then.

"The witness Blanche then related how, after parting with this secret lover, she had hastened home, when her progress was interrupted—in fine, she was carried off.

"The evidence of this witness is in very many respects most important.

"She has sworn that she was taken by her unseen and unknown abductors to a garret at the top of a house in London, where she was left alone.

"She then further affirms that the first person who came in was Adrian Winberry, her uncle. She knew him, she says, instantly, and from this it may be inferred that he presented himself before her free from any disguise.

"The object of his visit was, according to her statement, to endeavour to compel her to write a letter to her father, stating where she was, and what peril she was futurely threatened with, coupled with the request to accede to the request made by her captors.

"This, with praiseworthy firmness, the young lady refused to do, nor could any threats or arguments induce her to alter her decision. The conditions to which her father was to consent in order to procure her liberation were, that he should transfer his wealth and title to his younger brother, reserving only a sufficiency to keep them in comfort.

"This, gentlemen of the jury, must strike you as being a most monstrous proposition, and you cannot wonder if Miss Winberry resolved to suffer a great deal before she made such a request to her father; for she feared that out of his love for her, and consequent grief for her loss, he would be induced to grant the request, in order to have her restored to him, great as the sacrifice was.

"And now it must be borne in mind that the witness positively swears that she saw all three prisoners at the bar in the house in which she was confined, and her impression was that they were the tenants of it. This alone, without any additional evidence, would serve to show that the three prisoners were accomplices, and not, as stated by the counsel for the defence, perfect strangers to each other.

"But I shall shortly come to a more conclusive proof of their accomplicity, but I would wish to finish with what I am upon. It will be presented to you in due season.

"I wish to recall to your mind that the witness states that for several days before she effected her release or escape, she was not visited by any one, so that she was in imminent danger of starvation. This points to the identity of the prisoners, because during that time they were detained in custody in Newgate."

CHAPTER CCXCVI.

THE JUDGE CONTINUES HIS DIFFICULT TASK, AND STANDS UP BOLDLY IN FAVOUR OF DICK TURPIN.

HAVING reached thus far in his summing-up, the judge paused to wipe his face, which was hot and flushed.

The spectators took advantage of the lull, and gave a sigh of relief.

Their pent-up feelings required some outvent.

But the pause which the judge made was only a momentary one, and he resumed in the following manner.

It was observed that several of the jurymen took rough notes of the principal points to which the judge directed their attention.

"Up to the present time, gentlemen, you will perceive that the inclination of the whole of the evidence is to fix the onus of the guilt upon the prisoners at the bar, who were beyond question mixed up with the affair of the abduction.

"This point being conceded, then, see how accurately the whole drift of that evidence chimes in with the other proceedings of the prisoners. I mean with reference to getting possession of the Winberry estates.

"The evidence of Mr. Adrian Winberry, junior, is only valuable for its corroborative qualities, since he can swear that Miss Blanche Winberry was found by him in such a place as she describes.

"This portion of the case, then, can, I think, be left just as it is for the present, while we turn our attention to the discovery of the murder.

"Pursford, who is a Bow-street officer of experience, has stated upon oath how he saw, on the night of the twenty-seventh of the past month, three persons cross the road and enter a house in the Birdcage-walk, which was known to him (Pursford) to be deserted and under the imputation of being haunted.

"This, gentlemen of the jury, was deemed by the officer to be a very suspicious circumstance. He saw these three men at the hour of midnight enter the empty house, and the conclusion to which he came was a very natural one, namely, that they were there after no good.

"In his evidence he states that he went up to the door and found it fast. He listened, but he could hear no sounds of any kind within. He was alone, and conceived it his best plan of action to set off immediately for assistance. He did so, and returned with several men, who had been placed by the inspecter at the police-office under his command.

"On their arrival, they gave a summons for admission in the name of the king, but at the same moment there came to their ears the sound of the report of a pistol, and this was judged sufficient to warrant them to break down the door, which they did, and then rushed into the house in a body.

"You will doubtless recollect that in his evidence he gave at length the causes which led them upstairs to the room on the second-floor, in which was found the corpse of the murdered man.

"They had also, in their ascent of the stairs, heard voices and the trampling of feet, as though those in the house had heard the approach of the police, and were seeking safety in instant flight.

"On entering the room in which the murder was committed, they saw opposite to them an open door, and through this they went in search of the murderers.

"And now, gentlemen of the jury, I wish to direct your attention very particularly to this point—the counsel for the defence having, at one time, tried to destroy the identity of the two prisoners at the bar, John Norman and Richard Sare.

"Passing through this open door, of which I spoke, and crossing another room, the police-officers came to a flight of stairs.

"These led into a passage of some kind or other, which terminated in the small plot of garden ground which lies at the rear of these houses, and is separated from the Birdcage-walk by iron palings, as I daresay many of you have seen the house in question, it having recently acquired no small share of notoriety.

"In the act of making their escape from this little piece of garden ground, the two men I have just mentioned—Norman and Sare—were captured.

"They were captured, too, by the very police-officer who has given his evidence to you. He swears, without the slightest hesitation, that the two prisoners at the bar are the same as he captured, having looked in their faces attentively both at the time of capture and also at the time of his delivery of them into the hands of the governor of Newgate.

"In the meantime, Mr Adrian Winberry had been captured and brought to Newgate.

"I do not wish to touch upon his capture now; I would much rather the circumstances attending it were considered separately.

"What I now wish to draw your attention more particularly to is this. Pursford, the officer, swears that when he took his two prisoners into the vestibule of the prison, and they caught sight of Adrian Winberry there, they, doubtless under the surprise of the moment, were incautious enough to utter cries of recognition.

"Whether the other prisoner responded to these recognitory cries is not clear.

"And now, gentlemen of the jury, I wish you to connect the several links of my evidence together.

"Miss Blanche Winberry swears that Adrian, the prisoner at the bar, came into the room in which she was confined, and made those propositions which have already been given at length.

"She also swears that the two other prisoners, Norman and Sare, appeared in the room, their errand being, as I take it, to bring her the necessaries of life.

"Now observe what Pursford, the officer, swears.

"He swears that he saw three persons enter the haunted house.

"He swears that, being directed by certain sounds and indications, he found in a room upon the second floor the body of a man who had been cruelly murdered, and the evidence given at the inquest serves to show that when the officers broke in the murder had only just been committed, and that life was scarcely extinct.

"He swears most positively to the identity of Norman and Sare, and is convinced they are the two men he captured escaping from the haunted house, and delivered into the custody of the governor of Newgate.

"Then he swears, gentlemen of the jury, and this, in my humble judgment, is a most important point, that these two prisoners recognised Mr Adrain Winberry, and appeared surprised to find him in the vestibule of the prison.

"In connexion with what I have just now stated this says a great deal, and I wish you to ponder over it while I take up another thread in this intricate affair, which I have now the strongest hopes of thoroughly unravelling.

"It unfortunately happens that the events themselves are complicated with minor and extraneous incidents, which make my task difficult to a degree.

"However, I will begin with considering the evidence of one who has come before you in a very remarkable manner—I am not afraid to say in such a manner as no witness ever before came into a court.

"You know, of course, the person to whom I allude, it being, unfortunately for him, no other than the notorious highwayman, Richard Turpin.

"The evidence he gives is all important, but before we consider the evidence itself, there are one or two things requiring your attention.

"As you have heard, the counsel for the defence strongly opposed his evidence being received at all. But though, in his capacity of highwayman, Richard Turpin stands charged with the commission of many crimes, yet he has never been convicted of any.

"But being pursued by the officers who hold a warrant for his apprehension, and having had very many narrow escapes of capture at their hands, it must follow that his apprehension would be the immediate consequence of his appearance in the witness-box to-day.

"Urged, however, by some good feeling, you see he made his way as a spectator in the body of the court. An appeal for protection was made to me on his behalf by the counsel for the prosecution. But that appeal was quite beyond my jurisdiction. I had no power to protect the witness whatever.

"In spite, however, of this, as you saw, gentlemen of the jury, he came forward and sacrificed his own life—I say sacrificed it, for he has virtually done so, in order that justice should be done upon a daring criminal, who, by committing the revolting crime of murder, has made a happy home desolate.

"Gentlemen of the jury, the circumstances under which the witness came forward must go far to stamp all that he says with truth, and to remove the prejudice against receiving his evidence, which the counsel for the defence endeavoured to establish.

"Taking, then, into consideration all the various circumstances under which he came forward, I think, gentlemen of the jury, you cannot do wrong by receiving his evidence, and attaching that importance to it which I am sure it deserves.

"For my own part, I cannot help characterizing the conduct of this witness as noble in the highest degree, and let me ask where would another person be found to step forward boldly, as he has done, when they were perfectly assured their death would be the result.

"I may say no more. It is possible this witness, by his conduct in this matter, may endeavour to palliate his past misdeeds. How far he may succeed in any such endeavour it is difficult to say.

"There, can however, be no harm in stating that if it had laid in my power I should have allowed him free passage from the court to-day, and given him, at least, a chance for his life."

A loud cheer followed the termination of this speech, and there were very few indeed in the court who did not join in it.

The judge was, in spite of all his skill and judgment, not insensible to popular applause. Indeed, it is sweet to all, from the sovereign on the throne to the pauper in the workhouse.

The judge held up his hand for silence, but the gesture was only replied to by renewed cheering.

At length, however, by the strenuous exertions of the ushers and other officials of the court, order and silence were restored.

The judge resumed his address to the jury.

"Perhaps" he said, "you will consider I have dwelt a little too long on the point of the evidence of this witness being received. I feel that if I am understood I need go no further, simply stating that though ere now there have been many undoubted cases of a witness giving false evidence, yet I think I may make bold to say that a case was never heard of where the witness threw away his own life to do it.

"The fact of the witness being able to make his way through the crowd of officials who throng the entrances to this court without being detected speaks volumes in favour of his keeping out of the clutches of the officers if he was surrounded.

"Nevertheless, he is here! He has avowed himself, and the consequence will be that upon the termination of this trial he will be taken under the escort of the police to one of the strongest cells in Newgate.

Loud expressions of dissent from among the populace responded to this speech, which was far from being in unison with their feelings.

Unheeding it, however, the judge went on.

"Gentlemen of the jury—

"We have yet some important work to do in the shape of reviewing the case, which it is necessary to do completely. I have exceeded the limits I marked out for myself in speaking of this witness, but I will endeavour to compensate for my prolixity.

"In the first place, then, let us carefully weigh over the substance of the testimony given by Turpin, which in one part has a very remarkable connection with the accidental manner in which Adrian Winberry was taken prisoner.

"It appears, then, that on the night in question, Turpin was pursued by his foes, and took refuge in St. James's-park.

"But it seems it was not his intention to remain in the inclosure, but make his way out by one of the many gates around it without loss of time.

"When, however, near the piece of ornamental water in the centre of the park he heard some bugles blown, and doubtless from experience he knew the meaning of the signals.

"They signified, it seems, that the soldiers on duty at the different gates were not to allow any person egress from the park, which would then become a place where their prey could be speedily hunted down.

"Turpin, however, in this esperate emergency, remembers a house reputed to be haunted, situated in the Birdcage-walk, and with the determination of making his way into it, if possible, he crossed the park in that direction.

"By his own statement he succeeded in his attempt, and got into this empty house—how, does not matter. It seems he did get in.

"His next step was to ascend to the upper regions of the house, and when going up the first flight of stairs, he heard a key rattle in the lock of the front door, which was immediately opposite to him.

"And now, gentlemen of the jury, pray mark what follows, and how it coincides with the evidence given by Pursford, who is an officer well known for his skill and integrity, and whose testimony no one will attempt to controvert.

"From the outside Pursford, the officer, saw three men enter the haunted house.

"From the inside, Turpin, the highwayman, who was hiding from his foes, saw the very same thing.

"Moreover, the description given by him of the personal appearance of these three men perfectly coincides with that given by Pursford, the officer.

"But Turpin does more. He saw the faces of the three men distinctly, and he avers they are the prisoners at the bar.

"The case against two of them, then—Norman and Sare—is quite complete and conclusive. They are sworn to by Turpin, who saw their faces at the time the murder was committed; they are sworn to by Pursford, who captured them in the act of making their escape; they are sworn to by Miss Blanche Winberry as being concerned, if not in her abduction, at any rate in her imprisonment in the house in Lambeth.

"All this accumulation of testimony must, I think, leave their guilt apparent, and therefore I will say no more about them, but proceed to sum up the evidence against Adrian Winberry, the prime mover and instigator in the whole affair."

CHAPTER CCXCVII.

THE JURY HAVE SOME LITTLE DIFFICULTY IN AGREEING UPON A VERDICT.

THE judge referred to his notes again before he entered upon this the most important portion of his whole address.

It gave the jury the opportunity of whispering to each other, and commenting upon the evidence against the two prisoners.

But the judge did not stay long, for having in his own mind no doubt whatever of the guilt of the three prisoners, he was anxious to bring this very protracted case to as early a termination as possible.

He went on in the following words—

"Gentlemen of the jury,—

"In entering upon this part of the question now under consideration, I must request you to give me your earnest and undivided attention.

"I shall commence by directing your attention to what was sworn to by the witness Maud Gouldman, as being the cause which brought Adrian Winberry into contact with his elder brother William, after so many years of separation.

"She had it from the lips of William himself, who told her that Adrian, having squandered the allowance left to him by his father, had sought him out and endeavoured to extort money from him, but he refused to listen to his application.

"Then, with that on your minds, I shall direct your attention to the account which Miss Blanche Winberry gave of the interview she had with her uncle Adrian after her abduction.

"That interview was not sought, for it was thrust upon her by her uncle. She was a prisoner confined in the garret of a house stated to be situated in Lambeth. The account she gives of her uncle's proposal is simply this: Knowing the great love her father had for her, he had torn her from him, in order thereby to achieve his ends, which now seem not merely to extort a sum of money, but the audacious idea of inducing his brother to transfer his wealth and estates to him, reserving only an income for their support, thus, indeed, totally reversing the conditions of the father's will.

"But as I have before had occasion to remark, with most praiseworthy firmness Miss Winberry refused to do this, though threats of a sufficiently terrible nature were held out to her to make her hesitate to refuse.

"She did refuse, and now connect these two together, and the motive of Adrian Winberry appears the same.

"With these two examples, however, connect the evidence given by Turpin as to what took place in the haunted house.

"You will remember in his statement he deposed to standing at the door of the room in which the interview took place, first where he could only hear what took place, and afterwards where he could both see and hear.

"The purport of what he overheard is this. Adrian Winberry was urging his brother, then a prisoner in his hands, to sign a deed, which would make over to him all his wealth and estates, with the reservation above mentioned, and in return he was to be restored to freedom himself, and his daughter Blanche given up to him and saved from some terrible fate with which she was threatened.

"Here, then, you have Adrian Winberry sworn to by three different people, and strange to say, while they each identify his personal appearance, they at the same time show him actuated by the same motives; they have all three seen him under one aspect.

"The witness Turpin deposes that he saw the three prisoners at the bar in the room in the haunted house. The light of a lantern which was placed upon the table revealed their features fully to him.

"Two—John Norman and Richard Sare—had hold of the deceased Mr. Winberry by the arms, and kept him in his seat, while the other, Adrian Winberry, pressed him by these arguments to sign the deed of transference.

"In the end his arguments prevailed, and the elder brother affixed his signature to that document.

"No sooner had he done so than, horrible to relate, upon the evidence of this witness, Adrian drew a pistol, and blew out his brother's brains.

"Then Turpin, hearing the sounds which Pursford made in breaking in, and naturally jumping to the conclusion that his pursuers had tracked him to his hiding-place, felt that his own safety demanded his first consideration; therefore he ran upstairs, and made his escape over the roof-tops.

"One of Pursford's companions has given evidence which fully bears out this portion of the witness's story, for he was the one who pursued Turpin in the upper part of the house.

"Now if there was any doubt about this deed, that doubt must be dissipated, for behold, here is the identical deed made mention of!"

As he spoke these words the judge held up the deed, of which Mr. Skinner had so unwillingly relinquished possession.

"And mark," continued the judge, "this deed is taken from one of the witnesses for the defence—not from one for the prosecution; and mark as well, that it is signed by the two prisoners, John Norman and Richard Sare, who have all along, by the evidence of other witnesses, appeared as the accomplices of Adrian Winberry.

"Gentlemen of the jury, will it please you to inspect this document?"

Thus speaking, the judge gave the deed to the usher, who passed it to the foreman of the jury.

It was handed from one to another, and carefully examined by all.

"Now this deed, it appears, by his own confession, was drawn up by one Josiah Skinner, who is now in custody upon a charge of perjury, for his evidence is nothing more than a tissue of wilful misstatements. In his cross-examination, the prosecuting counsel also elicited the fact that he had endeavoured to abate into the premises of the deceased Mr. Winberry, by the advice of his client Adrian, but that attempt, it appears, was frustrated.

"I have now to touch upon the manner in which Adrian Winberry was apprehended, which certainly furnishes one of the most remarkable exemplifications of the means which are taken by Providence to work out its ends.

"After this I shall make some remarks upon the theory set up for the defence, and then leave the case in your hands for decision.

"You must bear in mind, then, the rather peculiar aspect which St. James's-park presented upon that particular night.

"A large number of persons were searching the park in every direction, the object of their pursuit being the capture of Dick Turpin, whom they knew to have taken refuge in it.

"Besides this, the usual exits to the park were guarded by soldiers, whose orders were to allow no one to pass out.

"This state of things, however, was known to but few persons, and certainly Adrian Winberry was not one of the few who were in the secret.

"And I must remind you, gentlemen of the jury, that if Pursford, the officer, had been one moment later than he was, he would have failed to capture the two men he took into custody, for, as already stated, they were in the very act of making their escape into the park.

"And now we have only to suppose that Adrian Winberry was the first in the flight, and that he managed to get over the palings before Pursford arrived, to account for his presence in the park.

"Being here, however, his first impulse would be to make his way to one of the gates, and he appears to have made his way in a direct line to the one situate in Spring Gardens.

"Here, however, the soldier on duty, in obedience to the orders he had received, took him into custody, and, upon the others coming up, he was carried off to Newgate.

"In the vestibule of the prison, however, the mistake that had been made was discovered, and then Adrian Winberry, declaring who he was, complained bitterly of the treatment he had received, and indignantly demanded to be set at liberty.

"This demand Mr. Cawthorn, the governor, declined to accede to, and in the midst of the dispute, Pursford, the officer, arrived with his prisoners, and then, according to his evidence, the recognition took place between them.

"Now all this, as a sequel to the rest, looks very black indeed, nor does the theory of the defence at all account for it in a satisfactory manner.

"The principal evidence, indeed, is that given by Mr. Skinner, and the tendency of that evidence is to set up an alibi. I cannot think, however, that it has succeeded in doing this. On the contrary, his evidence is more damaging than otherwise against the prisoners.

"This, gentlemen of the jury, is as clear a statement as I can give of this extraordinarily-involved case, which, at first sight, seems to set summary at defiance.

"With respect to the defence, the counsel employed has, I think, inclined more to utter wild and insupportable statements, none of which he, or any one else, could substantiate, than to shift the guilt from the shoulders of his client or clients—for I am not clear whether he appears on behalf of one or all three of the prisoners.

"Among these random charges, the one which needs most reference is that which charges Dick Turpin with the committing of the crime which he saw committed by another.

"To charge another person with being guilty, does not have the effect of proving the innocence of another.

"In my opinion, however, the charge is utterly groundless and ridiculous, and based upon the most improbable of suppositions, and I, in my own mind, feel quite clear that the highwayman is guiltless of that one crime, at least.

"And now, gentlemen of the jury, I conclude, and it rests with you to pronounce a verdict in accordance with your convictions. If you have any reasonable doubt about the guilt of the prisoners at the bar, your consciences and your duty compel you to give them the advantage of that doubt; but if you feel assured of their guilt, then does your duty to society at large compel you to register a verdict in accordance with that conviction."

The judge sat down.

A hurst of applause greeted the termination of his address.

Considering the great length of the trial—the many and complex incidents which had been brought into it, the contradictory nature of some of the evidence, and the number of witnesses examined, he had certainly performed his onerous task with more than usual ability.

To retain all those things in the mind required a memory of no uncommon tenacity, and to produce them in a tangible shape required a clearer intellect than many could boast of possessing.

The jury conferred busily together, as though there was some diversity of opinion relative to the guilty parties.

The judge leaned back in his chair, with his eyes closed.

He was an old man, and the exertion he had been obliged to make had tried his energies greatly.

We may avail ourselves of this pause to take a glance at the different actors in this strange drama of human life.

In the first place, then, we will turn to the three prisoners at the bar.

They were ghastly pale.

On their stern-looking countenances there was no ray of hope.

With a fixed and burning gaze they glared into the jury-box, and watched the every movement of those twelve of their human beings with the same intentness as a cat will watch every movement of its intended prey.

Not a single glance—not a single motion, however slight, escaped their notice.

Their lives hung upon the next few moments.

If in the solitude of his prison-cell Adrian Winberry had been able to close his eyes to the awful nature of his position, assuredly he was not now. It must have pressed with full force upon his breast and brain.

What were his reflections, what tongue save his own could tell?

All noted, however, his awful haggard look and his bloodshot eyes, which never for a single instant wavered in their direction.

Then there was Maud Gouldman.

She was still in the same place as she had been when Blanche entered the court. She had not been able to move a step.

Her attention was divided between the prisoners, the jury, and Blanche.

And there was one other to whom she felt deeply thankful. One who but for whose aid her case would have been sad indeed. One whom she had, in spite of her better judgment, learned to like, and who had cast away his life for her sake.

At least, that was what the judge said, but she had better hopes, and visions which would never be realized passed through her mind.

Then there was Blanche.

With a beating heart and colourless cheek, she waited for the verdict.

Alas! poor girl, her troubles in life had begun early, and seemed likely to continue.

She had conceived a passion without knowing who he was—with the son of her father's murderer.

Unhappy fate!

It was impossible, she felt, that her dreams for the future should be realized.

Whether Adrian Winberry, her lover's father, was pronounced guilty or acquitted, would be all the same to her.

Alas! poor heart.

When, where, and how would her troubles cease?

Standing very near her was the object of her thoughts. His eyes were fixed upon her countenance occasionally with a mournful gaze, and then he would look up at the dock where his father stood and utter a bitter curse upon his evil fortune.

He knew the bar that now stood like a wall of adamant between his cousin and himself; he had, too, the bitter pang of knowing how greatly he had added to the unhappiness of her he loved, for he should never have introduced himself to her, or, at all events, have kept her for so long in ignorance of who he was, and won her pure first virgin love.

CHAPTER CCXCVIII.

THE JURY RETURN A VERDICT OF GUILTY AGAINST THE THREE PRISONERS, AND RICHARD SARE MAKES A CONFESSION OF HIS GUILT.

From a contemplation of these proceedings we turn to our old friend Dick Turpin.

He was far from satisfied with his position.

He was in doubt, too, how the case would terminate.

To be sure the judge had expressed his own convictions pretty plainly, but then the jury will not always be ruled by the judge. Indeed, their disposition would rather be to run counter to it.

And so Dick felt doubtful for the result, and those doubts rapidly increased when he found the length of time the conference continued.

Mr. Wriggles had passed Mr. Skinner into the custody of a brother-officer who happened to be near, while he himself kept a sharp look-out upon Dick, determined not to lose him this time, let things turn out how they would.

Dick treated his old foe in a very friendly manner, occasionally interchanging a whispered remark with him.

The hope that Turpin had hitherto entertained, namely, that the judge would interpose on his behalf, had quite left him. He saw that it was foolish to expect it.

But there was the mass of people who filled the court. They were all on his side, and had manifested their partiality several times.

Would they, then, assist him?

Would they prevent his capture by the myrmidons of the law?

He had slight hopes of that.

He knew how little dependence was to be placed upon a body of people.

And so he waited for the verdict, and for his own fate as well.

And now we think we have taken a glance at all in whom we feel any interest, without we include the counsel.

He for the defence sat down at his table, biting the feather end of a quill-pen in a rather disconsolate manner.

Mr. Nuttall had upon his thoughtful face an expression which seemed to say, I have done my duty.

Mr. John Kersey still looked on anxiously, impatient for the verdict to be given in.

But there seemed to be a discussion of some kind or other going on among the jurymen.

At length, however, they turned round, and all sat down.

The clerk of the arraigns rose, and said—

"Gentlemen of the jury, do you find the prisoners at the bar guilty or not guilty?"

There was a moment of breathless suspense.

Literally, every one seemed to hang upon the lips of the foreman of the jury.

He was a fussy, pompous little man, and seemed to be aware of the important position in which he just then stood.

He waited, then, for every noise to subside, and when a silence of several seconds' duration had prevailed, he said, in a very important tone of voice—

"Guilty!"

Again followed that same rushing sound which we have before described.

It was caused by every one in court giving a sigh of relief.

Then some one tried to get up a cheer, but the criers nipped it in the bud.

The prisoners did not by any outward sign show the effect which this verdict had had upon them.

The usual question whether they had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon them was put.

Adrian Winberry tried to speak—to make a reply of some kind or other.

He moistened his lips, and endeavoured to clear his throat of something which seemed to be choking him.

"My lord, my lord!" he gasped, "I protest against the verdict of the jury. I am an innocent man, my lord, only the case has been placed in hands not competent for its conduction. I say I am innocent, innocent—quite innocent, and if I am hanged, I shall be a murdered man!"

A shudder ran through the court upon hearing this assertion, made at so awful a moment.

The judge looked at him sternly.

However, he did not speak.

One of the prisoners, however, was endeavouring to do so, or appeared to be, by the way in which his lips moved.

It was Richard Sare.

He was the youngest of the three, and there was not upon his countenance quite so hardened an expression as there was upon that of his companion.

The judge stooped down.

He knew for what object.

He fumbled about, and at length from a drawer in the pedestal before him, produced that ominous thing the black cap.

Dread, horrible, yet significant memento of past times, when the administration of justice was accompanied with very many more forms than it is now.

As he held this cap in his hand, then, previous to placing it upon his head, he saw that Richard Sare seemed about to speak.

He paused in what he was about, and asked the question—

"Have you anything you wish to say, prisoner?"

"I have, my lord."

"Say on, then."

The judge put his cap down on the top of the pedestal.

The moment Sare spoke, Adrian Winberry turned round like lightning.

He seemed to read the intention of his accomplice in iniquity in his face.

Uttering a howl of rage, he sprang forward past Norman and clutched him by the throat with so violent a grip that his fingers were almost imbedded in the flesh.

Sare fell down with his antagonist upon him.

A shriek arose in the court, and then a scene of the most awful imaginable confusion ensued.

So suddenly did all this take place.

So totally unexpected was the murderer's attack that the jailers who stood in the dock to keep watch over the prisoners were thoroughly taken by surprise.

Recovering themselves from their shock of astonishment, they threw themselves upon the struggling men, and endeavoured to separate them.

After several fruitless attempts they succeeded.

Adrian Winberry seemed to divine the intention of his accomplice, and resolved to prevent him from carrying it into execution if possible.

But the jailers tore him from his prey, though not until he had almost strangled him.

Then, livid with rage, he was forced to stand up in the dock, held firmly in the grasp of two men.

A universal cry of execration greeted him the moment the people caught sight of him, and several missiles were thrown.

More dead than alive, Richard Sare was sat up in a chair.

Meanwhile, the confusion and turmoil in the body of the court increased rather than subsided.

The judge rose.

In a voice that made itself heard above every other sound, he cried—

"Unless there is instant silence, clear the court. Clear it, let the consequences be what they may, unless there is immediate and total silence! Clear the court!"

There was no doubt about the speaker being fully in earnest in what he said.

The desire to hear the termination of the trial triumphed over that to create a disturbance, and the people, one and all, became silent instantly.

Not even a murmur rose.

In the meantime some pungent essence had been held to the nostrils of the man Sare, and he had recovered somewhat.

His first act upon regaining his consciousness was to look where Adrian was standing, and when he saw his foe so well guarded he seemed to take heart.

He rose from the chair, and assisted by two of the turnkeys, stood at the front of the dock.

All could see where the talon-like fingers of Adrian Winberry had actually infixed themselves into the flesh, and tiny streams of blood trickled from several wounds.

The attack which had been made upon his life was a sudden and desperate one, and it is much to be wondered at that it did not succeed.

"You were going to speak," said the judge, "were you not?"

"I was, my lord."

"Speak now, then."

"I wanted to make a clean breast of all this business, and I suppose Mr. Adrian guessed it, and thought to stop my voice."

"It is the most outrageous thing I ever heard of, but before you proceed to make any confession let me give you a word or two of warning. You must not forget that you have been pronounced guilty of murder by the verdict of twelve of your countrymen, and nothing now can reverse that verdict. If, however, you like to make any statements to the court you are at liberty to do so, but you must distinctly understand that nothing you can say will have a mitigatory effect upon the sentence I am about to pronounce upon you, nor can I hold out any hopes of your obtaining a commutation of that sentence."

The prisoner hesitated.

"I cannot make my situation worse by telling you what I know; can I, my lord?"

"Certainly you cannot; and if you confess your guilt you will take away any doubt there may be upon our minds as to the justice of the decision we have come to."

"I will tell you what I know, my lord; and I hope you will try to do what you can for me. You must know that about two months ago, or it may be more, Mr. Adrian Winberry came to my house in Fore-street, Lambeth, and said he had work for me to do, if I was in the humour to do it."

"How came he to know your address?"

"He had it from Mr. Josiah Skinner, my lord. Mr. Skinner recommended me to him."

"Oh! indeed. Then it seems Mr. Skinner has taken a greater part in this business than I had expected. Officers, look well to him. You have him already in custody."

Mr. Skinner's face changed to the colour of some old parchment deed which had not seen daylight for a hundred years or so.

But he made no struggle.

He had not the courage to make an attempt to preserve his own life.

The judge looked at Sare to continue.

"It's no good for me to deny it, my lord. We came to terms together, and he engaged my mate as well, who lived in the same house with me, and promised to reward us well if we would be faithful to him."

"Well?"

"Our first business was to lay in wait for Miss Blanche Winberry, and carry her off to London. We were to keep her locked up securely in the attic during the pleasure of our employer."

"And this you did?"

"Yes, my lord; we caught her in the shrubbery, as she herself says, by throwing a cloak over her head, and carrying her to a carriage. Then we drove to London."

"Go on."

"But the scheme did not seem to succeed so well as was anticipated, and another was to be tried; so me and my mate had another journey down to the hall, and, spying our opportunity, we made Mr. William Winberry a prisoner, and carried him off as well!"

"Did you take him to your house in Lambeth?"

"No, my lord; that was not judged prudent! Mr. Skinner suggested that Mr. Winberry should be taken to the haunted house in Birdcage-walk, of which he had the key, and confined there until such time as they thought fit to set him free."

"Had you, then, no idea that the unfortunate gentleman was brought to that lonely house in order to be murdered?"

"None whatever, my lord; I never dreamt such a thing as murder was intended, or I should not have had anything to do with it. When Mr. Winberry was a prisoner we paid several visits to him, and each time Mr. Adrian pressed him to sign a deed making over the property to him."

"Stop a bit. You signed that deed, did you not?"

"I did, my lord, and so did my mate. We were only to witness it. Well, sir, on the night of the twenty-seventh of the last month, we three all went to the haunted house, and not dreaming we were watched, or that there was any one in the house, we went into the room where the prisoner was, and, as I now recollect, leaving the door ajar. The lantern was put down on the table. Me and my mate had hold of the gent by his arms, while Mr. Adrian put the deed down on the table, and asked him to sign it. At last the old chap did as he was asked, and then I thought Mr. Adrian would be satisfied, and that he had got what he wanted, but all at once he whipped a pistol out of his pocket, and before I knew what he intended to do, he fired it, and his brother lay dead on the floor!"

The auditors of this awful tale could not refrain from a groan upon hearing this horrible statement of a cold-blooded and heartless murder.

But, at a sign from the judge, the prisoner continued—

"At the moment the pistol was fired, we heard some heavy blows struck upon the front door, and we dreaded capture. Mr. Adrian told us to follow him, and that we should be all right. We were horror-struck about the murder, and spoke to him, but he cursed us for a reply, and went out of the room. I spoke to my mate, and then hearing some one coming, we thought we had better fly with all speed, which we did, but we were too late. We were captured in the garden, and brought prisoners to Newgate, and when we got there who should we find but Mr. Adrian. Of course we spoke to him, but he looked terribly angry, and made on as though he did not know us. We were all locked up, and the next day Mr. Skinner came to see us, and he said he would get us out of all the trouble if we would do as he told us, which we promised to do. Then he said we were to make on as though we did not know Mr. Adrian, but to say it was a mistake, and that we were strangers to the man who had hired us, and that we had no idea murder was meant, so we did as he told us."

"And that is a plain statement of the case, is it?"

"It is, my lord. I am ready to take my oath of it at any moment."

"Very well. Have you anything more to say?"

"No, my lord, except that neither me nor my mate knew that Mr. Adrian meant murder, and it was done so quickly there was no time for us to prevent it."

"Does your mate, as you call your fellow-prisoner, agree to the truth of what you have just said?"

"I don't know whether he will confess, my lord."

"Yes, my lord, I confess," said John Norman, "and I hope as how we shall be leniently dealt with. I am ready to take my Bible oath at any minute, that what my mate has said is quite true in every respect."

CHAPTER CCXCIX.

THE JUDGE PASSES SENTENCE OF DEATH UPON THE PRISONERS, AND MAKES AN APPEAL TO THE JURY ON BEHALF OF DICK TURPIN, WHO IS, HOWEVER, CONFINED IN A CELL IN NEWGATE.

THE judge drew on the black cap.

The task he now had to perform was one from which any one would shrink.

But now that the prisoners had confessed, and added their testimony to that which had been given by the other witnesses, agreeing as it did in almost every particular, his duty was less responsible and disagreeable.

Still, it is an awful thing for one human being to doom three of his fellow-creatures to death, no matter what the circumstances may be, nor how imperatively their deaths should be called for.

In those days, however, so much was not thought of hanging a man as there is now. In the good old times, as some call them, there was always a gaping, riotous, disorderly throng round Tyburn-tree, and they were pretty sure of being presented with two or three trembling wretches, if not more.

This judge, however, as the reader cannot have failed to see by his conduct, was a man somewhat in advance of his time. He had enlightened thoughts, and took a more comprehensive view of things in general than was usual at that time.

His voice lacked firmness when he spoke, and all in the court could see the extent of his emotion.

He spoke as follows.

But, low as his voice was, there was not in all the court a single person who did not hear distinctly every word he said.

"Prisoners at the bar,—

"You have been tried by a jury of your countrymen, and have been by them decreed guilty, and I have now to conclude these proceedings by passing the last sentence of the law upon you.

"Prisoners at the bar,—You have had a long and patient trial. Every circumstance connected with the horrible tragedy of which you are decreed guilty has been carefully weighed and examined. With the justice of the verdict which the jury has returned, I may say I fully and cordially agree, more especially as since that verdict has been recorded two of you have made confessions of your guilt. The mere fact of your having done so has taken a great load off my mind, and so it must have done to the jury themselves. The painful duty I have to perform is materially lightened, and I shall have less compunction in passing sentence upon you.

"But first, I feel it to be my duty to animadvert upon the conduct of you, Adrian Winberry. The part that you have all through played in this dark drama is such as to make you hated and detested of all men. You have no excuse to make for your monstrous villainy. It appears, upon credible evidence, that you were left by your father an income quite sufficient to keep you in comfort, if not in luxury. But you thought fit to squander that income in extravagances, and then sought to extort money from your brother. Many events have been hinted at by the witnesses as to what took place at the time of your father's death, which show you in anything but a favourable light. With those events, however, we have, of course, nothing to do.

"Situated as we are with respect to yourself, it is impossible for us to say what were your intentions when you first mooted the question of money to your brother, nor are we in a position to say what passed between you on that occasion. A witness states, however, that the reason your wishes were not complied with was solely owing to the manner in which the demand was made.

"It may be that up to that time you had formed no designs upon your brother's life. It may be that during that very interview something took place or was said which roused your hatred against him. But let that be how it may, you sought to break his heart by carrying off his daughter. What were your intentions with respect to her it is out of my power to say, and perhaps always will be. Not content with this, however, you carried off the father, and confined him in a gloomy and terrible prison-house—a place which would be most calculated to exercise an effect upon the mind of the person confined in it. Then, by specious arguments, you won him to your purpose, and the deed was signed, entitling you to possess all you coveted. One would have thought that would have satisfied you, but so far from doing so, you murdered him in cold blood. Oh! it was an awful crime; so awful that the watchful eye of providence would not allow it to go unpunished. When any one begins to think of the peculiar position of affairs on that night, and the extraordinary manner in which you were captured, no one can help being struck with admiration at the manner in which one circumstance hinges upon the other. The avenging spirit was behind you, and drove you onwards blindly to destruction.

"Your crimes have been brought to light, and are about to receive their punishment. For yourself not one word in the shape of palliation can be said—there is nothing to excuse you in the least. Murder comprehends under its name various ways of taking life. The life may be taken in a moment of passion under circumstances of the utmost provocation. But you cannot plead either of these. Yours was long premeditated. That is established by the manner in which the murder was committed. You had resolved that so soon as he signed that document he should die. When your brother took the pen in his hand, yours, beneath your cloak, grasped the butt end of a pistol. You held it in your hand in such a manner as to produce it in an instant. You did so, and your brother's brains were scattered on the floor. Oh! it is a crime so horrible as to send a chill of horror through the blood of the most callous. In speaking of this fiendish crime, well could I say, in the words of one to whom the human heart and all the feelings that swayed it were laid open like a book, well could I say with him—

"Murder most foul, as in the best it is,
But this most foul, strange, and unnatural."

[BLANCHE WINBERRY AND MAUD GOULDMAN VISIT DICK TURPIN IN HIS CELL.]

it is a description that fully agrees with the one of which you have been found guilty. To slay a brother—to commit fratricide—to commit the crime for which Cain suffered—is indeed most unnatural under any circumstances, and most foul under the circumstances in which you slew your brother.

"Prisoners at the bar, for none of you can I hold out the slightest hope of mercy. Yet two of you, having made the confession you have, may be entitled to some commutation. But it is not for me to hold out any hopes to you. The sentence of this court upon all three of you is, that you be taken from the dock at which you stand to the place from whence you came, and from thence to the place of public execution, there to be hanged by the neck until you be dead, and may the Lord in his goodness show that mercy to your souls which we are forbidden to show to your bodies."

With these impressive words the judge concluded his remarks.

They were followed by an intense silence, for no one after those awful words seemed to have the power of speech and motion.

But the turnkeys were the first to move.

They tapped their prisoners upon the shoulders to intimate to them that they were to prepare to go.

But the judge held up his hand for silence, and then it became evident that he had something more to say.

He turned towards the jury-box and said—

"Gentlemen of the jury—

"Before I dismiss you from your seats, I must crave your attention to some little matters connected with the trial which is just concluded.

"The first concerns Mr. Josiah Skinner, who states himself to be an attorney-at-law, though I hope, for the credit of the legal profession generally, that statement may be found to be untrue.

"I have ordered him to be taken into custody.

"From the evidence laid before us, it appears pretty clearly that he was an accessory to all that has taken place. Perhaps much of it may be due to his instigation still, I think I have ample grounds for committing him to take his trial."

The foreman of the jury nodded his head.

The officers tightened their grasp upon Mr. Skinner.

The judge continued.

"The next point upon which I wish to address you is that of one of the witnesses for the prosecution, who came forward in a very singular manner and under very extraordinary circumstances to give his evidence.

"Of course, gentlemen of the jury, I allude to no other person than the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin.

"It is not, I imagine, necessary for me to dwell upon the manner in which he entered the witness-box.

"But as he lies open to the charge which my learned brother for the defence has brought against him, I think it will be best for me to revert to his behaviour on the present occasion.

"Above all ought these facts to be borne in mind.

"He is a highwayman, and an offender against the laws, for which reason one would scarcely look to find in him any of the virtues and refined feelings which might be expected from one holding a respectable position in society.

"But, nevertheless, let that be as it may, it seems there are certain ranks and differences in crime, and that there are some of so atrocious a character as to fill the mind of a highwayman with horror.

"And if you will all bear in mind, though the fact ought not to be admitted in extenuation or palliation of their deeds, it is, however, certain that a certain degree of romantic generosity is always ascribed to knights of the road, as they are popularly called.

"For the moment, I cannot recall an instance in which a case has been brought before me of a highwayman committing any further offence against the person than that of robbery, and during the evidence the defending counsel has always elicited that the robbery was unaccompanied with any violence whatever.

"From this it would not be going too far to infer that there exists in the breasts of these depredators generally a kind of wild, lawless, chivalric spirit, such as might have belonged to the knights errant of the middle ages, between whom and the knights of the road of our own day there is less difference than many people imagine.

"Such, then, being the case, it is not difficult to believe that Dick Turpin, highwayman as he is, was horror-struck when he saw the atrocious crime committed in the manner which has been described to you in evidence.

"Some concatenation of events, unnecessary to be described here, brought him, it seems, into contact with the members of the family of the murdered man.

"He would see their grief and the unutterable woe which the mysterious disappearance of the head of the house would cause in the hearts of all his descendants.

"Then he would know that he alone was a witness of the awful crime—that his evidence alone could complete the conviction of the murderers.

"But how was he to come forward?

"Too well would he be aware that a price was set upon his head, that the officers of the law were in search of him, and that, if he disclosed himself, his capture and incarceration would inevitably follow.

"But we see that this all-important consideration did not triumph over his desire to do justice to the family of the murdered man, and accordingly he has stood before us to-day in his true character, and stated upon oath all the particulars with which he was acquainted.

"And let not too light a value be set upon his coming forward.

"By some it will be urged that he could not have escaped apprehension, but that I beg leave to doubt.

"It is a matter of notoriety and public comment that, for a very long time past, all efforts which have been made to take him into custody have proved unsuccessful.

"And from one little event which has happened in connexion with his presence in this court, I am inclined to infer that all attempts would have been equally unsuccessful for a long time to come.

"The fact to which I allude is this.

"To-day being a day appointed for trial, this court-house and all the passages contiguous to it are thronged with spectators and officials belonging not only to Newgate, but the various police-officers.

"Such being the case, then, who would for a moment have thought it possible that Dick Turpin, the well-known highwayman, should, undisguised, have made his way in with the rest, unrecognised and undetected.

"This, in my judgment, speaks volumes in favour of the supposition that for a length of time to come he would have been successful in defying capture by the police.

"For my own part, it seems impossible for any one to have been single-minded enough to have acted in the manner in which he has acted.

"That he should expect some consideration to be shown him is, I think, only natural; and I much regret that it is not in my power to hold out protection to him—but I am powerless to do so.

"Nor by a detractor could it be said that he came here ignorant of the consequences to himself.

"He was in the court and was expressly warned before he came forward as a witness what would be the certain consequence of his doing so.

"But this did not have the effect of keeping him back or of causing him even to hesitate.

"He gave his evidence clearly and satisfactorily, and the moment he stepped out of the witness-box he was arrested by an officer of police, in whose custody he still remains.

"And now I wish to refer to the charge which has been brought against him by the counsel for the defence.

"He broadly and unconditionally accuses him of having committed the murder himself.

"But, gentlemen of the jury, a moment's consideration will be sufficient to convince you of the utter absurdity of this accusation.

"It seems impossible to all of you, I am sure, that any one could have acted in the manner in which I have described Dick Turpin acting.

"But if this is your opinion, should you not think it more impossible still—admitting for a moment that impossibility admits of comparison—I say, gentlemen of the jury, should you not have considered it still more impossible for a man placed as Dick Turpin is to commit a murder and then come into the witness-box at the sacrifice of his own life, in order to give false witness against another?

"The one case I have put to you can be ascribed to a kind of romantic chivalrousness, but the other is totally beyond all the bounds of sense and reason.

"What my learned friend the counsel for the defence will bring forward in support of his accusation it is not for me to say; but if the charge was, as I expect, brought forward without anything to substantiate it, I should recommend him to withdraw his accusation before the matter proceeds any further."

CHAPTRE CCC.

THE PEOPLE IN THE COURT MAKE AN UNSUCCESSFUL EFFORT TO RESCUE DICK TURPIN.

THERE was a faint hum of approval from the body of the people in the court when his lordship thus spoke, and all looked curiously towards the counsel for the defence in order to see what notice he would take of the appeal.

He rose to his feet and the judge remained silent, in order to afford him an opportunity to speak.

"My lord," he said, "since you have been pleased to allow me a chance to retract what I have said, I beg to take it, and therefore say, once and for all, that I individually draw back from the accusation."

The counsel sat down.

His lordship resumed his remarks.

"I think you have acted very wisely. And now, gentlemen of the jury, I will not detain you above a moment longer.

"Dick Turpin is now free from the charge of the murder of Mr. William Winberry, but I have yet a word or two more to say respecting him.

"It was not solely with a view of allowing my learned brother for the defence an opportunity of retracting his charge that I addressed myself to you.

"This highwayman has rendered signal service to society at large by the manner in which he has acted in this trial, and has set an example worthy to be followed.

"Under such circumstances, then, I think some steps ought to be taken in his behalf. I, for my own part, shall interest myself to the utmost in his favour, and all that I can do, I may safely say, shall be done. I trust my example will be followed by all those who have taken an active part in to-day's proceedings."

Another round of applause, which made the roof of the court ring again, followed this speech.

The judge continued.

"At present I have no alternative but to leave him in the hands of the officer who has taken him into custody, and I think it will not be out of place to give him a few words of advice as to the manner in which he conducts himself."

Then, looking at Dick, and addressing himself more particularly to him, he went on—

"Let me advise you," he said, "to make no resistance. Such a proceeding could not possibly be attended with any good results, or I should be the first to countenance it, for your behaviour has filled me, if no one else, with the utmost admiration. Submit quietly. You will be taken to a cell in Newgate, but that you must put up with. While you are there, I trust you will create no disturbance, and rest assured that every exertion will be made to obtain some amount of leniency from the crown on your behalf.

"I cannot promise anything, however. The jury I have retained in their seats, in the endeavour to interest them on your behalf also. And, now, attend to my last words. Do nothing to aggravate the charges which have been made against you. Remain for awhile passive, until you learn that the exertions made for you have proved unavailing."

Dick bowed to indicate his consent to what the judge had just said.

"I have now a few words to say to those who have met here to-day as spectators and auditors of this strange trial.

"Throughout the course of the investigation I have noticed that you have all greeted the witness of whom I have been speaking with a considerable degree of favour.

Whenever you saw an opportunity of applauding him, you seized upon it, in defiance of the rules and regulations of this court.

"This breach of the peace, however, we will pass over, and come to the point upon which I wish to address you.

"From the manifestations spoken of, it has occurred to me as not being unlikely that you would not think it right for this witness to be detained a prisoner, and that consequently you would attempt his rescue.

"For the sake, not only of him, but also of yourselves, let me intreat you not to make an attempt to interpose between the law and its victim.

"If you, however, persist in making the attempt, you will be sure to be defeated, and not only will you accomplish no good in that way, but you will also render nugatory those efforts which I have pledged myself to make.

"Therefore, leave this court in peace and quietness, even as you entered it, and if any of you have decided upon the rash undertaking, rescind that decision ere any harm be done."

As the judge concluded these words, he leaned back again in his chair.

Just for about a moment no one in the court moved hand or foot.

Then the jury, no doubt glad enough to be released from their protracted sitting, got up and proceeded to leave the box.

Next the turnkeys took away the three prisoners in the dock.

A few persons noticed that, while attention was attracted by these movements, the judge hastily wrote something on a slip of paper, and passed it to Mr. Wriggles.

That worthy functionary, as soon as he received it, nodded his head with a pompous air.

Then he whispered to Dick—

"Step this way His lordship wishes to speak to you."

What could Dick do but obey this mandate?

The judge had certainly throughout behaved in a most considerate manner towards him, and it would have looked very ungrateful to have refused so slight a request.

Immediately upon passing the note, the judge retired to the little room immediately behind him, admittance to which was gained by a heavy curtain.

Dick did not for a moment hesitate to accompany Mr. Wriggles.

The distance they had to go was short.

Therefore, almost before any one perceived the movement, he was out of sight, for, as soon as the curtain was raised and he passed through, it was allowed to fall into its proper place again.

The people in the court had not offered to stir.

Had it not been for the last words the judge had uttered, they would assuredly have one and all sprang forward to the rescue of our hero.

As it was, they were undecided and hung back, pondering the while on what had been said to them.

And it was during this momentary indecision that Dick passed out of their sight.

Then some one among the crowd cried—

"Hurrah for Dick Turpin, and down with the police! Fetch him out, friends! Never mind what the judge says; he isn't king. We won't have the bold highwayman scragged! Three cheers, mates, for Dick Turpin, and then we will set him free!"

The three cheers were given with startling effect, and then, like a mighty torrent, the crowd pushed forward.

But it was in vain they surged to and fro. They found themselves everywhere opposed by the officers, who poured into the crowded space from every imaginable point.

A furious contest ensued.

Then one or two of the populace, more daring than the rest, sprang on to the judge's bench.

They were soon followed by others.

Then, with a dash, they reached the curtain.

One hasty snatch, and it lay in a mass at their feet.

There was nothing now to bar their entrance to the little room.

They dashed into it.

But to their astonishment and dismay, the place was empty.

Not a soul was in it.

There was a small arched door opposite to where they entered, and towards this they made a rush as soon as they realized that Dick had really gone.

It was fast.

But that was an obstacle that they resolved to overcome.

They made a simultaneous dash at it.

There was a creak and a crash, and then the door gave way.

It opened into a narrow arched passage, and the first discovery the mob made after the door was broken down was that this passage was literally choked up with officers, who did not wait to be attacked, but pressed forward to disperse the mob.

But this was not so easily done.

Mobs are obstinate.

And especially so when they are opposed.

Now all this opposition which they had already met with only served to stimulate them to an extraordinary degree, and they were more than ever determined to accomplish their object.

But there seemed little hope of success.

The numbers of the police kept continually augmenting.

Some of them, too, adopted a rather novel and curious, but very effective, method of clearing the court.

These were the officers who stood nearest the doors.

Their plan was this.

They would make a dart into the court, and seize some individual and drag him out.

Then he was handed to another and another, through numerous passages, until he suddenly found himself propelled into the Old Bailey.

It was really wonderful to see with what expedition this was performed.

To be sure, only one was taken out at a time, and a great many ones filled the court, but then the process was prosecuted with so much rapidity that its effects very soon became perceptible.

Then those officers who were in the passage, pressing forward in a phalanx, soon forced those who were in the judge's private room out on to the bench again, and off the bench into the court.

Here, however, the mob made a bold and determined stand, resolved not to give up the accomplishment of their purpose without one more struggle.

The scene that ensued baffles description.

Mingled with the mob were many who took no part in their disorderly proceedings, but who, nevertheless, suffered severely from them.

From these arose loud shrieks and cries as the mob fought.

Among them might be counted several with whom the reader is acquainted.

For instance, Blanche Winberry and her lover and Maud Gouldman, as well as Mr. Nuttall and Mr. Kersey.

They were all inextricably involved in the general confusion—for what chance did they have of leaving the court?

It was in vain they tried to maintain a stand or a position in one place—the effort was altogether a useless one. They were drifted hither and thither with the crowd.

The pressure at times was fearful.

And still the infuriated people fought manfully with the police, although they could not gain any possible advantage either to themselves or any one else by so doing.

With an exertion of considerable strength and agility, young Adrian Winberry, who had never left the side of Blanche for a single moment, climbed up into the jury-box.

This was a place of refuge.

If he could manage to get Blanche there, she would be perfectly safe.

He held down his arms, therefore, and the instinct of preservation made the poor girl seize his hands.

She took a firm hold, and then, to his infinite joy, Adrian succeeded in drawing her fairly into the jury-box, and placing her on one of the seats.

Then he held down his arms for Maud, who was clinging with all the desperation which despair and terror could give her to the woodwork.

Mr. Nuttall was near her.

It was observable that from the first commencement of the disturbance he had left his seat at the table and placed himself beside her, shielding her as much as he was able from the rude assaults of the crowd.

And now, when he saw what young Adrian Winberry was about, and that the jury-box would be a place of security, he raised Maud in his arms and assisted her to reach the young man.

In another moment she was beside Blanche and in safety.

The mob still continued its vain efforts.

The people who composed it were wound up to the utmost desperation, and they were quite blind and heedless of what they were about.

The police-officers, however, who were armed with staves, laid about them in good earnest.

But the numbers were too great for them to be able even by this means to make a rapid impression.

Every movable article within the place was overturned.

The benches and seats were broken up to fragments, and were either hurled about the room or used as weapons for defence.

Officers and people were struck to the ground every moment, and the dismal groans they uttered, and the shrieks and yells which came from their lips, all combined to make this terrible scene still more horrible.

It might have been that Dick took it as a demonstration of popular feeling on his behalf, but the worst of it was it offered him no advantage.

At length, however, the officers succeeded in quelling the disturbance, and the ringleaders of the riot were taken into custody.

The others, who were unwounded, made their escape in the best way they could.

Then all that remained were the wounded on the floor, who were unable to crawl away.

The police achieved a victory, but not without a very severe struggle.

When the court was clear, Maud and Blanche expressed their wish to leave it.

Young Adrian Winberry, who looked really heart-broken, went to the door of the jury-box, and, opening it, allowed them to pass out.

Mr. Nuttall and Mr. Kersey were there waiting to receive them.

Blanche was very pale.

She was terrified by the awful scene of tumult which she had just witnessed, and could not control her agitation.

As she passed him, Adrian just bowed to her, and that was all.

He did not descend himself.

Blanche appeared scarcely conscious of it.

Mr. Kersey offered her his arm, and Mr. Nuttall offered his to Maud.

Thus escorted they made their way out of the court.

Mr. Kersey hailed a hackney coach, and directed the driver to take the whole party to his house in Red Lion-square.

They reached this place in safety, and, having paused a little while to rest and refresh themselves, Shockley was called, and the carriage brought to the door.

Mr. Kersey undertook to see to all future matters, and to communicate all he heard from time to time to them.

With this understanding they parted.

Shockley drove direct to the Hall.

Inside the carriage Blanche Winberry and Maud Gouldman sat clasping each other's hands.

Scarcely in all the world could have been found two sadder hearts than theirs.

Both were weeping.

Weeping silently, and for different causes.

Neither had the power to address the other.

And so, in silence and in tears, they leaned back in the carriage as it rolled upon its way towards the Hall.

Here for the present we must leave them, but, ere long, we shall return, for this strange episode in the life of our hero is not yet over.

These two young girls, now so doubly left alone, will be again introduced to the reader under circumstances both strange and perilous.

It is hoped that an interest is felt in their varying and cruel fortunes.

Alas! that it should be so; their troubles are not over yet.

CHAPTER CCCI.

DICK TURPIN IS LEFT IN THE CELL TO MEDITATE UPON HIS PROSPECTS AND POSITION.

LEAVING, then, these two fair and unhappy girls to continue their journey towards their desolate home, we will return to Dick Turpin, and relate what took place after his obeyal of the request made by the judge.

Dick assented to it without hesitation, because, from the whole tenor of his words and actions, he could tell that his lordship was favourably disposed towards him, and that he had nothing to fear in the shape of treachery and harm from him.

Therefore Turpin followed Mr. Wriggles very willingly.

The distance he had to go was very short. A dozen steps, indeed, brought him to the curtain, which served the purpose of a door.

It was drawn aside, and he entered with his captor.

He found himself face to face with the judge, who was standing with one arm resting upon the back of a chair of elaborate and antique workmanship.

Besides himself, there was only one person in the room.

That was Mr. Cawthorn, the governor of Newgate.

As the reader knows, this worthy had filled the office he now held for a limited time only.

Upon the occasion of the suspension of Mr. Tapner, owing to the extraordinary behaviour of that intemperate individual while Tom King was in custody, it will be recollected he was placed in the situation temporarily, during the inquiry which was made into Mr. Tapner's conduct.

That investigation, however, terminated in the way in which it ought to have terminated.

Mr. Tapner was dismissed.

The next step, of course, was to appoint a new and permanent governor in his stead.

Applications were numerous, but owing to the influence he had with those in whom the appointment rested, Mr. Cawthorn gained the situation, and he had ever since retained it.

There was nothing particular to be said against him. He was a stern, strict man, but yet not unjustly rigorous towards the prisoners under his care.

They were, however, well looked after, and every precaution was taken in order to prevent them making their escape.

Indeed, Mr. Cawthorn is fairly entitled to the credit of being one of the very first governors who made an attempt to reclaim the abuses of Newgate, which had hitherto enjoyed unchecked growth.

Mr. Cawthorn, then, and the judge were the only two persons present in the little ante-chamber when Turpin entered.

He made a profound bow to the judge, for he could not help feeling a respect for him.

His lordship kindly returned the salutation, and then said—

"Turpin, I have sent for you here in order that you might quietly surrender up yourself, and be taken to your cell. I more than anticipate some misguided attempt to rescue you may be made by your friends in the court. I should be glad to avoid it, if I could, and I trust you will assist me. If those without do attempt your rescue, they cannot succeed, so strong is the muster of police-officers assembled within these walls to-day. Your capture is inevitable; therefore, take my advice—give in quietly. Not only would all the resistance you could make prove futile, but it would be offensive to me. I do not like to say too much of myself, but still, as you must know well enough, I have power and influence. I will give you my word to exert both of them to the utmost in your behalf; I will promise that your conduct in this day's affair shall be represented in the proper quarter in a proper light. Nothing shall be overlooked. I consider myself bound to do this for the manner in which, up to the present time, you have behaved. I give you now into the hands of Mr. Cawthorn. He is already acquainted with all the particulars, and, moreover, knows what my intentions are. Therefore, from him you may expect to receive nothing but proper treatment. Accompany him. He will place you in a cell, but his duty compels him to do that. Your stay in it, however, I hope will be brief; and now, farewell; I hope you understand all that I have said, and I further hope that you will not mar what I am doing in your behalf by any injudicious attempt to escape from your confinement."

"I am deeply indebted to your lordship," said Dick; "I feel it better than I can express it. I will carefully attend to all your wishes; not one of them shall be disobeyed. More than once I have said that I would never yield myself a prisoner with life—that I would never be taken except in death; but I feel these circumstances are so exceptional, that I should be justified in foregoing that determination; and therefore, my lord, I am quite willing to do all that you request."

The judge was pleased with this reply, and made a sign to Mr. Cawthorn, which that individual immediately understood.

He came close up to Dick and said—

"I am ready. Follow."

Dick readily complied, for he judged it was the best policy to do so.

Mr. Wriggles, however, with a rather puzzled expression upon his countenance, kept close by his side, determined not to lose sight of him until he was safely placed in a cell.

If Dick had tarried a moment longer than he had, the people would have forced themselves upon him at the interview.

As it was he got out just in time.

The door was closed.

The passage filled up with officers.

The judge accompanied the procession a little way down the passage, and then he turned off to the left.

The governor of Newgate, Mr. Wriggles, some few turnkeys, and Dick Turpin took the high-road to the cells.

Mr. Cawthorn was pleased immensely to think he had at last got the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin, in custody.

Accordingly, he strutted on before in the most pompous manner conceivable.

No fetters of any description were placed upon Dick, and during their progress to the cells, Mr. Wriggles chose to make a remark about it.

"Ah! Dick," he said, "you are a lucky fellow. You are inside Newgate at last, but it's without any bother, and without any jewelry upon your person. Ah! well, it isn't every highwayman that has the head beak on his side. But I am afraid you have done too much to get off very easily, but still it can be tried."

"So it can," replied Dick, "but, as I said just now, I should never have yielded myself up under other circumstances, for I had made up my mind to fight to the last, and never to give in till death."

"You are a brave chap, Dick, and I like you."

"Like me?"

"I do, I do. I wish all was like you. But some do not. They talk about the time coming when there will be no highwaymen, but, if it does, what will the officers have to do?"

"Ah! what indeed? I never thought of that before."

"Very likely not. But, thank goodness, that event is not very likely to take place, either in your time or mine, so leave it, I say, for those who come after us."

Dick was silent.

But Mr. Wriggles went on—

"Dick, you're a trump. A regular trump. The more I think, the more I think so, and, if you come to grief, it will break my heart, there now."

"Silence," said Mr. Cawthorn, coming to a halt. "Smithson, where are you?"

"Here, sir."

"Open this door."

"Yes, sir."

The door to which the governor was alluding, was a massive-looking one, deeply set in the wall.

There were others of a similar kind beyond it.

Smithson was the name of one of the turnkeys.

He took from his pocket a huge bunch of keys, and, applying one of them to the door, opened it.

The whole party walked in.

As Dick had expected, the door led into a cell.

It was a large one, and doubtless, for a cell, very comfortable.

The last rays of daylight found their way into it when they entered, and allowed Dick the opportunity of seeing what his prison was like.

The first glance did not prepossess him.

But scarcely had he betaken that glance, than the daylight which had illumined the cell faded away.

Immediately it became involved in obscurity.

"My orders," said Mr. Cawthorn, "are that I should not place any fetters upon you."

Dick bowed.

"But I think you ought not to be left thus. Still, will you give me your word of honour that you will not attempt to escape?"

"What I said to the judge I will certainly stick to," replied Dick; "and, as for asking me for any more, it's no good at all."

"Very well—very well. I know what that means. I have received instructions not to put any irons upon you, and don't choose to disobey it. But, for all that, I shall take a few precautions of a different kind to make sure you do not escape."

"That you are quite at liberty to do. I hope you won't allow me to interfere with any of your projected arrangements."

"Here you are, then, and here you will remain for the present. I am quite ready to stake my life about that."

"I should advise you not to be rash, Mr. Cawthorn. There is no knowing what may happen."

"I know this, though," said the governor.

"Know what?"

"Why, that you are in a cell under my charge, and here you will remain until you are either taken out for a ride, or I receive an order for your release."

"Very well. I have no objection."

"Will you give me your word of honour, then, that you will not attempt to escape?"

"Certainly not. I made the judge a promise in your presence."

"And shall you keep to it?"

"Certainly I shall."

"That is quite enough, then. But I am suspicious of you."

"So it seems," said Dick, "but I can't help that. You are master here, and can do as you like."

Mr. Cawthorn was evidently far from easy in his mind about his prisoner.

He well knew the world-wide notoriety he had obtained, and how the intelligence of his incarceration in Newgate would disperse itself over the length and breadth of the land.

The means which had been taken to secure this notorious offender were well known, and also that hitherto every scheme had met with signal failure.

If now, after he had been safely lodged in prison, he was to make his escape from thence, Mr. Cawthorn thought, and justly, too, that he would not for long afterwards retain the situation he had been so desirous of gaining.

Hence, then, his anxiety, which was greater than it seemed, and much greater than he liked to acknowledge, even to himself.

Dissatisfied with the replies Dick gave him, and puzzled and perplexed as to what would be the best thing for him to do, Mr. Cawthorn left the cell.

Mr. Wriggles and the other prison officials of course followed him.

The door was closed, and the governor secured it himself.

The care he took to see that the bolt of the lock shot properly into the box provided for it, and that the bolts fitted securely into their sockets, was almost ludicrous to behold.

Then, last of all, he saw the strong iron bar put up, which went in a slanting direction across the door.

This done, he gave a last glance, and took his departure, leaving, however, one of the men outside the cell in the passage, as a sentinel or guard.

Somewhat relieved in his mind, but not with his heart altogether at rest, the governor made his way to his own apartments in the prison.

As soon as the door was closed, Dick turned round, and made another effort to look around him.

Darkness was deepening rapidly, but his eyes were accustoming themselves to the obscurity.

In one corner, just under the little grated aperture which served for a window, was a rude kind of pallet or bed.

Towards this he walked and sat himself down upon it.

From this point he endeavoured to survey his cell, but the outlines of it were so indistinct that he found the effort was a futile one, and he determined to postpone it until daylight.

Having come to this decision, he changed his sitting posture for a recumbent one.

Then his brain became crowded with numberless thoughts.

He was alone, and he found it some relief to mutter his thoughts aloud.

"And so," he said, "I am at last, really and truly, where I had made up my mind I never would be—in the interior of a cell in Newgate—a prisoner. I, who have defied the officers so long, that they must have considered it quite a hopeless task to capture me—yet here I am.

"But what a strange series of events have brought me here! They surpass, in strong and sustained interest, all that I ever read or heard. Certainly, nothing like it has ever before happened to me.

"I have made some friends, that is quite conclusive, and, I hope, friends who have power and influence, which they will exert to the utmost to get me out of this present difficulty. But I wonder what conditions they will attach to it?

"I like the judge. He seems an upright, honourable man, and very different to many who now sit upon the bench. I must esteem myself lucky that he presided on this occasion. Had it not been so, I should not have fared so well as I have. I have given him my word that I will not escape, and I will keep it, even if I was free to walk out of Newgate this moment. If he fails in what he is going to try to do, well and good; I shall then be absolved from that promise, and shall be able to meditate upon escape, for something seems to tell me that I am not near the end of my career."

"I think he will keep his word with me. I don't think I ought to doubt him. I will not. I should soon find whether he really was interesting himself in my behalf."

"How strange it seems for me to be here! I can scarcely realize my position! How strange, too, are the circumstances which brought me here! I cannot help thinking about that. I cannot dismiss it from my mind. During the trial, too, it came home to me very forcibly. To think that the simple fact of my taking refuge in that haunted house, at the particular time I did should have produced such wonderful results!

"I might have gone there earlier or later than I did, in either of which cases I should never have known anything.

"How strangely, too, was the capture or Adrian Winberry effected! Upon any other night, at any other time, he would have been free to leave the park unnoticed and unquestioned, and then he would have escaped the righteous doom which has overtaken him.

"Then there is Maud Gouldman. How wonderful I should meet with her as I did. Maud—Maud. Beautiful Maud—I wish"——

Dick was suddenly interrupted in his meditations by hearing some one unfasten the door of his cell.

CHAPTER CCCII.

RELATES HOW THE FRENCH GENDARMES ATTACKED THE RUINED MILL IN WHICH TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAD TAKEN REFUGE.

BEFORE we proceed to relate who it was that thus sought an entrance to Dick Turpin's cell so soon after he had become an inmate of it, we must revert to some events of a wild and startling nature which were taking place elsewhere.

Doubtless the reader would much rather not be left in suspense, but, unfortunately, it is unavoidable.

As soon as we possibly can, however, we will return to our hero.

It will be recollected that, since the commencement of the long trial we have just concluded, the narrative has met with no interruption.

This proceeded from two causes.

One was because the author desired to place the whole of the trial before his readers in such a manner that their attention should never once be diverted from it by other incidents.

For this reason, many interruptions which actually did take place in the proceedings were passed over in silence.

But, now that the trial is over, we must remind the reader of the length of time their undivided attention has been given to Dick, to the exclusion of other characters in the history.

But now that he is in Newgate.

Now that some little time must elapse before he can do anything but sit there supinely awaiting the progress of events, we feel certain that a better opportunity of leaving him could not be found.

Moreover, in order to understand subsequent events, it is necessary that we should turn our attention elsewhere.

And so, while he is half sitting up upon his pallet, watching the door to see who was about to enter, we will leave him, and return to Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack.

It will be remembered that the three highwaymen were making the best of their way to Calais, in order to get a boat there of some kind or other, so as to cross over to Dover.

But they had the ill-luck to be closely and hotly pursued by a large party of gendarmes.

They had, however, urged their jaded horses to the utmost, until, upon reaching the top, the horses of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack dropped exhausted to the ground.

Tom King was mounted, and the hill having been ascended, his steed would doubtless be able to carry him down it, and this his two friends urged him to attempt, and so escape, leaving them to do the best they could.

But Tom King, with that rare generousness which formed so prominent a trait in his character, refused to do so.

He resolved that, if his comrades were captured, he would be captured with them.

So he alighted instantly, for there was not a moment to spare, their foes being close behind them, and releasing the bridle of his horse, he sent him off at a gallop down the hill.

Then all three leaped over a low wooden fence which skirted a meadow.

Before them, in the darkness, they could just distinguish the outlines of some building, which, upon a nearer approach, they found to be a ruined windmill.

From its very dilapidated condition, they judged they would not have much trouble in obtaining an entrance to it.

And in this expectation they were not disappointed.

But if they got in so easily, was it a good place in which to take shelter?

That was the thought that occurred to our friends.

A moment's reflection served to answer it.

It was not a good place for shelter, and yet they would stand a better chance in an encounter with their foes than they would have done without any shelter at all.

Besides, there was just a chance, and no more, that they might not be tracked there by the gendarmes.

However, there was no time to spare for deliberation, so, after scrambling over an immense quantity of rubbish, they fairly crawled into one of the chambers in the mill.

It was through a small aperture like a window that they made their way, and was quite high up in the building, which was buried to a depth of several feet in the rubbish that had from time to time accumulated round it.

The first thing they did, after rising to their feet, was to go to this place and look out, in the hope of being able to catch a glimpse of their foes.

Nor were they defeated in their expectation.

Just dimly visible as a something darker than the night sky was the troop of gendarmes.

They must have been standing in a group together.

Doubtless they were looking about them for some trace of their prey, or listening for some sound to come to their ears which would indicate their whereabouts.

Then they scattered themselves—some leaping their horses over the fence into the meadow.

Suddenly there arose a shout from this portion of the party, and our friends, though they were too far off to hear the words, could tell by the tone that they had noticed the windmill.

And the next movement on the part of the gendarmes showed them that this supposition was a correct one.

The cry we have mentioned was responded to by another from those on the high-road, and then the remainder of the troop jumped over the fence and rejoined their companions.

Frenchmen are always fond of gesticulation and vociferation, and the chattering that now ensued baffles all description.

Rather anxiously our three friends peeped out of the window in the mill, and watched their actions.

A word of command was given in a loud voice, and then the whole body came at full gallop up to the windmill.

Of course, being mounted, they reached it in much less time than our friends did, who were on foot.

But, before they came near enough to hear what they were about, the three friends busied themselves with blocking up the window through which they had been peeping, with some pieces of timber and other rubbish which they found convenient to their hands.

Then a rapid exploration of the building seemed to show that there was but that one opening through which admission could be gained.

But, so frail was the whole of the building, that very little trouble would enable the gendarmes, well armed as they were, to cut an entrance into it, for the body of the mill was composed of nothing but planks of wood.

Just as they finished blocking up the aperture all but a small hole, which was reserved for the purpose of reconnoitering the enemy, the troop dashed up to the mill and surrounded it.

A few moments elapsed, during which the men were posted round the mill so as to form a perfect chain, and some one in command made a loud speech in French to the fugitives.

All three of our friends being well acquainted with the tongue, Tom King from education, and Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval from residence in the country, they could tell what was said.

It was nothing more in substance than an appeal to surrender themselves prisoners for the glory of la belle France, la grande nation.

But, of course, our friends took no notice of this; they were hardly the sort of men to do so.

When this officer had finished his harangue, he waited patiently for a minute or two for a response, and then gave the order to his men to attack the mill.

They began by climbing up on the heap of rubbish round it, and battering the woodwork with the butt end of their guns.

It was old and rotten, and a few vigorous blows would soon make a breach for them to crawl through.

Being on the inside, our friends could tell exactly which was the spot the dragoons were attacking.

That point, then, must be defended.

A very ready and ingenious means suggested itself to them.

The machinery of the mill was, for the most part, lying in a confused mass upon the floor.

It was composed of heavy pieces of iron and stone, and they set about placing them against that part of the wall of the mill which the gendarmes were trying to batter in.

This made a vast difference.

Their blows no longer produced the effect they did at first.

It did not seem, however, that they suspected what had been done, for they continued their attack with unabated vigour.

Doubtless they suspected that they had come upon some part of the mill that was stronger and better able to resist them.

But they persevered, and our friends soon saw to their dismay that this would not avail them much longer.

But the same voice which had before called out now did so again.

The men who were attacking desisted from their attempt.

Then followed another demand for our friends to surrender.

But, as before, they took no notice of it.

This seemed to enrage the official personage, for, in a very intemperate voice, he said—

"Fire!"

The command was followed by a little delay, and then a rattling discharge of musketry took place, which was directed to every part of the building.

It was a wonder our friends could be in the building and escape injury, but they did.

The bullets flew around them in every direction, but did them no injury.

This discharge over, the attack was resumed while the others reloaded.

Claude Duval felt in his pockets, and produced a small dark lantern, which he ignited.

His comrades looked at him in silence.

"It will never do to stay here," he said. "Those gendarmes seem terribly in earnest. We must make our escape somehow."

"But how?" asked Tom and Jack.

"That is the question. We shall certainly never find an answer to it by standing here doing nothing. I will look about me."

"Be careful of yourself."

"All right; but we must either get away from here somehow or other, or else wait and be comfortably shot or captured."

"But I can't see any means of getting away," said Tom King; "and if we do get out, we shall not be any better off than we were at first before we got in."

"I don't know; but we can't do worse than stop here. Ah! what is that? a ladder?"

"Yes, but it leads up to the top of the mill."

"Never mind, we may find something."

Claude Duval ran to the foot of the ladder, and hastily ascended it.

It led up to a trap-door, which he pushed open.

Then he found himself in the top chamber of the old mill.

Passing through the trap-door, he got on to the floor of the upper chamber.

His two comrades, after pausing a moment, followed him.

The chamber was encumbered with machinery, and it was also much smaller in size than the one that was beneath it.

There was a small hole on one side, and upon going to this, our friends saw that the piece of wood supporting the sails passed through it.

Their enemies were beneath.

"Here is a chance of alarming our foes," said Sixteen-String Jack. "They are immediately underneath these long sails. Let us cut away this rotten beam of wood, and allow them to fall down upon them!"

"Agreed!"

"Help me, then, both of you, and we will soon do the business."

Claude hung the lantern, by a contrivance with which it was provided, to his belt, and then all three drew their swords and began hacking away at the rotten beam of wood.

As Jack had said, the wood was rotten, for an impression was easily made upon it.

The centre gave them the most trouble, for there the wood was more sound.

But in less than five minutes the beam was completely severed, and then the sails, having nothing to support them, gave way.

They went down with a tremendous crash, carrying away a portion of the top and side of the old mill with them.

There was a shout from the soldiers beneath, and they hastened to get away, being impressed with the idea that the ruinous old building was about to fall bodily upon them.

For a few moments there was a scene of unutterable confusion, and then by degrees they gradually recovered from their panic.

Some suspicion as to the truth of what had occurred crossed their minds, for the officer again gave the command to fire, and nearly all the shots were aimed at the top portion of the mill.

But our three friends, having produced this consternation in the ranks of their foes, took all the advantage of it they could.

Claude instantly renewed his explorations, and a cry from his lips had the effect of calling his two comrades to his side.

"Look here," he said.

He pointed as he spoke to a rude flight of steps, which seemed to descend to a great distance into the interior of the mill.

"But that is going down again," said Jack.

"I know it," replied Claude, "but it does not take us into the same part as that from which we have just ascended. I am in hopes now we shall either get away or else find some place of security."

"I hope we shall."

"Follow me, then, and we will make the attempt."

"The gendarmes seem rather alarmed at what we have done."

"They do, and that will give us all the better chance of escape."

"I am afraid their panic will not last very many minutes."

"Never mind. It has lasted, you see, until we have got to the bottom of the steps."

"And no longer," replied Tom. "Hark."

At this moment they heard the order given to fire, and when such deadly and particular aim had been taken at the upper portion of the mill.

"And lucky for us we descended when we did," said Claude Duval, "for, if we had been above, we could not have escaped that murderous fire. We should all have been annihilated."

"We should," said Jack; "and how we are to escape eventual capture I am at a loss to think."

"We are in a desperate position, and desperate diseases require desperate remedies."

"Very true, but what are we to do?"

"The best we can, and trust to luck for the rest."

"Follow me carefully and as quickly as you can," exclaimed Claude Duval. "These steps seem to lead down to the very foundations of the mill, and there, perhaps, we may find some outlet."

CHAPTER CCCIII.

THE POSITION OF THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN IN THE RUINED MILL BECOMES CRITICAL.

This was a very faint and, most likely, fallacious hope, but still our friends grasped at it as drowning men will grasp at a straw, in the hope that it may save them from drowning.

Accordingly they followed Claude Duval down the crumbling, decaying steps, which every moment threatened to give way and precipitate them to the bottom.

But they proved strong enough to take them down, for, after the lapse of a few minutes, they reached the bottom in safety.

They were now upon what was evidently the lowest story of the mill above ground.

And, in reality, this was not above ground, for the rubbish which we have spoken of as having accumulated round the mill, reached up considerably higher.

They were, therefore, tolerably safe until the gendarmes should positively make a breach into the building and attack them sword in hand.

Certainly they were in no danger from fire-arms discharged from without.

"What's the best thing to be done now," asked Claude.

"I daresay we shall have a minute or two to deliberate."

"I don't know what had best be done," replied Tom King. "We are in an awkward fix altogether, and I can assure you I can't tell how we are going to get out of it."

"We must trust to luck, as I said before."

"It is a thousand pities we stopped that carriage."

"Well, so it is, viewing what has taken place since; but then who could have expected it?"

"No one; and, besides, it is no more than our fortune. We have been in perils before to-day, and I hope to be in many more before I die."

"Oh! don't talk of dying. It always makes me uncomfortable whenever that subject is mentioned."

"It is not a very agreeable one, I confess; but we are very near it just now, I am afraid."

"Never mind that. What had we better do?"

"That is a question."

"An important one."

"Yes, as you say, an important one."

"What are we to do, then?"

"Cannot you suggest anything, my friend?"

"No. I have been trying in vain."

"I thought so."

"We are in an awkward fix. Hark! there they go again."

A tremendous discharge from without testified that the gendarmes were keeping up the siege in good earnest.

"I tell you what it is," said Sixteen-String Jack. "You have said a great deal about our being in an awkward fix, but if we allow ourselves to be defeated by a set of gibbering Frenchmen, I shall consider we fully deserve the worst that can happen to us."

"It's all very fine for you to say that, Jack, but how are we to get out of our difficulty? that's the thing."

"I know it is."

"As for the gibbering Frenchmen, as you call them, they are gendarmes, all picked men and capital officers."

"Pho—pho!"

"They are, and you ought to know that before to-day."

"Do you mean to say, Claude, that if they were English Bow-street runners and we in here, that they would have been as long outside this rotten mill as these fellows have? Why, they would have been in like shot instead of peppering away at the woodwork in that simple fashion, upon the mere chance of hitting us."

A terrific crash followed these words, and completely drowned what was said in reply to them.

But it was soon over, and then our three friends looked in each other's faces as well as they could, in order to gather their expression.

"The mill is certainly coming down about our ears," said Tom King. "I wish we were safely out of it."

"The gendarmes have got inside at last, you may depend."

"What shall we do?"

"Why, in the first place, make it as difficult for them to get at us as you can."

"How shall we do that?"

"Demolish the steps."

"Oh! yes."

"They will then have to jump rather further than they will like in order to stand by the side of us."

"So they will."

This hint was acted upon at once.

With their long, heavy swords our friends slashed away at the flight of steps which had enabled them to reach the spot upon which they stood.

The steps were very frail, and so their task was easy enough.

By cutting away the lower part, they succeeded in pulling down the other.

[THE POLICE OFFICERS MAKE AN ATTACK UPON THE "WHITE HORSE" INN.

Just as it was falling, Sixteen-String Jack said—

"I am afraid we have done a very foolish thing."

"Do you mean by cutting away the steps?"

"Yes."

"How so?"

"Why, how can we get out again? We shall be starved to death here, like rats in a hole, if not worse."

"That is, supposing there is no other outlet from here," said Claude.

"Still, that ought to have been ascertained first."

"So it ought; but we must make the best of it, and set about it now."

"Hark! here come the gendarmes."

There was the hasty trampling of feet overhead, and, mingled with the sound, the voice of the officer in command.

They had clearly made a breach through some part of the side of the mill, either where their original attempt had been made, or else where an entrance was more easily effected.

The position of the highwaymen was now critical in the extreme.

Imagine, if you can, reader, a small chamber about eight feet in width, by ten in height.

The walls and ceiling composed of wooden planks roughly nailed together.

The floor also of wooden planks.

Just overhead the square aperture in the ceiling, up to which the demolished steps had led.

Such was the appearance of the place in which our friends were literally imprisoned.

Above them, coming closer to the square aperture referred to every moment, and entirely surrounding the mill, a large body of gendarmes.

These latter, however, knew not in what part of the mill to find our friends.

They had made their way into the same chamber as our friends had when they first entered it.

Should they—and beyond a doubt they would—find where their prey was hidden, nothing would be easier than for them to stand at the square hole in the floor above and open a most murderous fire upon them.

The hasty trampling of so many feet caused the old building to shake in the most alarming manner.

But, heedless of this, the gendarmes continued their search.

And now our friends set about doing that which they ought to have done at first.

And that was to see whether there was any kind of outlet from this chamber.

To be sure, there were some steps leading down to a kind of vault which was just above the foundation of the mill, but then it was not likely they would find any outlet from thence, except the means by which they had entered it.

They, however, as a kind of forlorn hope, decided to go down and see, as they could not make their position worse by so doing.

Accordingly these steps were descended, and upon reaching the foot of them, our friends found they were standing in a kind of vaulted chamber of very limited dimensions.

Claude had the lantern, and directly he found himself standing upon firm ground, he flashed the light of it about him.

But there was little to see.

The walls and floor were composed of a kind of clayey earth, beaten hard and flat.

Several huge beams, doubtless used for the support of the structure above, crossed the place in various directions.

But, beyond this, there was nothing to see.

A closer inspection was, however, made, in order to ascertain whether there was any means of exit.

Owing to the limited dimensions of the place, a search did not occupy many minutes.

On one side, half-hidden by one of the huge wooden beams, was a door.

It opened to a touch, and our friends, without hesitation, passed through the portal, Claude carrying the light and leading the way.

The atmosphere in this inner vault was very impure and damp; so much so, indeed, that our friends found considerable difficulty in breathing, while the lustre of the lamp perceptibly diminished.

But this was principally owing to the door having been closed.

The foul, pent-up air rapidly rushed out, while fresh poured in in its place.

But this circumstance did not look well for finding an outlet.

Glancing round, our friends saw they were in a kind of cellar or vault.

For what purpose it had been designed was more than they could tell, nor did they stop to inquire.

It was quite sufficient for them that such a place was there.

The sounds, which from time to time came to their ears, showed them that the gendarmes were rapidly approaching.

They had no time to lose.

They had been forced to burrow in the earth like foxes, and there was every probability of their being speedily unearthed.

Considerable tact had been displayed by the gendarmes in their attack upon the mill.

If they were slow in what they were about, they were sure.

Upon forcing an entrance, and standing fairly within the building, they looked all round them, but no trace of those they sought could they see.

The officer in command then gave his instructions in the following fashion.

Half the gendarmes remained outside.

They formed themselves into a ring round the mill, standing within a few feet of each other.

Every man held his musket in his hand, ready for immediate service in case either of the fugitives should make their appearance.

In the event of their doing so, they were not to wait for further instructions, but to fire at them, and, if possible, they were to wound and disable them without taking their lives.

The remainder, along with the chief officer, having entered the building, were, by his orders, sent to the very top of the mill.

Then, having satisfied themselves that they could not possibly go any higher, they set about the task of searching narrowly all around them.

As soon as they felt quite certain there was no one there, they went down to the next floor, repeating just the same mode of operation as before.

And so they went steadily down thus, thinking to make quite sure of their prey by driving them to the earth.

There was only one thing to be said in disfavour of this plan.

It took time.

Rather too much time to be altogether safe.

In such cases speedy measures are the best.

However, the gendarmes got down to the lower floor of the mill, and having searched that, and met with no better success than had hitherto attended their efforts, they proceeded to go still lower, when they discovered that the communicating steps had been cut away.

Fearlessly enough, however, several of them, finding there was no one in the chamber below, lowered themselves into it, and dropped down.

They then renewed their search.

How they were to escape not one of the highwaymen had any idea.

They could tell the gendarmes were very close at hand, and yet they seemed as far off attaining their object as ever.

They ran hastily round the vaulted chamber, into which they had made their way, and discovered a small opening on a level with the floor, looking like the entrance to some cavernous place.

Indeed, from the first, Claude Duval had been inclined to think that caverns must exist somewhere in the huge hill upon the crest of which the mill had been built, and it was this which encouraged him to continue these explorations underground.

The supposition was not an unlikely one, and it would turn out a very lucky thing for our friends if good grounds were found for it.

Certainly the rude little arched passage which Claude found seemed to lend colour to the idea.

The gendarmes were too close behind to allow them any time to deliberate whether they should seek safety by crawling through this arch, so Claude Duval set the example at once, leaving his comrades to follow him.

The archway, as he had expected, formed the entrance to a passage which in shape more resembled the entrance to a vault than aught else.

Still it was high enough to allow Claude to walk through it in an upright posture.

The length of this passage was only a few feet, and they emerged from it into a large cavern.

The most noticeable thing in this was a most tremendous rushing of water, as of a cascade, though at a considerable distance from where they stood.

The place was as dark as it is possible for any place to be, even were it in the very inmost recesses of the earth.

"Now, Claude, what are we to do?" asked Tom King, as soon as they emerged from the passage.

"Have you anything to suggest, Tom?"

"No, without we were all to make a stand at this narrow entrance, and defend ourselves from any one who attempted to pass through it."

"Our numbers are too unequal for us to do any good at that; besides, they would collect together and rush forward in a body with sufficient impetuosity to break through any guard which we might oppose to them."

"I am afraid so."

"What then is to be done?"

"We must continue to retreat. We have certainly been very lucky in getting so far as we have. It is more than either of you expected."

"It is."

"Come on, then, as quickly as you can, or else our foes will come up with us, and we shall be quite done for. This cavern seems to me, so far as I can tell, of vast extent, and somewhere in the distance I can hear the dashing of a waterfall."

"And you think that shows some prospect of our finding an outlet?" said Tom King.

CHAPTER CCCIV.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND HIS TWO COMRADES ESCAPE FROM THE GENDARMES BY THE ADOPTION OF A PERILOUS CHANCE.

"I HOPE so, at any rate," replied Claude.

"There are many more unlikely things."

"I wish we could stop up the passage, and so put a stop to pursuit, for some time at least."

"It would be a good thing."

"Shall we do it?"

"I think we had better not. We have no time, and we have no tools or materials suited to the purpose."

"That is very true."

"Our best plan is to keep as great a distance between our foes and ourselves as we possibly can. This cavern seems to stretch out a long way, let us make our way in as direct a line across it as we possibly can."

There was sound sense in this proposal, and so his comrades resolved to accede to it.

To take a path in a direct line across the cavern was a more difficult matter than one would be apt to think at a first glance.

The place was so dark that none but those who have been in a similar place could form any idea of what it was like.

The only means they had of dispersing this darkness was the lantern which Claude Duval carried in his hand, and, as may readily be supposed, this was quite inadequate for the purpose.

They could not, indeed, see more than a yard before them—the light was more like that emitted from a star than anything else.

Claude held it in such a manner that the principal rays which passed through the lens fell upon the ground close before his feet.

By taking this precaution he avoided coming in contact with any article.

As they advanced, which they did in true Indian file, the sound of rushing water continued to come more and more plainly to their ears.

In a little while afterwards the beam of light which the lantern sent forth shone upon water.

A halt was made, and then our friends found themselves upon the banks of a stream.

Claude Duval flashed the lantern about him in order to take in, if possible, the general aspect of the place.

To his surprise he found the cavern had grown much narrower—indeed, he seemed to be in one corner of it.

The black walls were visible all around him.

Straight in front was a narrow stream, the water in which was rushing along with the greatest impetuosity.

The channel in which it flowed seemed to be solid rock, worn away by constant attrition.

Seeing this, our friends ran along the bank for some distance, until they came to the place where the water fell down.

This was at one end of the cavern.

From some height which they could not see, even when the light of the lantern was directed upwards, the water came pouring down with great force, forming, indeed, quite a cascade.

It was this which made the rushing, roaring noise they had at first heard.

Now that they stood so near, the ground seemed to fairly tremble beneath their feet, so heavily did the water fall down into the kind of basin which it had hollowed for itself out of the rock.

In their surprise at seeing so strange a spectacle as a waterfall in a pitch dark cavern, our friends for a moment forgot the peril of their position.

But they were quickly reminded of the imminency of the danger which impended over them by the appearance of their enemies the gendarmes.

These had been able, with some little trouble, to track the fugitives to the cavern, and then they set about procuring lights to assist them in searching it.

This was easily enough done, as the materials were all ready to their fingers.

One of the gendarmes, by means of a flint and steel, struck a light.

Then the others with their swords chopped off large pieces of the many beams of wood that were in the mill, and readily hewed them into a torch-like shape.

They then ignited them, and the wood, being exceedingly dry and of a resinous quality, burned up brightly and answered the purpose of giving a light as well as the best torches could have done.

Every gendarme was thus provided, and, as they were in rather large numbers, the light which they cast around them was almost enough to illuminate the whole of the cavern, which was not so vast as the highwaymen at first imagined it to be.

It was in this way the gendarmes made their way through the passage into the cavern.

They held their extemporized torches as high up in the air as they could, so that their light should be diffused as much as possible.

But, of course, they did not see our friends as quickly as our friends saw them.

Claude immediately masked his lantern, and spoke in a whisper to his comrades.

"We must be quick," he said, "and endeavour to find our way out of this place."

"We must, but how?"

"As the gendarmes carry so many lights it will be easy for us to avoid coming into contact with the gendarmes."

"Certainly; but which way must we take that will give us the most likely chance of escape?"

"We cannot go any further this way?"

"No."

"Then let us follow the course of the stream. You see, it flows in a straight direction as far as we are able to see."

"But where will it take us to?"

"That I know not, but a stream of water like that must flow out somewhere, so I think we had better keep along its banks until we find out where it really does go."

"That is a good idea, Claude, and excellent advice."

"I am glad you think so."

"Lead on, then, quickly; we will follow behind you in Indian file."

"Come on, then."

"Go as quickly as you can, Claude."

"I will."

"Look how the gendarmes are dispersing themselves about the cavern. It is a thousand to one now if we are not intercepted before we go a dozen yards further."

Claude glanced round, and saw what his companion said was perfectly correct.

The gendarmes were rapidly dispersing themselves over the area of the cavern, and searching about with a vigour which bid fair in a little while to unearth our friends.

A faint reflected light came from the distant torches—so faint, indeed, that the foaming, rapidly-flowing water was but just discernible to Claude.

But it enabled him to make his way along the bank of the stream without wandering from his proper course.

The thundering din of the waterfall effectually drowned the slight sound which the footsteps of the fugitives raised.

On they went with tolerable rapidity, but the gendarmes were quicker in their movements, and ran hither and thither with bewildering quickness.

They were, doubtless, making a thorough search of the cavern, and eventually the highwaymen must have been discovered if they remained in it.

Suddenly, however, Claude came to an abrupt standstill.

His friends quickly learned the cause of it.

He had reached the wall of the cavern, through which the water flowed, and he could get no further.

Dimly—very dimly—they could see the outlines of a low and irregularly-shaped arch.

Underneath this the water flowed.

But to where?

That was a mystery.

It might be that it took its course deep down into the very bowels of the earth, where it went to supply some huge subterranean lake from which there was no outlet.

Under the arch all was darkness.

Not a single ray of light came to inspire the hope that in that direction they might be able to make their escape.

Claude's idea was that, by following this stream, he should be enabled to gain some other cavern and finally reach the open air.

He did not anticipate that the passage would construct itself into an arch.

The stream narrowed considerably, and the water rushed under the archway with tremendous speed, foaming and hissing as it went.

What were our friends to do?

Looking round, they found to their dismay that they had got into a portion of the cavern which was elongated in shape.

Indeed, the whole was very irregular in its figuration, and contained numerous indentations and projections.

It was into one of these indentations that our friends had got, and they saw with the utmost uneasiness the contracted space in which they stood.

But it was too late for them to emerge from it.

The gendarmes had already searched the whole area of the place, and were coming directly to them.

A good idea can be had of the kind of place in which the highwaymen were by saying that the recess in which they stood was like a funnel in shape, the funnel being laid upon its side.

The entrance to this recess was very large, and gradually tapered off until the water flowed through a space about equal in proportion to the hole at the bottom of a funnel.

The gendarmes were advancing rapidly.

To have attempted to pass them would have been impossible.

The space too limited for them to hope to do so undetected.

Then how were they to act?

The question was more than either could answer.

If they stood there, although they might maintain a resistance for a time, yet eventually they would be overpowered by numbers.

They could not fly.

If they attempted they would be captured or slain.

If they stayed where they were they would meet with precisely the same fate.

There was but one alternative open to them, and that was of so horrible a nature that it is not surprising if, bold as they were, they shrank from the adoption of it.

There was no time for hesitation.

If they did not make up their minds at once they would be deprived of even that one desperate chance.

Yet they did hesitate, and shrank from embracing it.

At the worst, however, they could but meet with death.

That would be their fate if they remained.

But the other did offer them a chance of life.

The reader will perhaps guess what the alternative alluded to is.

We think so, because it suggested itself spontaneously to the three friends, and though not a word was said, yet each came to the same conclusion respecting it.

It was this.

To commit themselves to the current of the stream, and allow it to drift them beneath the arch.

But though that promised a chance of safety, yet there were such contingencies attached to it that made them hold back.

To what place that stream might flow they could form no accurate idea.

It might be that if they once passed beneath that arch they would never again emerge into the light of day.

It might be that the arch grew narrower and narrower, until the bulk of water filled it quite up, and the passage became converted into a pipe.

Or it might be that the cause of the water had a downward tendency, and that the rapidity of its motion would increase to such a degree that they could not prevent themselves from being dashed to pieces against its jagged banks.

Or it might lead to the inmost recesses of the earth, from which it would be impossible for them to get away.

Or if these dangers were passed through, how could they tell what horrible creatures inhabited those waters, and whose instinct caused them to prey upon human life?

Then how horrible it would be, in that dark place, to suddenly find themselves in the cold grasp of some slimy monster.

The brain turns sick at the contemplation of such horrors.

But our friends did not wish to be captured.

In a strange country they knew they would meet with a short shift, and they were not many seconds reasoning themselves into the belief that, as they had to die, it would not matter how.

Tom King touched his two friends.

"There is no help for it, we must adopt this last resource. For my own part, I have determined to dare and do anything rather than be captured. Follow me, my friends. Quick—quick! or it will be too late."

Tom King's words had an immediate effect upon his comrades.

They had already made up their minds to do as he had determined upon doing.

No sooner had he spoke than Tom King leaped into the stream.

His companions followed his example.

They were either seen or heard by the gendarmes, for they could not avoid making a slight splash.

A loud cry assailed their ears, however, and the men rushed forward, casting the light of their torches upon the water.

The current was very strong, but the stream was not very deep, so the highwaymen were able to keep their footing.

Tom King was the first to pass beneath the arch.

He had to assume a stooping posture to do so.

The current seemed stronger beneath it, perhaps owing to a still further constriction of the channel.

But by stretching out his arms, he was able to touch the walls on either side of him.

This was of great assistance, for by pressing against them, or occasionally grasping at those pieces of rock which projected from them, he was able to preserve himself from being carried away by the tide.

In the most intense darkness he groped his way onwards, more than once striking his head against the roof, the height of which was very irregular, and from which, in some places, pieces descended like stalactites.

He found that, to avoid serious injury from them, he should have to stoop still more, and so he proceeded with his back bent and his lips almost touching the water.

His two comrades followed close after him; Sixteen-String Jack coming next, and Claude Duval bringing up the rear.

But as soon as they were out of sight beneath the arch, the dragoons arrived at the spot upon which they had so recently stood, and the light from their torches showed them plenty of indications which pointed to the direction the fugitives had taken.

CHAPTER CCCV.

THE OFFICER COMMANDING THE GENDARMES ENTERS THE PASSAGE AND MEETS WITH A HORRIBLE ADVENTURE.

A LOUD guttural kind of yell, which came plainly to the ears of the three highwaymen, arose from the gendarmes when they discovered the route the fugitives had taken.

But though, beyond all doubt, there were amongst them several brave men, yet not one could be found who did not shrink from the thoughts of entering that narrow gloomy passage, though they had the powerful influence of example before them.

It seemed too much like walking into the tomb.

The officer in command looked for a moment all the surprise he felt at the daring of the three Englishmen, who had already given himself and his troops so much trouble.

But a feeling of rage and anger soon supervened, and he determined by a summary process to put an end to the whole business at once.

Least of all did he like the idea of entering the narrow sewer-like passage.

But, notwithstanding his disinclination to follow them further, he was resolved they should not escape.

Accordingly, he spoke to his men, and commanded them to stand together in a throng, facing as nearly as possible the little archway.

Then rapidly followed the words:

"Make ready!"

The rattling of muskets followed.

"Present!"

The words were uttered in a loud tone, and came plainly enough to the ears of the three highwaymen, who felt uncomfortable according.

But all they did was to press forward with still greater rapidity along the narrow passage in which they found themselves.

Before giving the final order, the officer in command of the gendarmes addressed himself as follows to the three fugitives.

"Surrender! Surrender yourselves at once, and your lives will be spared. I will give you one minute to consider of my offer. Surrender, I say, and save your lives. Otherwise, if you refuse, I shall give the word to my brave followers, and they will fire up this narrow passage. If they do your lives must be lost, for how can you escape a dozen bullets when you are in a place no larger than will just admit your bodies? Surrender, I say, and your lives will be spared."

The officer paused.

Doubtless he fully anticipated that our friends would not hesitate a moment, but yield themselves up to him without further trouble.

But let us see how the highwaymen received his announcement.

The reader will guess that, desperate as was their emergency, they did not intend to give in so ignominiously as to crawl out of the tunnel, and be taken one by one as they did so.

Such a proceeding was not at all in accordance with their ideas.

Claude Duval who was last, and who consequently stood the worst chance, when the gendarmes fired did not flinch, but simply cried to his comrades in advance—

"Make haste—make haste! Be as quick as ever you can, or those confounded Frenchmen will put an end to us."

"All right, my friend," responded Tom King; "press on as quickly as you can; you need not fear overtaking us."

The time having elapsed which the officer had specified without his receiving any reply, he spoke again.

He evidently wished to take them prisoners and not to slay them.

"You make no reply," he cried, getting as close to the entrance of the passage as he could; "I shall call upon you once—I shall call upon you twice—I shall call upon you three times; and then, if you do not respond, I shall give the word to fire."

No notice was taken of this speech; and so, grown somewhat furious, the officer cried—

"Surrender, once."

No reply.

"Surrender, twice."

Still silence.

"Surrender, three times."

Then, as no reply followed this last appeal, he cried to his men—

"Fire!"

The gendarmes had stood with their fingers on the triggers of their muskets.

The muzzles of every one of them were pointed to the little arch.

They had also assumed such positions as would cause the shots to carry the greatest possible distance.

As soon, then, as their commander gave the word, they simultaneously pulled their triggers, and a terrific report and a blinding sheet of flame followed.

For an infinitesimal small space of time the interior of the cavern was lighted up with it.

Then succeeded what looked like a double darkness.

The bullets from the muskets went crashing against the rocks.

But no sound came to the listening ears of the gendarmes to show that their murderous volley had met with the success they intended it should.

As quickly then as possible, the officer commanded them to reload and fire again.

He was obeyed with true military promptitude.

Again was the cavern illuminated.

Again did the ear-deafening report of the weapons raise a thousand echoes amongst its recesses.

Again did the bullets come in crashing contact with the jutting rocks.

But with the same result as before.

If there was anything more calculated than another to fill the officer of gendarmes with vexation it was this.

If he had heard a yell of anguish—a groan—or a cry for mercy, he would have felt more satisfied.

But silence was most perplexing and annoying.

He did not know what to make of it.

Had they been annihilated by the first discharge?

That seemed scarcely probable.

Had they, by means of that dismal looking passage, emerged into another cavern similar to that which they had left?

That was possible, but still he was not sufficiently assured of it to follow them.

Or had they already come by their death?

Did the floor of the passage abruptly change its level, and had they been carried over the verge of the abyss, and plunged perhaps fathoms down in the bosom of the earth?

It might be so, or numerous other casualties might have befallen them, any of which would produce instantaneous death.

The officer soon made these reflections, and he came to the determination, in his own mind, that he would not fire again.

He paused a moment to consider what had best be done, and consult, in a low tone, with a few of his subordinates.

The result of the conversation was this.

The men were called upon to volunteer who would run the risk of entering the passage.

All were silent until the chief officer announced his intention of leading the way, and then the gendarmes, ashamed of the pusillanimity which they had displayed, pressed forward in a body.

The chief did not shrink, but took a torch from the hands of one of his followers.

Then, with his drawn sword in his other hand, he stepped into the stream, and walked boldly up to the little arch.

Having their leader before them, and with his example exerting its influence upon them, the gendarmes could not for shame hold back, so they all crowded closely at his heels.

The passage was entered.

In the same manner as the highwaymen had done, the gendarmes made their way along it.

The chief, however, went at a more steady pace than they did, and waved his torch about him in the expectation of coming upon some signs of the death of those of whom he was in search.

But nothing of the kind met his gaze.

The velocity of the current increased, and more than once he all but lost his foothold, so he was forced at length to consign his sword to its sheath and proceed unarmed, using his right arm as a means to cling to the rock, by which alone he could hope to retain his footing in the treacherous current.

A kind of mist, caused doubtless by the rapid flow of the water, rose in the air, mingled with fine spray, which threatened every moment to extinguish the torches.

However, they did just keep alight, burning in a dim, sickly fashion, and yet serving to illuminate the recesses of the passage.

They were able to avoid those projections of which we have spoken as being such serious impediments to our friends.

Suddenly, however, the chief of the gendarmes came to a halt.

He was about twenty yards within the passage—that is to say, he was about that distance from the arch by which he had entered.

His followers stopped also, and those who were nearest to him peeped over his shoulder, in order to ascertain what was the cause of the abrupt stoppage.

Those who did so were immediately satisfied.

In their path—a few feet only in advance—and seeming to block up the passage entirely, was some strange, shiny, half-defined object.

What it was none could tell, but in the centre of this dark mass, and separated from each other by a space of not more than two inches, were a couple of bright luminous objects.

A glance was sufficient to show what they were.

They were eyes.

There could be no doubt about that.

They were bright, fierce-looking eyes, too, and such as were calculated to make any one shrink back in half-defined terror.

To what kind of animal they belonged one could not tell.

But certainly to no human being.

A strange puffing, snorting noise came to the ears of the gendarmes, and it evidently proceeded from the creature which blocked up the passage.

Had it been in some fair open spot, and in the broad daylight, it is possible that the gendarmes would have looked upon this animal with very different feelings to what they did.

But in that intensely dark, cavernous passage, standing up to their knees almost in cold water, and in such a confined place, where they had no means of seeing what it was, or forming some idea of the power of mischief which it possessed, they felt nervous and terrified, when perhaps there was very little foundation for it.

Involuntarily they drew back a step, and the chief did so likewise.

He by no means relished the position which he occupied, and the thought of an encounter with the strange inhabitant of that dark place made him feel anything but comfortable.

The puffing, roaring noise increased in loudness.

It was a sound expressive of anger.

The creature was irritated.

The eyes seemed to glare more fiercely.

In vain the chief of the gendarmes raised his torch and strove to send some of its rays upon the object before him, in order to come to some kind of conclusion as to what it was like.

All he could see was something black, like the rocks which formed the walls and roof of the passage, and where its outlines ended and the others began he could not for the life of him discern.

He was prudent enough not to make any aggressive movement; if he had done so, he might have placed himself in a situation of much danger.

And now another fact pressed itself rather unpleasantly upon his notice.

The eyes seemed to be growing larger and larger.

Their brightness increased also.

At first he was unable to account for this, but soon the conviction forced itself upon him.

The animal—if such it were—was coming nearer.

It was doing what they were afraid to do.

Advancing to the attack.

If he any doubts upon this point, they were removed by the splashing of the water, which he heard plainly enough as the creature forced its way through the stream.

The chief of the gendarmes drew back.

It only needed that movement to lend wings to the feet of his companions.

Thoroughly dismayed and terrified, not only at their strange position, but also at the unknown creature before them, they were glad to seize upon any pretext for a retreat.

The movement which the chief gave communicated itself to the whole of the troop, and they turned and fled along the passage in the direction of the cavern which they had just left.

Many a time they stumbled in their slippery path and fell into the water, or knocked their heads terrible blows against the pieces of rock which depended from the ceiling.

But, heedless of all the injuries which they received—intent only upon getting out as soon as possible, which made them insensible to all else—they still continued their course.

Those who fell scrambled in some incomprehensible manner to their feet again, and those whose heads came into contact with the rocks most marvellously escaped unconsciousness, though many of the blows received were quite sufficient, under ordinary circumstances, to produce it.

Having penetrated so short a distance as they had, of course it was not long before they all emerged into the cavern.

No one can conceive what a sigh of relief they gave when they found themselves there in safety, nor could any one believe what a comfortable place they thought it after the vague horrors which beset them in the passage.

As soon as the chief of the gendarmes emerged into the cavern, in justice to him let it be said he regained his self-possession.

The panic which he had been a victim to left him.

He was once more a cool, intrepid officer.

He ordered his men to prepare their muskets and stand in readiness to fire.

He was obeyed, for soldiers will obey mechanically under almost all circumstances, so thoroughly is the principle of implicit obedience drilled into them.

The soldiers stood in readiness.

The position they occupied was the same as before when they fired a volley into the passage.

The chief then cautiously approached the little arch, and listened.

He could still hear the same puffing, snorting noise, although the roar of the waterfall almost made it inaudible.

He caught one glimpse of the gleaming eyes.

The creature had then followed them along the passage, undaunted by their numbers.

He was full of wonder to know what it could be.

But, great as his wonder was, it did not make him forgetful of the fact that now they had the creature at a manifest advantage.

He had no idea what its aggresive powers might be if it once emerged into the cavern, nor how difficult and dangerous it might be to achieve a victory over it.

CHAPTER CCCVI.

OUR THREE FRIENDS HAVE SOME FURTHER PERILOUS ADVENTURES IN THE CAVERNS.

But wedged in the passage as the creature appeared to be, the advantage was greatly upon his own side, and the chances of obtaining an easy victory over it almost certain.

Like a skilful general, then, who never allows such a favourable opporunity to slip, he gave the order to his men to prepare to fire.

The muskets were carried to the shoulders of the gendarmes, and their muzzles pointed to the entrance of the passage, close to the mouth of which the strange creature must be.

The men had their fingers upon the triggers, awaiting the word to fire.

But this the chief did not give.

He was watching the little dark arch, and had determined to give the word of command only when he caught sight of those horrible gleaming eyes, which had caused such a sickly feeling of terror to gather about his heart.

He had not long to wait.

Courageously the creature came on, never dreaming for a moment of the danger in which it stood.

The officer saw the eyes.

The gendarmes saw them too, for their gaze was intently fixed upon that same spot.

"Fire!"

The word rung out with extreme distinctness in that vast cavern.

It was obeyed with greater promptitude than any order was ever obeyed before.

Scarcely was the word pronounced than there was the simultaneous discharge of the muskets which the gendarmes held.

Once more was the interior of the cavern transiently illuminated by a bright flash almost blinding in its brilliancy.

Once more were the echoes of the place raised by the thundering discharge.

But scarcely one bullet struck against the rock, so accurate was the aim which every man had taken.

Mingled with the reports of the muskets there arose a strange yelling cry, the like of which not one of those who heard it ever listened to before.

It was, however, clearly a cry indicative of great bodily pain.

Then all was still.

Not one of the gendarmes moved hand or foot.

With an effort the chief officer shook off the effect which these strange adventures had upon him.

His words aroused the men.

By his orders the torches were trimmed, and fresh ones obtained and lighted.

Then, with feelings which we could not describe—feelings brought about by the strange nature of the place in which they stood—the gendarmes in a body pressed forward to see what kind of creature it was that they had slain.

Slain? They were by no means certain upon that point.

They knew well enough that many wild animals when badly hurt would feign death, and that so cunningly as to deceive any one until, upon a near approach of its adversaries, it would gather all its remaining strength, and in an expiring effort inflict great injury upon them.

And this reflection caused the gendarmes to approach the arch with great caution, lest one of them should be badly hurt by their strange antagonist.

But there was one thing which they entirely overlooked or forgot.

And that was the strength of the current and the impetuosity with which it flowed beneath the arch.

The animal, as we have seen, had been able to overcome the resistance which the rapidly-flowing water offered, and make its way to the arch.

But when the gendarmes fired that terrible volley, the contents of so many muskets being concentrated upon so small a spot, it had the immediate effect of depriving the animal of that strength which had hitherto enabled it to make a stand against the current, and it was with great swiftness drifted along the passage.

By the time, then, the gendarmes, in their cautiousness, had reached the arch, the body of the creature was far away.

Their disappointment was very great when, upon looking and expecting to see their adversary, they found the arch quite clear and just as it was when they first entered it.

They were at no loss to account for this, and they felt angry with themselves that the thought had not occurred to them.

They held a torch as far underneath as they could, but nothing but the foaming water met their gaze.

There was nothing to be seen.

Nor was there any means of ascertaining the nature of the creature which they had the encounter with, except by once more entering the gloomy passage.

But all naturally enough shrunk from doing this.

They withdrew, and the chief officer once more held a brief consultation as to what would be the best thing for them to do.

Not one of his arguments, however, could induce the gendarmes to enter the passage which was inhabited by such dreadful and mysterious creatures.

They were willing to fight against men, they said, to the last gasp, but they could not fight animals which they could not see, and of whose powers of mischief they were entirely ignorant.

The chief officer himself, if the truth must be told, felt no individual inclination to enter the passage again.

He had already had enough of that sort of thing.

Eventually he determined to leave six of his men as a kind of guard in the cavern.

They were to station themselves close to the arch, with their muskets ready for immediate service, and to shoot the first living thing that made its appearance.

Then he himself, with the remainder of his men, left the cavern, with the intention of finding whereabouts the stream emerged.

Men were left, however, at short intervals, and this was continued until the exterior of the mill was reached, so that a ready and easy means of communication was established between those above and those below.

The result of what had taken place was communicated to those gendarmes who had been on duty surrounding the mill.

These, of course, had seen and heard nothing of those whose capture they were so anxious to effect.

A slight change was also made.

Those men who had been in the caverns were left to surround the mill, and those who had previously been occupied in the performance of that duty accompanied the chief officer in his search for the spot where the stream of water, flowing through the passage, found its way out into the earth.

The hill upon which the mill was built was one of a chain of hills which extended for some considerable distance right and left of where he stood.

These hills were both high and large enough to contain many caverns underneath them, and doubtless there were many.

The officer had certain knowledge that there was at least one.

But we will leave him to prosecute his search, while we more particularly turn our attention to describing the adventures and proceedings of the three highwaymen themselves.

It will be recollected that the last time we saw them was upon a very critical occasion, namely, when the gendarmes were about to fire into the narrow passage.

When the chief officer made the speech in which he called upon them to surrender, our friends heard every word he said with the greatest distinctness.

But they never for a moment dreamed of yielding themselves prisoners in the kind manner proposed.

They pressed forward with increased speed, and immediately afterwards Tom King uttered a faint cry of satisfaction.

His comrades heard it distinctly enough, but they did not have any occasion to ask what was the cause of it.

It was very simple.

Tom King had reached a certain point in the passage where it turned off to the right, at an acute angle from the direction it had previously taken, which was undeviatingly straight.

It was incident upon making this discovery that Tom King uttered that ejaculatory cry of satisfaction, and he was round the corner in a moment.

He was followed, with extreme quickness, by his two comrades—for they knew the imminency of the danger in which they stood.

Just, however, as Claude Duval turned round, the order to fire was given, and the next instant many of the bullets passed over the spot upon which they had so recently stood, and flattened themselves against the wall, formed by the sudden curve in the passage.

Our friends were much delighted, too, to find that the passage increased in size as they proceeded, and that very rapidly.

So they did not wait to see what else the gendarmes did after the discharge of their volley, but hastened along the passage in the hope that ere long they should emerge into the open air.

At every step they took the passage grew wider and higher, and, of course, one effect of this was that the velocity of the current was much diminished, and they were consequently able to walk in the bed of the stream with much more convenience than before.

But their hopes of being conducted to the open air were doomed to disappointment.

The termination of the passage through the rocks was reached, and then they found that it was no more than an unpleasant means of communication between the cavern they had left and another of very similar general appearance.

Claude Duval now ventured to unmask his lantern, the light from which he had hitherto carefully concealed, and handed it to Tom King, who at once led the way out of the stream on to the dry floor of the second cavern.

His two comrades quickly stood by his side, but, before they had time to exchange a word with each other, they were startled with a strange sound.

It was like that which would be produced by some unwieldy animal when out of breath.

They instantly drew their swords and put themselves in an attitude of defence, for they did not know with what danger they might be threatened.

Tom King, too, waved the lantern about him so as to diffuse its light.

Their eyes then fell upon a singular object.

On a projecting piece of rock, which was only about a foot above the surface, was one of the most singular-looking creatures they had ever beheld.

In length it was about seven feet—in width, at the thickest part, about four.

It had a small head in proportion to the rest of the body.

But the head had a very intelligent look, as small heads frequently have.

The shape of it, and of the face also, was quite unlike anything our friends had before seen in the whole course of their experience.

But one of the most remarkable features connected with this creature, whatever it might be, were its eyes.

They were large, round and full and intensely bright.

They seemed even to possess some degree of luminosity of their own, so brightly did they appear to gleam.

They shone in the darkness like two bright orbs of light.

This small head was joined to a neck which was round and sleek.

This neck was supported by two massive shoulders. These, indeed, seemed the most massive part of the animal, for it was just there where its width and height was the greatest.

It was furnished with two feet or fins, our friends could not tell which. Doubtless they were intended to serve the purposes of both, and were shaped accordingly.

From the thick unwieldy shoulders the body of this strange specimen of the animal creation tapered off until it terminated in a tail, in all respects like the tail of a middling-sized fish.

The colour of the whole body was either black or something approaching it, and shone like highly-polished marble.

For some few moments the three highwaymen stood looking at this strange creature with the utmost surprise, interest, and curiosity.

They found that the snorting noise they had heard, and which had first attracted their attention, was caused by the animal breathing, which it seemed to do with great labour and difficulty.

"What do you think of that?" asked Claude.

"I have no idea," replied Tom King, to whom he addressed his remark. "Do you think it meditates making an attack upon us?"

"It looks very fierce," said Sixteen-String Jack, drawing back a step. "I wonder whether it can move quickly."

"I do not know. I never saw the like of such a creature before. What a lucky thing we did not meet it in the passage."

"In the passage?" exclaimed Tom King. "Stop! I have an idea."

"What is it?"

"An idea for ridding us of our foes—for a time at least."

"How?"

"Why let us drive this strange-looking creature into the passage."

"What for?"

"I should not wonder if the gendarmes, who must by this time be thoroughly enraged, do not attempt to follow us through the passage."

"Oh! I see now what you mean, Tom. You think if you can drive this creature into the passage, it will so terrify the gendarmes that they will turn back."

"That is just it."

"Then it is a capital idea, and I wish you success. And another thing: if we can drive it before us as we wish, who knows?—we might work it up to such a pitch of fury that it would actually attack the gendarmes, and force them to retreat."

"It is a capital notion," cried Claude Duval. "Let us set about it at once, for we have no time to lose. For all we know, the gendarmes may at this very moment be half-way through the passage."

"Most likely."

"The chief difficulty will be to get the creature into the passage. It may refuse to stir."

"Do not anticipate that. We can but try."

"Come on, then. You had better draw your swords."

The three highwaymen, with their drawn swords in their hands, now cautiously approached the shelving piece of rock upon which the strange animal lay.

It evidently viewed their coming with dissatisfaction, and a sort of growling sound mingled with the puffing, snorting noise of which we have before spoken.

It did not offer to move, however, even when its assailants were within a few feet of it.

Our friends were certainly running a great risk in thus provoking a conflict with an animal of whose powers of destruction they were completely ignorant.

But so much would be gained if they could carry out their original intention that they felt they could afford to run a good deal of risk.

Tom King held the light so that the beams fell full upon the face of the creature.

It blinked its eyes, but did not offer to stir.

Then Sixteen-String Jack waved his sword, but the animal took no notice of that hostile demonstration.

There was nothing more to do now than to proceed to harsher measures, so Jack with the point of his sword just pricked him gently where he fancied the skin would be thinnest and most sensitive.

CHAPTER CCCVII.

THE SITUATION OF THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN BECOMES STILL MORE CRITICAL.

The growling sound to which the strange amphibious creature had given utterance increased in loudness.

It showed its teeth, too, and a vicious kind of look came over its whole face.

But Claude Duval seconded the attack which his comrade made, and then, with a cry of pain, the animal sprang off the piece of rock into the stream.

The victory was so far gained, and the highwaymen of course followed up their advantage.

The creature was a great weight, and it fell into the water with a tremendous splash.

With the points of their swords the highwaymen continued to prick the skin of it, and it naturally shrunk every time a puncture was inflicted.

In this way, then, they succeeded in driving it in the direction they wished it to take.

When it once fairly got into the passage, their task was very much easier.

They pricked it more vigorously, so as to enrage it as much as possible.

At full speed, then, it made its way along the passage towards the first cavern.

Soon such sounds came to the ears of our friends as incontestably proved that the gendarmes had entered the passage, and were in full pursuit of them.

Upon making this discovery, they deemed it prudent to go no further, so Claude Duval gave the poor creature one vigorous parting thrust—such a one as would, he imagined, carry it the remainder of the distance.

Maddened, and thoroughly infuriated with the pain which it suffered, the creature continued its way along the passage until it confronted the gendarmes.

Then it came to a stand.

But only for a moment.

Blinded by fury it made a rush forward.

The gendarmes retreated.

The rest we know.

When that volley was fired, the creature was just beneath the arch.

Indeed, a portion of its body was already within the cavern.

Nearly all the bullets that were fired lodged in its body.

The cry, then, that the gendarmes heard was the last one it uttered.

It fell down dead, and the current carried it far away in a moment.

But our friends did not know this.

Their troubles, nevertheless, were far from being over.

They retraced their steps to the second cavern without meeting with any accident.

Their unanimous decision was to get out into the open air as soon as possible.

Accordingly, they made a rapid examination of the cavern, the result of which was that they found it very similar to the other.

At one end was the passage by which they had entered.

The stream of water flowed in a serpentine manner across it, and passed out again under another arch.

Than this there was no other exit that our friends could find.

After some hesitation they determined to try their luck. The former one having been passed in safety gave them courage to make a second attempt.

In the hope, then, that this stream might conduct them out of these gloomy regions, the three highwaymen again stepped into the bed of the stream and passed underneath the arch.

But it was not without great misgiving lest they should be so unfortunate as to meet with some other inhabitant of it, with whom they by no means desired to have an encounter.

This second passage was very much longer than the first; it was, too, more irregular, winding in and out in a perplexing manner.

[BLACK BESS IS WELL CARED FOR DURING TURPIN'S ABSENCE.]

It was not long before a very disagreeable circumstance forced itself upon their notice.

The bed of the stream sloped rapidly.

This downward tendency filled them with the utmost uneasiness, and they began to fear that after all they had got into these caverns, and that they should have great difficulty in emerging from them alive.

But neither spoke of this, although the thought was uppermost in the minds of each.

Down—downward the stream went, until it became difficult to keep their feet.

Indeed, it was only by clinging close to the rocks that they were enabled to do so.

A roaring noise, too, came to their ears, increasing in loudness every moment.

It was like that which they had heard upon emerging from the foundations of the mill.

And now a thought occurred to their minds of so awful a character that the pulsations of their hearts almost ceased.

It was Tom King who first spoke, though, when he raised his voice, his comrades knew well enough what he was about to say.

"Jack—Claude," he said.

"Yes, Tom," replied his companions, with difficulty raising their voices sufficiently to be heard above the roaring water.

"We are lost."

No pen could possibly describe the tone in which these three words were uttered.

"You fear, then——"

"I don't fear, but I am sure that we have got either into the vortex of a subterraneous whirlpool or cascade. Cling tightly to the rocks, or you will lose your footing. The water seems to rush by with more and more violence every moment."

"Can we retrace our steps?" said Claude.

"We can try, but I fear we have got too far down the treacherous current, and the bed of the stream is more slippery than ice."

"Let us try, then, at once," said Claude, "before we go further."

"Lead the way," said Tom King; "and be careful to secure your footing."

The three highwaymen turned round and made a desperate effort to retrace their steps along this underground stream.

But alas! the effort was a vain one.

Unconsciously they had approached the verge of a waterfall, and were in that portion of the stream which is called the rapids, from the great increase of the flow of the water just before it reaches the place of its descent.

It is well known how easy it is to be engulfed in a treacherous stream, even in broad daylight, so that it is no matter of surprise that our three friends, surrounded by darkness as they were, and under the excitement produced by the pursuit of the gendarmes, should not have discovered their terrible situation until too late.

It was not until Claude turned round and tried to return that he fully found how far they had been lured to their destruction.

The rapidity with which the water flowed seemed to have increased ten-fold.

And the bed of the stream, which rose with alarming rapidity, afforded not the least foothold.

Before, then, he was aware of such a catastrophe, he felt his feet give way beneath him, and himself carried with fearful swiftness down the stream.

He uttered a cry of horror, and made a terrific effort to clutch the point of some of the rocks which projected into the stream.

But the attempt was utterly futile.

He could not obtain a firm grasp of any one of them.

Sometimes he would take a precarious hold, but ere he could tighten it, the slippery rock would slip between his fingers, while he was carried with augmenting speed down the stream.

As we have said, the three highwaymen almost simultaneously turned round to retrace their steps. With difficulty they preserved their footing, until Claude lost his, and of course, the weight of his body coming against them had the effect of destroying their equilibrium.

Away, then, all three were swept like straws along the remorseless torrent.

In a little while they altered their endeavours to grasp the sides of the rocks in order to arrest their descent, to keeping into the middle of the stream, for they were continually receiving bruises from the sharp, jutting points.

How long they were drifted in this manner, they had no idea.

It was not for long, however, though, to them, the time seemed prolonged into an age.

Suddenly, and with an awful rush, they felt themselves carried with still greater rapidity forward, and then carried over a precipice.

They had long since given themselves up for dead men, for where else could that cataract fall but into the very bowels of the earth?

Down—down—they went, with a speed that almost deprived them of breath and consciousness.

Then they felt themselves plunged into a boiling seething mass of water, until there seemed to be tons of water upon them.

Then they rose to the surface—stunned, and almost insensible.

They did, however, possess sufficient instinct to crawl towards the side of the stream, and having done so, they lapsed into a swoon of so deathlike a character, that no one would have believed they lived.

In this state they continued for a long, long time.

Claude Duval, who was, perhaps, the most inured to hardships of various kinds, and who was gifted with the strongest constitution, was the first to recover his senses.

But for full two minutes after he returned to consciousness he was unable to recollect what had taken place, and where he was.

By degrees, however, recollection dawned upon him, and then he became aware that he had escaped from what he had made up his mind was inevitable death.

He was drenched to the skin, and he found that where he lay the descending water splashed over him.

His first thought was to seek for a light, but his immersion had effectually deprived him of all means of obtaining one.

Then he groped about in the intense darkness in the hope of finding his comrades, though he more than feared that they had perished, and that he was the only one who had escaped.

Presently he came in contact with something which he knew immediately to be a human form.

Passing his hands over it, he reached the face.

But the moment he touched it he was startled by hearing a loud cry.

He recognised the tones of that voice.

To his joy, Sixteen-String Jack was alive as well as himself.

A few rapid words passed between them, and then Sixteen-String Jack, who did not feel much the worse for his perilous adventure, assisted Claude to search for Tom King.

They found him at only a few paces distant, and so near the stream that if he had rolled over he must have fallen into it.

The darkness of the place they were in was most intense, but they succeeded, nevertheless, in removing Tom King from his perilous situation.

Then they adopted the best means within their reach to restore him to consciousness.

After a time they succeeded, and then the two, feeling much better, rose to their feet, and endeavoured to pierce the darkness which environed them.

But the effort was a complete failure.

If they held up their hands close before their eyes, they could not perceive any trace of it.

Nor could they consequently see each other, so they adopted the very wise precaution of keeping hold of each others hands.

At that moment they would have given anything for a light, in order to ascertain what kind of a place they were in, and whether it had any outlet to it.

Perhaps they thought they had only been spared death by drowning in order to perish by one ten times more terrible.

But a light was out of the question. The water had put out the one they carried and inevitably damaged the materials wherewith they might hope to obtain another.

With a roaring, crashing sound the water continued to fall from the height above.

The highwaymen were all under the impression that they were very far down below the level of the surface of the earth.

To them the cascade down which they had fallen seemed to be hundreds of feet high, at the very least, though it is probable that the darkness led them into error upon this point.

Certain, however, it is that their position was an unpleasant and alarming one.

Destitute of light, and food, and tools, what chances had they of once more standing beneath the pure blue sky?

Very little, indeed, unless fortune should stand their friend.

For a long time our friends remained just as they were, casting their eyes around them, but still unable to see anything but the darkness, which to their strained vision, seemed to take all manner of strange and alarming shapes and roll rapidly towards them.

At length they agreed to step forward for a few paces, all three keeping in a straight line, and each one putting his foot forward and securing a footing before he moved the other.

This was certainly about the best thing they could do.

In this way they proceeded some distance, until, indeed, the loudness of the cataract had much diminished, so that they were able to make themselves heard without straining their voices.

They then again paused.

But still there was nothing that they could see.

Suddenly, however, Sixteen-String Jack uttered a cry which sounded like one of joy.

"Look," he cried, addressing his comrades. "Look."

"Look where? At what?" they asked, eagerly.

"Yonder—yonder. Straight before you. Cannot you see something which looks like a faint and tiny star?"

His two companions strained their eyes to the utmost, but were at first unable to distinguish the faint speck of light to which Jack alluded.

At length, however, they caught a sight of it, and having once done so, could not be persuaded to take their eyes off it.

They were filled with joy when they saw it, for not one had any kind of doubt as to what it meant.

"Keep it steadily in view," they cried to each other. "Do not lose sight of it a moment, lest we should be unable to find it. Keep straight on towards it, for that will lead us to freedom."

With these words of encouragement on their lips, and their hearts full of hope, the three highwaymen stepped forward, still, however, taking the same precaution in their progress that they had done hitherto, namely, not to move one foot until they were certain of a secure resting place for the other.

In this way they went on and on for a long time, until that which looked at first so faint, and dim, and star-like, increased in magnitude and brightness, until at last they could see that it was really an opening in the rocks.

Through what kind of a place it was that they were making their way they had no idea.

It might have been some vast and spacious cavern, across which they were making their way out—it might have been a narrow passage only, extending but a few feet beside them.

The din of the cataract was now almost inaudible, which proved that the distance they had come was considerable.

Still they had a long way to go, for the opening must either be a very small one, or else at a great distance.

They found the latter to be the case, and, on a closer approach, saw that it was a rude natural arch, through which the stream of water flowed into the open air.

Thankful that its course was not, as they at first feared, directed into the very bowels of the earth, they once again committed themselves to the stream, for there were no means of passing under the arch on foot.

The stream was not, however, deep, nor had they far to wade through it.

In a few moments, to their intense satisfaction, our three friends stood upon dry ground, and with nothing but the sky above them.

It was broad daylight, and the sun was shining with full power and splendour.

Never before, in the whole course of their existence, had the face of nature looked so beautiful.

Certainly the spot at which they had emerged was about as lovely a one as could well have been imagined.

As far as they could see was a wide expanse of well-cultivated country.

To be sure, the summer had gone and the winter was close at hand, but still it was one of those bright, sunny mornings which even in mid-winter sometimes come and give us an idea of summer.

CHAPTER CCCVIII.

TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AT LENGTH LAND UPON THE SHORES OF ENGLAND.

But our friends were soon recalled from their contemplation of the beautiful scene spread out before them by their thoughts.

Dangers had been avoided and perils escaped without injury, but, for all that, they were far from being in a position of security.

The gendarmes would not easily relinquish their search, after the determined opposition they had met with, and the mischief they had done.

They would, doubtless, scour the whole country for miles round.

Looking behind them, they saw that the arch underneath which they had passed, and through which the water flowed, was situated at the base of a high hill, doubtless the one upon the brow of which the ruined mill had been built, or else one contiguous to it.

On foot they would stand but a poor chance of escaping from the well-mounted dragoons, whose horses would by this time have rested sufficiently to recover from their fatigue.

But our friends were in a very uncomfortable situation.

They were hungry and weary.

Their clothes were dripping with water, which was as cold as ice itself.

Every now and then they would shiver from head to foot.

"I'll tell you what it is," said Tom King; "we cannot stay here in such a condition as we are now, nor can we hide."

"But what, then, can we do?" asked his two comrades.

"We must endeavour to reach, unperceived by our foes, some small auberge where we can have shelter and accommodation. It will be easy to remove the suspicions which our appearance would be likely to excite, by saying that we had been capsized."

"We can try it. The chief difficulty will be to avoid the gendarmes, but, when that is done, the rest will be comparatively easy."

"Make haste, then. The gendarmes are doubtless searching all about for us, but then, if they are, we have a very good chance of escape, for they are nowhere in sight."

"Come on, then."

The three highwaymen set forward on their search for an auberge or inn.

It was not long before they came across a narrow sinuous lane, and, passing this, they shortly emerged upon a high road.

Somewhere along this they made no doubt they should be able to find what they sought.

But, having walked at least four miles without perceiving any more traces of what they wanted than they had seen at first, they began to grow disheartened.

Presently a peasant came in view.

He was trudging along with his eyes on the ground, but, upon hearing the sound of Tom's voice, who addressed him in French, he raised his head.

He looked surprised when he saw the appearance which his interlocutors presented.

Tom King had some trouble in making this fellow understand, and still more in understanding what he said in reply, for he spoke in one of the horrible barbarous dialects in the north of France.

But at length they gleaned that there was an auberge about a mile further along the road.

Tom tossed the peasant a small coin for his information, and with renewed vigour the three highwaymen continued on their journey.

The auberge was at length reached.

It was a small, poor-looking place, but still they thought it would answer their purpose.

Upon entering, Tom told the tale agreed upon, namely, that they had been out upon a pleasure excursion, and that the boat had unfortunately capsized. They had lost their way, being strangers in the neighbourhood, but would pay liberally for any accommodation afforded them.

This sounded a very plausible story, and the landlord of the auberge was completely taken in by it.

Perhaps the exhibition of a well-filled purse had something to do with his acquiescence.

However, be that as it may, our three friends were shown to sleeping chambers, and while there their clothes were taken and dried.

Fortunately for them, they seemed to have got quite out of the way of the gendarmes, who must have been searching another part of the country.

But the highwaymen stayed no longer than they were obliged because of the danger to which they exposed themselves.

Their clothes were brought to them thoroughly well dried and cleaned, and they put them on with the greatest satisfaction.

Then, descending the stairs, they called for refreshments, and dispatched a hearty meal.

They did not linger over it, however, and as soon as they had finished they prepared to start.

"The sooner we get away from here," said Tom King, "the better it will be for us, for there is no knowing how soon the gendarmes may make their appearance."

"That is uncommonly true, Tom," said Claude, "but we shall stand a poor chance of getting away from them if we have to travel on foot."

"We shall. What are we to do for horses?"

"I think it might very likely be managed."

"How?"

"Let us count up how much we are all worth in ready money. You must recollect I took a good-sized purse from the old man in the carriage."

"Oh! did you, Claude? I have been going to ask you what sort of luck you had, only the gendarmes were down upon us so soon that I have had no chance."

"Empty your pockets, and count up. I am in hopes we shall muster amongst us enough to buy three horses, and then we are off to England!"

"For one," said Sixteen-String Jack, "I shan't care how soon we get there. I am thoroughly tired of France."

"We are all the same about that, I think; but come, out with the money."

The highwaymen complied with this demand, and there was soon a goodly heap of coin upon the table.

Claude counted it, and, when he had finished that highly-interesting operation, he said—

"Good news, my friends. Unless horses are much dearer here than they are in England, we have enough money to buy three, and something to spare."

"Let us call the landlord, then, and ask him about horses for all three. Perhaps he can supply us."

"There is no harm in asking him, at any rate. Call him in."

The landlord was called, and, upon his making his appearance, he was questioned with respect to his capability for finding them with horses.

"I have three magnificent creatures in my stable," he said, "that have been left here for sale."

"How much each?"

"You shall come and look at them, and then we will talk about the price."

Our friends rose and followed the landlord to the stables at the rear of the inn.

Here they were shown three horses of middling quality. But still, although not very handsome, they seemed of that tough, wiry sort, which can endure any amount of fatigue, and get over the ground at a rapid rate.

"How much do you want?" asked Claude.

"I cannot take less than seven hundred and fifty francs each for them."

"That is a long price."

"What?"

"I say they are dear."

"No—no. Cheap."

"How much is seven hundred and fifty francs in English money, Tom?"

"Thirty pounds."

"Then that is a great deal too much," said Claude, turning to the landlord, "but I tell you what we don't mind doing."

"What?"

"Why, we will give the money you ask, if you will throw the furniture into the bargain."

"Throw the furniture? I do not understand."

"I mean, we will give you thirty pounds apiece for the horses, if you will find saddles and bridles also for the same money."

The landlord hesitated for a moment, and, as he had been told to sell the animals for three hundred francs, he thought he could afford to give in, and accordingly he did so.

Saddles were found, and, in a few minutes the horses were ready for the road.

The reckoning was paid, and then, the three highwaymen feeling rather more like themselves, trotted out into the high-road, and made the best of their way to Boulogne.

This place they reached without meeting with any particular adventure worthy of special mention.

By Tom King's advice, they resolved upon a bold course of action.

That was to go to the appointed landing place like ordinary passengers, and take places for themselves and their horses on board the boat which plied between that port and Dover.

It is often the case that a bold course is the safest, and so it proved in this case.

In an easy, off-hand sort of way our friends secured their places and got on board.

Once there, however, they took care to keep as much out of sight as possible.

Another circumstance was in their favour.

It was quite dark when they got on board, and, of course, as the passage across the channel is a short one, it was dark when they landed.

It was, in fact, about an hour past midnight.

Somehow or other the English Channel had been very unfortunate to our friends.

They had never been upon it without meeting with some perilous adventure or another.

But this time they crossed without the occurrence of any incident whatever, beyond those which always take place upon such occasions.

The reader must please be good enough to bear in mind that the three highwaymen were in total ignorance of all the varied and extraordinary incidents which had befallen Dick Turpin since they parted with him at the entrance to the cavern where they had made a temporary stay.

They were full of anxiety respecting him, and much wondered what had taken place during the last interval when they had had so many narrow escapes from death.

Not for one moment, though, did they anticipate what had really taken place.

Little did they think that, at that very moment, Dick Turpin was an inmate of a cell in Newgate.

That little surprise was in store for them.

It is needless to say how much Dick was liked by his three comrades.

During the course of this history we have seen how they have all looked up to him as a superior spirit.

Indeed, he had, by general consent, been elected captain, the other three to form a band and act under his directions.

But circumstances had taken such a turn that this was never properly carried out, though the other three when they landed recollected it, and determined to have the arrangement renewed and fulfilled.

They did not know what obstacles even then stood in the way of it.

Whether they were eventually to accomplish their aim, time alone, the great unfolder of all mysteries, can determine.

Full of these thoughts, and impatient to see their old companion, Claude and his party did not stay a moment longer at Dover than was necessary to land and get their cattle on shore.

As soon as this was done, they mounted and set off at full speed along the London-road, for it was in the metropolis that they thought Dick Turpin was most likely to be found.

To London, then, they directed their steps, nor did they halt until they had performed a considerable portion of the journey.

Of course the endurance of their cattle had a limit, and they were obliged to halt several times in order to allow them rest and food.

But no unnecessary time was lost.

On one of the occasions, when they halted at a roadside public-house, where they regaled themselves with some of the finest old October ale they ever remembered to have tasted, they received the first intimation of Dick Turpin's position.

They had not dismounted from their steeds, but sat in the saddle at the front door of the inn and had the ale handed to them.

They were waited upon by the landlord—a real jovial specimen of an Englishman—and his pretty daughter.

Mine host was inclined to be communicative.

"Are you much of travellers on the road?" he asked.

Of course, he was replied to in the affirmative.

"Then I have a piece of good news to tell you—if you have not heard it already. I don't suppose you have, for it has only just been brought down to me direct from London."

"No, we have heard nothing. What is it?"

"You'll rejoice, I'll be sworn. You will be able to perform your journey on the highway with more security and less risk than you have done for a long time past."

"How so?"

"Why, I have been told, upon the very best authority, that the notorious Dick Turpin, who has for so long past been a terror to all travellers on the road is—why, bless my life, how astonished you look!"

The landlord might well make the remark.

Upon the first mention of their old comrade's name, which they heard at a moment when they least expected it, neither of them could avoid exhibiting the surprise they felt.

But they would not allow the landlord to break off in the middle of his sentence, but impatiently clamoured for him to continue it.

"Why, gentlemen, I didn't think his name would so much surprise you, but the fact is, Dick Turpin, the highwayman, is"——

"Yes—yes! What?"

"Safely lodged in Newgate."

"In Newgate?"

"Yes. I always said he would get there at last, and you see my words have come true."

"In Newgate is he?"

"Yes. I have no doubt about the correctness of my informer. He is in Newgate safe enough."

"When was he taken there?"

"Three days ago."

"Indeed; then it is quite recently?"

"Quite."

"Well, you saw we were surprised?"

"I did."

"I am not at liberty to tell you the reason of it, but it was a very good one. I may say, however, that we were in search of Dick Turpin, and at the very moment you spoke we were thinking about him."

"Indeed! Then you are officers?"

"Mum!" said Tom King, holding up his finger in a mysterious manner. "I can't say what we are. Be sure you don't say a word about what we have told you. Good morning."

"Hi! Stop!" said the landlord, as the highwaymen trotted off. "I'll be shot if you have told me anything!"

CHAPTER CCCIX.

DICK TURPIN DISCOVERS THAT, AFTER ALL, NEWGATE IS NOT SUCH AN UNCOMFORTABLE PLACE AS HE EXPECTED TO FIND IT.

HAVING brought the adventures of Turpin's three companions up to this point, we feel that we can leave them for awhile, and turn our attention to Dick Turpin himself.

We suppose they have not forgotten where they saw him last.

He was seated in his dungeon in Newgate, reflecting upon the strange string of events which had terminated by his being placed there.

In this occupation he was interrupted by hearing the fastenings of his dungeon door undone.

Curious to see who it was that had come to disturb him so soon, Dick raised his head, and looked towards the door.

It was thrust open rather roughly, and a couple of men entered.

One was a turnkey, and the other was the man employed to go the round of the prison at certain intervals and supply the prisoners with food.

He put down a small pitcher of water just inside the cell, and a small loaf of contract bread upon the top of it.

Dick was hungry, but the sight of the fare set before him did not tempt him to eat.

But the regulations of the great city prison were very different then to what they are now.

Dick had money in his pocket, and he was well aware that while he had that he should not have to go short of luxuries.

So, when the man put down the pitcher, he said—in a tone of affected hilarity—

"Is that the best fare you can set before the prince of highwaymen? Nothing but water and black bread?"

"No offence, Mr. Dick," said the man, with as much deferential civility as he would have used if he had spoken to the governor himself; for among the officials of Newgate, Dick Turpin was looked upon as being a very distinguished character indeed. "No offence, Mr. Dick; only as juty is juty, why, of course, I was obligated to bring you the pervisions which the reggleations pervides."

"Oh! I daresay it's all right."

"Oh! yes, it's all right."

"Well, I feel rather peckish. What could you get me for supper?"

"Anything your honour wants."

"Very well; here's a guinea. Get what you like that is nice, and you can keep what you have left for your trouble."

"That's right, your honour," said the man, as he took the coin from the highwayman's hand and slipped it into his pocket. "I don't want to get no profit out of you, captain, and I won't. You shall have the worth of your guinea, every hap'orth. You shall have a supper fit for a king."

"All right," returned Turpin, who was well aware of the policy of keeping on good terms with all the prison officials with whom he came in contact. "Treat me well. You will find it answer your purpose best."

"Lor' bless you, captain," said the man, looking towards the turnkey, "we know a real gentleman, don't we, Jim?"

"In course we does. We have seen plenty in our time, so we are able to judge."

"I suppose so," said Dick; "and now, as I feel rather hungry, the sooner you can get my supper the better I shall be pleased."

"What will you have to drink, captain?"

"Oh! some prime old ale, if you can get it."

"You can get anything here, captain, by paying for it."

"I suppose so. Well, here is another guinea. You can spend the first, and divide the second between you."

Highly satisfied with their prisoner's bounty, the men withdrew.

In about half-an-hour afterwards they returned, bringing with them as nice and tempting a supper as could possibly be imagined.

"Eat it in comfort, captain. The governor has gone out, so we shan't be troubled with him. Ah! times is sadly altered to what they used to be. I can hear talk, too, of fresh changes, but I hope they won't be in my time. Why, I actually heard that they intended to take our perquisites off us!"

"No," said Dick, sympathizingly, "you don't mean that?"

"I do, indeed."

"Then, it's too bad."

"That's what I said."

"It's infamous. However, what did you say about the governor just now?"

"I said that he had gone out, so we shouldn't be troubled with him just at present."

"Then, does he make himself busy in prying about the prison?"

"Oh! very. You never know when to expect him. Instead of keeping in his own room, like a governor, and leaving the proper fishals to look after the prison, he keeps poking about here and there and everywhere."

"But you expect to be free from him for a little while?"

"Oh! yes."

"Then I'll tell you what you shall do."

"Anything you like, captain, besides letting you out of this here place."

"You need not trouble yourself about that."

The man gave a knowing wink.

"I am speaking earnestly," said Turpin. "I have given my word of honour to the judge that I would make no attempt to escape."

"He means to get you off himself, then?"

"Well, I fancy he will try at it."

"And suppose he don't succeed?"

"Why, of course, that will be another matter. But, come, I have not said yet what I was going to say."

"What is it, captain?"

"Why, as you don't expect the governor just yet, I want you to sit down here and help me eat my supper."

"Lor', captain!"

"Don't refuse. I can't eat without I have company; so sit down and make yourselves at home."

Highly delighted with the invitation, the men sat down, and without any further pressing, commenced a vigorous attack upon the tempting viands before them.

Dick was hungry, and as the supper was of such a character that it would almost tempt the appetite of an epicure, it may be believed that he did ample justice to it.

As for the two turnkeys, somehow or other these gentry are always in feeding condition, and the quantity they put under their waistcoats was really alarming.

But still there was enough and to spare, for the meal was not only of so excellent a quality, but it was excellent in quantity—sufficient having been provided for half-a-dozen men at least.

During the dispatchment of this meal they beguiled the time with various reflections upon things in general.

But above all, these men were struck with the nobleness which Dick had displayed by coming forward as a witness in the manner he did.

"Where is Adrian Winberry?" Dick asked, at length.

"Oh! he is safe enough. His cell adjoins yours."

"Does it?"

"Yes."

"Oh! which side?"

"That."

The turnkey pointed to the wall which was on your right hand as you entered the dungeon by the door.

"Oh! that is his cell, is it?"

"Yes."

"Does he know I am next door to him?"

"Oh! dear, no; and we should not think of telling him."

"Yet you have told me."

"Ah! but you and him are two different people."

"I suppose so."

"What we tell you we should not tell him; that's what I mean."

"I know. How does Adrian behave himself?"

"Like a wild beast."

"How is that?"

"He sits crouched up like a tiger, and when you enter his cell he looks at you like a maniac, but never offers a word."

"You seem rather afraid of him."

"Well, I shouldn't like to go within reach of his clutches, I can tell you."

"Is he chained?"

"Oh! yes, very heavily, and a good watch is kept upon him, because it is feared that, having powerful friends outside, he may attempt to escape—and perhaps get off."

"It will be an eternal disgrace to all in the prison if such a wretch is allowed to regain his liberty."

"Don't you be afraid of that. Such a strict watch is kept that he could not possibly go half-a-dozen steps without being seen."

"I should advise you myself to keep a sharp eye upon him. He might give you the slip, you know, and I am sure if anyone ever deserved a ride to Tyburn, he does."

"You are right, captain."

"How does he behave to you?"

"Like a wild beast, as I told you."

"Does he live on the prison fare?"

"Yes, what little he does eat."

"Oh! You never get anything for him?"

"Never."

"And never speaks?"

"No. So, in course, we don't speak to him. Why, if he was to lay down ten guineas for me to do for him what I have done for you to-night, I would say no."

"I am much obliged to you for your good feeling, I am sure."

"I would have done it for nothing for you, captain, if so be you was hard up and hadn't got no chink."

"I am well provided, though, as it happens," replied Dick, "though I thank you all the same. You will find I shall act liberally towards you."

"I know you will."

"Well, now then, what about Adrian's two accomplices—where are they?"

"Do you mean Norman and Sare?"

"Yes."

"They are in a couple of cells on the other side of the corridor."

"What do you think of them?"

"Why, I feel sorry sometimes."

"Do you?"

"Yes. I fancy they were led into the business without being awares of the nature of it."

"Well, I think so, too."

"Now, in my opinion, the worst one of the whole bunch is old Skinner, the lawyer, and I am afraid he will get off the lightest."

"I daresay he will."

"Don't you think he is the worst?"

"In one way I do."

"As how?"

"I think he put a great deal into Adrian's head which he never would have thought of himself."

"I am sure of it."

"Whereabouts have you put him?"

"He is in the next cell to Adrian Winberry."

"Then he is between us?"

"Adrian Winberry is."

"Yes. I mean Adrian Winberry is between us; I am in the cell on one side of him and Skinner in the one on the other side."

"Just so."

"But how comes it that we are all here in one place? These ain't the condemned cells, are they?"

"Oh! no."

"Well, that's where Adrian and his two accomplices ought to be."

"I know that, captain. But you see there is some repairs going on in that portion of the prison where the condemned cells are situated, and so we thought they would be safest here. Why, these are about the strongest cells in all Newgate."

"I suppose so."

"Because you are put in one of them?"

Dick nodded.

The turnkeys laughed.

"They want to take care of you, captain."

"Well, perhaps they had better; and I should also advise them to keep a very sharp eye upon all Adrian's movements."

"You needn't fear; but, captain"——

"What?"

"We must bid you good-bye."

"Oh! don't go yet; let's have a little more of your company, for I hate to be alone. Don't go the moment you have finished your supper."

"We should like to stay, captain, uncommonly; only, as I told you before, juty is juty, and if we stay here much longer, we shall have the governor popping in upon us, and, of course, if that was to be the case, why, we should have an end put, very likely, to all future meetings."

"Then go, by all means. Don't let me be the means of getting you into trouble."

"I think we had better start at once, then, captain."

"Very well, then. I shall see you at breakfast time?"

"Oh! yes. What should you like?"

"Anything. I am not at all particular, so long as it's nice. I'll pay you for it when you bring it."

"All right, captain; you may depend upon us."

"Can't you leave me the light?" asked Dick, as the men rose preparatory to leaving the cell, and took their lanterns in their hands.

"It breaks my heart to refuse you, captain."

"Can't you do it?"

"If I do I shall sure to be found out."

"How?"

"Why, there's a hole over the top of the door, and the light would come through into the passage, and if Mr. Cawthorn was to see it, I should lose my place, for he is awful strict."

"Take it away, then," said Turpin. "Don't get yourselves into trouble upon my account, only if you could have left the light, why, of course, I should have liked to have it."

"I know you would, captain, but we can't do it."

"Well, good night, then. And don't forget a good breakfast in the morning."

"All right, captain. Good night."

"Good night," said Turpin, again.

The two turnkeys who had shown themselves to be thus friendly disposed towards him, left the cell, and closed the door after them.

Then Dick was left in profound darkness.

It seemed doubly so after the light he had had, for, though not a brilliant one, still it was amply sufficient to illuminate the dungeon.

He was left in solitude, too, and Dick was of a sociable disposition, fond of company, and one who did not like solitude for long together.

And when the reverberations raised by the footsteps of the turnkeys as they walked along the passage died away, he was left in the most profound silence.

He was then in solitude, in darkness, and silence.

Not a single object was discernible in his cell, save the small grated aperture high up in the wall, through which a glimpse of the night sky could be obtained.

Dick groped himself towards the bed, and threw himself down wearily upon it.

The fatigues and excitements which he had so recently passed through had their effects upon him, and though at first his thoughts were busy, yet he soon lapsed into a sound slumber.

CHAPTER CCCX.

DICK TURPIN IS VISITED IN HIS CELL BY BLANCHE WINBERRY AND MAUD GOULDMAN.

And so passed Dick Turpin's first night in Newgate.

To be sure it might have been much worse, for a prison is never a pleasant place for any one.

But, then, Dick was indulged in various ways.

He had supped as heartily and luxuriously as he could have wished to have done.

He was unfettered.

The bed upon which he lay was a hard one, but, then, he was used to inferior accommodation in that respect.

At any rate, he slept soundly enough, though his dreams were somewhat disturbed, being a distorted reflex of all the events which had recently occurred to him.

Daylight was streaming into his cell when he awoke, and he was able to have a better look at it than he was the night before.

It was built of huge blocks of masonry, clumped together at various places with bands of iron.

The window, or rather the hole which received that designatory appellation, was as high up in the wall as it could conveniently be put, considering the size of the cell.

It was very strongly barred. Indeed, so close were the pieces of iron put together, that a cat would have found it impossible to squeeze between them.

Nearly opposite this window was the door.

Dick's principal attention was given to this.

It seemed a miracle of strength and security.

The inner side was entirely covered over with sheet iron, and, where the pieces joined, they were lapped over for about a couple of inches, and then strongly riveted together.

Dick had heard how many daring spirits had succeeded in breaking out of Newgate, when their limbs were so loaded with fetters that they could scarcely walk, and he wondered however it had been done, or however the prisoner had had the heart to set about a task which presented so many apparently insuperable obstacles.

It might be that, at this moment, the thought occurred to him that he should have to owe escape from his cell to his own exertions alone.

He rose whether or not, and, going to the door, passed his hand over it, and endeavoured to shake it in its frame.

But he might just as well have tried to shake one of the massive stone walls.

He was quite as likely to succeed in one as the other.

This was his own opinion upon the subject as he paced up and down the cell.

It must have been early morning, for he could hear none of the officials astir.

The cell was very cold, and Dick's blood was chilled, but, after taking a few turns up and down, he succeeded in increasing its circulation.

He was thus engaged when he heard footsteps and voices in the corridor, and he came to the conclusion that his breakfast was about to make its appearance.

But he was disappointed.

He could hear the voices and footsteps, and he could hear the various cell doors in the corridor outside opened and closed.

At length they came to his, and the same turnkeys who had visited him the preceding night made their appearance.

One of them carried a large-sized tray covered with a beautiful white cloth, which was of itself quite appetising to look upon.

"Excuse us, captain," said the other, as he closed the door, "for keeping you so long; but the fact is, we thought we had better attend to the other cells first, so that we could come here last and wait upon you."

"All right," said Dick; "I am much obliged to you."

"What do you think of that, captain?" asked the other, as he removed the covering from the tray, and disclosed the tempting articles which were spread upon it.

"It's first-rate," said Dick, as he rubbed his hands. "Sit down, and we'll make an attack upon it."

The men did not require to be told twice, so they sat down and began their breakfast.

There was just the same profusion as there had been the preceding evening.

There were viands of all sorts, and drinkables of various kinds.

Among the latter was some hot coffee, then not so common a breakfast beverage as it is now.

Dick was chilly, so he drank heartily of it, and it soon had a beneficial effect upon him.

The turnkeys were as much inclined to be companionable and pleasant as they were upon the former occasion.

As before, Dick asked after Adrian Winberry.

"He don't look as if he had had such a good night as you," replied one of the turnkeys.

"I have had a pretty good night," said Dick, "but the place is so infernally cold."

"Ah! cold nights is coming on now," replied the janitor. "I shall expect to hear lots of complaints."

"I should think so, if the other cells are as cold as this one is."

"As cold, captain! why there's some as would freeze the breath as it came out of your mouth; this here is reckoned one of the warmest cells in the prison."

"Then I ought to esteem myself lucky?"

"You ought, captain, for take my word for it, you might be lodged very much worse than you are."

"I daresay; but come, you don't eat!"

"Thankee, captain, I am getting on pretty well; now do you like your breakfast?"

"It is first-rate, and I hope I shall have as good a one as long as I am here, which I hope won't be for long!"

"Now, don't say that, captain."

"Oh! no offence to you, you know, but you understand."

"Oh! yes, captain, we understands."

"Is the day fixed for Adrian Winberry's execution?"

"Well, the warrant hasn't been delivered, I don't think; but I daresay they will be tucked up on the usual day."

"Monday?"

"Yes."

"Then they have got a short time of it. Does he seem to feel his position at all?"

"Not that I can see. He looks just like a wild beast, as I told you before, and how could you expect a wild beast to feel his position?"

"Why, not very well."

"Of course not. But we must go again, captain. It grieves us to leave you, but the governor's so strict."

"He is awful," said his companion; "and if he was once to find us here so friendly with you, the first thing he would do would be to put us on some other duty."

"I should be sorry for that," said Dick; "so pray take every care of yourselves. I would do anything rather than you should get into trouble on my account."

"Oh! captain, you are one of the right sort. It's a thousand pities that ever you should be here; but I shall never forget you, no, not to the longest day I live."

With these words the turnkeys left the cell.

"They are disposed to be friendly to me," muttered Turpin, when they had closed the door, "and I will take care not to offend them. I have heard it said that it is the worst policy to offend any one, let them be ever so humble; and I shall make it my study to keep on good terms with my jailors, for I fully believe in the truth of the saying. The day may come when I shall be glad to avail myself of their assistance—who knows?"

Dick paced up and down the dungeon as he spoke.

"I wonder what sort of success the judge will meet with in his endeavours on my behalf? I fear he will find the authorities very obstinate, for I have made myself notorious, and, at the same time, brought them into bad repute. Well—well, I must wait my time. I am not so uncomfortable here as I expected I should be, and no harm can possibly arise if I remain and await the current of events.

"It will be dreary work, though. I am not used to being cooped up between four stone walls—on the contrary, I have ever loved to have the pure, open sky above me. And Bess—bonny Black Bess—my matchless mare, without whom Dick Turpin would have been nothing—how is it I have forgotten her? I wonder how she has fared lately? Well, doubtless, for the inmates of the Hall would, out of respect for the services I have done, attend to the wants of my steed."

If the reader will remember, upon the occasion of Dick's return to the Hall, which for distinction's sake, we may as well call Winberry Hall, he had delivered his mare Black Bess into the care of Shockley, the steward, who conducted her to the stables belonging to the mansion, whither Turpin himself followed him.

He had seen her carefully bestowed, and in addition gave the ostler a liberal gratuity.

So Dick did not feel much uneasiness and alarm respecting his mare.

He felt pretty sure she was safe and comfortable, and where his enemies would not think of looking for her.

Then Dick's thoughts, finding a rest here, travelled to his three companions.

"What a long time it is," he said, "since I parted from them. I wonder what vicissitudes they have had? Perhaps they are no more, and yet I can scarcely think that, for somehow or other, I have a presentiment that I shall see them soon. I wish they were here now, I should then feel more at ease than I do; and yet, what have I to fear? I must be still and bide my time.

"If they should return to England, how astounded they will be when they learn that I am here, and by my own free will, as I might say. They will recollect my oft-repeated words of preferring death to capture, and will wonder what has happened to cause me to alter my determination.

"They will never suspect, I fancy, for I will scarcely acknowledge it to myself. And yet why should I fill myself up with a hope that must, in the end, bring nothing but disappointment and despair? But I love her—I love her! I cannot help it. The feeling is one over which I have no control. I can arrest it by no effort of the will. I love her. I felt the change about my heart when I first looked into her face. But she is not for me, and never from my words or from my actions shall she glean the state of my affections towards her. I should be a baser villain than I am were I to do so. I can see she is possessed with a rare romantic spirit, which I cannot but think delightful, and which so well accords with my own.

"What a strange and romantic notion it was upon her part to seek me out, and yet how fortunate a circumstance it proved to be—if not for me, at least to those to whom Maud is endeared. Beautiful Maud, I love you—dearly, fondly, truly love you—but it is with that kind of adoration which one might pay to some dear object far, far above him, which it would be impossible for him to reach. I will be content with that distant worship.

"It is now that I regret that fate has made me what I am, and yet how can I help that. We are all creatures in the hands of destiny, and have our separate paths carved out. I was to be a highwayman, and a highwayman I am, and, I am free to say, a bolder one never took up his station upon heath or road.

"But oh! if I could blot out the past, not only from my own recollection, but the memory of all men! But why think of that? It is impossible, and therefore folly of me to do so.

"But if I cannot love Maud as I should wish to love her, if I cannot receive from her those sweet tokens of affection which would convert this life into Elysium, still I can be ever at hand unknown to her, watching over her, and shielding her from every peril with which she might be threatened. I will do that. I must be content with the lesser happiness which that will afford me.

"Yes, I will do it. I will be her guardian spirit, ever at hand to protect and shield her from all harm. Yes, that shall be the future occupation of my life; but no word to her, no sign even that would betray the secret of my heart."

Dick Turpin was much moved as he uttered these words, and something came into his eyes which made his vision dim and indistinct.

His voice grew husky, too, with emotion, and he struck his breast twice or thrice with his clenched hand, as though by that means he could subdue the agitation which tumulted beneath it.

Then he ceased his hasty walk, and sat down facing the grated window, upon the only movable seat there was in the place.

This was a rickety, rudely-fashioned chair.

How long he thus sat, with folded arms, gazing out upon the piece of sky which he could see through the grating, he knew not, but it must have been for some time, for the sun rose higher and higher in the heavens, and then declined towards the west, when a sunbeam found its way into the cell, and the excess of light caused him to turn his eyes away.

Then he became aware that he was about to receive an interruption.

The securements of the dungeon door were one by one undone, and then it was thrown open.

Dick had scarcely curiosity enough to turn towards the door, and look who it was that was about to enter.

He quite made up his mind that it was his jailors bringing his mid-day meal.

But he heard a voice which showed him that he was mistaken in this supposition.

It was the voice of Mr. Cawthorn, the governor of Newgate, that he heard.

"This way, if you please," he said, in the most deferential tones. "This way, if you please, ladies. Be careful of the step."

Then the governor made his appearance in the cell, ushering in some one who was as yet invisible.

When he heard the words he uttered, however, and the rustling of silk in the passage, a wild kind of hope sprang up in Dick's breast, which gave him so much delight that he could scarce contain himself.

The reader will no doubt understand his feelings.

Could it be possible that she who had become so dear to him—with whom his thoughts had been so long and busily engaged, and who was uppermost in his mind—could it be possible, he asked himself, and his heart beat rapidly as he did so, that she had remembered him, and had come to visit him in his lonesome prison-house.

Feverishly and eagerly Dick had risen to his feet.

He clenched the back of the chair upon which he had been sitting with his left hand, and, by tightening his grasp, strove to conquer his emotion.

With a burning gaze he looked towards the door, in order to ascertain whether his presentiments were true.

He was not kept long in suspense.

In reality it was not a moment, though to him it seemed ten times as long.

The governor had preceded the visitors along the passage by a few steps only, and in courtesy entered the cell first.

Dick's anticipations were not mistaken.

There was a light step, and he then saw standing before him Blanche Winberry and Maud Gouldman.

"A couple of visitors," said the governor, briefly, and, as he spoke, he left the cell.

With his senses in a whirl, and with the sound of her voice murmuring like sweet music in his ear, Dick Turpin, still keeping his hold upon the back of the chair, placed his right hand upon his heart, and bowed deeply and respectfully to his fair visitants.

Ere we relate what took place between them, we will go back a little and narrate the causes of their being there.

CHAPTER CCCXI.

BLANCHE WINBERRY MORE THAN SUSPECTS THE NATURE OF MAUD'S SECRET.

It was quite dark and late at night when Shockley, the steward, drew up at the door of Winberry Hall.

During the whole of their ride from London, Maud and Blanche had sat in the carriage in silence and in tears.

Scarcely a word passed between them during the whole of their journey; their hearts were too full to allow them to speak, although they had so much to communicate to each other.

Blanche especially was much cast down.

She had suffered greatly since her abduction, and in her own account of what happened to her she stated how, during the latter portion of the time, she had been upon the very verge of starvation.

And there is scarcely any instance when the body and mind suffers separately. Indeed, it may be asserted that there is no ailment of the body, however trifling, which does not produce corresponding and proportionate influence upon the mind.

Feebleness of body is always attended with feebleness of mind, and that is the reason why strong men, and Englishmen as a rule, are so strong in all their opinions and prejudices.

[CLAUDE DUVAL'S STRUGGLE WITH THE POLICE-OFFICER.]

Debilitated, then, to no ordinary degree, Blanche Winberry, as soon as her escape was accomplished, without resting scarcely a moment, undertook a fatiguing journey to the Hall, only to learn upon her arrival there all the disastrous and grievful events which had happened during her absence.

Distracted with grief and maddened with excitement, we have seen how she posted back to London, determined to make her way to the trial.

We have seen, too, how she forced her way into court at a most critical moment.

Then she had to go through the long and trying ordeal of an examination in the witness-box.

And not only that, but to proceed to the anteroom and identify the body of her murdered father.

Oh! it was terrible and soul-crushing.

What, except the deep love she had for her parent, and the sense of duty towards society, would have sustained her through that awful day?

Then came the terrible discovery that her lover was the son of her father's murderer!

And yet she was sustained. She seemed, indeed, endowed with a strength of mind that was absolutely superhuman.

Not once had she faltered, or wavered, or broken down, but had given her evidence clearly, straightforwardly, and truthfully.

Still she bore up, and then, last of all, there came that terrific scene of confusion in the courthouse, where the crowd made the frantic effort to rescue their favourite, Dick Turpin, from the clutches of the myrmidons of the law.

And so, when she got into the carriage, what matter for wonder is it that she at once gave way, and sank under her accumulated trials.

On her return home, however, she succeeded in somewhat composing herself.

But the hour was so late that they proceeded without delay to the sleeping-chamber they occupied in common, and had done from their earliest childhood.

Many days had elapsed since they last shared it, however, and this thought came to the minds of both of them as they threw themselves into each other's arms and indulged in a warm and affectionate embrace.

It was an antique room in which they stood, and well in keeping with the exterior of the hall, which was quaint and old fashioned.

The small hand-lamp they had brought with them had been placed upon the old broad mantle-shelf, in its accustomed position.

But the light which came from it was quite inadequate to illuminate the distant corners of the vast apartment, in which the dispersed darkness seemed to accumulate in large and weirdlike masses.

On this occasion, however, the light of the lamp was rendered more than usually useless, for a full moon that was shining brightly in a southern sky, her lustre undimmed by a single cloud, poured her rays full into the chamber, distinctly revealing the figures of the two young grief-stricken girls.

It was a very large-sized window, and filled with innumerable diamond-shaped panes.

Some of these were of uncoloured glass, while others were beautifully stained in many colours, and elaborately embellished.

And as the bright, pure, silvery beams of the moon passed through these, they acquired their tint, borrowing their colour from them, and fell with a beautiful effect upon the polished oak flooring of the chamber.

For a few moments the two lone creatures remained in that embrace, speechless and motionless.

Then Maud, making a great effort, raised her hand from Blanche's shoulder, and, passing her arm round her waist, said—

"Come, Blanche; we shall be calmer then."

It was evident the fair and beauteous girl understood what her companion meant, for, rousing herself slightly, she moved in the direction of the window.

Maud half-supported her.

It was a bow-window, one of that ancient make, so commodious and yet so pleasant.

The recess in it was as large as a small apartment, and all round, at a convenient height, was a broad, polished, oaken seat.

Upon the floor, and against that portion of the seat which was under the front part of the window, was a velvet cushion.

In the darkness and shadow it could not have been seen by any one save those who knew of its existence there

But Blanche and Maud did not look for it even. They knew its exact position, and so, upon reaching the window, with their arms still encircling each other's waists, they sank down on their knees upon it.

Then clasping their hands over their faces, and resting their arms upon the window-seat, they prayed silently and fervently.

It was a beautiful and touching spectacle to see these two young girls, so utterly alone as they were, thus prostrating themselves in adoration to and communion with their Creator.

As they knelt thus, the bright rays of the moon fell with full force and brilliancy upon them, revealing every outline of their features with a distinctness that was remarkable.

And so, in the silence of this vast and antique chamber, they knelt and prayed for aid and strength and assistance in their troubles to Him who alone could vouchsafe such blessings to them.

And the soothing beneficial of calm and holy prayer soon made itself manifest upon them.

After thus pouring out their souls in fond devotion, their hearts grew gradually lighter and their troubles less.

But still they knelt and prayed until they were perfectly composed.

Then, raising their heads, they once more threw their arms about each other's waists.

Now they found they were able to speak calmly, though very, very sadly over what had happened.

Blanche Winberry's lip quivered, and her voice trembled more than once, for her trials and sufferings were almost more than she could bear.

But she grew better after confiding them to her old playmate Maud.

The latter, however, could not forbear reproaching her for the secret she had kept so closely locked within her bosom, for, until she had heard her say as much in the court, Maud had no idea that Blanche had got a lover, with whom she had secret assignations.

"Forgive me, Maud," said Blanche, the tears ready to start from her eyes. "It is the only secret I have ever kept from you, and I have suffered enough for it. Oh! what an unhappy, wretched girl I am. What have I done to merit such a cruel fate?"

"Do not repine, Blanche, darling. There is One above who ordains all for the best, though we, afflicted with soul-blindness, cannot see it. I forgive you, Blanche, though it was unkind of you. But that is all past now."

Blanche let her head fall upon her companion's shoulder.

"Do not rise yet, Maud, but tell me all that has happened during my absence. Don't omit anything, however trifling; I shall feel more at ease then, for you cannot think how anxious I feel."

Maud complied with the request, for, being so strongly urged, she feared to refuse it.

But, as the reader is already acquainted with the whole of the particulars from first to last, it is not needful to set down at length all that Maud said.

But she dwelt greatly upon the nobleness of Dick's conduct in behaving in the manner he did, and drew such a picture of the celebrated highwayman, that, when she had done, Blanche felt scarcely a secondary interest in his welfare to Maud.

All that Dick had done, all that he had said, was elaborately described. From the way in which each incident was given, and none forgotten, it was evident how deep a root they had taken in her memory.

From the love she bore her father, Blanche felt grateful to this unknown man for the manner in which he had given his testimony in his behalf, and brought the guilty ones to justice, and when she learned the result of his noble self-sacrificing behaviour, she was filled with pity.

"Oh!" she cried, "he must not perish, he must be set free. My father had influence with the authorities, he was beloved and respected by them all, and doubtless they will listen to the supplications of his daughter."

"And shall you really interest yourself, and do the best you can towards obtaining his release from his imprisonment, dear Blanche?" said Maud, gently, as she pressed her companion more closely to her bosom.

"Certainly I will, for I feel that my duty, if not my sympathies, require it of me."

"Oh! I am so glad to hear you say that, Blanche, dear. I know you can do so much if you only try."

"How anxious you are. Do you desire his freedom so very much?"

"I do, indeed. Oh! Blanche, if you could but see him! He looks so noble and so handsome, and when he speaks it is so gently, and his voice sounds like music. And he looks so well, too. He is so strong and vigorous, and look as though he could protect any one. I don't believe any danger would daunt him, and"——

"Maud!" interrupted Blanche, raising her head, and striving to obtain a glimpse of her companion's face. "Maud, do you know what you are saying?"

Maud made no reply, but buried her countenance still deeper in her shoulder.

Blanche continued—

"Why, Maud, if you were to speak about any one else but a highwayman like that, I should think"——

"Think what?"

"That you were in love with him; but as it is, I know it is impossible that you could forget your dignity so far."

"You are right, Blanche," said Maud, with a sigh, "you are quite right. If he was anything but what he is I should love him; I could not help it, nor you could not help it if you were to see him and be with him as I have been. Oh! it is a thousand pities that one so gifted with noble qualities as he is, and with such a self-sacrificing spirit as he evidently possesses, and with so much single-mindedness, it is a thousand pities that he should ever be a highwayman."

"It is, Maud, darling," said Blanche, who was less romantic than her cousin; "but you must not let your feelings carry you too far. You must recollect what he is, although he has done us such a service, and he must be content if we show our gratitude by procuring his release."

"Oh! if we could but accomplish that!"

"You heard what the judge said?"

"I did."

"Well, then, let us try to rest, and in the morning when we rise, we will go to London and call upon this judge, and ask him what success he has met with, and inform him of our intention of interesting ourselves for him to the utmost."

"Will you do that, Blanche, dear?—will you do that?"

"Yes, certainly; but you must come to bed at once, and wait patiently until morning."

With a heart considerably lighter than she had had for many hours, Maud complied.

But she could not rest, let alone rest in patience.

Her mind was filled with the image of the highwayman who had made so deep an impression upon her heart.

In fact, although she denied it to her own heart, Maud loved him.

She strove to call in her reason to banish the idea—to conquer it.

But in vain.

She felt that she loved, and that without any power upon her part to prevent it.

But she resolved to keep a close guard upon her feelings.

Not for one moment did she dream of allowing her passion to become known. She determined to nurse it in silence.

Her pride, position, and dignity, all forbade her to be anything more to the bold highwayman than she then was.

But she would nourish his image in secret.

How she kept repeating to herself all through that weary night as she tossed restlessly upon her couch, that the object of her love had been anything but what he was.

She felt that if such had been the case, she could have permitted a little hope to have access to her heart, but now she was compelled to utterly preclude it.

Not for one moment did the thought occur to her that Dick's feelings were precisely similar to her own. It never once occurred to her mind to take that view of the case.

If she had done so, it is hard to say in what way she would have acted.

However, the morning came at length, and then she rose and carefully attired herself.

Blanche, too, although she scarcely felt herself equal to the task, rose and attired herself also, for she saw how Maud had set her heart upon her journey, and she had too much regard for her feelings to disappoint her if she could possibly help it.

But there was another cause for Maud rising so early as she did on that particular morning.

While lying awake, she all at once recollected that Turpin's mare Black Bess was at that moment, or, at all events, ought to be in the stables attached to the hall.

She was no stranger to the numberless wondrous deeds which were ascribed to the highwayman's steed.

She knew, too, how often she had been told that her rider was indebted solely to her exertions for his countless escapes from death and capture.

But, most of all, she was aware of the anxious consideration for the welfare of Black Bess which Turpin manifested during his stay at the hall. She remembered every eulogistic word which he had uttered respecting her, and how he attended to her wants with his own hand.

And Maud determined that, now that Turpin was imprisoned and incapable of performing all those little offices which he would have done if he had been free, she would take his place in that respect, and personally see that the noble animal was well cared for and allowed to want for nothing.

And it was after making this determination that she rose from her bed so early, having made up her mind to lose no time in carrying her resolve into execution.

Long, then, before Blanche was ready, she had dressed herself and, muttering some words of excuse, hastily descended the stairs.

CHAPTER CCCXII.

MAUD GOULDMAN AND BLANCHE WINBERRY SET OUT FOR LONDON, AND HAVE AN INTERVIEW WITH THE JUDGE.

ALTHOUGH the hour was such an early one, yet Maud found, when she went down, that the few domestics who were employed at the hall were all astir, and they greeted her with a kindly word, for Maud was universally liked by all the household for her unaffected and charming manner.

But hastening on, Maud passed out of the door in the rear of the hall, and crossed the large yard in the direction of the stables, which were built at some considerable distance from the residence.

The whole place was very familiar to Maud, for, being of so gentle a nature as she was, she was, of course, fond of animals. Above all, however, horses were her favourite pets, and in happy days past she had spent many an hour in the stables, feeding and caressing them.

Accordingly she made her way in a direct line to the stable door.

It was open, and the groom was there.

He touched his cap respectfully when he saw Maud.

The stables belonging to Winberry Hall were models of construction. They were light, high, and well ventilated, while each horse was allowed plenty of room in his stall.

Maud did not require to be told which was Black Bess. It was impossible for that noble creature to be confounded with any other. The elegant symmetry of her form, the sleekness of her skin, and the proud arching of her neck, and the flashing of her eye, all testified the excellence of her breed.

Without fear or hesitation, Maud walked up to the beautiful animal, and stroked and patted her on the neck.

Bess neighed, and evinced signs of pleasure and satisfaction. She was accustomed to the caresses of her master.

With her own hands, then, Maud fed her.

The groom looked on with a smile.

"That's a beautiful creature, miss," he said, respectfully.

"Beautiful, indeed. For my sake, Robert, I hope you will pay her every attention, and see that she wants for nothing. Her master is a friend of mine, and will be absent for a time. During the period, however, his steed will remain here, and I have promised to be responsible for its proper treatment until his return."

"You leave it to me, miss. I'll give you my word she shall go short of nothing. I have seen a good deal of horse flesh in my time, but that caps all of it. Do you say the owner of it was a friend of yours, miss?"

"Yes, Robert."

"Well, miss, if you hadn't have said that, do you know what I should have thought?"

"No."

"What I should have been ready to lay a wager about?"

"No."

"Why, that that was no other than Dick Turpin's celebrated mare, Black Bess."

"Black Bess?"

"Yes, that is the only steed I have ever heard of that could come up to this, but, of course, it can't be, because you say it belongs to a friend of yours."

"Exactly so, Robert; so don't let me hear any more such foolish gossip. I wonder what he would think if he knew his favourite steed was taken for a highwayman's!"

"Oh! no offence, miss. You will excuse me for making the remark, for do you know, at one time or other, feeling a good deal of interest in horses, I have heard such a lot about this Black Bess, and the wonderful things she has done, that I really thought to myself when I saw this mare, 'that is exactly what I picture Black Bess to be like,' and the funniest thing, too, is that she is all black, and, if you pat and stroke her and say 'Bess,' she really seems as though she knew what it meant, and that that was her name."

"Well, Robert, you quite surprise me. Now you speak of it, it does seem rather singular, but, Robert"——

"Yes, miss."

"I beg you will not say a word about this to any one, because, if it was to get to the ears of our guest, he would be highly offended, and I should be very sorry for that, because he is a particular friend of mine."

"All right, miss, I won't say a word. I shouldn't have mentioned it to you, only I thought it was so singular."

"Then, do not let that be a reason for your mentioning it to any one else."

"No, miss, I won't You can depend upon me."

"I will, Robert; and I trust you will prove yourself worthy to be depended upon. Above all," she added, "let me hear no more such remarks as you have made to me."

The groom touched his hat in silent acquiescence.

Maud then left the stable.

But, as soon as she had gone, Robert looked at Black Bess with a puzzled and dissatisfied air, as he muttered—

"Dang me if I can understand this here business. There's summut in it. I am sure there is summut in it. But dang me if I can find it out. However, mum's the word, since Miss Maud desires it."

On her part, Maud, when she got out of the stable, murmured in a low tone—

"Oh! what shall I do? He seems already to be suspected, and it will never do for him to come here and reclaim his mare, even if he succeeds in getting his freedom. Oh! what shall I do? I will see him, and tell him all that has taken place, and ask him for his advice."

With a look of the greatest anxiety upon her fair forehead, Maud entered the Hall.

Upon proceeding to the breakfast-room, she found Blanche already there awaiting her.

But she said not a word respecting the manner in which she had been engaged, and luckily Blanche was too much immersed in her own thoughts and griefs to make the inquiry, so she was spared the necessity of owning the truth or inventing any excuse.

There was much to occupy Blanche's mind.

Until that moment when the horrible disclosure was made, she had no idea how much she loved young Adrian Winberry.

Now, however, she felt that he was twined round her heart in such a manner that she could not tear him from it without destroying it.

She felt, nevertheless, that she could never be the bride of the son of her father's murderer, yet, at the same time, she was conscious that she could not be the bride of another.

His image was prominent in her mind before everything else, and though she strove to turn her thoughts to other subjects, she found, upon every occasion, that the effort was a vain one.

Breakfast was partaken of in almost perfect silence.

When it was over, Blanche summoned Shockley, and told him her destination.

"I have been the coachman before," he replied, "and perhaps I had better perform the part again."

"I should feel so much more at ease if you would, Shockley," said Blanche.

"I will, then, miss, and the carriage shall be at the front door as soon as ever it is possible for me to get it ready."

With these words on his lips, the faithful servitor withdrew from the presence of his young mistress.

By the time they were attired, Shockley was waiting.

Entering the carriage, they directed him to drive to Mr. Kersey's, in Red Lion-square.

Upon arriving here, they found the lawyer was not at home.

This was a disappointment, for they fully expected to learn from him the name and address of the judge who had promised to interest himself upon Dick Turpin's behalf.

However, undaunted by this, Blanche went to Newgate, and obtained the information she required from Mr. Cawthorne, the governor, who received her with the greatest civility, for it was always, in his opinion, good policy to be friendly with those whose friendship was worth having.

The name of the judge was Holycak, and his residence was situated in the Oxford-road.

To this place, then, Blanche directed Shockley to drive.

The hour was quite an early one when they arrived.

But, nevertheless, the inmates of the judge's house were all astir, and, upon sending in their names, an audience was immediately granted to them.

They were shown into a room plainly yet handsomely furnished.

The walls were lined with books, and the table in the centre of the apartment was covered with papers.

The judge rose from his seat, and politely placed chairs for his two visitors, then sat down and prepared himself to listen to what they had to say.

Without any preface or circumlocution, Blanche began to speak upon the subject which had brought him there.

"You doubtless recollect me, sir, do you not?" she asked.

"Yes," was the reply. "You appeared in the extraordinary trial which was brought to a conclusion yesterday, and announced yourself to be the daughter of the man whose murder we were then investigating."

"Precisely so," said Blanche, in a failing voice, for these words brought vividly back to her mind all the painful occurrences connected with the trial.

"And you, if I mistake not," continued the judge, indicating Maud Gouldman, "also gave important evidence at the commencement of the trial in question."

"I did, sir," she replied.

"Then may I inquire the nature of the business which has brought you here so early this morning?"

This question was more particularly addressed to Blanche, and she at once replied to it.

"I will tell you, sir, and in as few words as I possibly can. I am sure you recollect that during the trial a witness came forward, and, at the sacrifice of his own life and liberty, delivered his testimony."

The judge nodded.

"You allude to Dick Turpin," he said

"I do, sir, for I find that is who he is. He is quite a stranger to me, though my companion, Maud, singularly enough, encountered him, and one by one these things came out."

"The encounter was an accidental one?"

"Certainly."

"Well, I do not see that matters much just now, so, with your permission, we will waive that part of the question."

"I do not wish to take up any more of your time than I can possibly help. I was about to say that, being the only daughter of Mr. William Winberry, I cannot help feeling that, highwayman as he is, a deep debt of gratitude is due from me to him."

"I think so, too; for the evidence he gave was all important and conclusive. Had it not been for him, we should never have known the precise manner in which the deceased was murdered, nor so certain who were the guilty persons."

"You will see, then, sir, that I feel myself under a great obligation to him."

"Just so."

"And I am desirous of repaying it. Now, from your manner at the trial, and what I subsequently heard, you seemed inclined to intercede for him."

"I not only seemed inclined, but gave my word to exert all the influence which I possess, and when you entered, I was at that moment engaged upon the business."

"I am glad to hear so much, sir. Have you any hope that you will be successful in your efforts?"

"I have. In the first place, coming direct from me, the application will have great weight, and moreover, I know just how to put it into its proper channel."

"I trust you will succeed, sir," said Blanche, earnestly; "for if he was to perish in consequence of what he has done, it would be a source of the deepest grief to me, and therefore I had determined to question you upon the point, and ascertain your opinion whether he would be more likely to be released if I personally came forward in his favour?"

"What could you do?"

"My father was a man who had much influence in the city, and who was much respected by the greatest men who dwelt there, and so I thought that if I, as his daughter, presented myself before them, they could not refuse to listen to my supplications."

"They would listen to you, no doubt, but that, I am afraid, would be all you could accomplish. I am sorry to put a damp upon so laudatory an undertaking, but really I do not think that the amount of good you could effect would be of any importance, and most certainly would not recompense you for your trouble."

"My trouble, sir, I think nothing of."

"I am glad to hear you say as much. But I can put you in the way of doing Turpin more service than you could by your single exertions."

"Let me know what it is, sir, and judge of my sincerity by the readiness with which I promise to do it."

"I have here a petition addressed to the highest authority in the land, which I have had carefully drawn up. In it the whole of the circumstances are clearly and expressly stated, and the conduct of the highwayman throughout the course of the trial expressly dwelt upon. I have only just received the document from the hands of the person I instructed to prepare it, and have just finished perusing it. I consider it exceedingly well calculated to answer the purpose required. The deed is as yet unsignatured. Now, if you, the daughter of Mr. Winberry, would be the first to sign it, I think your name would have great effect in inducing others to sign it likewise."

"Do you, sir? then I will write my name at once, and Maud, too. She shall write her's as well."

The judge spread the petition out smoothly upon the table, and, giving Blanche a pen, directed her where to sign.

With trembling fingers she obeyed.

Maud came forward next, full of eagerness to do anything that would help the highwayman out of his present perilous situation.

With a firm hand she wrote her name immediately beneath that of Blanche.

"And you think," she said, "that we have done more good by signing our names there, than we could do if we were to attempt to get up a similar petition ourselves?"

"I do. Leave the affair in my hands, and you may depend upon my doing all that could possibly be done."

"I am much obliged to you, sir, and we shall rely upon you."

"Pray do so."

"But there is another favour I should like to ask of you," said Maud.

"Speak," replied the judge, "and, if it lies in my power, it shall be granted."

"Can you write an order that will allow us ingress to the prison, so that we can have an interview with Turpin?"

The judge was silent for a moment, and then he said:

"Your request seems a strange one. What is the motive for your visit?"

"Merely to thank him for what he has done, and assure him that we will do and are doing all we can for him."

"Such a motive as that is right enough, but, if I give you this order, pray do not, through any mistaken idea of kindness towards the prisoner, in any way abuse it. I mean, as to supplying him with tools, or in any way assisting him to make his escape."

"You may rely upon our doing nothing of the kind," said Maud, earnestly. "But do not refuse me the order for admission."

The judge seemed full of surprise at this request.

He hardly knew what to think of Maud.

However, as she had given him her word not to make any improper use of it, he could not well refuse, so he wrote an order to the desired effect.

Upon receiving it, the young girls again expressed their thanks for the trouble he had already taken, and thus the interview terminated.

CHAPTER CCCXIII.

DICK TURPIN'S INTERVIEW WITH BLANCHE WINBERRY AND MAUD GOULDMAN.

ARMED with this pass, Maud Gouldman felt ten times more happy than ever she had done in her life before.

Blanche and herself entered the carriage, and instructed Shockley to drive them direct to Newgate.

When Maud made the application to the judge for an order to visit the celebrated highwayman in Newgate, Blanche was completely taken by surprise.

She had no idea that her companion was about to prefer such a request, but when she made it of course she could not well step forward and interfere.

But she viewed the act with very great uneasiness, and she felt convinced that the suspicion which had dawned upon her mind on the preceding evening, that Maud felt a warmer interest in the highwayman than she ought to do, increased in consistency and strength.

"Maud!" she said, when the carriage had been set in motion.

"What, Blanche?"

"I had no idea that you were going to ask the judge for an order to visit this Turpin in Newgate."

"Had you not? I thought we had come to the resolution to do so last night."

"No, I cannot remember that a word was said about it."

"But surely you cannot be vexed at having the opportunity afforded you!"

"To see this highwayman?"

"Yes. Not to gratify any curiosity you might feel upon such a point, but to thank him as a daughter ought for all that he has done. You must remember he has sacrificed his liberty for you, if not his life; for I do not for a moment buoy myself up with the hope that the judge, influential though he may be, will secure for him a full pardon."

"What then?"

"He might save him from death; but if he does, it will only be for the lingering punishment of perpetual imprisonment."

"And is it possible he has done all this for my sake?"

"Yes; and yet not altogether for your sake, either. He has done it for the sake of justice, and in order that so base a villain as Adrian Winberry should not achieve a perfect triumph. He would have slain you, or something worse, and would have taken possession of the estates, had it not been for the intervention of this highwayman."

Blanche sighed.

"I am afraid it would have been so," she said.

"I am sure of it; but you see, by sacrificing himself he has prevented that, and surely it would not be too much for you to pay him a visit, and in person thank him for all that he has done on your behalf, and assure him of the exertions which are being made for his preservation."

"It seems you thought so."

"I did, and I thought as well that I ought to do just as I have done, and here we are before the walls of Newgate. Do not go against your inclination. Do you feel desirous of expressing your thanks?"

"Yes," said Blanche; "as we have the order we will make use of it."

At this moment Shockley appeared at the door of the carriage, and opened it.

The reader must not fall into the mistake of thinking that Blanche Winberry was unwilling to utter her thanks to the generous witness.

On the contrary, she would have done anything in order to obtain an interview with him, but it was Maud that made her hesitate and draw back.

She feared that an impression had been made upon the susceptible heart of the young girl, and she dreaded anything to take place which would tend to deepen it.

But now that she was at the grim portals of Newgate, and was authorised to pass through them, she thought she would avail herself of the chance afforded her, but at the same time determined that Maud should never pay another visit if she could possibly help it.

Accordingly, when Shockley held the door open, she alighted, but not until after Maud had done so.

Upon presenting the order, they were immediately admitted into the lobby of the prison, but were not permitted to go any further until Mr. Cawthorn was sent for.

The governor was not long in making his appearance.

He saluted them with the utmost respect, and upon the order being handed to him, he called a turnkey, and proceeded to escort the fair visitors to the cell himself.

We have seen how the governor led them in, and then retired. We have also seen how Turpin respectfully saluted them.

It is at this point that we resume.

By a great effort Dick regained possession of himself. With another and yet deeper bow he said—

"To what circumstance, ladies, may I attribute the honour of this visit?"

"You know us, I presume," said Blanche.

"I do, lady. You revealed yourself at the trial as the daughter of the unfortunate Mr. Winberry, and your companion I have already had the pleasure of seeing many times."

"You are correct, sir."

"Pray pardon me," said Dick. "I am a rough, rude man, and but little accustomed to the usages of polite society. The accommodation offered by this cell is slight, yet before this I should have asked you to be seated."

"Nay, never mind," replied Blanche; "we would rather stand. I have come here because I felt that I was under a deep obligation to you. The service you have rendered me is a great one, a very great one, and no words of mine would ever be sufficient to express my gratefulness for the chivalric manner in which you have acted."

"I need no thanks," said Dick, "though, at the same time, I cannot but feel pleased at hearing you express them. Still, at the same time, I feel deeply honoured to think that you should have sought out the highwayman in his cell to express your obligations to him."

"I cannot do so in words," continued Blanche, much struck with Turpin's gentlemanlike behaviour, "but I have chosen to do it in another way. I have just had an interview with the judge who presided at the trial. He is exerting himself immensely in your favour, and I have lent all the assistance in my power. If the object sought for is not achieved, it will not be from any negligence upon our part. I have great hopes myself, however, that this, so far from turning out an unlucky event for you, will prove a fortunate one."

"I sincerely thank you," said Dick, "sincerely thank you. Indeed, I cannot attempt to express my feelings. In this matter, although a highwayman, and with the hands of all men raised against me, yet I have merely acted in the manner which a sense of honour prompted me to act. I will not say, however, that I anticipated being made the inmate of this dungeon. My own conviction was that protection would be extended to me, and that I should at least be allowed a chance of my life."

"I should have expected the same thing, and yet, in one way, you have the chance you speak of. The representations of the judge, made as they will be in the proper quarter, cannot fail to have a great effect, and I trust that the end will be that you will be allowed to pass out of the portals of this prison a free man, and with nothing to fear as the consequence of your past deeds."

Dick shook his head.

"I should not like to buoy myself up with such a hope as that. I am afraid it would be expecting too much. Be under no apprehension, however, about my life. Until the result of what the judge is doing is known, I have given my word of honour not to make any attempt to escape. But, when that result is known, and it should be unfavourable to my life and liberty, I shall consider myself absolved from that promise, and, then, doubt not, I shall be free, for I have powerful friends outside the prison walls who are aware of my situation."

"I trust," said Blanche, "that you will be spared the necessity of calling upon them for aid, but that you will be set at liberty in a legitimate manner, and with the chance before you of beginning life afresh."

"I am deeply grateful for the good feeling which you manifest towards me. I am sorry that I was unable to prevent the consummation of the catastrophe which has plunged you into so much grief."

Blanche wept.

"Adrian Winberry is in the cell next to this," continued Dick. "Yonder stone wall is all that divides us from him. In the cell beyond is the villainous lawyer, Mr. Skinner."

"You seem to know a great deal about the interior of the prison, considering you have been for so short a time an inmate of it."

"My knowledge of it is more extensive than you would perhaps imagine. You will see that in less than twenty-four hours after I receive the intelligence that the judge has tried and failed, I shall be out of Newgate. But, now, I would not go if there was not a single obstacle interposed between me and liberty."

"And why not?"

"You will, perhaps, smile incredulously when I tell you the reason, but it is because I have given my word of honour not to escape, and at all hazards I shall certainly keep it."

These words were spoken in a tone of firm and unalterable decision, and without any boastfulness.

Blanche Winberry could not avoid being much struck with Turpin's manner, and unconsciously she repeated mentally the words which Maud had spoken on the preceding evening, namely, that it was a thousand pities he was a highwayman.

As for Maud, she had stood silently beside Blanche, drinking in every word Dick uttered, and dwelling upon every gesture and change of expression.

It was then she felt that love was a thing over which the mind had no control.

She loved this highwayman—she felt it—she knew it.

In vain she struggled against the feeling, and endeavoured to dismiss it as unworthy of her—it would come again and again.

And now Dick turned himself to her and spoke.

He wished to ask her a question and elicit a reply, in order that he might once more hear the tones of her voice.

"Lady," he said, "if you will remember when I set out with you to London I left my mare, Black Bess, in your stables; need I tell you that I prize her almost as dearly as I do my own life? I would not part with her for her weight in gold. While I am cooped up here a prisoner, would it be asking you too much to continue to grant her an asylum, and see that she wants for nothing? If you would, I should consider any obligation which you may feel yourself under to me more than repaid—indeed, I should think the obligation was on my side."

"I have already seen to her wants," replied Maud, quietly; "I thought by so doing I should be proving my gratitude for what you have done. I am not mistress at the hall, but yet I think I could take upon myself to promise that your request shall be granted; and that, so long as you wish, a safe asylum for your steed shall be found in the stables, where she shall have every attention. Am I right, Blanche?" she added, turning to her companion, "in promising this much?"

"You are, and I confirm it. I will make it my especial care to see that all her wants are supplied."

"Thanks—thanks!" ejaculated Turpin. "I wish I could say how very much I appreciate and feel this kindness! Now that I know my bonny mare—who has brought me in safety out of a thousand perils—is in safety, I shall care little for my incarceration, and await with patience the progress of events."

"Farewell, then," said Blanche, extending her hand—for the more she saw of the highwayman the more did her feelings change towards him. "Farewell! When next we meet, if we should ever do so, I trust I shall find you a free man."

Dick made no reply to this speech, but raised the hand proffered him respectfully to his lips.

Blanche drew it away with a slightly offended air, which Dick pretended not to notice by making a low bow.

Fain would Blanche have prevented Maud from taking her leave of the highwayman.

But just then it was out of her power to prevent it.

Timidly—with her heart fluttering so violently that she could only catch her breath by short and sudden gasps—with the colour mounting in her fair cheeks, Maud Goldman held out her hand to Dick in the same manner as Blanche had done, and, making a great effort, articulated the word "farewell."

As before, Dick took the small, fair hand that was held out to him between his own, and with an inclination of the most profound respect, touched the tips of the fingers with his lips.

As he did so, a thrill shot through both with the rapidity of an electric shock.

It as suddenly ceased.

Dick released the hand, but not without a slight pressure, which he could not prevent himself from giving.

Then, with his head still bent down, he murmured in a tone of deep seriousness—

"Farewell."

When he raised his head his visitors were gone.

The cell-door was closed.

Dick sank down upon the chair.

But, starting the moment afterwards to his feet, he paced up and down the cell with rapid strides.

This interview produced a great effect upon him, nor could he prevent its doing so, or banish it from his mind.

By the quick motion up and down the cell, however, he succeeded, after a time, in subduing his agitation.

He was interrupted by the appearance of his jailors, and, though he strove to conceal from them all traces of his emotion, yet they did not fail to perceive that something had taken place which had moved him much.

But, by a forced hilarity, Dick strove to disguise his sadness.

"I have got a piece of news for you, captain," said one, at length, when dinner was over.

"Indeed—what is it?"

"The warrants have arrived."

"Well?"

"The condemned are to suffer on Monday morning."

"All three?"

"Yes. Adrian Winberry, John Norman, and Richard Sare, are all three to be executed at Tyburn on Monday morning."

"But Norman and Sare expected a respite."

"Yes, I think they did, but it has not been granted them. I saw the execution warrants myself."

"To-day is Friday, is it not?"

"Yes."

Dick dropped off into a fit of musing.

Finding themselves unable to arouse him from it, the two jailors left the cell.

And so the day passed away—a long weary day it seemed to Dick. He fancied night would never come.

But if the time appeared to pass slowly to him, there were those to whom it seemed to pass by with lightning-like rapidity.

Those were the three men condemned to death.

They had so few hours to live that they were easily numbered.

Norman and Sare were utterly prostrated.

They had filled themselves with the hope that, after making a confession as they did, the capital sentence would be commuted.

But now that that hope had proved to be utterly fallacious, they had given themselves up to the most abandoned grief.

They wept, they shrieked, they implored for mercy, but to no avail.

With Adrian the case was different.

He knew he had no hope to expect, and, therefore, after the reception of the warrant, his demeanour underwent no alteration.

CHAPTER CCCXIV.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN REACH THE WHITE HORSE IN DRURY-LANE, AND TOM KING ANNOUNCES HIS INTENTION OF RETURNING THE COMPLIMENT TO DICK TURPIN, WHEN THE OFFICERS MAKE A SUDDEN ATTACK UPON THE INN.

The landlord of the public-house at which Tom King and his comrades had learned such important information respecting Dick Turpin, looked after the highwaymen with deep indignation, until a turn in the road hid them from his sight.

"Don't tell anything, indeed," he muttered, wrathfully. "I wonder what I could tell, if I was a mind to try?"

In the meantime our friends continued on their way to London.

"What are we to think of this?" said Tom King.

"Dick Turpin in Newgate!"

"I can scarcely believe that such a thing is true.

"Nor I, Claude," rejoined Tom King. "You know how often he said he would never yield himself up a prisoner, but that he would rather die a thousand deaths."

"Oh! yes, he always declared that."

"He did; and yet we are told he is there. Well, it is no good for us to speculate upon it, because we should be sure not to get at the truth. The best thing we can do is to push on for London at full speed, and learn all we can as quickly as possible."

"That is the plan, Tom. But whereabouts shall you go?"

"Why, to old Matthew's in Drury-lane. We are sure to hear tidings of him there."

"Of course we are," said Claude. "I had forgotten all about him."

"You would not have done so if you had known him as long as I have. He is a real friend, and no mistake."

"Then, let us make our way there at full speed, for, if Dick is in Newgate, why, of course, we must get him out."

"Of course we must; but it is no good our trying to do that until we have learned the full particulars."

"Forward, then. The sooner we reach Drury-lane the better."

This was an opinion in which all three unanimously acquiesced, so they urged their horses forward with all the speed they possibly could.

It was growing dusk when all three pulled up in Vere-street, Lincoln's-inn Fields.

It was Tom King who set the example, and the others immediately followed it.

"I think we had better not go any further on horseback," he said.

"Why not?"

"We shall attract so much attention, and that is what we ought to avoid, if possible."

"Certainly."

"I propose, then, that we alight here, and give our horses in charge of some one or other."

"What shall we do with them eventually?"

"Why, when we get to old Matthew's, I will tell him, and then he will send some one to fetch them, by which all suspicion will be avoided."

"So it will, that is a capital idea."

The three highwaymen immediately alighted from their steeds.

It was not long before they found a man who was quite willing to take charge of their horses for a little while.

Then, singly and on foot, they made their way up White Horse-yard.

Tom King went first, taking care to reconnoitre.

But he saw nothing suspicious, so, in a bold and confident manner, he crossed the threshold of the old inn.

The place seemed, for a wonder, to be quite void of customers.

Tom knew every part of the building well, so he walked down the passage to the door leading into the bar, which we are sure the reader will remember.

To reach this of course he had to pass the bar window, where the customers were served.

As he stepped swiftly by, he saw old Matthew ensconced in the depths of a huge arm-chair.

Without making any more noise than he could avoid, Tom turned the handle of the door and entered.

Old Matthew was sound asleep.

There was a chair just opposite to where he sat, so Tom silently sank into it, intent on giving the worthy landlord a slight surprise.

Having composed himself to his satisfaction, he took a tobacco-pipe which was standing against the grate, and made one end of it rather warm by putting it between the bars.

Then he touched Matthew upon the back of his hand.

The effect was electrical.

Old Matthew uttered a shout, and opened his eyes.

Then he closed them again, for he thought he must be dreaming.

But upon opening them once more, he saw, still in the same position, Tom King.

Before he could recover from his surprise or utter an ejaculation, another figure glided in.

That was Sixteen-String Jack.

The landlord rose to his feet just as another form entered.

That was Claude Duval.

"Bless my life, gentlemen!" he said, at length, "what can be the meaning of this?"

"Do you know us?"

"Know you? ask me if I know Drury-lane from any other street in London. But you mustn't stop here and be seen. Come in—come in!"

He opened the inner door as he spoke, and ushered the three highwaymen into the private parlour, which no one was allowed to enter without his permission.

He placed seats for all, including himself, and then put a number of bottles and tankards and glasses upon the table, so that they could partake of whatever they thought proper.

"Then, as he deposited himself in a chair, he said—

"Now, pray do not keep me in suspense a moment!

longer, but tell me, what brings you all three here? Why, do you know I had quite given up all hopes of ever seeing you any more."

"It's a long time since we met, certainly," said Tom King, "but I am very glad we have met once again."

"So am I. Come, now, stand upon no ceremony. When you are here, you are at home. Pour out for yourselves, and drink just as much as ever you like."

"Thanks, Matthew. You are a real good sort, you are, but there is something we want you to do for us at once."

"What is it?"

"Why, we came here on horseback, but we thought if we all three rode up to the door, we should attract a good deal of attention, so we alighted in Vere-street, and got a man there to take charge of the horses until we sent for them."

"And very wise of you. I can tell you, it was a lucky thing for all of us that you had so much thought."

"Why, is there anything particular the matter?"

"No, only lately you would not believe what a close watch the police have kept upon this house. They have rushed in once or twice, but they were not clever enough to find anything."

"I suppose not, Matthew. It strikes me you are more than a match for all the Bow-street officers in London, if you only feel inclined."

"They did not find anything," added the landlord, "because there was nothing."

"Oh! indeed. But come, send for the horses."

"I will at once."

"I suppose you can find room for them?"

"Oh! yes."

"That is all right, then."

Old Matthew left the room for a few minutes, but he quickly returned.

"I have put that matter all right," he said. "I wish I could manage everything as easy. Now, then, tell me what brings you here? Where have you been? What have you been doing?"

"Well, that would be a long story to tell."

"So much the better."

"We can't stop to tell it."

"But you must."

"I tell you we can't."

"Why not?"

"Because time is too precious for us to waste a moment of it."

"What is the matter, then?"

"Dick Turpin."

"Oh! ah!"

"He is in Newgate."

"So I have heard."

"Is it really true?"

"It is, indeed, I am sorry to say."

"But how did it come about? He always said he would never yield himself a prisoner."

"I know he did."

"But what induced him to alter his mind?"

"I don't know all the particulars, but all I do know you shall very quickly be made acquainted with."

"Go on, then, we are burning to hear it."

"I have a good mind not."

"Why?"

"Because you would not satisfy my curiosity with respect to your adventures."

"You shall have them in full, never fear, but not until you have told us all about Dick."

"I will tell you all I know."

"Do so, then."

Old Matthew then proceeded to give an outline of what had taken place at the trial.

He did not know all the circumstances, but he was pretty well acquainted with all that had taken place at the Old Bailey.

The three highwaymen were filled with admiration when they heard of the noble manner in which Dick Turpin had come forward to give his evidence, and proportionably indignant when they learned the judge had refused to hold out any protection to him, and prevent him being taken prisoner.

They heard of the riot which had ensued with feelings of greater satisfaction.

But that Turpin had been actually locked up in a cell after all, they thought was incredible in the extreme.

Old Matthew, however, took care to inform them of the words which the judge had uttered, and the promise he had made to interest himself on Dick's behalf.

But to this the highwaymen attached less importance than they really ought to have done.

They had no faith in judges being their friends.

"And so Dick is still in Newgate?" he said.

"He is."

"Have you seen him?"

"No."

"Have you tried?"

"Of course I have. I went to the door of the prison as soon as I heard the news, but they would not let me see him. They knew me, and turned me away."

"Oh! indeed!"

"Yes. What could I do?"

"Nothing."

"Just so. But I heard a bit of news which filled me with surprise."

"What is it?"

"Why, the judge succeeded in gammoning Dick into making a promise that he would not attempt to escape."

"Bah!"

"It's a fact. The judge promised in return that he would do all in his power to procure his release—he was so pleased with his conduct at the trial."

"Well, there might be something in that, but I don't like it."

"Nor I."

"Well, then, Matthew, what is to be done?"

"That is just what I want to know."

"Of course we can't let him stay in Newgate?"

"Certainly not."

"Then we must get him out."

"I am afraid that will be a thing very difficult to accomplish."

"It won't be very easy, that's certain."

"No, it won't; and I don't think the judge will do much good, for Dick has balked the authorities so long, and has played such a desperate game with them, that now they have once got him into their clutches, they won't be very willing to let him go again."

"That is precisely my opinion."

"I'll tell you what it is," said Tom King. "Dick is in Newgate, and we must get him out. You don't dispute that, do you?"

"No."

"Very well, then. It is no good for us to attempt to do anything tending that way without establishing a means of communication with him of some sort or other."

"But, how is that to be done?"

"I have an idea."

"What is it?"

"I will tell you. Do you recollect when I was in Newgate?"

"Yes, very well."

"Dick came to the prison and paid me a visit."

"And nearly got nabbed."

"Never mind, he escaped."

"He did, that's true."

"'Well,' said he to me, 'you will never have to return the compliment, for I intend to die before ever I am taken prisoner; consequently, I can never become a live tenant of Newgate.'"

"He said that, did he?"

"He did."

"I have heard him speak to the like effect myself."

"Listen. Now it seems I am in a position to return him the compliment, though he never thought I should be."

"But you don't intend to do so?"

"I do; and I have got a capital scheme in my head."

"To see Dick?"

"Yes."

"Then let us hear it at once."

"I intend——"

Tom suddenly ceased.

"What's that?" he asked.

Old Matthew sprang to his feet.

"Quietly," he said. "Don't move or make a noise. It may be nothing after all."

The others followed his example, and rose.

The noise which had interrupted Tom King in what he was about to say, was the trampling of feet and the cries of voices, and as these sounds continued old Matthew drew a couple of bolts at the top and bottom of the door.

Scarcely had he done so than some heavy blows were struck upon it, and a commanding voice shouted, in a loud tone:

"Open the door, in the king's name!"

Then, without waiting sufficient time to know whether the order would be obeyed, a vigorous attack was made upon the door, which soon began to show signs of giving way before the blows which were rained upon it.

"The officers have made another attack," said old Matthew.

"Confound them! what a nuisance they are."

"What shall we do?"

"I am afraid they know you are here."

"What then?"

"It makes the chance of hiding you all the more difficult."

"I know that, but what shall we do? If you are not quick, they will have the door down."

And this looked very likely indeed, for it was giving way in all directions—it never having been intended to withstand such an attack as that which was now made upon it.

"I vote we give them pepper!" said Claude, and, as he spoke, he went to the fire-place, and very deliberately took up the poker.

Armed with this formidable weapon, he made his way to the door.

He reached it at an opportune moment.

CHAPTER CCCXV.

THE POLICE-OFFICERS MAKE AN ATTACK UPON THE HIGHWAYMEN AT THE "WHITE HORSE" INN IN DRURY-LANE.

One of the officers who were outside had succeeded in partially forcing his way through the door, in spite of the efforts which Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack made to prevent him.

To swing the poker round his head was, to Claude Duval, the work of a second only.

He brought it down with full force upon the shoulder of the officer which was plainly visible between the door and the doorpost.

The man uttered a howl of agony as he felt the weight of the crushing blow which Claude inflicted, and he made a desperate effort to withdraw himself from the dangerous position which he had taken upon himself to occupy.

He was induced to make a second effort ten times more desperate than the first, by another blow which Claude administered with the poker.

This time he succeeded in withdrawing himself, and the door was again closed as well as the dilapidated condition of the fastenings would permit it to be.

But a voice was now heard to cry—

"Fire, my men—fire! Give them one volley through the door, and then follow me, and down with it."

A rattling noise followed this order, which filled our friends with no little dismay.

"Stand aside," cried old Matthew in a low voice, and yet loud enough to be plainly heard by our friends, "stand aside, all, or you will be injured by the bullets."

The caution came just in time, for at that moment there came a loud report of firearms, with which the sound of crushing wood, as the bullets made their way through the door, was mingled.

But when old Matthew spoke it was the easiest matter conceivable to step on one side so as to be out of the range of the shots, and our friends, therefore, escaped without the least injury happening to them.

There could be no doubt, however, about the officers being fully in earnest in what they were about.

And here let us give a word of explanation.

It is ever our wish to avoid mystery. It is not to that which we look for interest, and therefore we do not attempt to preserve it. No circumstance is intentionally left unexplained to the reader.

During the conversation which he had had with the three highwaymen a few minutes before, old Matthew had stated that of late he had been much troubled with the police.

And this was the fact.

Old Wriggles was aware that Matthew was a firm friend to all the family generally, and to hightobymen in particular, and that this was well-known among the classes referred to was quite certain.

That astute, or, as they say now-a-days, intelligent officer, determined to keep close watch upon the "White Horse," and make periodical incursions into it whenever anything of a sufficiently suspicious nature occurred to justify him in doing so.

But hitherto old Matthew had been a match for him.

It might have been that he really had no one concealed on his premises, but whether that was so or not, he put on an appearance of great candour, and placed his house at their disposal for them to search it as they thought proper.

At present, then, no good had been achieved by the officers in these attacks.

But they had had no precise information.

Now the case was different.

Undaunted by the numerous repulses they had met with, and the unsuccess which they had hitherto had, the officers, under the direction of Mr. Wriggles, still maintained their watch.

And what was it they expected to find?

Dick Turpin had been seen in London, and had been captured.

His three inevitable companions, they argued, were somewhere not very far off.

Where so likely a spot to look for them as the "White Horse" Inn, the landlord of which had to their knowledge on more than one occasion signally befriended them?

This was the reason, then, why the watch was kept, and why old Matthew had been so much troubled.

We have now to account for the present attack.

Our friends certainly acted very wisely in coming to a halt in Vere-street, Lincoln's-inn Fields, instead of proceeding on horseback direct to White Horse-yard.

If they had done so, they would inevitably have been captured, for the officers were even then upon the watch. Luckily, however, this was avoided.

By going on foot as they had, and taking such precautions to reconnoitre, they had entered without being perceived by their enemies.

But our friends had been seen when they alighted from the horses, although they were not aware of that unpleasant fact.

It was an officer who saw them, but, like a prudent man, he affected to take no notice, and when the highwaymen bent their steps towards Drury-lane, he made no attempt to follow them.

He contented himself with keeping a sharp eye on the cattle, the owners of which were not, he was sure, going very far away.

His watching was soon rewarded.

Presently a man came who had been dispatched by old Matthew upon that especial errand to fetch the horses.

Cautiously, then, this officer followed the horses, until he saw them housed in the stables at the rear of the "White Horse."

Then, convinced there was no more to be seen at present, he made his observations known to Mr. Wriggles, who at once resolved upon what he should do.

He would attack the inn so vigorously and rapidly that no chance should be given either for concealment or escape.

He had little or no doubt in his mind that the three daring highwaymen of whom he had so long been in search, and who had given him such a deal of trouble, were at that moment under the roof of the inn.

He sent off then for reinforcements, and surrounded the inn as well as the number of his men would allow him.

Then, placing himself at the head of the remainder, he rushed in.

We have already detailed the commencement of the attack, and described the success he met with.

The position of our friends certainly looked critical in the extreme.

But we have faith in old Matthew, and are not void of the hope that somehow or other he will be able to trick the officers.

At any rate, owing to his timely warning, they escaped all injury from the volley with which Mr. Wriggles thought fit to favour them.

But before the din of the explosion was well out of their ears, he beckoned to the highwaymen to leave the position they then occupied, and follow him across the apartment.

Of course they did this quickly and willingly enough.

At that very moment Mr. Wriggles and his officers dashed vigorously against the door.

Matthew did not speak, but having reached one side of the room, he opened a door, of the existence of which our friends were utterly in ignorance.

And so they would have been if they had been in that room a thousand times oftener than they had.

It was invisible.

We will describe how this was.

The parlour behind the bar of the "White Horse" was papered with a rather gorgeous complicated patterned paper.

There were curious curves and scrolls upon it, and huge bunches of flowers of variegated hues.

In one of the darkest corners of the parlour was the door we speak of.

But there were neither fastenings nor hinges visible.

It was covered with the paper, and presented a level unbroken surface with it.

The crevice, too, which one would have thought would have marked the shape of the door, was invisible.

The eye running round it failed to detect anything of the kind.

How was this?

It was simple enough.

The shape of the door had been cut to correspond with the extraordinary pattern of the paper referred to.

If the paper took a capricious curve, the shape of the door followed it.

Then in these curves one portion was shaded very deeply, so that, when the door was closed, it would have taken a sharp eye to have discovered it.

The darkest and obscurest corner had been chosen for it, and the back of the door had been lined with some substance which would have caused the wood to emit a dull sound like brickwork when struck, so that it would stand the ordeal of the most usual tests applied for the discovery of secret doors, namely, to strike the walls with the butt-end of a pistol, and listen for a hollow sound.

But, as the reader may suppose, the highwaymen did not have much time afforded them to examine this door

A dark recess was disclosed by it.

Old Matthew spoke hurriedly.

"This is the best I can do for you this time. Make haste! Get in there, and I will shut the door."

"But——"

"Never mind. Listen! You will be able to hear all that passes. If you find this hiding-place is in imminent danger of discovery, you must quit it."

"But how?"

"I will tell you as rapidly as possible if you will not interrupt me. At the back of you is a door which you can open easily enough; it leads into the yard. Here you will see another door; that leads you into White Horse-yard. But don't leave this place of concealment without you find it positively necessary."

The three highwaymen instantly gave their promise to comply with the instructions given by the landlord.

No sooner had they done so, and squeezed themselves into the cupboard—for the recess looked more like that than anything else—than old Matthew closed the door, which fastened with a spring.

He had evidently a particular course of action marked out to perform, for he seized the poker which Claude Duval had used to such good advantage, and stood with it in his hand in an attitude of defence.

In the meantime, Mr. Wriggles and his men had made a second rush against the bar door, flinging their bodies against it with all the force they were capable of.

This second rush was effectual, so far as the demolition of the door went, for down it fell and the officers with it.

But springing to their feet, they rushed forward to the attack, when to their surprise, they found there was no one to confront them but old Matthew, the landlord, who, however, held up the poker in a menacing manner, and looked as though he had fully made up his mind to defend himself if attacked.

Panting for breath—his eyes flashing fire—and his usually red face now of a purplish-black hue — Mr. Wriggles, pistol in hand, rushed into the little parlour with his men.

Old Matthew, preserving upon his countenance an expression of perfect calmness, retreated a step or two towards the fire-place as the officers advanced.

That these worthies had fully made up their minds that the persons they sought were in this parlour was fully proved by their looks of disappointment and rage when they saw that old Matthew was the sole inmate of it.

By an effort, Mr. Wriggles commanded his voice and spoke.

But it was in a gasping, jerking sort of way that the words were uttered.

"Wh—what's—the—m—meaning of this?"

"I think I am the proper person to ask that question," said Matthew, coolly, "and you the proper person to reply to it."

"Th—that won't do."

"I shall try, at any rate."

"Do you mean to say you have not had three highwaymen in here, and that you have hidden them somewhere?"

"Yes, I do."

"Who attacked us, then?"

"You attacked me."

"Pho—pho. One of my men has had his shoulder-bone smashed with a blow from a poker."

"And here is the poker," replied old Matthew, still with the same calmness, and holding up the article mentioned as he spoke.

"But where is the man who used it?"

"Here he is."

"You?"

"Yes, I."

"By what right did you use it?"

"The right which every man has to defend his own house."

"Pho—pho—nonsense. That won't do. You knew we were police."

"No I didn't. You broke in here like thieves, and without saying a word to anybody, tried to break the door down. Of course, I defended myself. I should not have been a man if I had not. Then you must fire a volley of bullets through the door, and smash it down completely."

"Where are the highwaymen? They are here. I have evidence of that. You have hidden them."

"I tell you what it is, Mr. Officer. You have got a spite against me, that's the long and the short of the matter. But I'll see whether there's any law in the land, or whether there's not. I am a patient, easy-tempered man, or else I shouldn't have put up with this sort of thing so long as I have, but I don't intend to put up with it any longer. You have made a dead set at me, but I don't know for what reason. I never did you any harm that I know of, and I don't believe I ever have done you any. But I should just like to know what harm you have done me. You have taken away my character as a respectable publican and you have quite ruined my trade, for who would ever think of going into a house which was continually watched by the police, and where they were liable to be pounced upon at any moment? Why no one, of course, and yet that is just the state of things here."

"Hold your row," said Mr. Wriggles, at length succeeding in stemming the current of the landlord's eloquence. "Hold your row. We don't want none of that gaff. We know our birds are here, and we means to have them."

"Take them, then."

"We shall."

"You'll get yourself into trouble. Here was I sitting quietly in my private room—mark that, if you please—private room—I say, here was I sitting in my private room——"

"Oh! d—n your private room," yelled Wriggles, in a rage. "D—n your private room, and you and all."

"Oh! just as you like, but I say you broke in all at once like a parcel of thieves, so, of course, I stood up and defended myself. And that's the truth of the matter."

"Don't pay any attention to him," cried Wriggles. "Search the house, my men, from top to bottom, and, if he obstructs you, I give you my authority to take him into custody. I will take the responsibility of that upon myself."

CHAPTER CCCXVI.

MR. WRIGGLES FINDS OLD MATTHEW RATHER MORE THAN A MATCH FOR HIM.

FROM their well-contrived place of concealment our friends could hear with perfect distinctness every word uttered, and they could not help feeling mightily amused when they heard old Matthew give vent to his well-acted indignation.

Finding that so far they were menaced with no particular danger, they remained perfectly still, fearful of betraying their hiding-place by making the slightest movement.

But the reader can without doubt imagine to some extent the anxiety which they experienced, and the eagerness with which they listened to what was going forward.

After the order had been given to take him into custody, old Matthew assumed a deeply injured air.

He seated himself in the chair by the fireside, the back of which was turned to the secret door.

Then looking the officers in the face, he said—

"Now, gentlemen, here I am, quite powerless. Be good enough to finish knocking my house to pieces. You have begun it very nicely. There lies one door, burst from its hinges and riddled with bullets. Go on, gentlemen, and knock the house down!"

"If we do," said Wriggles, "you will have no one to blame but yourself."

"How do you make that out?"

"You know how I make it out, without asking me."

"No, I don't."

"You do, I say."

"Tell me how I am to blame for you knocking my house to pieces and ruining my trade. Just answer me that."

"Why, as everybody knows, your house is the most notorious resort for highwaymen and 'family' men of all descriptions in all London."

"Who says so?"

"I say it."

"I know you do."

"That is enough, then."

"No, it isn't."

'What more do you want?"

"Prove it."

"Prove it?"

"Yes, prove it, Mr. Wriggles. What authority have you for making such a statement? Have you ever found any highwaymen or 'family' men in my house? Just answer me that."

And as he spoke, the landlord stamped his foot upon the hearth, and in the act caused the arm-chair in which he was sitting to run back upon its castors until the back touched that part of the parlour wall where the secret door was placed.

He thought he was putting at least one more barrier between our friends and the officers.

Mr. Wriggles evidently did not see anything suspicious in the movement, for he went on in reply to old Matthew Gale's remarks.

"You have always been one too many for us, Mr. Gale. I know we have never found any one we wanted in your house, but that is only owing to your superior cunning. But we have seen people who were wanted enter your house, and never come out again."

"Don't talk nonsense."

"Nonsense?"

"Yes. There isn't one of the whole 'family' in London who does not know how sharp a watch is kept upon this place by your police, and do you think they are such fools as to enter it?"

"Well, let that be as it will, I have the clearest proof that three well-known highwaymen, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack, entered this public-house not half-an-hour ago. Now I know very well they have not left it, because the inn is well surrounded. Consequently they must be here."

"Find them, then."

"I daresay you think you can defy us to do that without feeling uneasy. Come, landlord, don't be a fool. You know the men we want, and you know they are here; and, what's more, you know a good reward is offered for their apprehension. Now, I'll make you an offer."

"What is it?"

"I know the men are here."

Matthew shrugged his shoulders.

"You seem to have got that idea pretty firmly fixed in your head."

"I have. Very well, then; produce those men. Give them up to me, and I will guarantee that you shan't get into any trouble through their being found in your house; and, what's more, you shall share the reward upon the same terms as the rest."

Matthew heaved a deep sigh.

"I wish I could," he said, "that's all. But the thing's impossible. If they were here, however, I would give them up in a moment upon such advantageous terms being offered me."

And this was said with an air of so much apparent sincerity, that the officer would have been completely deceived by it if he had not known old Matthew as well as he did.

But Mr. Wriggles was not deceived.

He merely put his finger in a waggish manner by the side of his nose, and looked as cunning as he possibly could.

"Won't do," he said, "won't do. Now, Matthew, do, for your own sake, think over the offer I have made you. I know the men I want are in this house, although you have denied it before so many witnesses. Now I will find them, if I have to pull the 'White Horse' down brick by brick, and when I do find them, why, of course, I need not tell you you will be placed in a very awkward position indeed."

There was no one better aware of this fact than old Matthew himself, but still that did not have the least influence upon him.

He would not have betrayed our friends, even if his life was at stake.

But he spoke to the officer.

"Mr. Wriggles," he said.

"What? Have you thought better of it?"

"Better of what?"

"You know of what. Do you agree to accept my offer?"

"I tell you, I only wish I could, but I desire you will listen to me for a moment, and I will tell you something that will benefit you."

"What is it? You see I am in no hurry, because my precautions are so well taken that a mouse could not get out of this place without being seen by some one."

"Very well. Such being the case, take it easy."

"What were you about to say?"

"Oh! I forgot. You have been kind enough to picture what would be the consequences to me if those you seek are found concealed on my premises."

"Yes."

"Well, you say you have seen them enter, and use that as an excuse for having acted in the way you have. Now, if you fail to find them, or make good your accusation, you shall suffer for it if it costs me all my savings to make you. I am tired of this sort of thing, and am resolved to have an end put to it."

"Very well — very well," said Mr. Wriggles, in a cracked tone of voice, and with an uneasy sensation about his heart. "We have wasted time enough, my men. Now, then, to business. Search this apartment thoroughly. Don't leave a corner unexamined, and we will serve all the house just the same."

"You are quite at liberty to do so, gentlemen," said old Matthew; "only I warn you, Mr. Wriggles, of what will be the consequences of your failing in your object."

"I'll chance that. Now, my men. About it."

The police-officers dispersed themselves about the parlour, and peeped under the different articles of furniture, without, of course, discovering anything.

At length they were satisfied they had pried into every corner.

During the search old Matthew preserved his equanimity in a most admirable manner.

He had retained his seat in the arm-chair, never offering to move an inch, and narrowly watching every movement of the officers.

In the position he occupied, he certainly was of great service to our friends, for it prevented that part of the room from undergoing so close an examination as the rest.

And, so well did he perform his part, that no suspicion generated from his actions.

When the men had finished their search, Mr. Wriggles gave an ironical smile, and said—

"I have not quite done yet, Matthew, my friend. I'll show you something else."

As he spoke he took from his coat pocket a small hammer.

It was entirely made of iron—handle, head, and all. The handle was very thin, and the head of a circular shape on one side, and elongating into a spike on the other.

"There's a pretty little tool," he said, affecting to eye it with admiration. "It's really beautiful, that it is."

"What is it for?" asked old Matthew, who could have given a tolerably good guess.

"Why, my friend, I think you may have heard of such things as secret doors in the walls of rooms."

"I have, before now."

"Well, this little instrument is especially intended to discover them."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. You see it is nicely balanced upon a slender handle. That is for the convenience of the person making use of it. Then look at the head. On one side it's rounded. That's to knock the wall with. If a dull sound is produced, it's all right—you know there's nothing but a wall. If hollow, a door."

"That's all very well," said Matthew, "but the butt-end of a pistol would have answered the purpose just as well."

"Oh! no, it wouldn't. Sometimes you feel rather doubtful as to whether the sound is dull, like a wall, or hollow, like a door. When that is the case you can easily satisfy yourself. To do that, you must bring the spiky part into requisition."

"Very interesting!" said old Matthew, who, although he preserved his coolness, looked upon the instrument with which Wriggles seemed to be so pleased, with distrust and uneasiness.

He did not know the exact extent of his powers.

Having given this explanation, Mr. Wriggles set about his task of sounding the walls.

He did this with great care, not leaving a single square foot of the wall without a blow, using for this purpose the blunt or rounded end of the hammer's head.

While he was thus engaged old Matthew was struck with a fresh thought.

So excellent a one was it that he felt he could fairly rub his hands together for very glee.

But he did not venture upon so great a demonstration of satisfaction as that.

But he could not prevent his eye from sparkling.

Hitherto he had looked upon Mr. Wriggles' operations with an indifferent air.

Now, however, he affected to cast uneasy glances upon the walls, and more especially upon the corner of the fire-place on the side of the room opposite to that upon which he sat.

It was not long before this was noticed.

Mr. Wriggles was the first to perceive it.

But though he noticed the spot to which the landlord's eyes were continually and uneasily turned, he took no notice further than to get to that part of the room as quickly as he could.

At length he reached it.

Cautiously and gently he rapped with his nammer.

As he approached, which he did in what he considered an artful manner, he looked at old Matthew out of the corners of his eyes, and observed the changes in his countenance as he neared the important spot.

Full of exultation, and doubting not that he had the game entirely in his hands, Mr. Wriggles tapped away at the wall.

But he ought to have known old Matthew better by this time.

The fact was, the officer was blind just at that moment to everything else but his own superior cunning.

Tap—tap—tap.

As yet the walls had returned a uniformly dull sound, and Wriggles knew that up to the present moment he had struck upon nothing but brick.

Now, however, he struck another blow, and this time the sound which followed was of a decidedly different character.

To use a common simile, it sounded as hollow as a drum.

Old Matthew gave a great start, and pretended to clutch the arms of the chair for support, as though the discovery had come.

He did this because he saw Mr. Wriggles was peeping at him.

"Ha! ha!" laughed that individual, his exultation taking quite a facetious form. "Ha! ha! Mr. Landlord; there's something here. Ha! ha!"

Old Matthew opened and shut his mouth several times in a gasping manner, as though he wanted to speak and could not.

"What's this, I wonder?" continued Mr. Wriggles. "That gives a decidedly hollow sound. Ha! ha! I must call in the assistance of my spiky friend to prove that. Ha! ha!"

As he spoke he turned the handle of the hammer in his hand.

Then he prepared to strike a blow with the spike.

Old Matthew fell back in the chair.

Mr. Wriggles poised the hammer in the air, but paused before he gave the stroke.

He was like a cat which feels secure of its prey, and thinks it a piece of excellent amusement to play with it for a while.

And so it was with the police-officer.

When he thought that he had tormented the landlord enough he struck the blow.

There was a crashing sound.

The spike upon the head of the hammer buried itself in the wood.

"Ha! ha! Mr. Gale! you'll alter your note now, I rather think. You are a very clever man—a very clever man indeed; but, dear me! not near so clever as some one else I know. The secret's out now. But come, I'll be generous with you, old chap; give them up, and you shall hear no more about it, and have your share of the reward."

Old Matthew knew by this time that he had quite hooked his fish.

The bait, so cunningly held out, was swallowed.

A great change took place in his manner.

He assumed a defiant, off-hand way of speaking, and laughed at what Wriggles could do, and defied him to do his worst.

And this so cleverly that the men thought the behaviour only put on—like that kind of conrage which fails to make itself apparent until the animal is forced to bay.

"There's nothing," he cried, hoarsely, "there's nothing there. Come away, I say. I tell you there is nothing there."

"Ha! ha!" was the reply made by Mr. Wriggles. "We shall soon see about that. Take care of him, my men, and be prepared for action. I will knock the door down myself, and then you be prepared to grapple with the highwaymen as soon as they make their appearance. Hurrah! my boys, we have them! The reward is ours!"

CHAPTER CCCXVII.

CONTINUES TO RELATE THE INTERESTING PROCEEDINGS OF MR. WRIGGLES AT THE "WHITE HORSE" INN.

MR. WRIGGLES was not more sure of his own existence than he was that he had really hit upon the place where the highwaymen were concealed.

He had achieved his end at last.

The hollow reverberatiug sound whic.. had followed the blows with the blunt end of the hammer, proved that there was a recess.

Then the blow with the sharp end had quite set the matter at rest, as well as shown that there was a concealed door.

And what could be behind that door but the highwaymen?

Then he considered old Matthew's behaviour as an additional assurance.

But the cleverest people are sometimes over-matched, and those who pitted themselves against the landlord of the "White Horse" generally came off worst in the encounter.

Mr. Wriggles did in this instance.

He took a pistol from his pocket, and, cocking it, took up a position in front of the door, and at a few paces from it.

He commanded his men to do the same, and with faces full of the expectation of anticipated triumph, they obeyed.

Old Matthew pretended to be quite overcome.

And now Mr. Wriggles proceeded to "draw the badger," for by this term he designated what he was about to do.

His first proceeding was to knock three times upon the hidden door.

Then he said, in a loud, pompous voice—

"Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack, we, officers of police, know you to be concealed behind this door, and, in the name of his most gracious majesty the king, we call upon you to surrender yourselves to us. If you refuse, the consequences will be upon your own heads. We shall call upon you three times, and if, when we have done so, you do not deliver yourselves into our hands, we shall attack you."

Of course, for the very best of all reasons, there came no response to this speech from behind the door.

Although, in their hiding-place, the three highwaymen could not see what was taking place in the parlour, yet they were well aware the officers were upon the wrong scent, so they did not trouble themselves in the least.

"Once!" cried Mr. Wriggles; "we call upon you to surrender."

A pause.

No reply.

"Twice!"

The same result.

"Three times! we call upon you to surrender."

But no more notice was taken than there had been upon the two preceding occasions.

There was silence still.

Mr. Wriggles began to grow angry at this contumacy.

At the same time he could not conceal from himself that a disagreeable presentiment was stealing over him that he was doomed to be "done" in some way.

"Fire!" he cried, in a husky tone of voice. "Fire, every one of you, since they will have it."

The men had nothing to do but to obey orders, besides, their chief set them the example of firing first.

The report of so many pistols in so confined a space was rather stunning and tremendous.

The concussion of the air broke several of the window-panes, and the glass fell with a clattering sound into the yard outside.

The parlour, too, was filled with blue smoke, which was some seconds in clearing away.

When it did so, a glimpse of the spot at which their shots had been aimed could be obtained.

A number of holes were visible, and in many places splinters of wood could be seen.

But no cry as of anguish from a wound reached their ears, nor nothing which could be construed into a death scream.

The uncomfortable feeling which we have described Mr. Wriggles as experiencing increased in intensity.

But, calling to his men to draw their cutlasses, he sprang forward with his own in his grasp, and commenced slashing away at the woodwork.

By the united exertions of the police the door was soon pulled down, and then a dark-looking recess was disclosed.

But it was empty.

A glance assured them of that fact.

But Mr. Wriggles, dreading the worst, as he had begun to do, could scarcely bring himself to believe that such a horrible state of things could be real, and that, after all his cunning, his exultation and his trouble had been thrown away.

Cutlass in hand, he dashed into the little recess.

It was about four feet in depth only, and the width of an ordinary door.

He minutely examined the walls, the floor, and the ceiling, but without any good result.

He was forced at last to come to the conclusion that there was no means of outlet to this place, save the legitimate one.

Turning round, with his heart swelling almost to bursting with furious passion, his eye fell upon old Matthew, the landlord.

One glance at that individual's countenance almost maddened him.

He was laughing—yes, positively laughing at and enjoying his discomfiture.

And yet he seemed to be stifling his mirth, for he inflated his cheeks, and then drew them in again, while the shaking of his fat sides communicated a movement to the chair upon which he was sitting.

It was really too bad of old Matthew to so exasperate a discomfited foe.

But he did it.

He felt that it was his turn to rejoice.

"What do you mean, you hoary-headed old villain?" said Mr. Wriggles, striding up to him, his rage quite overcoming his prudence. "What do you mean by this?"

"Ha! ha!"

"Look out that you don't suffer for it."

"Mr. Wriggles!"

"Curses!"

"Mr. Wriggles, I can't help laughing, indeed I can't."

"What have you got to laugh at?"

"Why, you, to be sure."

"Me?"

"Yes, to think what a jolly fool you have made of yourself."

"You mean what a jolly fool you have made of me."

"Oh! have it that way if you like, only my modesty would not allow me to put it so."

"Oh! d—n your modesty!"

"Very well. Just as you like. But I can't help laughing. Now didn't I tell you as plain as ever I could speak that there was no one there?"

"You said so, but it was not likely I was going to believe you."

"So it seems."

"But you have not conquered me yet, Mr. Gale."

"Oh! you are going to give yourself more trouble, then?"

"I am. The failures I have met with do not daunt me in the least. On the contrary, they do but serve to increase my vigour and determination."

"Very well, search away, but if you will take my advice you will just go quietly about your business."

"Bah!"

"I know very well you will not be advised by me. If you had, you wouldn't have made that great hole in the wall there."

"The very fact of your having such a place in your parlour wall is suspicious."

"Oh! is it?"

"Yes, it is."

"But suppose I didn't know it was there?"

"No one would ever suppose such a ridiculous thing."

"Oh! wouldn't they. Well now, do you know what that place is that you are making such a grand fuss about?"

"Yes, I do."

"What is it, then?

"A hiding-place for gentlemen who are wanted."

"Now, don't get such foolish ideas in your head."

"Foolish ideas?"

"Yes, foolish ideas. For that place is nothing more and nothing less than a cupboard which used to be there when I first took the house, but as I had no use for it and considered it spoilt the look of that side of the room, I had the door nailed up and papered over as you see, and so it has remained to this day."

"Then why couldn't you tell us so?"

"Why, you wouldn't have believed me any more than you did a moment ago, when I told you the highwaymen were not here."

"But they were watched in, and their horses are at this very moment in your stable."

"Ah! it's no use talking to you, I am sure. Go on—go on. But if you don't find them I can tell you you will have to suffer for it."

"I will run the risk of that."

"Very well. You are free to act just as you think proper."

"Of course I am."

"Go on, then."

"I will pull this house down, I tell you, and examine every brick one by one, but what I will find them."

Matthew waved his hand, and was about to speak.

But the words he had almost began to utter, died away upon his lips.

His cheek blanched.

A sound had come upon his ears and also upon the ears of Wriggles and the officers.

They started, and, with cries of rage upon their lips, darted out into the bar.

The sounds which they had heard were those of evident conflict.

The idea that struck them all was that the highwaymen were making their escape from some part of the premises, or, at all events, were trying to do so.

Old Matthew guessed, perhaps, just exactly what had occurred.

But we will properly relate to the reader what had taken place.

To do so we must direct attention to the place where our friends were hidden.

We know that up to a certain time they had remained here in perfect safety, until, indeed, after Mr. Wriggles's attack upon the door.

It will be recollected that when old Matthew left our friends, he gave them some parting instructions, to which he requested their particular attention.

They were to be acted upon in case they should be threatened with discovery, and related to the means which they were to adopt in order to make their escape.

At present there seemed to be no probability of their being put into requisition.

The space, however, in which they had to stand was a limited one, and they experienced considerable inconvenience; yet they did not dare to stir, for fear their movements should be heard by the officers, and their hiding-place betrayed.

But when they heard them preparing to fire a volley at the door on the opposite side of the apartment, they considered that a favourable opportunity to endeavour to make some change in their position.

They did slightly succeed, but only slightly.

They were more comfortable than they were before, but not much.

Then came the little altercation between Matthew and Mr. Wriggles.

During this, Claude, who could not gain anything like a comfortable position, moved gradually and silently until his back was against the wall, opposite to the door by which they had entered.

Against this he rested, when, to his unutterable dismay, he felt it give way behind him.

But he recovered himself quickly enough from falling to the ground, which he had a narrow escape of doing.

He saved himself.

The fact was, he had leaned up against the door of which Matthew had spoken, and which, he said, would take them out into the little yard at the rear of the public-house.

Whether the door was secured by a spring and Claude had accidentally pressed upon it, or whether it had not been securely fastened, is hard to say; but, certain it is, from one or other of these causes the door gave way in the manner we have described.

This was a most unlooked-for and dangerous occurrence, for no sooner was the door open than some one called out as though to give the alarm.

This some one was a police-officer, who had been stationed in that identical back yard by his strategic chief in order to keep watch.

Claude guessed this, and the peril of their situation made him more than usually rapid in his actions.

With the swiftness of a tiger's leap, he sprang out through the unexpected aperture into the yard.

There he saw an officer.

To spring upon him and clutch him by the throat with no friendly grip, was the work of a moment.

But the officer was a tall and stalwart man, and Claude could tell that, strong as he was, he had opposed himself to one who was almost his equal.

But putting forth his utmost strength he grappled with this man.

It was but for a moment he had to sustain the conflict single-handed.

His two companions feeling certain that, after what had occurred, their hiding-place would be no further good to them, emerged into the yard, closed the door after them, and hastened to Claude's assistance.

Against such odds, of course the officer did not stand the ghost of a chance.

Sixteen-String Jack, watching his opportunity, clenched his fist and struck him a heavy blow on the side of his head.

But, of course, all this had not been done without making a noise.

It was these sounds of conflict which had reached the ears of old Matthew and Mr. Wriggles in the bar, and which had caused such a tint of deadly paleness to overspread the countenance of the worthy landlord.

It was this struggle which had caused the police-officer and his men to give vent to the cries of rage they did, and to rush out into the bar.

They knew of no other means by which they could reach the yard.

No sooner had they disappeared than old Matthew sprang to his feet.

He looked anxious and disconcerted.

But quick as thought he moved his chair, and, pressing the spring, caused the secret door to fly open.

He passed through it, and closed it after him in a moment.

Then he saw the door opposite to him, which led into the yard, was open.

Two steps took him to the threshold of it.

He could then see into the yard.

The officer who had uttered the alarm lay on the ground without motion.

His companions and Mr. Wriggles had not yet arrived.

But doubtless they would be there in another moment.

Anxiously old Matthew glanced round the yard in search of our friends, for even now he had not lost all hope of saving them.

CHAPTER CCCXVIII.

RETURNS TO DICK TURPIN IN HIS CELL IN NEWGATE, AND GIVES SOME INTERESTING PARTICULARS RELATIVE TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF ADRIAN WINBERRY.

ALBEIT we leave Dick Turpin's three brave companions in so perilous a situation, the exigencies of our narrative compel us to revert to the proceedings of Dick Turpin himself.

It will be seen that our hero's stay in the great city prison was destined to be marked by the occurrence of some very remarkable events.

It will doubtless be remembered that when we saw Dick last was on the Friday.

That Friday which preceded the Monday fixed for the execution of Adrian Winberry and his two companions in guilt.

The jailers who were upon such friendly terms with Dick, had informed him of the arrival of the warrants ordering their execution.

The interview which Turpin had with Maud Gouldman and Blanche Winberry produced a great effect upon him.

He tried to shake off the feeling, but found the effort quite a vain one.

He longed for night to come, and yet when darkness descended upon the earth, and the different objects in his cell were shrouded from his view, he felt no better off than before, and, with the same impatient restlessness, longed for day to come again.

But time lagged.

The hours passed by slowly and wearisomely, and Dick Turpin, like Richard III., felt his stern impatience.

> Chide this tardy-gaited night,
> That, like a foul and ugly witch, doth limp
> So tediously away.

But what a contrast there was between him and Adrian's two accomplices, Norman and Sare.

Horrible thought to such souls as theirs'—they knew they had but so many hours to live.

So many? Say rather how few, for they were able to count them easily.

To them the minutes flew by with lightning-like rapidity.

The day was gone, and as the last rays of daylight faded from the cell, they felt that they would only twice more see that spectacle.

Oh! it was horrible to feel as they felt. The mind is unable to form a proper estimate of their sensations.

Hour after hour slipped by so swiftly that they seemed like minutes.

At that awful hour they repented, when it was too late, that they had been weak enough to allow themselves to be persuaded by the inducements and arguments which Adrian Winberry held out to them.

How gladly would they have recalled the past.

And so, in fruitless groans and shrieks for mercy, which the stone walls of their cell heeded not, they passed away the night.

They did not dare to sleep, for they dreaded the elapsion of time during unconsciousness. Miserable though they were, they wished to live as long as possible.

And now let us take a glance at Adrian Winberry.

From the time of his condemnation he had unvaryingly preserved a dogged stoicism of manner.

It had completely fixed the idea in the minds of all the officials by whom he was visited, that he had given himself up to despair.

But such was not the fact.

From what the reader has casually seen of Adrian Winberry, he can easily believe that he was not the kind of man to allow himself to be daunted by whatever obstacles might obstruct his path.

Neither was he the kind of man to tamely submit to circumstances without making an effort to turn the current of them.

From the very first moment of his incarceration one word and one idea had been unceasingly uppermost in his mind, and before his mental vision.

And that was escape.

He had resolved to free himself from his confinement.

Hitherto, however, he had not been able to make even an attempt.

Now time pressed, and he felt that if he was to escape at all it must be without further loss of time.

On this Friday night, then, to which we adverted, he determined that a trial should be made.

With an eagerness which equalled that of Dick Turpin, he waited and watched for the night to come.

The jailers made their accustomed rounds, and found him in his usual position—that is to say, crouched up like a wild beast.

He vouchsafed not a word to them when they placed his food upon the floor of the cell, but only glared at them with his haggard eyes.

But as soon as they closed the door his demeanour underwent a remarkable alteration.

Springing to his feet, he seized upon the loaf of bread, and, coarse and repulsive as the fare was, began to devour it eagerly.

He did this, not because he was particularly hungry, but because he did not know how long a time would elapse before he had the chance of tasting food again. And, moreover, he wished to endow himself with as much vigour as possible, so as to be the better able to prosecute his escape.

He did not cease till the whole of the loaf had disappeared.

By this time night had fully come.

The faint, roaring hum which had reached his cell, telling him of the busy world without, came no longer to his ears.

Nothing could be heard stirring within the prison.

"It is time," he said, and as he spoke he rose to his feet and paced the cell.

It is probable at that moment he was elaborating some plan of escape which he had engendered in his scheming brain.

At length he paused, and groped his way upon his hands and feet towards the spot where the jailer had deposited the water.

It was a large, strong, stone pitcher.

Raising this to his lips, Adrian drank deeply of its contents, though the quality of the water was not of the purest kind.

He drank again and again at frequent intervals, and then, turning the pitcher over, he allowed the remainder of the water to flow away.

What was he about to do?

In what way was he to accomplish his escape?

We shall see.

The reader must bear in mind we have not mentioned that Adrian Winberry was supplied with any tools.

Nor was he.

But, by noting his actions, we shall see what steps he took to remedy that deficiency.

Having drank his fill, and having, as he imagined satisfied his thirst for a long time to come, he poured away the water.

As soon as the pitcher was empty, he raised it in his hands as high above his head as he could.

Then dashed it down with considerable force on to the floor of the dungeon.

The crash sounded with alarming loudness in the silence of the night.

But no notice appeared to have been taken of it.

He listened, however, for several seconds, and then, hearing no sound indicative of an alarm having been given, or of the approach of anyone, he stooped down.

The pitcher had been broken into several large fragments, which lay scattered about the floor of the cell.

One by one, and with extraordinary patience, he collected them together.

Then he felt them—for he had no light and could not see—and selected from among the rest one piece, which he calculated would best answer the use to which he was about to put it.

This much done, he rose to his feet and looked about for the little grated aperture through which light was admitted to his cell.

He was easily able to fix his eyes upon this, because it was somewhat lighter than the rest of the walls.

By this simple means he was able to exactly and correctly ascertain his precise whereabouts.

With a steady step, as though he had fully resolved upon what he was about to do, he turned to the left, and walked until his further progress was stopped by the stone wall.

It was not, however, as some would have thought, the stone wall leading into the passage before which he paused, but the one dividing his dungeon from the one next to it.

Was it his intention to first make his way into that?

If so, for what purpose?

He had learned that his lawyer, Josiah Skinner, was in the cell adjoining his, and his resolve was to work his way into that and obtain the co-operation of his legal adviser, who, perhaps, would be provided with tools, which would make the task of escape lighter.

But, if he had not, he considered he should still have the advantage which the assistance of Mr. Skinner would give him.

There was another motive, too, which induced him to adopt this line of conduct.

The cell in which he stood, and which had been chosen for his reception, was doubtless one of the strongest in the prison, so that it would be a matter of great difficulty, if not impossibility, for him to make his way out of it.

But with the cell in which the lawyer was confined the case might be different.

The same precautions for strength might not have been taken.

At any rate, if the cell was just the same, it could not be more difficult to escape from, and he would have the certain advantage which assistance would give him.

And so, for these reasons, instead of making his attack on the wall which divided his cell from the passage, he made it upon the one that separated his from the one in which he believed Mr. Skinner was confined.

As yet that worthy was only in custody on the charge of perjury which the judge had preferred against him, and therefore no great strictness would be exercised towards him.

Pausing, then, before this wall, Adrian Winberry carefully felt it with his hands.

He passed them over the huge block of stone of which it was composed, until the ends of his fingers came in contact with the mortar which cemented them together.

He ran his fingers along the crevice or indentation between two blocks of stone.

Then, satisfied apparently with the result of his labours, he knelt down on the floor of the dungeon, and, with the piece of the stone pitcher he had selected from the rest, began to pick out the mortar in small fragments.

For this the piece of pitcher was admirably adapted, for it had a sharp point, which dug into the somewhat moist mortar easily and gradually removed it.

But still the task of dislodging a huge piece of stone by such means would never have been undertaken save by a prisoner, and that prisoner animated by the hope that each tiny grain that he picked out took him so much nearer to freedom.

It was in this light that Adrian Winberry looked upon his superhuman task.

It was this thought which encouraged him to continue his exertions and endowed him with the requisite amount of patience.

He put forth his whole energies, and it was really wonderful to see what a quantity of mortar he removed, and how soon he had worked his way all round the stone.

And now, as he proceeded, he found the difficulty of what he was about increase.

So much so that, looking back, and judging by what he had to do, the first portion of his laborious work looked like insignificant child-play.

The deeper he worked his way into the interstices of the stones, the more trouble he had to introduce the piece of pitcher and dislodge the mortar.

But he persevered, never allowing his courage to abate for a moment—never suffering his mind to experience the least sensation of depression.

Presently a curse broke from his lips.

In using the piece of pitcher which had done him such good service rather roughly, it had broken in his hand, leaving a portion sticking in the wall.

This compelled him to pause, and when he did so he found how much his exertion had heated him.

The perspiration poured off him in streams.

With a hasty movement he brushed away the clustering drops from about his face, and, having done so, groped his way to where he had left the other fragments of the pitcher, and began to search among them for another piece which would perform the duty he required of it.

[TOM KING IS DETECTED IN HIS DISGUISE.]

At length he found two, and, in the anticipation of meeting with another accident, took them both and renewed his operations.

The piece of pitcher sticking in the crevice was removed.

Time passed, and still Adrian was at his work—for two hours he never rested once, except for the purpose we have mentioned, but kept on untiringly.

At the expiration of that time, however, he paused, but only because his task was so far accomplished.

He had worked all round the four sides of one of the huge blocks of stone, until the crevice he had made was so deep that the piece of pitcher was not long enough to reach the mortar.

Surely now, he thought, he should be able to loosen the stone in its setting somewhat, so he rose and, putting his fingers as far as he could in the top crevice, exerted all his strength and pressed downwards.

To his great joy, the mass gave way beneath the pressure, slowly and gradually.

But he stopped and placed the piece of pitcher in the under crevice, so that it should not sink so far that he should be unable to raise it again.

This precaution was one very necessary to take.

In this way, then, and with incredible patience, he worked the block of stone up and down—backwards and forwards—until he had loosened it in a surprising degree.

The services of the pitcher were then again called into requisition, and, taking the strongest fragment he could find, he used it like a lever, and, by slow degrees, worked the stone out into his cell.

This was a very tedious operation, but, when the stone projected about half an inch, he seized it with his fingers, and strove to pull it towards him.

He broke his nails and bruised his fingers in the attempt, but he did not care for such minor inconveniences as these, and, at last, to his inexpressible gratification the block of stone lay upon the floor of the dungeon.

CHAPTER CCCXIX.

ADRIAN WINBERRY MAKES A FATAL ERROR, AND DICK TURPIN FRUSTRATES HIS ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE.

To Adrian Winberry this seemed a good deal done towards the accomplishment of his purpose, and he felt inspired with hope accordingly; but anyone looking at it as a partial escape from the prison at Newgate, and taking into account what would have to be done before freedom was attained, would be apt to consider the displacing of that stone as a very trifling thing indeed.

But flushed with the success which had hitherto attended upon him, the prisoner, without allowing himself more than a moment's rest, returned to his work with undiminished vigour.

It was now that he felt how welcome a draught of the water he had thrown away would have been to have cooled his parched lips and burning throat; but he consoled himself with the thought that ere long he should stand within the dungeon occupied by the rascally attorney, where, beyond doubt, he would be able to slake his thirst with abundance of water—for, he argued, Mr. Skinner would have had no motive to pour his away.

A large square aperture was now presented in the wall where the stone had been taken away, and thrusting his head and shoulders into this, Adrian, by the aid of his sense of touch, commenced a careful exploration of it.

The flakes of mortar crumbled away beneath his fingers, until he could again feel the crevice round another stone.

Undaunted by the awkward position he would have to assume in order to set to work again, Adrian took up the piece of pitcher, and resolutely picked away at the mortar.

He had the satisfaction of finding that he made very rapid progress, for in the middle of the wall where he was now at work the mortar was quite moist, and consequently easily removed.

Still it was a weary time, and his arms ached insufferably before he was able to work that stone up and down as he did the other.

But at last that time came, and, feverishly impatient, he loosened it in its setting.

Then the next thing was to remove the stone.

He did not attempt to draw it towards him this time.

On the contrary, as he judged that stone was all that divided him from the contiguous dungeon, the easiest and best method by far would be to push it from him.

And accordingly he applied the pressure in that direction.

At first without result, but presently he felt it gradually slipping before him.

Encouraged, he pushed harder and harder, until, with an ominous crash, the huge stone fell into the next dungeon.

To writhe through the aperture was, to Adrian Winberry, the work of a moment, but when he did so and regained his feet, he met with a surprise that he was little prepared for, and he uttered a shout either of anger or of fear.

The next moment he felt himself tightly clutched round the throat by some one.

But in order to make things quite clear, we will just for a moment revert to the doings of Dick Turpin upon that eventful night.

After all his longings for the time to pass away, the night had come, but without bringing any relief to his vexed spirit.

He paced up and down the narrow limits of his cell with an impatient tread, till, tiring of the exercise, he flung himself upon the rude couch which did duty for a bed.

But though he thus sought for repose, sleep did not come to him—indeed, he never remembered being so very wide awake as he then was.

The silence and the darkness at last, however, had the desired effect upon him, and towards the time when Adrian Winberry commenced his operations, Dick fell into a restless and uneasy slumber.

In this state he continued for a long while, until, in fact, Adrian had dislodged his first stone.

Just then Turpin sat up on the bed and strove to look about him.

But he could see nothing save the darkness and the light square patch in the wall where the window was situated.

He had awoke with some faint, peculiar sound in his ears, but what it was he was at a loss to think.

Now, however, all was profoundly still.

Under the impression that his fancy had misled him, and that his awakenment was due to an awkward position, or some such trivial circumstance, he proceeded to lie down again.

But almost immediately he heard a faint scratching sound.

Had it not been for the intense silence which prevailed within the cell, it would have been inaudible.

Dick heard it, however, and he lay quite still and listened with the utmost intentness.

Convinced that his imagination was playing him no trick, he gradually and quietly rose.

Then slipping off the bed, he stood upon his feet on the floor of the cell, and turned himself round until he was quite sure his face was turned in the direction from which the noise proceeded.

This much done, he crept stealthily forward, until his further progress was arrested by the wall.

The scratching was on the other side of it, for a certainty.

Now this was a sound which Dick could not altogether make out the cause of.

The sound seemed to come from what he had been told was Adrian Winberry's cell, but that that individual should be working his way into his cell he conceived was too absurd a supposition to be indulged in for a moment. And yet, as the reader is aware, such was actually the case.

But then Adrian Winberry was labouring under a mistake.

He had the idea implanted in his mind that he was working his way into the company of his associate.

But he was in some way wrong in his information as to the side of the cell upon which Mr. Skinner's abode was situated.

And instead of getting nearer to his friend, or progressing in his escape, he was in reality labouring so hard to get into the presence of one who had by his actions proved himself to be his greatest enemy, and if it had not been for whom he would, in all probability, have completely succeeded in his nefarious undertakings.

Dick Turpin, as we say, could scarcely bring himself to believe that the sounds he heard were produced by Adrian Winberry, because he was at a loss to think what motive he could have for making his way into his presence.

It seemed altogether preposterous, and yet he could not help the idea occurring again and again to him, because he could not think what else it could be.

Puzzled and perplexed, Dick made his way to the chair, and sat down upon it.

"I suppose," he said, "I can do nothing better than await the progress of events. It's a very extraordinary circumstance—very, indeed. I can't think it's Adrian Winberry. Perhaps it is some friend of mine, who thinks by getting into my cell to enable me to make my escape. I shall be sorry if such proves to be the case, because, as I have given my promise, I could not avail myself of his services, and, upon the discovery being made, my position would become worse instead of better."

This was unquestionably true, because the authorities would be put more upon their guard, and their prisoner would be hemmed in with so many precautions that ultimate escape would be a very doubtful affair indeed.

And for this reason Turpin hoped that it was no friend of his who was at work with the intention of effecting his escape.

Impatiently Dick waited to see what was going to happen next.

As he sat thus waiting, he became conscious that the cell was gradually growing lighter.

He could distinguish the walls—his own limbs—and the rude table upon which his meals were served.

At first he was inclined to attribute this increased vision to the expansion of the pupils of the eyes, for he had more than once noticed how, after a short stay in a place that had at first seemed utterly dark, he had been gradually able to define objects.

But the lightness kept increasing, and that to such an extent that he was unable any longer to attribute it to the cause which we have named.

Raising his head he looked towards the grated aperture of the cell, through which a small glimpse of the sky could be obtained.

Then the mystery of the accession of light was dissipated at once.

A number of small, white, fleecy clouds were flitting rapidly across.

Dick Turpin had not been out upon so many nocturnal excursions as he had without noting with a particular eye the various aspects of the ever-varying sky.

By the mere look, then, of these fleecy clouds, he was able to tell with certainty that the moon was not far distant, and that it was her silvery rays which gave them the appearance that they wore.

This would account for his being able to see about him so well as he did.

And he was destined to see even more distinctly, for the edge of the moon now appeared at one side of the grating.

At first it was but a mere silver thread, but as the moon continued her rapid motion towards the west, it increased in size, until the whole of the full round face of the orb of night was visible.

When this was the case, the interior of Dick Turpin's cell was even more brilliantly lighted up than it was during the greatest part of the day, and every object could be seen with remarkable distinctness, though, as is always the case with moonlight, sharp black shadows were thrown.

It was just when the moon had thus attained her full power, and the cell was so well illuminated, that the scratching sound became louder and louder, until it suddenly ceased.

It was succeeded by a creaking, cracking noise, and this was caused by Adrian's efforts to move the stone up and down, and so loosen the mortar where he could not reach to pick it away with his rude yet effectual implement.

It so happened that the rays of the moon, coming as they did in rather a slanting direction into the cell, fell with full force and distinctness upon the very wall on the other side of which Adrian was at work.

Such being the case, it was an easy enough matter for Dick, who was guided by the sound, to fix his eyes upon the identical stone which was being displaced.

He saw it rise and fall, and move to the right side and then to the left, with a slightly perceptible motion.

Then that ceased, and the stone began to gradually and gradually come out of its setting, until it projected from the wall.

Dick Turpin knew that the jailers had told him that wall was all which divided him from Adrian Winberry, and yet he fancied he must have made some mistake, and that he was situated on the other side of the cell.

He was puzzled to find a motive for Adrian working a way into his cell.

What possible object could it serve?

He had fancied he would make an attempt to escape, from the daring with which he had attempted to carry out his other schemes, and had expressed his opinion to that effect upon more than one occasion when conversing with his jailers; but then, he thought, the last place Adrian would think of attacking would be that wall, upon which, however, it was plain an attack was most unquestionably being made.

For, behold, the piece of stone projects further and further into the cell as the pressure from behind is steadily applied to it.

Ere long the mystery of this nocturnal worker would be revealed.

So, with straining eyes, Dick watched the moving stone, upon which the moon's rays fell with such brightness that he could see every grain in it.

The stone grated and creaked as it came forward little by little, until at length, as we have described, it fell with a crash upon the floor of Turpin's cell, into which, of course, Adrian was immediately able to see.

The cry which had come from his lips was caused by his first view of Dick's countenance.

He recognised him instantly, for Dick's face was fully turned towards the moonbeams.

On his side Dick Turpin was not slow to recognise the countenance of Adrian Winberry, which was such a peculiar one, and so firmly imprinted upon his memory, that it was impossible for him to mistake it.

In an instant Dick comprehended, by the cry and the look of vexation and rage which overspread Adrian's features, what had occurred.

Adrian had forced his way in there by mistake.

When his eyes rested upon his sinister-looking face projecting from the hole in the wall, and clearly defined by the light, Dick sprang to his feet, and almost immediately recovering from his surprise, clutched Adrian tightly round the throat, and with main force strove to drag him into the cell.

But he did this easily, for Adrian Winberry, so far from doing anything to impede his progress, actually assisted it.

As soon, however, as he felt his feet upon the firm floor of the dungeon, he made a sudden stand, and with an exertion of strength which we should never have given him credit for possessing, he released himself from Turpin's grasp, and followed up this advantage by fixing his bony fingers in his throat with a vice-like grip.

Dick felt the power of the compression, and knew that unless he succeeded in releasing himself from his adversary's grasp at once, he would soon be put out of the power of doing so.

A furious struggle now ensued.

Adrian Winberry was choked with rage and endowed with thrice his ordinary strength.

The thought that he had had all his careful work for nothing maddened him, but he resolved if his escape was frustrated, he would not be baulked out of his revenge.

He saw before him—he held in his grip—the man who had proved himself to be his most dangerous enemy, and to whom might be entirely attributed his discovery, condemnation, and imprisonment.

Nerved, then, with hate, he struggled furiously with Dick.

But our hero soon recovered his coolness.

By a skilful manœuvre he extricated himself from his grasp.

Then throwing the whole weight of his body into one blow, he bore his antagonist to the earth.

Here the struggle was renewed.

But Dick was uppermost.

And now the most unequivocal signs were given that the prison authorities had been aroused by the tumult.

CHAPTER CCCXX.

ADRIAN WINBERRY IS ACCOMMODATED WITH A SET OF JEWELLERY, AND FORTHWITH REMOVED TO STRONGER QUARTERS.

Lights gleamed along the corridor, and there was the trampling of many feet without.

The alarm had been given, and the various officials whose duty it was to watch during the night were hastening to the scene of tumult.

Dick heard them coming with no little satisfaction, for Adrian Winberry, in his present furious state of mind, was anything but a comfortable opponent, and he would not care how soon he got rid of him.

Accordingly, hearing the turnkeys approach, he raised his voice, and called aloud to them.

He was heard, and directly afterwards a key was thrust into the cell door, which was unlocked and thrown open.

An astonished-looking group appeared upon the threshold.

What was their surprise to see two persons on the floor of the cell, struggling furiously with each other.

Those turnkeys were, however, rather accustomed to sudden surprises, and they soon recovered from this one.

Several of them, darting forward, seized hold of both the combatants, and forcibly separated them.

It was then they received another shock, for, to their unbounded astonishment, they found one of the combatants was Adrian Winberry.

Having made this discovery, they did not require to be told how he had gained admission there.

One glance at the breach in the stone wall was enough to tell them that.

"Run for the governor," said one, "and bring him here at once."

A turnkey immediately set off upon this errand.

While he was gone, those who remained divided themselves into two groups.

One held Dick Turpin tightly in their grasp, in order that he should not make any sudden attempt at escape, or rush at his foe.

The other kept hold of Adrian Winberry for precisely the same reason.

But the courage and strength which had hitherto sustained that bold bad man, seemed at this juncture to utterly abandon him.

He had received rather rough usage during his struggle with Dick, and he showed upon his person several marks of it.

His head was now bowed down upon his breast, and he looked utterly dejected.

And who can wonder at it?

He had had the chance of escape, he had used what might fairly be deemed superhuman exertions, but, owing to one fatal error, he had lost all, for now their suspicions were aroused, he would be effectually debarred of all further chances of accomplishing his aim.

He must resign himself to that death which he so well deserved.

Not many minutes elapsed before the turnkey who had been dispatched to fetch the governor returned, bringing that individual with him.

Mr. Cawthorn prided himself upon his personal promptness on all matters connected with the prison.

As he came along the turnkey had communicated to him an outline of the facts which had occurred, so that the governor did not display that astonishment which he would have done if he had entered the cell wholly unprepared.

He set about questioning the turnkeys first, who deposed to having heard shouts and cries, and the scuffling noise which a struggle produces, and, finding the noises to proceed from that cell, they entered it, when they found Dick Turpin on the floor of the cell with Adrian Winberry beneath him, and that, upon turning to look how he came there, they had seen the hole in the dungeon wall.

The governor walked up to this and examined it himself with great care and attention.

Then, turning to Turpin, he asked him for an account of what had taken place.

Dick complied with his demand, and, as he had no reason for keeping back any circumstance connected with the affair, he told all—how he had been awoke from sleep by some slight noise—how that noise had been repeated—and how he watched the wall from which it appeared to come, until the stone was forced out of its setting, and Adrian Winberry's face appeared at the aperture, when, coming to the conclusion that he was in the act of endeavouring to effect an escape, he had clutched him by the throat until the turnkeys arrived and spared him the necessity of doing so any longer.

To this narrative Mr. Cawthorn listened with the most profound attention, and, upon looking round again, he could see so many things corroborative of it that he could not withhold his belief.

He ordered a set of heavy fetters to be brought into the cell, and for the smith to be called up.

While his men were absent upon this errand, Mr. Cawthorn occupied himself with an examination of the hole in the wall through which the prisoner had made his way.

For this purpose he took a lantern from one of the turnkeys, and disappeared through the aperture into the adjoining cell.

In the meantime, the other jailers, who had received no orders to the contrary, kept a firm hold upon Adrian and Dick.

Upon crawling through the opening, Mr. Cawthorn saw the corresponding stone lying in the next cell, with a heap of mortar near it.

Still he was at a loss to think how it had been dislodged.

He saw the fragments of the broken pitcher, but the thought never once occurred to him that they had been used for the purpose, or that, indeed, they could be of any possible service.

But there were the stones, sure enough, and by the appearance they presented it was quite evident that they had been freshly removed.

This was the extent of the governor's discoveries in that quarter, and so, probably as it was the nearest way, he crawled back through the hole into Turpin's cell.

At this moment the smith arrived, carrying a small portable anvil, some rivets, and a hammer.

There was a sleepy look about his eyes, and every now and then he yawned in such a manner that his jaw-bone was in imminent danger of dislocation.

Behind him came a couple of turnkeys, who dragged after them a set of fetters.

The passage of the iron links over the floor of the corridor made a hideous noise.

In answer to the question which the smith propounded, as to which of the prisoners he was to oblige with a set of jewellery, Adrian Winberry was pointed out, so he at once turned his attention towards him.

But his task was easy enough.

The prisoner was quite passive in his hands, and suffered himself to be loaded with the chains without the least resistance.

The task of riveting them on did not occupy much time, and then Adrian was quite helpless, and in a much worse position, so far as effecting his escape went, than he was before, because now, as a preliminary step, he would have to divest himself of the heavy mass of iron.

As soon as all this was done, Mr. Cawthorn directed Adrian to be removed, specifying the dungeon to which he was to be taken.

It was in a part of the prison even then rarely used for the incarceration of prisoners.

At the present day it has wholly disappeared, and scarce even the tradition of its existence remains in the memory of the officials.

It was entirely underground, and its position may be indicated by saying it was under what is now the western portion of Newgate-market.

This was a remnant of the old prison, built some time in the eleventh or twelfth century.

The dungeons in this part were, of course, almost always in a state of utter darkness.

Noisome exhalations and disgusting reptiles, ever the accompaniments of such places, were there in plenty, making it a most disagreeable part to sojourn in.

But to make an escape from that part of Newgate was justly held to be impossible, from the fact of it being underground, and from every precaution having been taken to prevent any prisoner confined there from making his way through the surface.

Mr. Cawthorn did not accompany the turnkeys who led Adrian Winberry, heavily laden as he was, to this cell, but determined to visit him after he was properly installed there. As soon as he had departed, he made a sign to those who held Turpin in their grasp to release him.

They obeyed.

Mr. Cawthorn was not and could not be blind to the value of the service which Dick had rendered him by interfering and putting a stop to what, judging by what had been done, looked like Adrian's successful attempt to escape from Newgate.

But it was not exactly the thing for the governor of a prison to be on good terms with one of the prisoners, no matter what services might have been rendered.

And yet Mr. Cawthorn did not like to go without saying something.

"How was it," he asked, "that you interfered in this matter? Why did you not join your services to his and endeavour to effect an escape between you?"

"For a very simple reason."

"What is it?"

"In the first place, I have pledged my word not to make any effort to escape; and in the second, I have such a horror and detestation of Adrian Winberry and his crimes that I could not put myself under an obligation to him, or act in concert with him in any way."

"I see. And so you grappled with him, and held him tightly until assistance arrived?"

"Just so."

"Well, Turpin, I may as well confess the fact as not, but by acting in the manner you have to-night, you have rendered me a very great service, and I am not the sort of man to forget it."

Dick bowed.

"By what I can see," he continued, "he seemed to have every prospect of finishing what he has so successfully began, and I need not conceal from you the fact that, if any one so [illegible] as he is had succeeded in making his escape, I should in all probability have forfeited my situation."

"If what I have done is any good to you," replied Dick, "you are heartily welcome to it, but nothing was done with that intention, speaking candidly."

The govenor smiled.

"Well—well," he said, "I daresay you don't look upon me with very friendly eyes, but I can't help that, you know. But you might be in prison under a worse governor, I can tell you that."

"I have no fault to find with you," said Dick, "and as I said before, if what I have done is of any benefit to you, I am glad, and you are heartily welcome."

"Very good—very good. But there is one thing which puzzles me."

"What is it?"

"Why did Adrian work his way to your cell, instead of out into the passage?"

"There I confess you puzzle me."

"Do I?"

"You do, indeed."

"Have you no idea?"

"I could scarcely say no to that, and speak truthfully."

"Then you have some idea?"

"Yes."

"What is the opinion you have formed? for if you will believe me, I am quite at fault in the matter."

"I may be wrong, but still this is the view I take. Is not Adrian Winberry's lawyer, Mr. Skinner, confined in one of these cells?"

"Yes."

"In the one which adjoins that?"

Dick pointed, as he asked this question, to the cell which had up to such a little while ago been tenanted by Adrian.

"Yes."

"In fact," said Dick, "as Adrian stood in his cell, my dungeon was on one side of him, and Mr. Skinner's on the other."

"Precisely. He was placed between you both."

"That is what I thought."

"But what of that?"

"Adrian would perhaps learn in some way the contiguity of his rascally accomplice, and think that he should have a better chance of success if he broke into the lawyer's cell, and obtained his assistance."

"I see. And so you think that Adrian made a mistake somehow, and took your cell for Mr. Skinner's."

"Just so."

"And did not find out his mistake until you had him by the throat?"

"Yes."

"Well, it may be as you say. At any rate, I cannot help expressing my obligations to you. I shall have to find you fresh quarters, of course, but I suppose you will not object to that."

"Not if I am no worse lodged than I am at present."

"I will see to that."

"Would you allow me to make a suggestion?"

"Certainly, what is it?"

"It is that you should visit your other three prisoners, Norman, Sare, and Skinner."

"I had intended to do so."

"I see you understand your duties better than I can tell them you."

The governor bowed, and felt pleased at this compliment.

"Come this way," he said. "You shall have the next cell along the passage."

Dick Tarpin was led out of the dungeon by the jailers.

He could not leave it without some regret, because it was there where he had been honoured with a visit from the idol of his heart, Maud Gouldman.

He could fancy just where she stood, and stand upon the same spot himself, but now he was going to be deprived of even that slight pleasure.

Regretfully, then, Dick cast his eyes around the cell, and took a farewell glance at it.

The next moment he stood in the passage, and directly afterwards was installed in the next cell, and which was in every respect similar to the one which he had just left.

Mr. Cawthorn acted upon Dick's suggestion, and made a round of the prison.

But he found his prisoners all safe.

Last of all he repaired to Adrian's dungeon, and had him carefully searched, but he was unable to find upon his person any instrument which would have assisted him to remove the two large stones.

He quite overlooked the pieces of platter.

CHAPTER CCCXXI.

OLD MATTHEW GAINS A COMPLETE VICTORY OVER MR. WRIGGLES.

THE effect of the blow which Sixteen-String Jack struck the officer who was struggling with Claude Duval in the little bit of a yard belonging to the "White Horse" Inn, was instantaneous.

It was delivered with great precision.

His fist went with full force against the officer's ear.

He dropped down like a shot.

They had nothing further to fear from him for some time at least.

He was quite incapable of speech and motion.

But the three highwaymen were fully conscious that an alarm had been given—that, indeed, the sounds of the little conflict they had had must have reached the ears of the police-officers in the private bar-parlour.

It, therefore, became incumbent upon them to make up their minds quickly as to what was the best thing to be done, and to lose no time in carrying their designs into effect.

The reader may be sure they did not forget that old Matthew had made particular mention of a door which he informed them would take them out into White Horse-yard.

They glanced hastily round in search of it, and, as soon as it met their view, they made a dash in that direction.

Not a word was said, but the action was simultaneous.

This door was situated in a high brick wall.

It was locked, but the key was sticking in the lock, so, without loss of time, they turned it round and flung the door open.

It was at this moment that old Matthew made his appearance in the manner detailed at the close of a preceding chapter.

The officers had not arrived.

Our friends were in the act of rushing through the door, when the voice of old Matthew restrained them.

They halted and looked round.

They saw his face pale with anxiety.

"Quick—quick," he said. "Quick, for your lives, and for my credit. Leave the door wide open just as it is, and come to me. Quick—quick; all will yet be well."

Our three friends had unbounded faith in old Matthew's ability and willingness to aid them, so, without an instant's hesitation—without, indeed, reflecting upon the matter, they obeyed his commands to the very letter

They hastened to where he stood, which was just inside the recess which had hitherto found them such a secure hiding-place.

He dragged them back into it again and closed the door—which from the yard could not be distinguished from the rest of the wall—just in time.

Before he had time to slip the little bolt which secured it into its sockets, the officers, with cries of rage, rushed into the yard.

But Matthew, unflurried by this circumstance, properly fastened the door, and then said to our friends—

"Remain where you are, and do not offer to stir for your lives. I have not time to explain what I am going to do, but you will know presently. Have faith in me and all will be well."

Then, wheeling his arm-chair until it occupied just the same position as it did when the officers left him, he sank down again into it in precisely the same attitude as before.

Old Matthew did not wait to hear any reply to this speech, but hastily made his way into the parlour again, and with all speed possible closed the cunningly contrived secret door.

The reader, doubtless, comprehends the motive for his conduct, and guesses at the means by which he meant to baffle Mr. Wriggles and the officers.

He calculated that upon making their way into the yard and catching sight, first of their prostrate comrade and then of the open door, they would fall into the mistake of supposing that they had made their escape through it, and rush off in consequence.

Then, in the event of any of them returning to the parlour they would find him composedly seated just where he had been left.

Old Matthew's calculations were cunningly made, and the sequel proved that they were in every respect correct.

The officers, and Mr. Wriggles included, fell blindly into the trap which he had laid for them.

We will relate what took place.

Mr. Wriggles, upon hearing the shout which the officer in the yard uttered, knew in a moment that his prey had been seen.

But, ere he could move, so quick were Claude Duval's motions, he heard a struggle, which ceased as suddenly as it had begun.

Uttering a shout to his men, he dashed out of the parlour into the bar, and out of the bar into the passage beyond it, with the intention of making his way into the yard from which the cry had come.

But the "White Horse" Inn was built in rather an intricate manner, and for a stranger, it was no easy matter for him to find his way from one part of it to another.

Excited as Mr. Wriggles was, it is scarcely to be wondered if he did what any one in his cool blood would be likely to have done—namely, missed his way to the yard.

But altogether he did not lose a couple of minutes, but, when important events are taking place, a couple of minutes is a long time.

It is long enough to decide the fate of a kingdom.

But Mr. Wriggles discovered his error, and made another, and this time more successful, effort to reach the yard.

As old Matthew had fully anticipated, the first thing which met his gaze and the gaze of his men was the police-officer lying at full length in the yard, just as he had been struck down by Sixteen-String Jack.

Beyond a cursory glace, however, Mr. Wriggles paid no attention to this prostrate officer.

Other and more important objects occupied him.

He gave a hasty glance round the yard.

No one was visible.

There were no traces of any one.

The door which old Matthew had closed, and which was all that separated our friends from their foes, was perfectly invisible, and all of a piece with the wall in which it was placed.

Perhaps a very close examination might have detected it, but Mr. Wriggles just then was not likely to bestow a close examination upon anything.

He saw the door leading into White Horse-yard.

He could not have helped doing so.

There was no concealment about that.

It was flung wide open upon its hinges, as far as ever it would go.

Now the idea which immediately seized upon Mr. Wriggles, as well as those who were with him, was one which would have seized upon anybody.

It was that the highwaymen had got out into the yard, struck down the officer, and then rushed through the gate.

He could scarcely arrive at any other supposition.

Accordingly, with a loaded pistol in one hand and his drawn sword in the other, he rushed out into White Horse-yard.

He then had the choice of turning either to the right or the left in the alley.

The first would have taken him to the slums of Claremarket and Lincoln's-inn Fields.

The other to the classic region of Drury-lane.

There was nothing to guide them either way, so he shouted out an hasty order for his troop to divide itself into two portions, one to take one route, and one the other.

He chose himself to go in the direction of Claremarket because he thought that would be the most likely.

In Stanhope-street, however, he found one of the men who had been set to keep watch.

Breathless and exhausted, Mr. Wriggles stopped before him, and asked whether he had seen anything of the three highwaymen.

The man replied in the negative, and averred that they were the only persons who had emerged from White Horse-yard while he had been standing there, because he had fixed his eyes upon it, and never moved them off once.

This was conclusive, and Mr. Wriggles was driven to the conviction that the highwaymen must have turned up towards Drury-lane.

Accordingly, without losing a moment, he made his way in that direction.

But, just as he was entering the alley, he met the other half of his men returning.

Upon asking them the reason, they said that they had come to the conclusion that the highwaymen had gone Lincoln's-inn Fields way, because the man on guard at the Drury-lane end of White Horse-yard had most solemnly declared the three highwaymen had not passed him.

Mr. Wriggles glared like a hyena in the face of the man who made this communication.

Then he uttered a dismal howl, and turned round two or three times upon his heels.

But that process did not seem to have much effect in clearing his brains.

Somehow or other the conviction crept over him that he had been "sold."

But how it occurred he could not for the life of him make out.

In such a state of rage and anger that he scarcely knew what he was about, he knocked his hat firmly on his head and ran back to the inn yard.

His men followed at his heels in a disorderly throng.

Arrived here, Mr. Wriggles looked once more about him.

But there was nothing more to see.

The officer, however, who had been knocked down, began by this time to evince symptoms of returning animation.

He was raised to his feet.

"Bring him in," shouted Wriggles. "Follow me. Bring him in, I say."

Thus speaking, the irate police-officer made his way back into the inn.

Upon entering the private parlour, he saw old Matthew, the landlord, seated in his chair just where he had left him.

He never once thought he had moved.

"Haven't you found them?" asked old Matthew, quietly.

The question seemed to exasperate the discomfited police-officer to the utmost degree.

He caught hold of his hat, and uttering a volley of curses, dashed it on the ground.

His wig followed, the only difference being that this was dashed down with even greater vehemence than the hat.

Then, in the extremity of his rage, he executed a kind of war-dance upon them, all the while pouring out curses with great volubility, until at length he was compelled to stop from sheer want of breath.

In the meantime the officer was led in, and sat down upon a chair.

One of his comrades took French leave with the brandy, and, pouring some from a bottle on the table, forced it down his throat.

The man gasped and coughed, and began to show signs of rapid recovery from his state of insensibility.

Old Matthew grew uneasy again.

He did not know how much this man might have seen, or how much he was in a position to tell.

Most fervently did he wish that Sixteen-String Jack had hit him a little harder.

But he would have to abide by the course of events, he could do no more just then but float like a straw upon the current.

The man was revived.

Then questioned.

At first his answers were rather confused, for his mind was not in a very lucid state.

All that could be elicited from the fellow, however, was this

He had seen the three highwaymen suddenly make their appearance in the yard.

Then one grappled with him, and while they were struggling another came up and knocked him down.

After that he recollected nothing, except that he had a remembrance of seeing three shadowy figures rush across the yard and open the gate.

Old Matthew drew a long breath.

He was safe.

Mr. Wriggles rubbed his bald pate with a puzzled air.

As yet he had elucidated nothing, or at all events, nothing but what had tended to confirm his own previous ideas on the subject.

He turned to old Matthew.

"You have had a narrow squeak this time, old fellow," he said. "The men I wanted were here, that's clear enough, although you so stoutly denied it, and they appear to have got away, but how I can't exactly make out. I shall soon hear tidings of them, never fear."

"Mr. Wriggles."

"What?"

"I wish you would leave me in peace."

"I daresay."

"Why do you persecute me like you do?"

"Ha! ha!"

"You have never found anything in my house."

"Through your cleverness."

"And never will."

"I hope so."

"You won't. As for these three highwaymen, if they did come in it was without my knowledge or contrivance, and if they hid themselves anywhere about the premises they appear to have got off and without my knowledge or contrivance, too, for have I not been seated here all the time?"

Mr. Wriggles could not deny the latter part of old Matthew's speech, but he considered the commencement of it was open to very grave doubt indeed.

However, he did not say a word about that, but merely remarked—

"I suppose I must give up the game this time, but mark me, my friend, I shall keep a very sharp look-out after you."

"Oh! never mind; don't trouble yourself about that," said Matthew.

"Oh! it's no trouble, I assure you."

"Well, if you don't like to spare yourself the trouble, I wish you would spare me the inconvenience of your visits."

"I daresay. But it's easy enough—you shouldn't find shelter for such gentry as you do."

"There you go again. You really are the most ridiculous man——"

"Well—well, Matthew," said Mr. Wriggles, assuming an off-hand air which sat with very bad grace upon him, "we will say no more about what has happened. I daresay they have got far enough off by this time, and are pretty safe. I am sorry I had any suspicions of you. Good morning, Matthew, good morning. Follow me, my men. We will be off, for we can do no more good here. Come—along, come along. Good morning, Matthew."

"Good morning. But are you really off?"

"Yes."

"Won't you have anything to drink?"

"Not now, thank you. We must be off, or the gentlemen we want will get too far away for us. Good morning."

In another moment Mr. Wriggles had gone, taking his men with him.

CHAPTER CCCXXII.

AFFAIRS GROW STILL MORE COMPLICATED AT THE "WHITE HORSE" INN, AND OUR FRIENDS FIND THAT THOUGH MR. WRIGGLES HAS GONE AWAY THEY ARE IN AS MUCH DANGER AS EVER.

No sooner, however, had Mr. Wriggles passed through the doorway, after having uttered the words with which the preceding chapter concluded, than old Matthew, who had never offered to move from his arm-chair, put his finger to the side of his nose, and perpetrated a series of knowing winks, although there was no one by to perceive them.

Then in a low voice he muttered, as well as a subdued chuckling laugh would let him—

"Not so green, Mr. W., not so green. Old Matthew wasn't born yesterday, and it would require a cleverer bit of acting than that to take him in. All right, my boy, you are done—done brown."

As he uttered these words, old Matthew rose quietly from his seat and crept stealthily across the parlour.

He could see into the bar, but not one of the officers were there—or at all events none were visible.

The worthy landlord was in a fright for fear the highwaymen should jump to the conclusion that now the officers had left the parlour the coast was clear, and injudiciously make their appearance.

He was equally in dread of communicating with them, and telling them to be sure not to move until he gave them permission to do so, for he had more than a suspicion that Mr. Wriggles had hit upon some clever scheme, and was about to play some very deep game indeed.

But whatever it was, we are not afraid of old Matthew being equal to it.

Mr. Wriggles' sudden change of manner, from the extreme of ungovernable rage to forced hilarity, was carefully noted by the landlord, and he drew his own conclusions from it.

Just at present, owing to being alive to the necessity of being well upon his guard, he felt himself to be in a quandary.

However, he felt the only thing he could do would be to rely upon the discretion of our friends. He fancied they would have too much good sense to emerge from their hiding-place until they were told it was safe for them to do so, especially after having such a narrow escape as they had.

Accordingly, he stepped into the bar.

Going to the window, from which a view of the passage and the front door could be obtained, he looked towards the street.

But there was no one about.

The police-officers certainly seemed as if they had left the premises.

From the bar window old Matthew made his way to the front door.

He looked up and down Drury-lane, first to the right and then to the left.

But there was not the least trace of any one of them visible.

While standing on the door-step, a man lounged up to him and said—

"Then you have got rid of your disagreeable visitors, Mr. Gale?"

Old Matthew turned round sharply, and looked keenly and suspiciously in the face of the man who had addressed these words to him.

He was a stranger—at least, the landlord had no recollection of having seen him before.

"Yes, they have gone I fancy."

"Oh! yes, I saw them myself."

"Oh! did you? Which way did they go?"

"Down Wych-street."

"Towards the Strand?"

"Yes."

"Oh! I didn't know which way they had gone. They have put me to a great deal of trouble, and I am glad enough to get rid of them."

"I daresay you are," said the man, with a knowing wink; "they didn't find who they wanted, did they?"

"No."

"You're a clever one, you are. I shall come to you when I am in trouble."

"Oh! shall you?"

"Yes, I know you will be able to hide me from the grabs safe enough."

"Don't you place too much confidence in me, my friend; but I must go in and put my house to rights, for they have upset everything."

"I don't s'pose they are very particular about what they do, eh?"

"Not very."

"Well, I'll just come in and wet my whistle."

Old Matthew would much have preferred his room to his company, but he could not tell him so without exciting his suspicion, and that was a thing to be most specially avoided.

So he said not a word, but walked in doors with the man close at his heels.

It is almost unnecessary to say that old Matthew suspected this man to be some agent of Wriggles.

But still he was not sure.

Matthew walked into the bar, and the man stood just at the little window through which the different liquors were served.

"I'll have a 'go' of gin," he said.

A small quantity of gin was put into a measure and handed to him.

The man seemed much inclined to stand and be talkative.

Leaning his hands upon the window-ledge, he looked at the door communicating with the parlour, which had been battered down by the police.

"They have been knocking the place about, I see," he said. "Now, do you want anybody to help you put your house in order, because, if you do, I'm your man? I have got no work to do to-day, and I'm a capital carpenter."

"No," said old Matthew. "I have a man that I always employ to do any jobs about the house."

As he spoke, Matthew fidgeted about the bar, and went into the parlour and came out again, but all to no purpose, there stood the man as provoking as possible, as though he did not intend to go for some time yet.

Old Matthew went out of the bar, and turned the key in the lock.

He directed his steps towards the back door.

While he was in sight of the man he sauntered along, but as soon as he felt sure he could not see him, he ran with great quickness across the yard to the bar-window looking out into it.

He got close to this and peeped in, allowing the smallest portion possible of his head to be seen.

He was well rewarded for his trouble.

The man who had drank the glass of gin gave a stealthy glance around him, and, seeing nothing, imagined the coast to be clear.

In a moment, then, and with the exertion of an agility really remarkable, the man raised himself on to the window-ledge.

Then he carefully and quickly lowered himself till he stood inside the bar.

Here, however, he did not hesitate, for doubtless he was aware of the necessity there was for being quick in his movements.

He glanced quickly round him, as though in search of some place of concealment.

He espied, just under the counter we have so often mentioned, a small cupboard.

The key was sticking in the lock.

He turned it, and opened the door.

The interior seemed to afford him satisfaction, and in much less time than it takes us to write it, he was inside the cupboard.

Then he pulled the door close after him, though, of course, he was unable to lock it.

Convinced that he had no more to see, old Matthew withdrew from his position at the window looking into the yard.

His suspicions were now fully realized.

He was sure beyond all doubt, that this man was a spy employed by Mr. Wriggles to watch for the spot where the highwaymen were concealed.

Matthew could not divest himself of the idea that there was at least one police-officer concealed, either in the bar itself or else somewhere close at hand.

He had still a very difficult part to play.

The officers were by no means foiled yet.

The most important and necessary thing for him to do was to give warning to the highwaymen, and let them know what was taking place.

But how to do this was the difficulty.

Suddenly old Matthew thought of communicating with them through the secret door which opened into the yard.

When the thought occurred to him, he was quite at a loss to think how it was it had not crossed his mind before.

However, there was plenty of time yet for it to be acted upon.

Matthew stepped across the yard, and as a precautionary measure, secured the door.

Having done this, he looked about him, but he could not see anyone.

Going then, to the secret door, the exact position of which was well known to him, he knocked upon it in a significant manner.

Then he said, in a low voice, and yet he spoke in a tone loud enough to reach the ears of those for whom it was intended—

"It is I—Matthew. Open the door a little way, but silently. Make no noise. I have something important to say to you."

"What is it?"

"There is danger."

The words were uttered with great rapidity.

He put his mouth close to the crevice of the door as he spoke.

He was heard.

Tom King, as silently as he possibly could, withdrew the little bolt, and opened the door to the extent of about half-an-inch.

Conversation was now an easy matter.

"What is it, Matthew?" asked Tom King; "did you say there was danger?"

"Yes."

"Imminent?"

"Very."

"What next?"

"Listen to me."

"We are all attention."

"You have not moved?"

"No."

"Nor attempted to get out?"

"No."

"That's fortunate."

"You give quite a sigh of relief."

"And well I might."

"Why?"

"Old Wriggles has gone."

"We heard him."

"I mean he has pretended to go."

"Oh!"

"And he is in hopes of catching us. But patience. You keep still where you are, and leave the rest to me. I'll be a match for him, I'll warrant."

"And so will I. We are much beholden to you, Matthew."

"Oh! don't mention it."

"We won't move."

"No, pray don't, until I come to the door and give you permission, or you will spoil all."

"But you won't keep us in here longer than is necessary?"

"Not a moment."

"That's all right, then."

"Now I'm off. There's a man concealed in the bar."

"The devil there is. Do you think he can hear us?"

"No."

"I breathe again. What are you going to do with him? How shall you manage?"

"Leave that to me."

"I can do that safely, I know."

"If I dont' give him pepper, and make him wish he had never seen the 'White Horse' in his life, call me a Dutchman."

With these words, which perhaps the vanity of the landlord was not free from thinking were very appropriate ones to close a conversation with, he closed the door, and directly afterwards had the satisfaction of hearing the little bolt shot into its socket.

With great deliberation Matthew crossed the yard.

"Now for the gentlemen in the cupboard. It will do me good, that will. It almost makes my eyes water when I think of it."

What excellent plan it was which old Matthew had devised for the discomfiture of the spy, we shall very quickly see.

Having crossed the yard, he entered the house by the legitimate back door.

But he did not go direct to the bar.

On the contrary, after having given one glance to see that all was right, he proceeded a few paces along a passage, until he came to a flight of stairs leading to some underground region.

It was to the kitchen.

[JUDGE HOLLYOAK'S INTERVIEW WITH DICK TURPIN.]

Entering the place, which was in a state of semi-darkness, he directed his steps to the fireplace in search of something.

What it was could not be seen at first, but presently he lifted off the coals a kettle.

It was a large kettle.

From the careful way in which he had handled it, and from the fact of his carrying it at arm's length, one might easily come to the conclusion that it was full of boiling water.

And such, indeed, was the case, and when the worthy landlord emerged into the passage, where it was somewhat lighter, clouds of vapour could be seen issuing from the spout and from the lid, which kept fluttering up and down.

In this place old Matthew's face could be caught a glimpse of, and its expression noted.

His eyes were twinkling, and very bright.

His mouth was distorted into a grin.

Altogether, any one looking at him would have come to the conclusion that he meditated some very capital practical joke, or, at all events, that he was bent upon mischief of some sort.

So he was, and, not only that, he meant to have a little revenge as well.

Crossing the passage, he paused a moment at the bar-door while he unlocked it.

Then entering, he put the kettle of hot water down on the counter, at the same time muttering in a half-audible tone, some disrespectful remarks about Mr. Wriggles.

CHAPTER CCCXXIII.

OLD MATTHEW HAS HIS REVENGE UPON THE SPY CONCEALED IN THE CUPBOARD.

If the unfortunate spy who had so cleverly concealed himself in the cupboard had had the least idea of what kind of fate was awaiting him, he would not have stopped there, screwed up into a most uncomfortable position, a moment longer, but, risking all, he would have made a clear bound out, and got as far away from the "White Horse" as he could, in the smallest possible space of time.

But, alas! the spy was in utter ignorance of the doom which was impending over him, and, so far from feeling any presentiment or dread, he was felicitating himself upon the great success which had attended his clever manœuvre.

He was safe, he thought, and, from his capital place of concealment, all he had got to do was to watch all that was done, and take notice when the highwaymen appeared and were well off their guard.

The instructions given him by Mr. Wriggles—for that individual was firmly of opinion that the highwaymen were concealed somewhere about the premises—were to keep strict watch, and, when the favourable opportunity arrived, to blow a whistle shrill which he carried about him.

Mr. Wriggles and his men would take care to be somewhere close at hand, so that they could hear the signal as soon as it was given.

This was a very excellent plan, and great credit is due to Mr. Wriggles for having so promptly devised it.

One thing only was necessary to its success, and that was that the spy should hide himself somewhere and not be seen.

Now the spy was quite confident he had done this, although much easier than he could have hoped for.

But as we are aware, old Matthew peeped through the window and saw him.

Such was precisely the aspect which affairs presented upon that very memorable day, or rather evening, for night was fast closing in.

"Hullo!" said old Matthew, as he put down the kettle on the bar counter in the manner we have recorded. "I wonder where the chap is that had the go of gin. Oh! here's his glass, so I suppose he has gone. Confound him, if he had stayed I would have set him on at this door, for the sooner I get it mended the better I shall be pleased."

The spy was almost ready to groan when he heard the landlord utter these words, and he fervently wished he had stopped a little longer, for, of course, while employed in the capacity mentioned, he would have a much better chance of performing his mission.

But still, he tried to make himself content, and over and over again congratulated himself that Matthew had no suspicion of him, and that least of all he had an idea he was concealed in the cupboard.

By accident, apparently, Matthew managed to kick against the cupboard door, which was a little way ajar, and then in the most natural way in the world he muttered something about the door being unlocked.

At the same moment he stooped down, and pressing the door, shut it, and turned the key in the lock.

The spy was fast.

Old Matthew's face beamed all over with satisfaction.

As for the man in the cupboard, he could in no way interfere with what Matthew had done, though he mentally uttered some very diabolical curses upon his head.

Still he was impressed with the idea that his presence was quite unsuspected.

We have all seen a cat play with a mouse before destroying it, and we suppose it was some such feeling which prompted old Matthew to dally with the officer when he might have done what he wanted to do at once.

Time was precious, however.

The top of the little cupboard formed a part of the bar counter.

Old Matthew moved aside the different articles upon it, and then, just in the centre of the top of the cupboard was a round hole about three quarters of an inch in diameter, into which a cork had been very tightly fitted like a plug, and the top cut off so as to be on a level with the rest of the counter.

This hole had been stopped up in the manner described because there was now no longer any use for it.

But, previous to some alterations that had been made, this hole was used to carry off whatever quantity of liquor was spilt, and for this purpose a pitcher was placed in the cupboard immediately under the hole, so as to receive all that ran through.

But now another place had been made, and a pipe was attached to it, which was a very great improvement, and much more convenient and clear than the old method.

Matthew, however, as soon as the counter was cleared, seemed as though he was about to revive the use of it, for he took down a corkscrew which hung on a hook, and, inserting the point into the cork, proceeded to draw it just as he would out of a bottle.

This he did without much trouble, although it had been fixed in its present position for a very long time.

As soon as the cork was out of the hole, he took a funnel, or tundish, and put the end of it in.

What the spy thought of all this is hard to say.

He was a prisoner.

Doubtless he heard old Matthew at work above him, though he would not be able to conjecture what he was about, nor, doubtless, would the ray of light which streamed through the hole above tend to enlighten him in any way.

He certainly did not anticipate the horrible fate of which he was soon to be made a victim.

It must be understood that the cupboard was of very limited dimensions.

The bottom of it was on the floor, and the height to the top about four feet.

It had no shelf dividing it—the inside was quite empty.

As for the width and depth of it, those dimensions just allowed the spy to squeeze himself into it, though in a very huddled-up fashion.

From this it will be seen that he occupied nearly the whole of the interior of the cupboard.

Old Matthew's plan must now be manifest, or, at all events, guessed at.

Having fixed the tundish into the hole in the counter, just as he would have fixed it into the neck of a bottle he wanted to fill, he raised the kettle of boiling water, and poured it into the vessel as fast as he could.

Of course, the result of this was the scalding fluid ran in a heavy and continuous stream on to the officer.

A horrible howl, which echoed and re-echoed through the building, was the result.

Then the officer commenced a violent struggle to release himself.

No flesh and blood could stand such treatment as that.

Old Matthew, however, took no notice.

With the utmost composure he continued emptying the boiling water out of the kettle.

When full, it held about a gallon, and it was little short of that quantity which the landlord emptied upon the spy.

It must have been dreadful to have received it. In the position he occupied, he must have been scalded from head to foot.

The officer made a terrible clamour.

He yelled, and shrieked, and struggled, and fought.

But all to no purpose.

Old Matthew had him secure.

Then the spy, maddened with pain, put the whistle to his lips, which he had all the time held conveniently in his grasp, and, concentrating all his energies into one blast, he blew it with such shrillness that old Matthew was fain to drop the kettle and stop his ears with his hands.

Having done this, the spy commenced afresh his efforts to release himself from his uncomfortable situation.

But the signal had been heard.

Mr. Wriggles and his men, who were lying in wait close at hand, as soon as the shrill, piercing sound reached their ears, felt confident that the trick had succeeded, and that the highwaymen were at last as good as in their power, so they rushed pell mell into the bar.

They arrived just in time to hear some furious yells, which came with full force of bodily anguish from the lips of the spy, and to see the cupboard shaken visibly.

Old Matthew assumed a look of the utmost surprise, curiosity, and dismay.

Before Mr. Wriggles could do more than glare about him—at any rate, before he could utter a word, there was a terrible crash.

The cupboard door was dashed open.

Out rolled the spy.

"Murder," he shouted. "Oh! murder! Fire! The devil! Oh!—oh!—oh! Murder! Fire!"

"A man—a man," cried old Matthew, acting as though he knew nothing. "You have arrived just in time, Mr.

Wriggles. Seize him. Seize that man. Take him into custody. He is a thief, doubtless, and has concealed himself on my premises, intending to rob me. But, fortunately, an accident has discovered him. Take him into custody, Mr. Wriggles—take him into custody. I give him in charge."

"Murder," roared the spy. "Oh! murder. I'm murdered. I have been murdered with boiling oil. Oh! murder. The devil."

Now, Mr. Wriggles could tell to a trifle just what had taken place, but, nevertheless, he said, in his off-hand, blustering way,

"What's the meaning of all this?"

"Why, Mr. Wriggles," began the spy.

"Silence," said the officer, in a voice of thunder.

"I'll tell you all about it," said old Matthew, working himself up into a state of the utmost excitement. "I'll state the charge. Take him into custody. See that he does not escape."

"Do not make such a row," said Wriggles, with a frown which old Matthew enjoyed mightily. "Tell me what you have to say."

Mr. Wriggles found himself in rather a disagreeable predicament.

Old Matthew knew he had got him "in a hole," as he called it, and he determined to make the most he possibly could of the advantage he had gained.

"It's a most fortunate thing you came in just as you did. I wanted to clean down my place here after your visit, and see, there is the kettle I went to fetch to do it with. When I went out I left that man drinking gin at the bar-window, and when I came back his glass was there, but he was gone, so I supposed he had finished his draught and left the house. But it seems I was wrong. In doing down the counter, some of the hot water went down that hole, and then I heard a most awful howling. I was scared, I can tell you, when you came in, and then the cupboard was dashed open, as you saw. I give that man into your custody as a Bow-street officer. My charge against him is concealing himself on my premises with intent to commit a robbery."

Old Matthew uttered this long speech with the utmost volubility.

It was in vain Mr. Wriggles and the spy strove interjectionally to stop the current of his eloquence. He would not stay until he was compelled to do so by the exhausted condition of his lungs.

"Now look here, Matthew," said Mr. Wriggles, "you are a very clever fellow, and I give you credit for it. But don't come it too strong."

"No, d—n it!" yelled the spy. "I am all of a blister from head to heel."

"Silence," said Mr. Wriggles.

"Yes, sir—oh! yes, sir. But if you had only been in that infernal cupboard, and had a gallon of boiling water poured on to you like I have, you would not take it so d—d easy. Oh! curses."

A fresh accession of intolerable pain brought a volley of most horrible imprecations from his lips.

"Silence," said Mr. Wriggles again.

The discomfited spy's curses subsided into groans.

"Now, Matthew," continued Mr. Wriggles, addressing the landlord, "you have carried this game on very well, and so far you have been victorious, but you can't carry the joke any further. Of course you know and I know what it all amounts to. You have outwitted me this time. I sent my man to keep watch, but I suppose he played his part so clumsily that you detected the deception."

Old Matthew gave one of his most knowing winks, and put his finger to the side of his nose in a very sagacious manner.

"You don't get the better of me very easily, Mr. W., I can tell you that. I suppose, however, it's no good my telling you that those you want are not here?"

"Not a bit of good."

"I thought not. You are a most unreasonable man. Well, I tell you so again, and you can do as you like about believing me. But, whether they are here or whether they are not, you will have to try some very good scheme before you catch them. So, for the present, I should advise you to give it up."

"I suppose we must. But, mark me, I am not more sure that I am an officer than I am that you have got the highwaymen hidden somewhere on the premises. Don't deny it!—it's no good you doing so. Now, I give you warning, I will surround this house in such a manner that not a soul shall leave it without my knowledge."

"You are free to do just as you like about that. I should advise you, though, not to try the dodge on of sending a man in, or he might get into trouble."

"Yes, curse me!" said the spy, whose hurts were really of a very serious character indeed; "curse me, if ever I get into a cupboard again."

"I should think not, my friend," repned Matthew. "Now, Mr. Wriggles, don't let's have any ill-will about this matter. You have done your best and I have done mine, so that's all right. Let's shake hands, and have a glass together."

"I don't mind if I do," said Mr. Wriggles. "for I have had almost enough of it this time."

"If you haven't, I know who has," said the spy, with a dolorous groan. "Whatever shall I do?"

Mr. Wriggles and old Matthew were unfeeling enough to laugh.

CHAPTER CCCXXIV.

OLD MATTHEW ACHIEVES A COMPLETE VICTORY OVER MR. WRIGGLES, AND HOLDS A CONSULTATION WITH THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN RESPECTING DICK TURPIN'S SITUATION IN NEWGATE.

It looked rather strange to see all the officers, Mr. Wriggles included, sit down in the parlour in the very seats our friends had occupied such a short time before, and throwing off all appearance of enmity, proceed to enjoy themselves.

Willingly enough old Matthew covered the table with plenty of drinkables of every description, and then he sat down at the table himself.

They were, now business was over, the best friends imaginable, and no one to have looked at them would have believed that they had so lately occupied such antagonistic positions with each other.

Such a scene as we are describing is, perhaps, one that would not be met with now.

On the whole, the police regulations of the present day are vastly superior to those of the good old times.

The police-officers and old Matthew were now hail fellows well met. They laughed, and talked, and smoked, and told tales; and in fact, enjoyed themselves, as Shakspeare has it, to the "top of their bent."

As for the highwaymen, cooped up as they were in the narrow recess, they were anything but jolly and comfortable while the officers were enjoying themselves, and they heartily wished them at the bottom of the sea.

However, as everything must have an end, excepting a circle, this carouse of the officers was at length brought to a conclusion, and they separated at length with expressions of the utmost goodwill towards each other.

As soon as they were gone—and old Matthew took care to see that every one went out—he fastened up the front door, determined for that night at least, as he had no company, to shut up the house.

Having done this, he, with a great deal of reconnoitering, and watching, and prying into out-of-the-way nooks and corners, to make sure no one was hiding, went to the secret door in the wall and gave our friends permission to emerge.

They were heartily glad to do so, though they had kept their promise to the letter, and had not made the slightest attempt to come out, though they had the power of doing so.

But, having once got permission, the reader may be sure they did not lose any time, but stepped out into the bar, and stretched their limbs with the appearance of great relief.

And certainly they had found it very irksome to remain so long in one position without being able to move, though they preferred doing that to being captured.

They hastened, however, to press round old Matthew and congratulate him upon the success he had met with all through the adventure, and expressed their gratitude for the magnitude of the service he had rendered them.

Then they sat down—the table was cleared, the fire replenished, fresh pipes brought in, and then they were quite comfortable.

The only thing which cast a gloom over their spirits was the circumstance of Dick Turpin being a prisoner in Newgate.

It was only in a confused, impartial manner that our friends had heard what had taken place, so they would have old Mathew to tell all from beginning to end, which he did with a very great deal of willingness, for he had imbibed just sufficient to make him feel pleased at hearing himself talk.

Our friends were content to laugh heartily at the graphic description he gave of the agonies of the spy, and they could not withhold the admiration which they felt for the worthy landlord's capital plan of serving him out.

They were all quite inclined to think Mr. Wriggles was defeated, and that they would not be troubled with him for some time to come.

Whether they were right or not will very quickly appear.

They were jolly enough now about him, and exulted over his failure, for they knew he could not make another razzia upon the inn without their having ample notice of it, because all the doors were secured.

Their mirth waxed fast and furious.

It was Tom King who, in a manner of speaking, recalled them to themselves.

He spoke in a serious tone of voice.

"It's not just the thing for us to be here enjoying ourselves as we are and never so much as giving a thought about our absent companion!"

"That's very true," chimed in old Mathew, his voice becoming grave in a moment, for Dick Turpin was a special favourite with him, and he would gladly have incurred any amount of danger or personal inconvenience provided it was the means of doing him a service. "It's very true we ought not to be laughing and talking about nothing at all, like we have been, but we ought to avail ourselves to the utmost of the favourable chance presented to us of having a little quiet conversation together. I vote that before we separate we come to some sort of conclusion as to what is the best thing to be done."

"Hear, hear! Matthew," said the three friends in chorus.

"Bravo, Matthew! we quite agree with you."

"Very good, gentlemen, then what do you propose?"

"Let us consider a little first before we make a proposition," said Claude Duval.

"If I recollect right," remarked Sixteen-String Jack, "Tom King was in the act of saying something to us when his speech was interrupted by the officers breaking in."

"You are quite correct," said Tom King, seriously; "I was in the act of announcing my determination, and if you will allow me, I will resume where I left off."

"Hear—hear."

"Stop a moment," said old Matthew. "I have an amendment to propose."

"What is it?"

"You will excuse me for speaking?"

"Oh! of course. Let us hear what you were going to say."

"Well, then, gentlemen, since we had our conversation this afternoon, so many things have occurred that I declare they have quite driven all I have heard out of my head. Now, you must be something the same, so, in my humble judgment, it will be the best for all parties to make a fresh beginning, and reconsider the matter from the commencement."

"Agreed, Matthew, agreed. So we will."

The landlord complacently resumed his pipe and leant back in his chair, prepared to pay the utmost attention to all that might be said.

"Now we will retrace our steps," said Tom King, "but I don't think we need go any further back than this. You told us Dick was in Newgate, and all the events which had conspired to bring him there."

"Yes, I did."

"We may begin at that point, then."

"Very good."

"Well, then, continue."

"As I said before," resumed old Matthew, "as soon as I heard what was o'clock I started off to Newgate, in the hopes of being able to obtain an interview with Dick, and ask him how he was, and see that he wanted nothing, but when I got to the wicket, the man on the look knew me, and wouldn't let me in."

"What a shame."

"That's what I said, but it was no use. I tried all manner of schemes to get admission, but they all failed."

"It seems they keep a very good guard".

"They do. They mean to keep him safe if they possibly can. You see, Dick has done such a many daring, desperate things in his lifetime, and the officers have never been able to lay hold of him once."

"He was very lucky."

"But, now they have got him into their clutches, they won't let him go very easily, I can tell you."

"We shall see, Matthew. Do you recollect what conclusion we came to before the officers interrupted us?"

"What was it?"

"Why, that as Dick Turpin was in Newgate, we must get him out."

"Just so."

"Now, from what you have just said, I opine that will be a very difficult matter."

"It won't be the easiest thing in the world, certainly."

"But never mind, Matthew, we don't mind running the gauntlet of a little danger, provided we can save a comrade's life by doing so, and, as for you, I know you have the wit and the cleverness to devise some scheme which we can carry out."

"Really, gentlemen, you flatter me—you do, indeed," said old Matthew, putting his hand upon his heart, and bowing in a deprecatory manner.

"No—no, not a bit of it, Matthew. Yours was capital scheme to convey a couple of files into Newgate, when I was confined there. A capital scheme!"

"I'll try what I can do," said old Matthew.

"One thing is certain," said Tom King. "If we are to do any good for Dick as regards effecting his freedom, we must establish some means of communication with him, and in my judgment that is the first thing that ought to be done."

"It seems very necessary."

"I think so. But how is it to be done?"

"It will be difficult."

"We might get hold of a turnkey who was friendly to Dick, and by means of bribes win him over to our interest. But the worst of it is, there is no trusting them."

"There is not. I should feel inclined to say no to that proposal at once. They would lead you on, ten to one, and at the last moment turn against you and ruin all."

"But if we discard them," said Sixteen-String Jack, "what are we to do?"

"I will tell you," replied Tom King, "and that will just bring the conversation round again to where I left off."

"What is it?"

"Do you remember the time I was in Newgate?"

"Of course."

"Well, then, didn't Dick disguise himself as a farmer, and passing himself off as my father, pay me a visit?"

"He did," replied old Matthew, "though I used every argument I could think of against it. It was all to no purpose, however—go he would."

"Certainly he did, and we had an interview together."

"Yes, but just think of the risk he ran in doing it, and what a narrow escape of capture he had."

"I know all about that; but he got off freely enough."

"By little less than a miracle."

"It doesn't matter how it was, so that he did get off."

"Well—what of it?"

"I shall just put it to all of you impartially," said Tom King, "and ask you for your decision."

"Very good."

"Not that your decision, if it goes against me, will have the slightest effect in turning me from what I intend to do."

"That's good—but go on."

"This is the point. Dick Turpin having visited me when I was a prisoner, in order to give me a chance of making my escape, do you think I ought to allow myself to be outdone by him?"

"Outdone by him?"

"Yes. Certainly not—that's your reply, of course; and if it isn't, it's mine. When I was talking to Dick about it, I said 'I am heartily obliged to you, comrade, and whenever I have the chance I will return the compliment.'

"'Do you mean visit me in my cell?' Dick asked.

"'Yes,' said I.

"'Then you'll never have the chance.'

"'Why not?' I asked. 'You must not be too confident. If you have escaped hitherto, it does not follow that you always should.'

"'I know that, Tom,' he said, 'but I have made a determination, and I have expressed it many a time. It is that I will never yield myself a prisoner, but fight to the last gasp, so you see, Tom, although I am much obliged to you for your offer, you will never have a chance of returning your compliment, because I shall never be in Newgate alive.'"

"I have heard Dick say a similar thing," said Matthew.

"And so have I," said Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

"But you see, friends," continued Tom King, "that, contrary to his expectations, he is where he made up his mind he never would be."

"That's true. We none of us know what we may come to. But now, Tom, you may as well speak out at once. I know very well what you are going to say."

"You can form a pretty good guess, no doubt."

"There should be no guess work about the matter. Come, speak up."

"Well, then, what I have firmly made up my mind to do, is to go to Newgate and pay Dick a visit."

"I knew it," said old Matthew, "I knew it."

"Well, then, my friends, now that I have announced my determination, do not try, any of you, to get up arguments against it. If you do, they will have no effect upon me, so far as making me change my determination is concerned, and they might perhaps unnerve me, for I know to the full the dangers of my undertaking."

"I hope you do."

"I am sure I do. I have thought the matter over thoroughly from first to last."

"I am sorry your mind is so firmly made up, and that you are resolved not to listen to reason, for I should have liked to have had a try at persuading you to give up the notion, but, as it is, I suppose the best thing I can do is to spare my breath."

"Quite the best thing. And now, what I want you to particularly bear in mind is, that I am not going to return the compliment, as I call it, just for the mere bravado of the thing, but I shall do a great deal of good."

Old Matthew did not speak, but shook his head.

"Listen to me," said Tom King, eager that they should be convinced by his arguments, "listen to me. You have agreed upon the necessity of communicating with Dick, now who could you find better qualified to do that than myself? I could hear all he had to say, and bring it back to you. We should then be able to agree as to what must be done."

"I am afraid the risk is too great, Tom," said Claude Duval. "You yourself have admitted how sharp a look-out they keep."

"I know."

"And, besides that," said Sixteen-String Jack, "you may depend every one who pays a visit to Dick will be very closely scrutinized indeed. Not only that, but they will have the recollection of the trick Dick played them such a short time ago, and therefore they will be doubly on the alert."

"I don't dispute that," said Tom King.

CHAPTER CCCXXV.

TOM KING RESOLVES TO DISGUISE HIMSELF IN FEMALE APPAREL, AND TO PAY A VISIT TO DICK TURPIN IN HIS CELL IN NEWGATE.

"You speak in a very confident tone, Tom," said Claude Duval, "and from that I argue that you have got some good scheme on hand, by which you think you will be able to get the better of the officials of Newgate?"

Tom nodded.

"In fact," added Sixteen-String Jack, "I recollect you said something about it."

"Did I?" said King. "Well, then, without further preface, I'll let you know in a word or two what I intend to do."

"That's the sort," said old Matthew; "I am dying to hear it."

"Well, if you can suggest any improvement in the plan I am going to lay before you, I shall be very glad indeed, and also ready to modify it if necessary; but don't throw cold water on it or try to make me give it up altogether."

"We won't; begin."

"I will. In the first place, then, I intend to pay Dick a personal visit in his cell. You quite understand that, don't you?"

"Quite."

"As we have every reason to believe the utmost vigilance will be exercised, therefore the necessity of disguise becomes immediately obvious. You grant that, don't you?"

"Oh! yes."

"That point being conceded, then, we pass on to the next. In consequence of the extraordinary vigilance anticipated, the disguise, if it is to be effectual, must be a most excellent one."

"There's the difficulty. You will be scrutinized too closely for any disguise to stand it."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes. With disguises you must bear this thing in mind. If there is no suspicion directed towards you, well and good, but, if people are on the look out, they will penetrate your disguise and detect you."

"Just leave that part of the question for the present, and listen to what further I have got to say. I will answer your objections presently."

"Go on, then."

"Assuming the difficulty of disguising myself to be very great, we will proceed to consider what kind of disguise would be least likely to be suspected."

"That is a point to be considered, certainly."

"It is a very important point, indeed, and one that requires the utmost consideration."

"Have you considered it?"

"Yes."

"I thought so. What disguise have you chosen?"

"A woman's apparel."

"A woman's apparel?"

"Yes. You know I am thin and slightly made, then my face is small, and my features small also. Altogether I think you will find I shall make up as a woman first-rate."

"I shouldn't wonder now," said Old Matthew, as he surveyed the lithesome form of the young highwayman, which had a decidedly feminine appearance. "I congratulate you upon your scheme. It's a good one, and ought to succeed."

"I think it will succeed. The Newgate officials may have their suspicions, but I fancy they will never fancy looking for Tom King, the highwayman, in the disguise of a woman."

"No, perhaps not."

"Now, Claude and Jack, what do you think?"

"Why, a good deal better of the scheme altogether than I have done all along."

"I am glad to hear that. And now, Matthew, I want your assistance."

"You can have it to the full extent of my power."

"I know I can."

"What is it you want to know?"

"Why, can you tell me any one who would be able to furnish me with a good disguise, or could you tell me where I could get one."

"Well, rather."

"You can."

"Oh! I forgot for the moment. I thought you had already made the acquaintance of my old friend the costumier."

"No, I have not."

"But we have," said Claude and Jack. "He disguised us when we went to hear your trial."

"Oh! did he?"

"Yes, and what's more," said old Matthew Gale, "he disguised Turpin on the occasion when he paid a visit to you in your cell."

"Then he is very clever in his art, that's all I can say; for I didn't know Dick until he spoke."

"He is very clever. You see he has been connected with the theatre all his life, and been accustomed to dress the actors for their different parts, so you see he has acquired a kind of proficiency."

"I understand."

"You can safely leave the matter to him. If any one can disguise you beyond all power of recognition, he can

"I am glad to receive these assurances, because it makes my task all the lighter, and diminishes the difficulties. Now, do you think he could make me up to look like a respectable female?"

"I have not the least doubt of it. Now I come to look at you I find your appearance is decidedly feminine."

"So much the better, then."

"Tom, I don't mind telling you I have a much better opinion of your plan than I have had."

"Hurrah!"

"And upon mature consideration, I think there are some chances of its being successful."

"I think so too," said Tom. "And now the only thing I want is the approval of my comrades here."

"Will you permit me to say a word?" asked Sixteen-String Jack.

"A dozen, if you wish it. My desire is to hear all you can possibly say upon the subject."

"Well then, I admit, of course, that it is necessary, if we are to rescue Dick Turpin, we must open a means of communicating with him, but I am sadly afraid the officials at Newgate will keep too sharp a look-out for us to manage it."

"And then," said Claude Duval, "you must recollect who is the governor of Newgate. It is Mr. Cawthorn. He got the appointment through looking extra sharp after his prisoners, and you may depend he will try to retain it by adopting the same means, and being on the watch for every one who enters. You will have a good deal of trouble in passing him undetected."

"I can't help thinking that you magnify the danger, though you must not think that I do not place proper value upon it."

"The real fact of the matter is this," said Matthew Gale. "We don't like to run the risk of losing you, and we think the chances of our doing so are very great—that's it."

"I know it is, and I feel very grateful to you. I quite understand it. But we must think of duty. We are banded together, and one of the conditions of our union is, that we mutually aid and assist each other. Now, as for rescuing Dick, I consider it to be my especial duty to do so."

"You must be very careful."

"You may depend upon that."

"If they were to detect you, and confine you in a cell as well as Dick, we should be very awkwardly placed."

"So you would, Jack, but I will try my best to provide against such a contingency as that. And now, Matthew, what about this costumier? Where shall I find him?"

"I will find him."

"But I shall have to go to his house."

"Oh! dear no. He lives close by, in Bow-street, next door to Covent Garden Theatre."

"Will he come here?"

"Yes; in the first place to have a look at you; then he will go back to his warehouse, and return with all the articles necessary for disguising you."

"Capital. Why, when I was ready, you could call a hackney-coach to the door, and I could get into it without any one being the wiser."

"Oh! yes; you could do that."

"Come, I have better hopes than ever."

"But do not elate yourself too much. In an ordinary case I should say success was certain. Being dressed as a female, you could keep a veil down over your face, and that would prevent any one seeing your features very distinctly."

"Good again. But why shouldn't this case succeed?"

"Well, if you must know, I think you will be examined so closely that it will be impossible for you to avoid being found out."

"We must try that, and now I propose that we separate, and try to get a few hours' repose before daylight. It is no good for us to lay our plans any further until I have seen Dick, and brought back word what he says, and then we shall be able to speak decisively."

"So we shall."

"Until then speculation is useless."

"There is one thing which I should very much like to know."

"What?"

"Why, where Dick Turpin's mare Black Bess is."

"Don't you know?"

"No; do you?"

"Of course not, but I thought, to be sure, you would know where she was."

"But I don't, and I have no more idea than you have. I often feel anxious when I think about it. It is to be hoped she is somewhere safe."

"Yes, if anything was to happen to her, I do believe Turpin would give up at once if he was to lose his mare."

"She is certainly a beautiful creature. If she was mine, I should prize her quite as much as he does."

"So should I."

"I have taken care of her many a time," said old Matthew, "and I was very fond of her."

"I should be inclined to think she was safe," said Tom King, after a pause.

"Why so?"

"Because Dick Turpin seems to have gone into the court deliberately. I mean, he had fully made up his mind what he was going to do, from which we may argue that he had calculated all the chances of his position, and come to the conclusion that there was at least a doubt about his coming out again. Such, then, being, in all probability, the case, he took care to bestow his mare, Black Bess, somewhere where she could remain in perfect security."

"That is very good reasoning," said the landlord, "and it carries conviction along with it. I have no doubt that it is just what Dick has done."

"Well, we shall know that when I see him," said Tom King, "for I will take care to make some very particular inquiries upon the subject; and when I return I will tell you all about it."

"I hope you will."

"Do not be down-hearted, Matthew; I have faith in the power of your friend to disguise me efficiently, and I have faith in my own powers to keep up the character I shall assume."

"Well, I hope you will. Of course, the great stake you have in the case will insure your being careful; and when you see Dick, be sure you ask him very particularly about the promise he made to the judge."

"I will."

"I mean as to the precise nature of it, for upon that a great deal will depend."

"Trust me for that. And now, as I said just now, let us seek a little repose, for I can assure you I feel greatly in need of it."

"I daresay you do. I am ready whenever you are."

"Stop a minute," said Claude Duval, "I have an amendment to propose."

"Speak."

"In the morning we cannot tell what may happen, and the chances are a thousand to one against our having such a good chance of consulting together as we have got now, so I propose we devote a few minutes to the consideration of a point which seems to have been entirely overlooked or disregarded."

"What is it, Claude?"

"Why, this: you cannot disguise the fact that there is, to say the least, a probability of your disguise being detected and yourself made a prisoner!"

"There certainly is a probability, but"——

"Never mind. I know what you are going to say. I think, as there is a probability, we ought to take it into our calculation, and determine what should be done in the event of your being detained a prisoner."

"And very right, too," said old Matthew. "The design promises well, but it may fail. There can be no harm in making up our minds as to what we should do under the circumstances proposed."

"Certainly not," said Tom King, though, by the indifferent tone in which he spoke, it could be told that he thought it rather an unnecessary precaution.

But it was not, as events will prove.

"I think," said Claude, "we can put it in this way. If you do not return by a certain time, we may come to the conclusion that you are nabbed."

"How long will you give me?"

"Till to-morrow night. If you are not back by dark we shall make up our minds you are a prisoner."

"Very well."

"You may then depend upon us, without loss of time, setting about procuring your freedom, and taking those steps which are the likeliest to answer the end aimed at."

"Very good, but I hope to save you the trouble."

"And you can easily believe we don't want to have it."

"Of course you don't."

"Well, gentlemen," said old Matthew, as he knocked the ashes out of his pipe, "I think we have done all we can do, and the best thing now will be to get a good rest, in order to be equal to any fatigue which you may be put to."

"I am sure that will be the best," said Tom King.

"Then, gentlemen, as you are all so unanimous, be good enough to follow me, and I think I can promise you a good night's rest."

"I don't think Mr. Wriggles will trouble us again."

"Nor do I. You need fear nothing, however, on the score of capture."

"Why not?"

"Neither Mr. Wriggles or any one else could get into the house without my knowing of it plenty time enough to bestow you in some safe spot."

"That's a comfort, certainly, and as we have all the greatest confidence in you, we shall go to sleep without the slightest apprehension."

"You can safely do so, for I can assure you you will come to no harm under my roof while I am alive."

"I quite believe that, Matthew."

"Come this way, then," said the landlord, as he preceded them up the stairs and showed them into a comfortable sleeping apartment.

CHAPTER CCCXXVI.

TOM KING IS DETECTED IN HIS DISGUISE, AND ONCE MORE BECOMES THE TENANT OF A NEWGATE CELL.

THE night passed away without the occurrence of any event tending to disturb the three highwaymen, who therefore slept well and soundly—for such was the faith they had in the fidelity of old Matthew, and his power to shield them from any danger which presented itself, that they felt not the least apprehension.

When morning came the friendly landlord had a substantial meal laid for our friends in one of the upper rooms in the house, where they would be less likely to meet with molestation or interruption.

"I have sent for the old costumier," he said, as he came into the room after the highwaymen had dispatched their meal.

"That's right," said Tom King. "When will he be here?"

"He sent word back that he would come directly," replied Matthew, "so he is sure not to be long."

"The sooner the better. What time is it now?"

"Nearly nine."

"It is full early yet—I thought it was much later."

At this moment the faint tinkling of a bell somewhere in the lower regions of the house reached the ears of the little party.

"What does that mean?" asked Claude.

"Oh! it's all right. It means that the costumier has come; I will go down and fetch him."

Old Matthew departed, and shortly afterwards made his appearance, bringing the old costumier with him, who has already been more than once or twice introduced to the reader of this narrative.

In his usual cringing manner he made a low bow, and desired to learn the gentleman's pleasure.

Tom King informed him how he wished to be disguised, and also stated what a close scrutiny he expected would be made of it, so that he would require him to exert his utmost skill.

The old man smiled. He liked to have an opportunity of displaying the perfection to which he had brought his art, and he was quite anxious to set about his task.

He looked at Tom from head to foot, as though he would take his measure with his eye, and then he said—

"My friend Mr. Gale, the landlord, informs me that you wish me to come here and disguise you?"

Tom nodded.

"I must go back, then, to my house. I shan't be long away. I will return with all the things requisite for disguising you. I shan't be long."

With these words on his lips the old costumier left the room.

When the door had closed behind him, Tom said—

"Does he know us, Matthew?"

"I daresay he does."

"Can he be trusted?"

"Can I?"

"Of course you can."

"Then I will be responsible for him."

"That's sufficient. I want no better guarantee."

"He has only to go to Bow-street, so he won't be many minutes."

And he was not, for in much less time than either of our friends could have believed so old and decrepit a man could have gone the distance, he returned, bringing with him a very large bundle, which was, however, of very inconsiderable weight.

Untying this, he displayed to the gaze of our friends an assortment of female clothing.

His task now commenced.

It was a tedious one, but it will not take us long to describe it.

The female apparel was put on over that which Tom wore.

By skilful padding, his form was made to assume that of a woman's, after which a dress of very good quality, and such as any respectable woman might not be ashamed to wear, was put on over it.

When this was done, the transformation was pretty complete, but as yet the old costumier had not proceeded to the manipulations of his craft.

He first trimmed Tom's hair, cutting it rather short.

Then he took a box containing some kind of white paste or enamel, and carefully smeared it all over the highwayman's face.

The effect of this was to remove the deep brown tint which the sun of France had given to it, and it also covered from view the marks upon his chin and lip, where the hair had been shaved off.

It made, too, a greater difference in his personal appearance than any one would have thought.

Over his hair the costumier then placed a very neat wig, with curls hanging down on both sides.

Then, when he had surmounted it with a hat and feather of the kind then most in fashion, and thrown over his shoulders a shawl, a complete change was immediately effected.

His disguise was now complete.

There was a gauze veil attached to the hat, and, when this was drawn down over it, his features were nearly concealed, and so much altered that no one could have recognised them.

Claude and Jack actually clapped their hands with delight when they beheld the metamorphosis, and they had now but little doubt that Tom King would be successful in his perilous enterprise.

"I have done all that I can do," said the costumier, deferentially. "The rest will now remain with you. Mind you do not forget the part you are playing. In order for the disguise to be complete, and for it to rouse no suspicion, you must adopt a feminine gait as well as a feminine voice; and, indeed, in all respects comport yourself as a woman would."

"I will try my best," said Tom, "and I have sufficient conceit to think I shall succeed."

It was at this moment that old Matthew re-entered, having left the room while the disguising was going on in order to attend to his business.

He was really astounded at the change, and when Tom made an elaborate curtsey, as it was then the fashion for females to do, he was struck with admiration.

He had already a very high opinion of the costumier's skill, but he considered this to be his masterpiece.

Tom's slim figure was just suited to the character he had assumed.

"Then you think I shall do, Matthew?"

"I do. It all rests with yourself now, I fancy. I shall let you go with much less reluctance than I should have done."

"And I have every confidence myself. But it is time I started."

"I will send for a hackney-coach."

"Do, at once."

Old Matthew left the room for this purpose, and then Tom bade his two friends adieu, and they repeated their instructions to each other.

This done, Tom gave the costumier a liberal recompense for his trouble.

There was a stand for hackney carriages close to the theatre, so that one was quickly at the door.

Tom King descended the stairs.

He bade the worthy landlord farewell, and thanked him for the trouble he had taken, and then entered the hackney coach.

The coachman was then directed to drive to Newgate.

Off went the cumbersome, but really comfortable, vehicle at a speed of quite four miles an hour.

Tom King did not much note the length of time it took him to reach his destination.

His thoughts were busily occupied in speculating upon what he should say and do, and what would be the result of his perilous errand.

It must not for a moment be thought that Tom King was blind to the danger into which he was about to run.

He had thought the matter over, and weighed every circumstance of the occurrence of which there was the least probability, most carefully in his mind.

But he had confidence in his own powers and his own address to free him from any dangerous combination of events.

At length the carriage drew up before that door of Newgate by which visitors are admitted.

The driver got down off his seat, and, opening the door, assisted his fare to alight.

"Shall I wait, miss?" he asked.

"Yes. I shall not be long. I am only going to visit a prisoner."

"All right, miss; "you'll find me here a waiting for you."

Not forgetting that he was now a female and not a male, Tom crossed the pavement, and, ascending the steps, knocked timidly at the door of Newgate.

How strange it seemed that he, above all other men, should voluntarily have come to such a place.

But, in the cause of friendship, much has been done and many perils incurred.

A bold heart, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, might well have shrunk from going so far as to do what Tom did.

The last time he passed from beneath those walls was in the hangman's cart, sitting on the coffin intended for the reception of his own body, and on his way to Tyburn.

Yet here he was again. His life still liable to the law.

The first timid summons which Tom gave was disregarded, so he repeated it, and this time a little louder than before.

The little panel in the door was dashed aside, and a man's face appeared behind the bars.

"What do you want?" he growled, for, though Mr. Cawthorn had been successful in making the jailers and turnkeys partially polite, yet, when they had a chance, they always snubbed those who applied for admission, that is, provided the governor was not at hand to hear them.

We ought to state here that the day of the week upon which Tom thus stood at the door of Newgate was Saturday.

The day, indeed, after the events we have last described as happening to Dick Turpin.

It will be remembered that it was on the Friday night when Adrian Winborry had made his abortive effort to escape, and that Dick's cell had been changed.

"What do you want?" growled the turnkey.

"To see a prisoner."

"Who?"

"One who calls himself Richard Turpin."

"Eh?"

"Yes."

"Where's your order?"

"I have none."

"Can't see him, then."

Bang shut went the wicket.

Tom's heart sunk.

This was an obstacle he had not calculated upon.

He thought he should be able to obtain an interview with the prisoner without going through the formality of presenting an order.

How was he to get one?

What magistrate would listen to his application?

He knocked again.

He felt that was the only chance he had, and determined to persevere.

The knock this time was obeyed with the utmost promptness.

The same face presented itself at the grated aperture.

But so changed was it that Tom almost failed to recognise it.

He was at a loss to account for it.

There was, however, no less an alteration in his words and manner than there was in his looks.

"Oh! it's you again, miss, is it? I am very sorry, but if you haven't an order, you can't see the prisoner."

This speech astonished Tom.

But he soon arrived at the mystery, for he heard a voice say, in an authoritative tone of voice:

"What's that, Wilks?"

"If you please, sir, it's a female."

"What does she want?"

"She wants to see Dick Turpin, sir, but she hasn't got no order."

The grating had not been closed, so, standing close by as he did, Tom could hear every word of this little dialogue.

The person with the authoritative tone of voice was no other than Mr. Cawthorn, who had just made his appearance in the vestibule, and it was in consequence of this that the remarkable change took place in the demeanour of the man on the lock, as we have described.

When the governor heard Wilks say that it was a female who sought admittance to Dick Turpin, he thought it just possible that it might be one of the two ladies who had visited him on a former occasion, so he had the door opened, and gave instructions for the visitor to be admitted into the lobby.

Tom felt his heart beat strangely, and a tremor to seize upon all his limbs as the door was flung open, and he had nothing more to do than to lift up his foot and cross the threshold of the prison.

But without a perceptible hesitation, he obeyed the man on the lock and entered.

The moment he did so, Tom found himself confronted by the governor of Newgate, who he immediately recognised, because he had seen plenty of Mr. Cawthorn during his recent incarceration.

A glance assured the governor that the female who now stood before him was not either of those he had seen upon a former occasion.

Still his manners underwent no great alteration.

In a tone of great politeness he repeated the question which Wilks had asked.

Of course, Tom made the same reply.

The governor shook his head.

"You must be aware," he said, "that no one is allowed to visit the prisoner without a special order."

"Have not you any discretion in the matter?" asked Tom, who performed the part he had assumed with great perfection. "I thought the governor of Newgate would allow visitors to enter. I have only just come to London, and I am a stranger here."

Mr. Cawthorn rubbed his hands together in a disagreeable fashion.

There was an expression about his face which Tom by no means liked.

"Ha! yes. The governor has a discretion in these affairs."

"I thought so," said Tom; "and the thanks of a poor woman will be your due if you will be kind enough to allow me a few minutes' speech with the prisoner upon family matters."

"Ahem—yes. Johnson."

"Yes, sir."

"Show this lady to Turpin's cell."

CHAPTER CCCXXVII.

TOM KING'S INTERVIEW WITH DICK TURPIN IN THE NEWGATE CELL, AND ITS RESULTS.

Beyond a doubt the governor of Newgate had some reason for thus granting the visitor's request, and what that motive was will very quickly be made apparent.

For a moment Tom felt a sickly sensation creep over his heart.

But he banished the feeling quickly.

It might be the success which had attended his endeavours made him suspicious that all was not well.

At anyrate he felt a presentiment of coming danger.

[CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AWAIT THE COMING OF THE MAIL COACH.]

He thought, however, that it might be the walls of the prison which cast this shadow over his soul.

Johnson, whom the governor had addressed, was one of the turnkeys who were lounging about, and, in obedience to the instructions of his superior, he led the way down a corridor in the direction of Turpin's cell.

As soon as Tom had disappeared, Mr. Cawthorn, with an expression which it would be hard to define, hastily left the vestibule by a different door.

He made his way through several passages, and then up a flight or steps leading to a corridor, from which several doors opened.

Here he paused a moment as if for reflection.

Then he went forward several paces and stopped before one of the doors to which we have alluded.

By his actions he seemed to wish to pass through one of them for some particular reason, but was undecided as to which would best answer his purpose.

After a brief calculation, he opened one of the doors, and passing through it, closed it quickly behind him.

For the present, however, we must not describe any more of the cunning governor's proceedings, but turn to Tom King and relate what befel him.

He walked along the corridors, then, along with Johnson, the jailer, still taking the utmost pains to keep up his character, and not to do anything anomalous to it.

In good time the door of the cell in which Turpin was confined was reached.

The ponderous fastenings were one by one removed, and finally the door itself turned slowly back upon its hinges with a disagreeable grating sound.

"A visitor," said the turnkey, gruffly, as he stood aside and allowed Tom to pass him.

The latter took care to do so without betraying any undue haste.

The cell was light, especially in comparison to the passage they had been traversing, and Tom's eyes had become accustomed to the gloom to a considerable extent, which enabled him to see every object in his companion's dungeon with perfect ease.

When Turpin heard the jailer pronounce the words, "a visitor," a wild hope sprang up in his breast that Maud Gouldman, with whom his thoughts had been busily occupied for some hours past, had come again to see him.

And this supposition was increased when he heard the rustle of female garments, which came quite plainly to his ears, for Tom was attired in a black silk dress.

On his side, Tom King was fearful that Dick would recognise him, and betray him by a sudden ejaculation, so he held back, and kept the veil down over his face.

The turnkey closed the door, but did not fasten it.

Strictly he should have remained in the cell, and heard all that passed between the prisoner and his visitor, but then, if he had done that, he would only have done his duty, whereas by going outside he was almost sure of having a fee of some kind.

Dick did not speak, but remained with his head bent down waiting to be addressed, for the illusion had not yet been dispelled.

Indeed, he had scarcely raised his eyes to look at the form of his visitant.

Tom was struck with surprise.

Could the humble deferential-looking being standing before him be his old comrade in many a desperate highway exploit?

"Surely no," he thought. "There is some mistake. This cannot be Dick, or else he is changed indeed."

And yet a second glance at the outlines of his form showed him that he had made no mistake, so he was forced to adopt the latter supposition.

But Tom could not bear this state of things, so in a whisper he spoke.

He was astonished, however, at the distinctness with which the faint sounds came to his ears, and, looking up, he saw that the top of the cell was circular in shape, rising, in fact, into a kind of a dome, and he attributed it to that.

"Dick," he said, "Dick—don't start—don't speak. Do you know my voice?"

It is true these words were uttered in the faintest possible tones, but Dick recognised them, as was plainly evidenced by the start he gave.

"Good heavens!" he cried aloud, in spite of Tom's injunction. "It cannot be you, and in this guise—impossible!"

"Hush, Dick, do not speak so loud. I am here under peril of my life."

"Forgive me, I will be all caution now. My surprise is over. Give me your hand, Tom. I am pleased to hold it once more in my grasp."

"That's something like yourself, Dick. Why, when I came in I am sure I did not know you. You stood there quite humbled and cast down. Whatever is the meaning of this?"

Dick smiled in a sickly sort of fashion as he said—

"Sit down, Tom, my friend, and listen to what I have got to tell you. I have a long history, and one that will much surprise you."

"Be quick and tell me, then, but don't be any longer than you can help, for I suppose they will send me away presently, and I have much to say to you myself."

"No doubt, Tom. When did you return to England?"

"Only a few days ago."

"And Claude and Jack?"

"They came with me."

"Brave hearts! I wish I was with them once again."

"And so you shall be before long. Keep your spirits up. But I don't wonder at your getting gloomy in this place; it gave me the horrors, I can tell you. But come, let us hear what you have to say."

In compliance with this request, Dick gave his old comrade a brief account of all that had happened to him since their parting at the mouth of the cavern in Scotland. With all this the reader is acquainted, so it is needless for us to repeat it here.

There was only one thing that Dick omitted, and that was to declare his passion for Maud Gouldman.

Of course he had to make mention of her, and he also set Tom's mind at ease about Black Bess by telling him where she was.

To all Tom listened with the utmost attention.

The things which had hitherto looked so strange were now clear enough, and Turpin's behaviour was no longer any mystery to him any more than it is to the reader.

In return Tom related the adventures of himself and his two comrades by sea and land, and ended with the statement that Claude and Jack were staying at the "White Horse," whither he was about to return.

"And now, Dick," he said, "the little time we have left to be with each other must be devoted to the consideration of our future proceedings. What about this promise you have made?"

"It simply amounts to this. I have passed my word that I will not make any attempt to escape from this place until I learn from the judge who showed himself so friendly disposed towards me that the efforts he is making to procure my liberation are ineffectual."

"And do you believe he is taking any steps?"

"I am sure of it, by what Blanche Winberry and Maud Gouldman told me when they paid me a visit."

"Well, Dick, this is really about the most wonderful and romantic series of events that I can remember. But to proceed. If the judge tells you he has succeeded, what shall you do?"

"Why, then all will be well."

"Perhaps. But if he fails?"

"Then I shall be released from my promise, and I shall at once set about making my escape."

"Then that's what I want to talk about, and just let me give you a word of advice. Don't let the judge keep you dallying too long, or else you will let the chance of escape pass by."

"Do not fear."

"I do fear. Judges are our enemies, and I should never think of trusting one so far as you have. Was I in your place, I should cast my promise to the winds. You have friends without the prison who are ready and willing to render you valuable aid, and you are much to blame if you neglect to avail yourself of it."

"I cannot break my word, Tom, so do not press me to do it. No one yet has ever been able to say that Dick Turpin ever broke his word after having once given it."

"I know that."

"Then don't let this prove an exception. Be content as I am to let events take their course. Ere long, I shall doubtless have an answer from the judge, and then I shall be able to decide how to act."

"But how shall I know what is his decision?"

"It will soon be known. I fancy it will give you little trouble to ascertain from some of the turnkeys."

"That can be managed; and now, suppose the judge tells you he has failed."

"Well."

"We must decide upon what we are to do. It is true, owing to my admirable disguise, I have succeeded in making my way to your cell unsuspected, but the second time I might not be so lucky."

"I should be very sorry for you to run the risk a second time. If you will recollect, when I came to see you, I got into the prison all right. It was the getting out that was the difficulty. If it had not been for the pistols I had secreted in my pocket, and which escaped their search, I don't know what I should have done."

"It is to be hoped I shall be luckier than you. I don't think any suspicion is aroused at present."

"You must be careful, Tom. Mr. Cawthorn is rather a cunning man, and he might, perhaps, find you out."

"Never mind that. I shall have to go directly. Now, Dick, look here, we will make this arrangement."

"Go on. I am listening."

"Come closer, for fear the turnkeys should overhear us. I will take care to learn the result of what the judge communicates to you, and when he communicates it. On the following night you must do your best to work your way out, and, in the meantime, we will think of the best means of aiding you."

"All right."

"That is agreed between us?"

"You may consider it so."

"Very good; and now, Dick, don't you suffer yourself to be bamboozled by this judge, and put you off to the last minute. If you must know just what I think, he has not, in my opinion, the remotest chance of success."

"Why not? I believe he is a man of great influence."

"That may be, but the fact of the matter is, you have set the authorities at defiance for a long time, and done more desperate deeds than half-a-dozen other men. For this reason I think you have no chance of pardon."

"Don't look on the gloomy side of things, Tom."

"Your imprisonment has done you no good, Dick."

"Why?"

"It has taken away to a very great extent that energy and self-reliance for which at one time you were so remarkable. You should not have listened to the words of the judge, no matter how softly they were spoken. Had you thrown yourself upon the protection of the mob, you would, ten to one, have got out safely, and with very little trouble."

"It's no good to talk about the past, Tom, not a bit. What is done can't be undone. Here I am, with my word pledged, and here I shall remain until I am released from it."

"I can't altogether blame you for that; the only misfortune is that you should have made such a promise."

"But we understand each other, do we not?"

"I think so."

"Time's up long ago," said Johnson, the jailer, putting his head into the cell.

"All right," replied Tom. "One moment, and I will be with you."

The jailer retired.

"Now, Dick, I must bid you good-bye; but it won't be long, I hope, before I see you mounted on your bonny mare in company with us once again. When you came to see me while a prisoner here, I told you I would return the compliment, and, in spite of your confident assurances to the contrary, I have done so."

"You are a true friend, Tom," said Turpin, grasping his hand—"a true friend. My confinement here does seem to affect my spirits, but when I mount, a gallop in the fresh air will dissipate all that gloom, and I shall be myself again."

"I trust so."

"Oh! I shall be right again when I am free from this place, and something like an inward conviction sustains me and assures me that I shall be free, and that we shall have yet many a glorious adventure together which will by far surpass all that we have ever done."

"Spoken like yourself, Dick. I shall be able to carry back a good account of you to Claude, and Jack, and old Matthew."

"I quite understand all your instructions, Tom, and shall trust to you to find out when the judge has his interview with me, and act accordingly."

"You can trust me fully, and perhaps some means may be found by which we can communicate with each other; at all events, we will do so should anything occur of a different nature to what we expect."

"Very well."

"Good-bye, Dick, then; good-bye; and ere long I trust to grasp your hand with nothing above us but the sky."

"Good-bye, Tom; and believe me, I heartily echo your wish, for I am sick of this place."

"I daresay you are. Once more, good-bye. Here is the turnkey."

Johnson entered at this moment, and Tom, after once more pressing Dick's hand within his own, hastily left the cell and followed his guide along the passages to the vestibule of the prison, where a slight surprise awaited him.

CHAPTER CCCXXVIII.

MR. CAWTHORN HAS TOM KING CONFINED IN A CELL, AND TAKES SOME VERY GOOD PRECAUTIONS TO PREVENT HIS ESCAPE.

WE must now return to the proceedings of Mr. Cawthorn, the governor of Newgate, and furnish a clue to his mysterious behaviour.

When he closed the door behind him in the manner we have described, he was surrounded by the most intense darkness.

The governor, however, did not take any means to procure a light, from which it may be inferred that he did not need one.

He lowered himself on to the floor of the apartment, if such it was, and commenced groping his way along it, making in his progress a scarcely audible sound.

At length he paused.

He had then reached the centre of the chamber.

When we describe the position of this chamber, the reader will have a suspicion of what is about to follow.

It was immediately over the cell occupied by Turpin.

The cell into which our hero had been placed after his adventure with Adrian Winberry, was one of a series which had been constructed in a peculiar manner for a certain purpose, though it was very rarely, from some cause or other, that they were made use of in the manner their projector intended.

It will be recollected that when Tom King entered his old comrade's dungeon, he spoke in a whisper, and was astonished at the loudness with which it sounded.

Then glancing up at the ceiling of the cell, he attributed the effects produced to its dome-like shape, and in this he was perfectly correct, as such a construction magnifies the sound in the same manner that a convex lens will magnify all objects seen through it.

But further than this Tom did not go.

The idea never for one moment struck him that the cells were built in that shape for the sole reason of making faint sounds audible, and still less did he imagine that in the ceiling there was a small aperture communicating with a chamber exactly overhead, and through which sounds were transmitted as through a speaking-trumpet.

Yet such was actually the case.

The contrivance was an ingenious one, and the end for which it was devised requires no explanation.

There is no longer any mystery with respect to Mr. Cawthorn's conduct.

Acquainted with all which we have just set before the reader, he resolved to set at rest those suspicions which sprang up in his mind when Tom applied for admission.

Likely enough, he thought, his suspicions were utterly without foundation, but then he had an easy means of satisfying himself upon that head.

He resolved to do so.

His hesitation upon reaching the corridor was caused by the uncertainty he felt as to which of the doors would take him into the chamber over Dick's dungeon.

By counting the doors, however, he arrived definitely at this piece of information.

Lying down, then, at full length upon the floor, Mr. Cawthorn placed his ear over the orifice in the topmost portion of the dome and listened.

In this position every word which was uttered by the two highwaymen reached his ears with the utmost plainness, and the intelligence he thus learned was important indeed.

The seeming female, who had come to see Turpin, was no other than the almost equally notorious highwayman, Tom King.

Tom King, who had once been in his hands, but who had cheated the gallows in a most surprising manner.

Of this he had no doubt.

"A capital invention this," he muttered, mentally. "They little think I am hearing every word they speak as plain or even plainer than they can themselves. An excellent invention, truly!"

The governor was quite pleased with it, because it answered his purpose.

But there are few, we think, who would altogether approve of it, though, for some reasons, they might be disposed to do so.

It seems treacherous, and anything savouring of treachery is repugnant to the feelings of a true Englishman.

It was quite certain our two friends spoke to each other under the impression that there was no one at hand to overhear them.

When the conference was over, Mr. Cawthorn rose from his recumbent position, and made his way out of the little chamber, again closing the door behind him with the same silence as before.

Then, bending his steps direct to the vestibule of the prison, he stood not far from the man on the lock.

There were two or three turnkeys besides, sitting on a bench, which was provided for their accommodation.

A quizzical kind of look was on Mr. Cawthorn's face, as, standing in his favourite attitude, with his hands clasped behind his back, he looked in the direction which Tom King was to come.

The men knew that something was about to happen, but they could not tell what.

However, they kept themselves on the alert.

Mr. Cawthorn had not to stand long.

The sound of footsteps could be heard in the corridor leading to the cells.

Now, Tom King was under the conviction that his enterprize had been successful to a degree, and he consequently felt the greatest confidence in his disguise.

To be sure, there was the danger of leaving, but he considered that as little or nothing.

As for the turnkey, Johnson, who had so considerately kept out of the way, and allowed them to have their talk to themselves, Tom thought he deserved some recompense.

Accordingly, as they came together along the passage, the disguised highwayman took an opportunity to slip a liberal gratuity into his palm, and an immense amount of deference and respect was the result.

Alas! Tom King had no presentiment even of what was about to happen.

Everything was going on in a most satisfactory manner.

At length, the door which separated the corridor from the vestibule was reached, and Johnson, taking a ponderous key from his girdle, thrust it into the lock and opened it.

Tom gave a hasty glance into the vestibule.

At first he could not see the governor.

A projection of the masonry hid him.

Straight in front was the half-door leading out into the street.

No sooner, however, did Tom emerge from the corridor and fairly stand within the vestibule, than he caught sight of Mr. Cawthorn, and the glimpse he got at his face was anything but assuring.

With his hands behind his back, and in an attitude of great affected cleverness—his face screwed up into an expression of comical derision—the governor of Newgate peered into the countenance of Tom King.

Gladly would our friend have passed him without saying a word, and he made an attempt to do so, but it failed.

Mr. Cawthorn did not intend him to pass.

He planted himself exactly in his path.

"Ahem!" he said.

Then for the first time the thought darted through Tom's mind that he had been discovered, and he gave a despairing look at the outer door.

"Seen your friend, I suppose, eh?" continued the governor.

"Yes, sir, I thank you," replied Tom, commanding his voice as well as he was able. "I am very much obliged to you for your kindness."

"In-deed!"

Mr. Cawthorn swayed gently backwards and forwards on his toes and heels.

"Yes sir, and I can only say again, that my best thanks are your due."

"Ahem. Yes. It's really quite pleasant to be in a position to render you a service which affords you so much satisfaction. Ahem!"

"No doubt," said Tom, whose heart misgave him more and more.

He feared that he had rashly ventured into the lion's den, and that it would be no easy matter to leave it unscathed.

But what could he do?

Mr. Cawthorn stood exactly between him and the outer door.

To attempt to rush past him and endeavour to get into the street by main force was quite out of the question, and he felt it was so.

The man on the lock, too, and the other turnkeys gathered round the governor, and looked on curiously

His behaviour was so extraordinary.

They all knew it portended something.

"Well," continued Mr. Cawthorn, "I suppose you found your friend all right and properly attended to."

"Yes, sir."

"Ah! What relation did you say you were to the prisoner?"

Tom did not recollect mentioning the relationship, but still he said—

"Oh! cousin, eh? That's another form of sweetheart, I suppose, eh?"

Tom made no reply.

"We omitted one little ceremony," continued the governor, "but it is not too late to remedy the omission. Hicks and Moggs!"

"Yes, sir," replied two of the turnkeys.

"Just take hold of that lady for a moment."

The men darted forward, and took a firm grasp of Tom's arms.

Possibly he might have shook them off, and yet he did not want to disclose his secret.

It was quite time when he was found out.

Tom resolved to keep up the character of a female—at any rate for a little longer.

"Hicks," said the governor, addressing the turnkey on Tom's right hand

"Yes, sir."

"Take off the lady's hat."

This command was rather roughly obeyed, for Hicks took hold of the hat by the brim, and pulled it with some violence off Tom's head.

Then the governor pretended to discover what he all along knew very well.

"Ha!" he said, when Tom's features were fully exposed to his view. "Hold him tight. Help, here. Just what I thought. That is Tom King, the highwayman!"

Not one of the turnkeys had expected this announcement, and they were astonished accordingly.

But, being in the habit of having surprises, they had a knack of quickly recovering themselves, and, in less than a moment, Tom found himself surrounded by a number of men, everyone of whom took hold of him somewhere or other.

In spite of the odds against him, however, Tom made a desperate effort to recover his liberty.

He struggled and fought with all the insensate fury of a madman.

He knew the result of his struggles.

Not only his liberty but his life depended upon his getting free, for, of course, having been already condemned, the first opportunity would have been taken of carrying the sentence into effect.

The man on the lock joined the fray.

The key of the outer door was in his pocket, so he was quite sure the prisoner could not escape.

The racket was prodigious, and, in a very little while, the whole of the prison was roused.

From the corridors leading to the different ranges of cells turnkeys poured forth, while passers by in the street, hearing the uproar, ascended the stone steps without in a dense crowd, and effectually choked up the entrance.

No weapons, save those with which Nature had provided them, were used.

Tom had pistols about his person, but up to the present he had not succeeded in getting his hands at liberty for a sufficiently long period of time to draw them.

As for the turnkeys, their sole object was to secure him—he was already a prisoner—but they found the task of slipping handcuffs on a very difficult one to accomplish.

In the struggle, the voluminous female apparel with which he had been clothed was torn away, until, at length, not a shred remained, and then Tom was exposed in his ordinary dress—for it will be remembered the costumier put on the female apparel over his clothes.

He was now readily enough recognised, for the wig had been one of the first things to disappear.

Tom felt that he cut a rather ludicrous figure, and was enraged accordingly.

Notwithstanding all his efforts, however, he was in the end overpowered by numbers.

But he did not give in while he had strength left to resist.

At length one of the officers, more dexterous than the rest, slipped on a pair of handcuffs.

Resistance was then entirely at an end.

Still keeping their hold of him, the men stood aside, and permitted the governor to have a glimpse at his prisoner.

There could now be no doubt whatever about Tom King's identity, though Mr. Cawthorn was made quite certain on the point by what he had overheard.

"So this is your trick?" he said, sneeringly; "and a pretty one it is. The idea to dress up in women's petticoats. Ha! ha!"

"Ha—ha!" laughed the turnkeys in chorus, as though it was the funniest thing in the world.

They always laughed when the governor did.

"Well, you have done a good thing for yourself, Mr. King. Really Newgate is quite honoured. Dick Turpin and Tom King both under its roof at once! I'll declare it will be a thousand pities if you are not both tucked up at Tyburn together. Ha! ha!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed the turnkeys again.

"You ain't quite sharp enough, Mr. King. Do you think I was going to be taken in by such a shallow device as that? Pah! Well, here you are, and here you will remain, for I will take care there are no escapes made from the prison while I am governor of it. Secure him well, my men. He is a desperate character, truly. Take care of him, and if he escapes you shall every one of you suffer for it."

"Shall we try some irons, sir?"

"No, never mind irons. What's the good of irons? Put him in a cell, and watch he don't come out of it.'

This was very good advice of the governor's, so far as the detention of a prisoner was concerned—the means proposed were far better than trusting to bolts and bars.

CHAPTER CCCXXIX.

JUDGE HOLLYOAK COMMUNICATES TO DICK TURPIN THE UNSUCCESSFUL RESULT OF HIS ATTEMPT TO OBTAIN HIS PARDON.

The turnkey who had so officiously proposed hampering Tom's limbs with fetters, shrunk back when he saw that his proposal was not relished.

In obedience to the orders of the governor, the prisoner was dragged to one of the cells.

We say "dragged," because Tom King did all he could to impede the progress of his jailers.

But his resistance was overpowered, and he was gradually forced along the passage.

At length a door was reached, which Mr. Cawthorn doubtless considered would answer the purpose he required of it.

It was opened, and a strong-looking stone cell was disclosed.

Into this Tom was hustled rather roughly, and the door was closed upon him.

The rage of our friend was so great that it almost threw him into a fit of madness.

To think he should have succeeded in his designs, as far as he did, and then at the last moment to be baulked by the extra cleverness of the governor.

The reader must bear in mind that Tom had no idea how it was the governor had penetrated his disguise.

He was, however, now left to his own reflections and speculations upon the matter.

His first ebullition of rage and passion died away, and then he began to think more calmly of his position.

While doing so, he, at some pains, removed from his person all the fragments which remained of the female apparel he had worn.

When this task was completed he felt rather more at home with himself, and he seated himself upon the bench, which apparently was to serve him for chair, table, and bed.

"This is awkward," he said to himself; "most awkward. How am I to communicate with Claude and Jack? Curses on it all! nothing could be more provoking. Then there's myself. I am by no means comfortably circumstanced. Let me see. To-day is Saturday; they will have some hanging on Monday, and if I am here I shall be included among the number. I must escape. But how? Confound that Cawthorn! there's no such thing as getting the better of him. How did he find out my disguise?"

In such reflections as these did Tom occupy himself with continually the same result.

He was driven every time to the same conclusion—the only and inevitable conclusion.

He must escape.

As for Mr. Cawthorn himself, it would scarcely be possible to find in all England a man more content and satisfied with himself than he was.

Dick Turpin, the most famous highwayman in the world, was in his custody.

Now he had captured that famous highwayman's comrade, under such circumstances as would ever redound to his credit.

He considered his reputation established.

No pains or trouble should be spared by him, he determined, to keep his slippery guests safe under lock and key.

"I shall have him tucked up on Monday," he said to himself, "along with Adrian Winberry, and Norman, and Clare. Capital. I could not be blamed for Tom King's former escape, but, if there was the least blame attached to me, it would be quite removed by my recapture of him. Ha! ha! I shall have a pension yet."

And so, while Tom King fretted and fumed, Mr. Cawthorn congratulated himself upon the aspect of affairs.

It was not long before Dick Turpin was made acquainted with what had taken place.

His regret was exceedingly great, because he knew the immense peril in which Tom stood.

Beyond a doubt he would be executed off hand.

This was serious, because Dick could not help considering himself to a certain extent the cause of his death.

From his place of espial overhead, Mr. Cawthorn had not heard a word uttered about tools, nor did he think for a moment that Dick had been furnished with any.

But it was a point upon which he resolved to be quite sure, and to have no doubts upon whatever.

Accordingly, accompanied by several turnkeys, he made his way to Dick Turpin's cell.

He had him carefully searched from head to foot, so that nothing whatever could be concealed about his person without inevitable discovery.

Being quite assured upon that point, he did not search the cell, as being a useless labour, but quietly had Dick removed to another, so that, if he had secreted anything in it, it would cease to be of any value to him.

Nothing, however, had been given to Dick, so the governor went to all this extra trouble for nothing.

Turpin learned that Tom had been confined in one of the strongest cells in the prison, and that Mr. Cawthorn had given express instructions for him to be well watched over.

The jailers who were friendly to Dick communicated this and other intelligence.

That memorable Saturday was an anxious day for Dick Turpin.

He repented now over and over again that he had passed his word not to attempt to escape.

Indeed, he almost felt inclined now to break it, although it was given.

He wished to achieve the rescue of Tom King.

And, unless he was very quick in his movements, he would be too late.

Hanging day, as Monday was always called, was close at hand, and, if Tom did not escape before then, it would be all over with him.

For himself, however, it was somewhat different.

He had yet to be put upon his trial, so that some time must intervene, at any rate, before his execution could take place.

There was no such formality in the case of Tom King.

Well, then (knowing as we do the friendship which subsisted between them), might Dick Turpin feel anxious and alarmed.

The affair was a most unfortunate one, let it be viewed in what light it might.

In this way the day passed wearily away.

It was growing dusk when Dick Turpin, as he sat in his cell, heard the sounds of voices and footsteps in the corridor without.

They paused before his own door.

The ponderous fastenings were removed, and then it swung open with a creaking sound.

"A visitor," said the turnkey

As the man spoke, an elderly gentleman, dressed in black, stepped into the cell.

At first sight, owing to the darkness in the place, Dick did not recognise his visitor, but a second glance showed it to be Mr. Hollyoak, the judge who had presided at the trial of Adrian Winberry.

Dick rose and made a profound bow as soon as he found who his visitor was, and waited for him to speak.

With the manner of one who has a disagreeable duty to perform, and who wishes to get through it as quickly as possible, the judge addressed him—

"I need scarcely tell you the motive of this visit to you, since you must know it well already."

"I do know it," said Dick. "It is to communicate to me the result of the exertions which you have made in my behalf."

"Just so."

"And are you in a position to do so?"

"I will tell you in a few words. I set about performing the promise I made to you, and by a proper representation of the case, succeeded in interesting a great many people in your favour."

Dick bowed.

The judge continued.

"Having done this, I had a petition drawn up, setting forth the whole case, and proceeded to get signatures for it. The first were those of Blanche Winberry and Maud Gouldman, two very near relatives of the deceased."

"And did they sign?"

"They headed the list. I then proceeded to get other names, and when I found I could obtain no more, I forwarded the petition in the proper quarter."

"I am much beholden to you, sir," said Dick. "But have you yet had any reply with reference to this petition?"

"I have."

"And that reply?"

"Is simply this. All that is stated there shall be borne in mind at your trial, and it will serve to obtain, most likely, some commutation of your sentence."

"And is this all you have been able to effect?"

"You speak in a tone of disappointment, but I don't wonder at it. My own expectations were much higher, I confess, but I have been able to accomplish no more."

"I am much obliged to you for what you have done, sir," said Dick; "but will you grant me one request?"

"What is it?"

"Release me from the promise I made you."

"Not to attempt to make your escape?"

"Yes, sir."

"Should you keep your promise until I did?"

"Most certainly."

"Then I release you."

"Many thanks, sir, for that, and all that you have done for me besides."

"And now, tell me. Do you think there is any prospect of making your escape?"

"I shall try."

"That is not exactly an answer."

"I am aware it is not."

"Then you think there is a chance?"

"I do."

"I beg to differ from you there. So many precautions have been taken that it will be an impossibilty."

Turpin smiled.

"I have not moved hand or foot since I have been here, though I have had plenty of good chances of escaping. Now, however, that I am released from my promise, the case will be different."

"We shall see."

"We shall, sir."

"I am heartily sorry I have not been able to do more good for you than I have. Still I have tried my best. I think if the matter goes to trial the petition will not have much effect with the judge and jurymen."

"I am of the same opinion, sir."

"I think, considering the manner in which you came forward, the authorities ought to have allowed you one more chance for your life."

"That was all I wanted, sir.

"I know that was all you asked for."

"I hope, sir," said Dick, "you will allow me to say how very grateful I feel for all the trouble you have taken."

"Pho—pho. Do not mention that."

"Should I come to trial, I hope I shall have the good fortune to appear before you."

"I hope not; because if you were I should do my duty strictly and impartially, which in this case would be very painful."

Dick liked the judge all the better for this candid acknowledgment.

A few words of no importance or interest to the reader passed between them, and then the judge withdrew.

When the door closed behind him Turpin rose to his full height, and said—

"Now I am free, and master of my own actions. Tom, my friend, it will go hard with me if, ere long, you don't find a change in your position and prospects. I must think—I must think."

He paced the cell hurriedly as he spoke, and strove to hit upon some scheme which afforded some reasonable prospect of success.

For a long time he was unsuccessful.

Night came and found him with the problem still unsolved.

Many difficulties were in the way.

Dick wanted, not only to escape from Newgate, but to take his comrade with him.

He had, however, not the least idea where his cell was situated.

Nor did there appear any ready means by which he could find out.

When the turnkeys came with the supper, they found the "captain," as they always called him, in a not very amiable frame of mind, and so they were wise enough to leave him to himself.

Any other night the time would have lagged, and every minute seemed prolonged into an hour.

Now, however, when so much was at stake, the hours flew by like minutes.

The rapid flight of time chafed Dick terribly.

Every moment was, as he well knew, of the most vital importance.

But, nevertheless, the night was wasted in indecision, and Sunday morning came and found him as far off the result as ever

He never slept a moment all the night.

In the morning he looked pale and haggard, and his eyes were bloodshot.

There remained now only twenty-four hours, and, if something was not done for Tom King during that time, he must inevitably perish.

It was this which weighed, too, heavily upon Dick's mind, and prevented him thinking so clearly as he would have done.

He was over anxious, and the feeling defeated its own object.

Then, as now, it was the practice to take all the prisoners to church on the Sunday morning, for which purpose a chapel is provided in the building.

Here, at least, Dick thought he should be able to obtain a glimpse of his old comrade, if nothing more.

Perhaps he should be able to learn some important information.

At length the time for service arrived, and, according to custom, Dick, as well as the rest, were marshalled into the chapel.

For a long time Dick could not see Tom, for the prison just then was rather full of tenants.

Presently, however, he saw him.

Tom was looking round him anxiously, doubtless for the same reason as himself.

Dick kept his gaze steadily fixed upon him, and at length their eyes met.

A glance of intelligence was exchanged between them, but that was all.

After service they were taken back to their cells, and Dick was no nearer his object than before.

CHAPTER CCCXXX.

OLD MATTHEW AND THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN HOLD AN ANXIOUS CONSULTATION RESPECTING THE FATE OF TOM KING.

So remarkable an occurrence as the capture of Tom King in the manner we have recorded soon spread with amazing swiftness over the whole city of London, and before the Saturday night had come, there were few who had not heard some exaggerated version or other.

Amongst the first who learned what had taken place was Matthew Gale, the landlord of the "White Horse," in Drury-lane.

Somehow he was scarcely surprised at the intelligence.

Ever since Tom had taken his departure in the hackney-coach, the heart of the worthy landlord had been haunted with a vague presentiment of coming danger.

The feeling was one which could not be shook off. Indeed it seemed all the efforts which he made to this end only tended to increase it.

The news of Tom's capture was only the realization of his forebodings

As soon as he ascertained the particulars, he hastened upstairs to the room in which Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were confined, and communicated all to them.

The concern of the two highwaymen, who had the warmest possible admiration for Tom King, was extreme.

Unlike old Matthew, they refused to give credence to the tale, and insisted upon his obtaining some verfication of what he had stated.

This he had no objection to doing, if merely to satisfy himself.

"I will go," he said. "It will be less dangerous for me to do so than to confide the mission to any one else."

"You will run no great risk," said Claude; "all you will have to do will be to conduct your inquiries cautiously."

"Trust me for that," said old Matthew. "I won't be any longer away than I can help, and when I return you can rely upon my bringing you full and correct information."

"I know we can."

"You will start at once?" asked Sixteen-String Jack.

"Without a moment's delay."

"That is well. Pray go at once. We shall be anxious till you come back."

"I am off, and I will be back as quickly as I can. While I am away, be sure you stay where you are; don't show yourselves upon any account, and then I don't think you will have anything to fear."

"All right, Matthew."

"I am off, then."

The worthy landlord, who certainly never looked at his trouble when he was serving our friends, left the room, and set out for Newgate.

As the distance from his house to the prison was not great he determined to go on foot.

One reason that influenced him in this was the thought that he might be able to pick up some information on the road.

He made several inquiries, and entered into brief conversation with many persons, but without his eliciting in either case more than he knew already.

The story of Tom's capture was repeated to him with very few alterations or variations, and this went a long way towards convincing him that it must be somewhere near the truth, or they would not agree so well as they did.

At length the prison was reached.

Old Matthew looked up at the black and gloomy structure, and very wistfully at the little door through which visitors passed on their way into the prison.

From the man on the lock he knew every information could be obtained, but that surly official would never have communicated it to him.

Old Matthew was thrown upon his own resources to learn what he wished to know.

As on other occasions he was not at fault.

He had partly made up his mind what to do.

In the first place he went to the pie-shop on that side of the Old Bailey which faces the prison, and saw his friend Coles.

The reader will remember Coles.

He was the man who, at old Matthew's request, had so cunningly secreted the spring saws in the crust of one of his pies.

He was to be trusted.

Here Matthew thought he was sure of getting every information, for the jailers and other prison officials were continually coming or sending over for pies, and Coles was frequently sending for dishes after the pies had been eaten.

Nor was old Matthew disappointed in his expectation.

Coles was very glad to see him and pressed him to stay, but Matthew told him how urgent the business was upon which he had come.

Nevertheless, the subject was not broached until old Matthew sat down in the little room behind the shop.

"Now, Matthew," said Coles, as he closed the door, "speak freely, and let me hear what you want."

"I will, Coles."

"Go on, then."

"Something rather extraordinary took place over the way this morning, didn't there?"

"At Newgate?"

"Yes."

"I believe you, why"——

"Stop a moment, my friend; I want you to be good enough to give me all the particulars you are acquainted with without any embellishments of your own."

"As for particulars," said Coles, "I can't say that I know many of them, but, if the main facts of the case will do, I can supply you with them."

"Those are just what I want to know."

"Well, then, by all I can learn, it appears that this morning Tom King, the highwayman, disguised as a very respectable young woman, called at Newgate and asked to see Dick Turpin, who is confined in one of the cells, and waiting for his trial."

"Yes—yes."

"At first no suspicions were excited, and the seeming young woman was allowed to go into the cell."

"He did have an interview with Dick, then?"

"Tom King?"

"Yes."

"I believe so, for after he had been to the cell he came along the passage and was going to be let out, when who should be standing in the lobby but Mr. Cawthorn!"

"That's the governor?"

"Yes."

"Go on."

"Fill up your glass again."

Old Matthew did so.

Then he nodded to his friend to continue.

"The governor must have had some suspicions—though what they exactly were perhaps no one knows but himself. However, he had the female apparel pulled off, and there stood Tom King in his own clothes."

"What next?" asked old Matthew, eagerly, for the reader can believe he felt a more than common interest in what he said.

"Tom King, when he discovered he was found out, made a desperate resistance. He had no arms, or, at all events, did not make use of any, and in the end he was, as you may think, completely overpowered by numbers, and carried to a cell; but I believe he struggled and fought to the very last."

"And that has really happened?"

"Oh! beyond all question. I will vouch for the other part."

"How?"

"Why, I heard a tremendous uproar, and could see something curious was going on, for I stood at my shop door at the time, so I ran across the road and peeped over the top of the wicket."

"What did you see?"

"Why, Tom King, sure enough, fighting the jailers—there was a dozen of them at least—like the very devil!"

"You knew him."

"In a moment."

"And you saw him carried off to a cell?"

"Yes."

"That is enough, then. I suppose you have nothing more to tell me."

"Nothing certain, but I'll tell you what Johnson the turnkey, said when he was in the shop about half-an-hour ago."

"What?"

"Why, that on Monday Adrian Winberry and his two accomplices are to be executed for murder at Tyburn, and that Tom King is going with them."

Old Matthew sprang to his feet.

"Tom King?" he ejaculated.

"Yes."

"Going with them?"

"Yes."

"Impossible!"

"It's true, if it is."

"But how can they execute him so soon?"

"Well, I asked Johnson that question."

"And what did he say?"

"That the reason was this: Tom King has already been tried, cast for death, and the warrant sent to the prison for his execution."

"Yes."

"Well, that warrant was never carried out. He was taken to Tyburn, and escaped by a hair's-breadth."

"Yes—yes."

"Consequently the warrant against him remains in full force, and they are determined it shall be carried out as quickly as possible, and they will take such precautions with respect to a guard of military, that a rescue will be impossible."

"Indeed."

"To-day is Saturday, you know, and Monday being so close, the authorities think Tom will not have such a good chance of escape as he would if it was put off for another week."

"I see. Coles, my friend, I am much obliged to you. The information you have given me is important—indeed, very important."

"Fill your glass again."

"No, I thank you. I have just emptied it because I must be off. I can't stay a moment longer."

"I can guess."

"What?"

"What you are going to do."

"Well, if you can, keep it to yourself, for any revelations would spoil all."

"You can trust me, Matthew. I wouldn't say a word for the world."

"I know that, Coles. I may want your services. I can't tell, but, in the event of my doing so——"

"You can have them."

"That's right. Good-bye."

"Good-bye."

Old Matthew shook hands with Coles, and then made the best of his way back to the "White Horse."

The intelligence he brought with him was important indeed.

Not only was it confirmatory of all that he had before heard, but he had gleaned some additional particulars, which were of the greatest importance.

He found all at the house just as he left it.

There had been no disturbance.

No alarm.

No attack by the police.

Claude and Jack waited very impatiently for Matthew to return.

To them he seemed to be absent an endless time.

At length they heard him ascending the stairs.

They ran to the door and opened it.

As soon as they caught sight of his face that was enough. They had no need to ask whether what they heard was true.

Nevertheless, they did put the question.

In a voice of great concern, Matthew told them all that he had heard from his friend Coles, and, as he proceeded, the faces of the two highwaymen assumed quite as grave an expression as his.

"This is indeed most serious," said Claude Duval. "We shall have to be very speedy in our movements, or he will perish."

"He will."

"I had no idea," remarked Sixteen-String Jack, "that he was in so much danger; but I might have known it if I had given the subject a moment's thought."

"He has not time to make an escape," cried Claude. "What is to be done?"

"Affairs have assumed a very serious aspect," said old Matthew—"a very serious aspect; and, frankly speaking, I have no idea what would be the best thing for us to do."

"Nor I."

"But," said Sixteen-String Jack, "we must not allow him to perish."

"Not if we can prevent it."

"But we must prevent it."

"How?"

"I cannot answer that question."

"Nor I," said Claude.

"But we must reflect," said Sixteen-String Jack. "There is a little time between now and nightfall; let us all three occupy it by thinking the matter over and considering it in our minds."

"Agreed."

"Surely between us we shall think of something!"

"It is a very ugly affair altogether," said Matthew. "You see, we had quite enough to do to think how we should get Dick Turpin out of his difficulty, and we wanted Tom to help us to do that."

"And now he is the worst off of the two."

"Decidedly."

"But if an old comrade is in ever such great danger we will not desert him. Never mind the risk. We can but save, or perish with him."

"Let us do the former."

"With all my heart."

"Come—come," said Sixteen-String Jack, "all this discussion leads to nothing, and wastes valuable time besides. Keep quiet, and let us think of something."

"I must leave you," said old Matthew; "the business below requires my attention, and if I am too long absent from it, suspicion may be awakened."

"Take care of it."

"I will, you may be assured. I will, however, come back as soon as it is dusk, and that will be in about an hour's time, I fancy."

"About that."

"Very well, then. I will think the matter over in the bar, and do you talk it over the while between yourselves up here."

"We will."

Old Matthew went downstairs, and kept his word.

Jack and Claude occupied the hour he was absent in proposing a thousand schemes by which the liberation of Tom King could be effected, but they were rejected one after the other as being unsuitable.

And so the time wore on until the shadows of evening crept into the room in which they sat.

Then came the sounds of old Matthew's feet as he slowly ascended the stairs.

CHAPTER CCCXXXI.

A DESPERATE PLOT IS HATCHED BETWEEN THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN AND THE LANDLORD TO EFFECT THE LIBERATION OF DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING FROM NEWGATE.

When old Matthew opened the door and entered the apartment, our friends saw he carried a lighted candle in his hand.

It was not quite dark enough for one to be absolutely needed, but still the gloom in the room and the gloom in their minds made a light look cheerful and pleasant.

Without a word being spoken by either of them, Matthew closed the door behind him, put the candle on the mantelpiece, and sat down. He looked inquiringly into the faces of the two highwaymen, and then spoke:

"You look very dull and glumpish," he said. "What's the matter? Can't you make up your minds as to what is the best thing to be done to save Tom King from Tyburn Tree on Monday morning?"

"No, Matthew, we can't; and that's just the fact of the matter."

"Nor can I."

"Oh! you can."

"I can't."

"I have faith in your powers."

"Then don't have too much faith."

"But you have thought of something."

"No, I have not."

"Not of anything?"

"Of nothing that promises the least chance of success."

"How unfortunate!"

"And you have not?"

"No. We have discussed a thousand different plans, but we have discarded them all as being unsuitable."

"I'll tell you how it is," said old Matthew. "We are over anxious, that's the reason we can't think of something. Now, we ought to get quite cool, and talk over the matter quietly, striving not to think of Tom's great danger, and the little time we have got to get him out of it."

"Very true, Matthew; but the difficulty lies in forgetting that and keeping ourselves cool."

"I know it does; but if you will take my advice, you will fill your pipes, and have a smoke, and I will do the same. There is nothing like a smoke, in my opinion, to calm your mind."

"Well, we will try your remedy, Matthew."

"Do."

Pipes were reached and lighted, and after a few whiffs the conversation recommenced.

"How do you feel?" asked old Matthew, anxious that this remedy should be approved of; "are you calm?"

[THE ENCOUNTER BETWEEN THE HIGHWAYMEN AND THE MOUNTED PATROL.]

"I think so."

"Try a few more whiffs."

Our friends did so, and then the landlord broke out into the following remark—

"You may depend the only way we shall do Dick and Tom any good will be by making a very bold stroke."

"How?"

"I don't know how, but you may take my word for it that only some desperate scheme, and such as no one would think of doing from its very daring, will succeed."

"I see."

"You understand me?"

"Quite, so far as your remarks go."

"Exactly; what now remains is to devise some very bold and daring scheme, and put it into execution."

"Very true. But there are a great many difficulties in the way."

"I know that. But they will never be overcome if you do not resolutely attack them."

"But, Matthew, having advanced so far as you have with your propositions, can't you tell us something that will enable us to achieve our purpose."

Matthew shook his head.

"Are you sure?"

"I can't just at present, and yet, stop. I have an idea."

"What is it? Let us hear it."

"You will laugh at me."

"No—no."

"But it is so preposterous when I come to think of it a second time."

"Is it?"

"It is, indeed. No, it won't do."

"Then, never mind. And yet, just for curiosity sake, suppose you tell us what the idea was that occurred to you."

"I don't mind telling you if you won't laugh at me, for I can't bear to be laughed at."

"Go on—go on; we won't laugh at you."

"Very well, then, the idea which just came all of a sudden into my mind, was that we should attack Newgate as we should a castle, and fetch those we want out of it by main force."

"Ha! ha!"

"There you go. Now you said you wouldn't laugh at me."

"I know I did."

"And you do."

"But it's such a comical idea. The very notion, now, of we three storming Newgate. Ha! ha!"

"Stop a minute," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"What is it?"

"Well, as you know, there's many a true word spoken in jest."

"Oh! yes."

"Well, then, I don't see why a good plan of action should not be suggested in the same manner."

"What do you mean?"

"You shall hear."

"Surely you do not entertain old Matthew's idea of storming the citadel."

"I do, though."

"Ha! ha!"

"Never mind, Claude. Let those laugh who win."

"But, my dear fellow, the idea seems so excessively droll."

"Not so droll, perhaps, as you would first imagine."

"Explain yourself."

"Willingly, if you will allow me the opportunity."

"We shall only be too glad to do that."

"In the first place, then, just carry your thoughts back to what old Matthew expressed his conviction to be."

"What for the scheme to have any chance of success, must be a desperate one."

"Just so."

"Well, what then?"

"Isn't the scheme daring?"

"Certainly."

"Desperate?"

"Absurdly so."

"No—no; don't go so far as that. Just admit that it is desperate."

"What next?"

"I am surprised you do not catch at my idea."

"I do not."

"I will soon make matters clear to you."

"Pray do, for though I began in jest, I feel by this time fully in earnest."

"I intend you to be."

"We are, then."

"Matthew."

"Yes, Jack."

"In the first place, I address myself to you."

"Very well."

"After the trial of Adrian Winberry, and Dick Turpin was taken prisoner, what did you tell me the people in the court did?"

"Why, made a desperate scrimmage, and tried to rescue him with might and main."

"Precisely so. Now what does that argue?"

"Argue?"

"Yes. What conclusion could you come to from that circumstance?"

"Do you mean that the people in the court were friendly to Dick Turpin?"

"Certainly, that's just what I do mean. I think it's quite clear the people were disposed to stand Dick Turpin's friend, and liberate him if they could, or else they would not have tried to rescue him as they did."

"That is clear enough," said Claude Duval.

"Then put that and that together."

"No, I would rather you."

"I will, then. At first I was, like you, inclined to laugh at old Matthew's idea of storming Newgate, but then I thought that it might be done, and that the very daring of the enterprise would insure its success."

"Very likely; but I don't see how it is to be done."

"The thing seems to you to be an impossibility."

"It does."

"I'll make it plain. It's very certain we three can't do it unaided."

"Very true."

"Then we must get some one to aid us."

"But who? That's the difficulty."

"Not at all."

"Not at all?"

"No."

"How? Who could you find who would take part in such a serious affray?"

"The 'family'."

"The 'family'?"

"Yes."

"And I'll be sworn," said old Matthew, springing to his feet, with a joyful expression on his countenance, "and I'll be sworn that they will join you, every one."

"Perhaps they would," said Claude Duval.

"I am sure of it."

"I think they would," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Now, what do you think of that for a daring plan?"

"I don't think that one more daring could possibly be devised."

"Nor I."

"And yet have so many chances of success."

"We have not touched upon that part of the question yet."

"I have thought of it, however."

"Well?"

"You may depend, in the event of such an attack as I contemplate being made, those who are opposed to us will be completely paralyzed with astonishment, and we shall achieve our purpose before they recover from their surprise."

"What kind of an attack do you think of making?"

"We would enlist every member of the family in our cause, and I don't think myself there would be much trouble in doing that. We should have a very large force at our disposal, of which Claude and myself could take the command; and I am not afraid to say that we should storm Newgate even if it was twenty times stronger than it really is."

Old Matthew drew in his breath with an audible sound.

"It's an awful plot to talk over," he said.

"It is. But what will be the consequences? We shall break into the prison and liberate those we wish set free."

"Well," said Matthew, "I suppose it can't be helped; and as I said before, unless we adopt some desperate measure we can't succeed."

"That being the case, then, what more desperate means could you conceive than the one I have proposed?"

"None, certainly."

"Very well, then."

"It seems too dangerous."

"Pho—pho!"

"It does."

"But think how likely to succeed."

"Stay a moment, Jack."

"What is it?"

"I want you to tell us in few words what your plan is."

"To give an outline of it?"

"Just so."

"I will do that with very great pleasure. We must see all the 'family' somewhere. Go to one of the large inns and propose what we want, namely, that they should place themselves under our leadership and storm Newgate—break into it, and set Dick Turpin and Tom King free. We could have horses ready and take advantage of the confusion to make our escape with all speed. Then we will all four once more cry "Hurrah! for the Road!"

"It will be worth something to be able to do that. I am sick of the life I have been lately leading."

"So am I."

"That reminds me that I have got an amendment of your plan to propose."

"Let us hear it, Claude."

"Suppose to-night we ask Matthew to get us a couple of first-class horses."

"Yes—yes."

"Provide us with arms."

"Yes."

"And then we would set out and spend the night in search of booty and adventures."

"Hurrah!" cried Sixteen-String Jack. "Capital. I second that motion at once."

"Come on, then. Now Matthew, let us have the horses."

But the landlord shook his head,

"You are not content," he said, "with what you have done already, but must incur fresh and unnecessary peril. Suppose you are captured to-night. How will your friends stand then?"

"You must not look at things from such a gloomy point of view, Matthew. We will, for our own sakes, take great care of ourselves."

"I suppose it is no good my advising you."

"Yes it is, Matthew. What do you think of our plan for enlisting all the 'family' in our service?"

"It is a good one."

"That's right. And you think we shall succeed?"

"You have a chance of success."

"Very well, then, Matthew, go and fetch the horses."

"No—no."

"Will you if I give you some good reasons for doing so?"

"I will try."

"In the first place, we ought not to go asking favours of the 'family' without money in our pockets."

"No."

"Then we have none. So you see we require a booty for that. Isn't that a good reason?"

"It is the risk I speak of."

"Then there you make a great mistake. I have shown you we are in want of booty, and the next thing will be to show you we are in want of an adventure. Now do you know how I shall do that?"

"No."

"Well, then, Claude and myself have been cooped up so long, and kept from any adventure on the highway, that our talents are quite rusting away. Our blood is getting chilled in our veins, and we want a good ride along the high-road to warm it. We shall then be in good condition for our work, so you see the reasons why we should make an excursion to-night are excellent."

"Well, well," said old Matthew, "I won't baulk your fancy, for fear, after all, that something should go wrong in consequence, and then you would shift all the blame on to my shoulders."

"Just as you like, so long as you get us the horses."

"I will do so, but it will never do for you to mount here, everybody will be aware of it. You had better make your way out of the back door on foot, and as quietly as possible, and without attracting any more notice than you can help, direct your steps to the Oxford-road, where the horses shall be waiting for you."

CHAPTER CCCXXXII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SET OUT ON THE OXFORD-ROAD, AND MEET WITH A VERY REMARKABLE ADVENTURE.

THE two highwaymen were too well acquainted with the perils of their position not to see at once the wisdom of the little arrangement proposed by old Matthew, and they immediately acquiesced in it.

If there was anything that would warm the blood of our friends and steady their nerves, a gallop along the high-road and a spirit-stirring adventure, such as they had had in past times, would assuredly produce that effect.

In fact, the hide-and-seek sort of game which they had been playing so long did not suit them any better than the close confinement they had had ever since their arrival at the "White Horse."

Then they were rather poorly off for cash, and they knew some money would certainly be required in the carrying out of their designs.

For instance, when paying their visit to the "family," at the ken, one very requisite thing would be to treat those assembled all round with whatever they liked to call for, and if a couple of hundred happened to be present that would cost something.

Then again, they could not tell what emergency might occur in which money might not be of the most essential service.

Under these circumstances, and influenced by these reflections, there certainly did seem every reason that they should set off on their little expedition.

Old Matthew, however, although he unwillingly gave his consent, took rather a different view of the affair than our two friends.

There was great danger attached to their excursion.

Mr. Wriggles, he felt sure, had by no means given up his search for them, although he had made no demonstration lately; but then he might perhaps be trying to lull them into a sense of false security.

That was the first danger, but by no means the last.

A knight of the road was exposed to many perils.

They might have an end put to their career at any moment by a chance or well-directed shot, or by capture, or a thousand other accidents inseparable from their calling.

There was no reason why, if they had escaped so far, that they should escape to-night.

Then, if anything happened to them, how would Dick Turpin and Tom King fare in the Newgate cell?

This was the view which old Matthew took of the affair, but which was not participated by our two friends themselves.

Danger was a thing with which they were so familiar, that they had long ceased to look upon it with ordinary feelings.

They disregarded it completely.

Matthew requested them earnestly to take all possible care on this night at least, and painted the consequences which would occur if they should not return.

They readily promised.

Thus satisfied, the landlord set out to look after the horses.

Our friends, while he was gone, occupied themselves with making an examination of their different weapons, and placing them in such a condition that they would be available for instant service.

"Which road shall we take, Claude?" asked Sixteen-String Jack. "We may as well make up our minds before we start."

"To be sure, Jack."

"Then, which do you say?"

"I hardly know. It seems ages to me since I cried 'Stand and deliver!' upon an English high-road!"

"And to me."

"Well, which way shall we take?"

"Suppose we say the Oxford-road?"

"Agreed. That will suit us as well as any."

"I have had many a good booty there."

"Oh, we will say the Oxford-road."

They had agreed upon this point when Matthew entered.

"I have sent off to a place for a couple of horses where I am sure of having good ones from, and I have told him to have them waiting in half-an-hour in front of the railings before Montague-house."

"That is in Bloomsbury Fields, is it not?"

"Yes."

"But you said the Oxford-road, Matthew?"

"I know I did, but this was a second thought."

"Oh?"

"You see, Montague-house is in a very retired spot—it is not so far from here to there as the Oxford-road."

"It will suit you for that, then, admirably."

"So it will."

The Montague-house referred to by our friends was a rather ancient edifice, which has, however, long since disappeared. Its site, however, is occupied by the British Museum, so it will be easy for our readers to understand its position.

Indeed, some will remember that the street on the east side of the British Museum, leading from Great Russell-street to Russel-square, is called Montague-street to this day.

This was the rendezvous which old Matthew had appointed.

No sooner had the half-hour expired, than the two highwaymen, who were in a state of perfect readiness, shook hands with old Matthew and departed.

Claude Duval had asked for a piece of rope, and had been accommodated with a coil of that material, which he wound round his waist.

He thought such a thing might come in useful. At any rate, if it was not wanted it would not much matter.

Thus equipped they started off.

They were allowed egress—not from the front door, but by the door in White Horse-yard.

Upon reaching this place, they looked up and down it as well as the darkness would allow them, but they saw nothing of their foes.

Encouraged by this, they, after a moment's deliberation, turned to the left, preferring to go in the direction of Drury-lane.

Upon emerging into this thoroughfare, the same searching glances were given, but neither Mr. Wriggles nor any of his men were in sight.

The night was early as yet.

The streets were tolerably thronged with people, though not so thickly as at the present day, for London a century and a quarter ago did not number so many inhabitants as it does now.

It would seem that, after all, Mr. Wriggles had given up the task of capturing the highwaymen.

Without any interruption whatever, Claude and Jack made their way along Drury-lane until they reached the top of it.

Then crossing the end of Holborn, they passed along a narrow street—now called Museum-street—which led them direct to their destination.

In the dim nightlight Montague-house looked huge and sombre.

Advancing close up to the railings, the highwaymen stood with their backs to them, and waited for the appearance of the horses.

They had not long to wait.

Out of the gathering gloom they saw a man come mounted on a horse, and leading another by the bridle.

He was walking the animals slowly.

"There they are," said Claude, and, as he spoke, he hastened forward and addressed the man, who pulled up as soon as he saw them.

"Were you waiting for us?"

"Who are you? I am waiting for two gentlemen."

"And we are waiting for you."

"Give me some proof."

"We are friends of Matthew Gale's, the landlord of the 'White Horse' in Drury-lane."

"All right," said the man, slipping out of the saddle; "he ordered them."

Sixteen-String Jack gave the man a crown piece, and then followed Claude's example and mounted.

They seated themselves firmly in the saddle in a moment, and set off at a sharp trot.

The commencement of the Oxford-road was soon gained.

Claude and Jack, as soon as they were mounted, experienced that sense of exhilaration which no one can fail to feel when mounted on a good steed.

The motion, too, warmed them without fatiguing them.

"A gallop!" cried Jack, "a gallop! I feel once more as if I was a free man!"

He touched his steed lightly with his spur as he spoke, and the gallant creature responded to it by bounding forward at a rapid speed.

Claude followed.

The Oxford-road was then quite free from houses, except a few which stood back surrounded by their own grounds, and they were very few about.

The road was almost deserted, so our friends had no obstacles to their progress.

On reaching Tyburn Gate our friends drew up, and Claude, thrusting his hand into his pocket, pulled out a handful of loose silver, which he gave to the tollman.

Having passed this obstruction, they proceeded at a more gentle pace.

They did not wish to exhaust their horses, but to reserve their powers until they had occasion to make use of them. It was a glorious night, and one which well suited their purpose.

There was no moon.

But the sky was thickly studded with brilliant stars which seemed to cast a faint twinkling radiance upon the earth.

With the exception of the slight illumination received from them, it was profoundly dark, yet not so dark as to prevent Claude and Jack from seeing the hedgerows and tall trees on either side of the road.

They were now fairly in the country, and quite away from all houses.

"This is glorious, Claude," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I feel myself again."

"We want something."

"What?"

"The presence of our two comrades."

"Dick and Tom."

"Yes, we do indeed."

"We shall have them, ere long."

"I trust so, and then we will see whether our old plan cannot be carried out. I mean the one which we devised immediately after Tom King's escape from Newgate."

"You mean forming ourselves into a band of four, with Dick Turpin to act as our captain."

"Just so."

"That would be glorious."

"Thus united, we will perform some deeds which shall by far transcend all that we have hitherto accomplished."

"We should be strong enough to overcome almost any force opposed to us, should we not?"

"Certainly."

"Do not let us speculate upon the future too much; you must recollect it looks very dark and uncertain."

"It does, indeed."

"Hark!"

"What!"

"Halt. I fancy I heard the sound of horses' hoofs."

Claude pulled up in a moment and so did Jack.

Then the two leant forward in their saddles, and listened intently for the repetition of the sound which the latter had heard.

It came quite plainly to their ears.

Undoubtedly it was the sound of horse's hoofs.

But unaccompanied by the rumbling of carriage wheels. The horse was coming at rather a slow walk.

"What are we to do, Claude?"

"Stop him."

"He is coming this way, I think."

"Oh, yes, he is coming to London. I wonder what makes him walk his horse so slowly as that?"

"I don't know."

"It seems strange."

"It does. The tread is quite measured and slow, as though the rider was in no sort of hurry."

"It is something unusual and strange, and that is quite sufficient reason for us to be cautious."

"It is."

"Let us draw aside as close under the shadow of the hedge as we can, and then, when the horseman passes us, which he is sure to do presently, we will have a look at him, and, if he seems of the right sort, it will be easy for us to overtake him."

"If he goes no faster than he does now."

The sounds came with greater and greater distinctness to the ears of our friends.

It was high time, they thought, that they took up their position, so they did so at once, and as noiselessly as possible.

Having done so, it would have required an eye of more than usual sharpness to have distinguished them from the hedge behind them. The only difference was the ground looked rather darker.

Our friends did not speak for fear the light breeze which was blowing should carry the sounds with it upon the still night air, and waft them into the ears of the approaching horseman.

They did not want him to have the least suspicion that they were on the road in ambush.

Should they attack him, their success would in a great measure depend upon taking him by sudden surprise.

With the same slow, steady motion the horseman came on.

There was something excessively odd about any one travelling the road at night at such a pace as that, and our friends could not make it out.

Anxiously they waited for a solution of the mystery.

To while away the time, each of the highwaymen drew a pistol from his belt, and, cocking it, held it in their right hands.

They were then armed and in readiness.

Five minutes elapsed.

Then, as Claude and Jack strained their vision down the road, a moving object came in sight.

They, assisted probably by their fancy, quickly made out its outlines to be a horse and rider.

Nearer and nearer he came, at the same slow walk.

He became more and more visible.

At length he came to within a few yards of our friends, who then saw that they were quite right.

It was a horse and rider.

The latter was clothed in garments of some dark colour, so dark, indeed, that his form was scarcely distinguishable.

On he came.

Suddenly, to the great surprise of our friends he pulled up in the middle of the road exactly opposite to them.

CHAPTER CCCXXXIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL HITS UPON A VERY INGENIOUS EXPEDIENT FOR BRINGING THE OXFORD MAIL COACH TO A STANDSTILL.

THERE was something very strange and mysterious in all this, but the two highwaymen nevertheless felt that the mystery would be still further developed.

Straining their eyes until they positively ached again, they watched all the movements of the strange horseman.

They saw him look up the road, and to the right and to the left.

Then he assumed a listening attitude.

"I thought I heard horses' feet upon the road," he said; "but all is still now, so I suppose I was mistaken. And yet I could almost have sworn to it."

The horseman listened again, and somehow or other the idea came into the minds of Claude and Jack that the man on horseback was of the same trade as themselves, and that he was on the lookout for travellers.

Nevertheless, they did not move hand or foot, but continued to keep their eyes fixed upon him.

That they were perfectly invisible and indistinguishable from the hedge in the shadow of which they stood, they felt certain, for the horseman had several times looked in the direction of them, and never made the least movement or sound to show that he had seen them.

"I can't hear anything," said the horseman, aloud. "Curse it! what confoundedly dull work it is. Here have I been pacing up and down this road for more than an hour. I shall be glad when my time is up. However, I'll turn back, and try and meet my mate, and if we have a bit of chat together, that will pass away the time better. Come up, will you."

As the horseman addressed these last few words to his steed, he turned round, and walked slowly away in the direction he had just come.

It was not until the sounds of his horse's hoofs had entirely died away, that the highwaymen ventured to address each other, or even to move.

And then Claude Duval spoke.

"What do you make of that, Jack?"

"To tell the truth, I don't know what to make of it."

"Nor I, exactly."

"If he had spoken on purpose to mystify us as to who he was and what he wanted, he could not have done it better."

"It was a strange speech."

"Very."

"Did you hear what he said about riding down the road to meet his mate?"

"Yes."

"What did he mean?"

"I am no better able to judge than yourself."

"I don't like it at all, because I don't understand it; and anything I don't understand I don't like."

"Nor I."

"The best thing we can do, I fancy, is to walk forward very quietly, and, as soon as we come to a gap in the hedge, or a gate, or anything of that sort, we will make our way through it."

"And then follow this mysterious horseman, and try to overhear what he says to his mate."

"Just so."

"We shall then, no doubt, come to the root of the matter."

"So we shall."

"Forward, then. There is a dry ditch here. Walk along that, and then we are not so likely to be heard."

This good advice was followed.

About twenty yards further on along the road there was a gap in the hedge.

They resolved to avail themselves of it as a means of getting into the meadows.

Both dismounted, and getting through the gap first themselves, took hold of their horses by the bridles and drew them up after them.

They then mounted, and finding there was a quantity of short grass behind the hedge, they pushed on at a gentle trot.

The ground made the beat of the horses' hoofs quite inaudible.

At every few yards they would pull up and listen for the sound of the mysterious horseman.

At length they heard him.

He was going at the same slow, steady pace as before.

Presently their practised ears could detect the sounds of another horse approaching them, also at a walking pace.

It may be that some suspicion of who the rider was crossed the minds of our friends, but, if so, they did not make any remark to each other concerning it.

Indeed, it would not be prudent for them to have done so.

Gently they kept on their way.

At length they heard a voice say:

"Is that you, Jenkins?"

"Yes, mate."

The trampling of horses' feet ceased, and the highwaymen came to a standstill.

"What awful dull work this is."

"Awful."

"Have you heard anything?"

"No. Have you?"

"I fancied once I heard horses' feet coming from London, but I must have been mistaken, for I listened and could not hear them."

"Oh, you were mistaken, no doubt. I wonder when the relief will come?"

"Not for half-an-hour yet."

"How dreadful."

"It is. This patrolling the road is the dullest work I have ever had to do."

"I am sure it is that I have."

"I'd sooner be at Bow-street a good deal. When you are in London there is a chance of your getting shelter and some one to talk to."

"And something to drink."

"Yes, but here we are up and down this road without a house or a human being in sight."

"It's dreadful work."

"It is that. I had no idea what it was to patrol a road for two hours every night, but now I have found out to my cost."

"We have been on this job now for a matter of two months, and I am tired of it, I can tell you. We have never had an alarm of any sort all the while, have we?"

"Not once."

Sixteen-String Jack touched Claude on the arm.

"Come," he said, in the faintest possible whisper.

He pressed his heels against his horse's flanks as he spoke, and at a walk led the way across the meadow, going in a direction at right angles to the road.

Their progress was almost noiseless, and they got off without being heard by the men in the road.

The meadow was of considerable length, but our friends did not stop till they came to a hedge which barred their further progress. Then, feeling they were quite out of earshot, they spoke.

"What do you think of that, Claude?" asked Sixteen-String Jack.

"Why, I think we have acquired a piece of very important and useful information."

"Very, indeed."

"I understand it all, now. The police authorities must have appointed a troop of mounted men to patrol the roads contiguous to the metropolis."

"That's it."

"And we have just seen two of them."

"Who don't seem very well pleased with their job."

"It must be awful dull work."

"Unquestionably."

"That accounts for his walking up and down the road in that mysterious manner. I couldn't make it out at first."

"Nor I."

"I am afraid this will interfere with us a great deal."

"It is sure to."

"I wonder old Matthew did not mention it."

"You may depend he knows nothing at all about it."

"Perhaps so."

"We discovered it by an accident."

"And a fortunate thing it was for us that we did."

"Decidedly."

"But I suppose you don't intend to let them baulk you of your intention."

"Oh, dear no. It will surprise me if I go back to London empty handed."

"And me."

"Jack."

"What, Claude?"

"Do you recollect I asked for a piece of rope?"

"Yes."

"Do you know what I wanted it for?"

"Not exactly."

"Well, I may as well tell you. I have set myself a task."

"What is it?"

"You will join me, I know."

"Let me hear what it is."

"Well, then, I set out with the intention of stopping the Oxford Coach."

"The devil!"

"It's a bold scheme, isn't it?"

"It is, and more especially so now the roads are patrolled by mounted police."

"That makes it awkward certainly, but I'll tell you how I shall do it."

"How?"

"I shall pick a nice dark piece of road, with trees on each side, and I shall tie the rope right across."

"I understand."

"That will throw the horses down in a moment."

"It's a good plan, Claude, and I don't see why it shouldn't answer. We should have to be quick."

"Yes. But just think what a good booty we should have from all the passengers, without counting the mail-bags, which are sure to carry something worth having."

"That will set us up for a bit."

"It will. Now, if you will take my advice, you won't stop any one else if you have ever so good a chance."

"Why not?"

"Because it can't be done without raising an alarm."

"I see."

"Which would be fatal to us. When we have stopped the coach we will make our way in as direct a line as possible to London, and not trouble after anything else."

"Agreed."

"Come on, then. We will follow this hedge a little way, and then get into the high-road again."

"Perhaps, if we get further out into the country, we might miss the patrol."

"Very likely."

Our friends again resumed their way, taking their way along the hedge which divided the meadow from the one next to it, and which ran parallel to the road.

It was a very fortunate thing for our friends that they discovered the existence of a mounted patrol on the road as they did.

If they had remained in ignorance of that fact, they might have been made acquainted with it at rather an awkward juncture, and in rather an awkward fashion.

Now, however, they were on the alert, and probably would not have much difficulty in avoiding the danger now that they were made acquainted with its presence.

The soft turf in the meadow was very grateful to the horses' hoofs, and they trotted along rapidly.

At length they came to another hedge, which put a stop to their progression in a straightforward direction.

They did not jump this as they might have done, but made their way towards the highway again.

As they had fully expected, they found a gate leading out into it.

It was fastened with a padlock, but Claude alighted from his horse, and soon got rid of that difficulty.

The gate swung open, and they all passed out into the road. They listened intently, but they were unable to hear anything of the patrol.

As quickly as possible, then, they made their way forward in such a direction that they must inevitably meet the Oxford Coach.

It was a daring feat for any two men to attempt under any circumstances, but especially so now the road was so well guarded as it appeared to be.

But our friends were bent upon the accomplishment of it, and the reader by this time must be aware that it was no trifle which prevented them from carrying out anything they had taken in hand.

We are rather inclined, however, to tremble for their safety.

Should they be either killed or captured, the aspect of affairs would be rather serious.

But, without the least dread whatever upon their minds, they trotted along the road as though nothing in the world was the matter.

At length, without meeting with any interruption, and without the occurrence of any incident, they arrived at a spot which Claude considered very well calculated to answer their purpose.

From some reason or other, the road was some few feet narrower than elsewhere.

It took rather a sharp curve, too, to the right.

On both sides were some very tall trees, which grew to a great height, and, as a natural consequence, cast a deep shadow on the roadway.

That was increased by the tendency which the tops of the trees had to touch each other—indeed, in some places they were actually in contact.

So far all was favourable.

But there was something else which induced Claude to select that spot above all others.

The driver of the coach, would, of course, be aware of the sharp curve in the road, and, as a measure of safety and precaution, not only to himself, but to anything approaching, he would rein his horses in, and come round slowly.

This was just what was wanted.

Sixteen-String Jack saw the advantage at once.

"This will be the place, I think," Claude said.

"Oh, yes; you could not possibly find a better."

"Then just hold my horse a moment, and I will alight and tie one end of the rope to a tree in readiness."

"Do so."

Claude slipped off his horse, and, as he did so, he said:

"I will put my ear to the ground first, and listen if any one is coming."

"It will be prudent."

Claude laid himself down at full length in the roadway, and, placing his ear on the ground, listened very intently. No sound, however, came to his ears.

Satisfied of this, he slowly uncoiled the rope from round his waist, and then proceeded to tie one end of it very firmly to the trunk of one of the trees.

This done, he walked across the road, holding the rope slackly in his hands.

In another moment, however, their ears were assailed by the blast of a horn.

"The Oxford Coach," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Fasten the rope, Claude, we are just in time."

CHAPTER CCCXXXIV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL PLUNDER THE OXFORD MAIL, AND BOTH HAVE A NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

ANOTHER blast of the horn followed Jack's words, which, though louder than the preceding one, was feeble—though, doubtless, had the coach been nearer than it was, it would have sounded a lusty note.

Claude Duval slipped the end of the rope round the tree on the other side of the road, and pulled it tight.

He held it in this position a moment or two, ready to let go in an instant should anything else want to pass before the stage-coach came up.

But there seemed to be no other vehicle upon the road.

The rumbling of the wheels could now be heard with a distinctness which momentarily increased.

Claude now ventured to secure the rope.

Having done so, it formed a line right across the road, about two feet from the ground, and was a barrier of a very formidable character indeed.

It was tight and well secured. The rope was strong, and there were no fears of its breaking or the knots giving way, at all events, until the service it was designed to perform was completed.

Claude put his hand upon it near the middle and tested its firmness, and feeling quite satisfied upon that point, he remounted his horse.

The coach was now very close at hand.

The rapid revolutions of the wheels upon the hard turnpike road made a continuous grating, showing the speed at which it was coming to be very great.

The horn was blown at frequent intervals.

In one of their calculations, however, our friends proved to be in error.

They had reckoned that, upon approaching the bend in the road close to which they had taken up their station, that the driver of the coach would slacken his speed, and come round carefully, for fear of a collision with any other vehicle which might be coming towards them.

But the driver did nothing of the sort.

He did not perceptibly check his horses, but the guard kept on blowing his horn almost unceasingly, the meaning of which was to let all people on the road know the stage-coach was coming, and to warn them to get out of the way.

From their advantageous position on horseback, our friends could see over the hedgerows, and after the lapse of a few moments they could see the reflection of the lamps on both sides of the vehicle, which shone with a strange effect upon the vegetation.

Little did the driver and guard and passengers think what sort of an adventure was awaiting them.

In fact, ever since the mounted patrol had been established, a feeling of great security had taken possession of the breasts of the public.

This owed its existence to the fact that, since the mounted police had patrolled the road, no robberies had been committed.

To stop a coach filled with people, many of whom were well armed, was at any time a daring undertaking for two men to resolve upon, but trebly so when the roads were watched by mounted police officers, whose particular duty it was to see that no such act was consummated.

But our friends had resolved upon it, and a few minutes now will serve to show what sort of success they met with.

The coach rolled on.

Claude and Jack backed their horses as close as they could to the bank on one side of the road, and then, with their pistols already in their grasp, they waited.

But at the same time they listened intently, so as to be aware if anything else besides the coach approached them. At length, with a sudden dash, the huge conveyance, with its four spirited horses, came round the corner of the road.

"Now, Claude," said Jack, "be ready. Cry 'Stand.'"

"All right."

Sixteen-String Jack made this last request because Claude Duval had got a stronger and louder voice than he had himself.

The rope across the road must have been perfectly invisible to both the coachman and his horses.

Claude left his place of concealment.

He had two pistols in his hands.

One was loaded with ball.

The other with powder only.

This latter he discharged in the air, and immediately throwing it on the ground, passed the loaded one into his right, and, followed by Jack, reached the side of the stage-coach.

Our friends had found discharging a pistol loaded with powder only an excellent device.

They were able to load it heavily, and ram the charge down hard, so that, when the pistol was fired, not only would the report be tremendous and startling, but an intensely bright red flame would issue from the muzzle.

The sight and the sound of this had the effect of frightening people.

It made the highwaymen seem as though they were in good earnest.

Scarcely had the report of this pistol ceased than Claude, in his most stentorian tones, cried:

"Stand and deliver! Halt! Pull up, coachman—pull up, I say, or I will send a bullet into your brains."

"Highwayman, eh, lad," said the coachman, as he made a vain effort to rein in his horses, who were startled by the report of the pistol and the sudden burst of flame proceeding from it.

But just at that moment the feet of the two leading horses got entangled in the rope which had been placed across the road for that purpose.

The others could not stop themselves, but fell down likewise, so the coach was brought somewhat suddenly to a standstill.

A succession of shrill shrieks now came from the interior of the coach.

By an arrangement to which they had mutually agreed, Sixteen-String Jack looked after the passengers on the roof of the coach and levied his contributions upon them, while Claude Duval performed the same interesting operation upon those who occupied the interior.

Now the guard of a stage-coach, who always sits at the back in a seat provided for his special accommodation, was provided with two instruments which he was to make proper use of as occasion required.

One was a long tin horn.

The other was a blunderbuss.

The first was to herald the approach of the coach.

The other was to defend the passengers from any attack which might be made upon it.

Both hung in wicker baskets provided for their reception, in very loving contingency with each other.

The guard, then, as soon as he saw Sixteen-String Jack, who had ridden close up to the coach and demanded the purses of the outside passengers, the guard, we say, with many wise shakes of the head and hushes, proceeded to draw the blunderbuss from its receptacle.

Then, when he had it out, he cocked it, and placing the butt against his shoulder, took careful aim at the highwayman.

The huge, bell-shaped mouth of the instrument looked terrifying to a degree. With a triumphant and exultant feeling about his heart, the guard pulled the trigger.

The result was rather startling to the guard, and decidedly not pleasant.

It was many a day since the clumsy firearm had been discharged.

Now it was overloaded.

There was a flash of white smoke.

Then a roaring report like the discharge of a small cannon.

Mingled with the sound was an awful cry.

It came from the lips of the guard.

It was echoed by many of the passengers on the roof.

The barrel of the blunderbuss had burst, and the guard, with the hideous yell we have mentioned, fell bleeding and wounded, from his seat at the back of the coach into the roadway.

It was the recoil of the weapon which did it.

Several of the outside passengers were injured, but not seriously.

But how did Sixteen-String Jack fare?

He escaped unhurt.

But how?

His attention had been attracted towards the back of the coach.

He saw something was going on.

The next moment he caught sight of the bell-mouthed barrel of the blunderbuss pointed straight at him. He knew how little dependence could, in a general way, be placed upon those weapons.

Still he did not like to run the risk of this one being powerless to harm him.

Directly he saw it he slipped off his horse on to the ground.

Nor was he a moment too soon.

The discharge followed instantly, and a perfect storm of missiles flew over his horse, and which must have riddled him through and through had he remained.

No sooner was the danger over than he recovered himself, and, springing into the saddle, called out so that his comrade should know he was unhurt.

He spoke in somewhat sterner tones than before.

"Quick—quick. Give me your purses every one of you. Throw them into my hat. If any one hesitates, that moment will be his last."

This threat had the desired effect, and purses of various kinds were thrown into the hat.

Jack rapidly transferred them to the capacious pockets of his coat, and then cried:

"Now, gentlemen, your watches."

There was a little demur to this, but the sight of Jack's pistol silenced all scruples, and the watches were handed to him.

Jack now turned his attention to the driver, from whom he expected to get by far the most valuable portion of booty.

"Coachy," he cried, "do you want to see the sun rise to-morrow?"

The driver glared at him, but made no reply.

"Because, if you do," continued Jack, "the only way by which you can do so will be by immediately handing me the mail bags which you know are in the box under your seat."

"The mail bags," gasped the coachman. "I am a ruined man. Oh, good gentlemen, protect me."

But the passengers were deaf to his appeal.

If they did not feel inclined to imperil their lives for the salvation of their own valuables, they were scarcely likely to do so for those belonging to other people.

"Coachman," said Jack, "hand me those bags. If you refuse or hesitate a moment longer, so sure as you now breathe, you are a dead man."

"Murder."

"You may call it murder if you like, but I should call it suicide."

"Suicide?"

"Yes, for you will be throwing your life away when there is no occasion for you to do so. Come—come. I cannot linger longer. The mail bags, I say, without you want me to shoot you first and take them afterwards, for to have them I am determined."

With a dismal groan, as he reflected upon what would be the consequences of this night's work, the coachman got up off his seat and opened the box to which Sixteen-String Jack had alluded, and which was provided for the reception of the mail bags.

The coachman was very reluctant to give them up, because he was responsible for their safe keeping.

But then, he thought, as the highwayman was determined to have them, that he had better give them up than be shot, and have them taken afterwards just the same.

With a heavy heart, then, he handed them to Jack, who threw them before him on the saddle.

Having related so far what befel Jack in his attempt upon the outside, we will proceed to turn our attention to the success Claude had with the inside passengers.

Riding straight up to the door of the coach, he caught hold of the window with his left hand, and let it down with a crash.

Scarcely had it finished clattering down in its frame than there was a sudden report.

Claude felt his hat fly off his head, and a tingling sensation all along his scalp.

This, of course, startled him for the moment, but Claude had been fired at more than once in his life, and he knew from experience that if you hear the report of a firearm you are alive.

So on this occasion he was certain that, beyond a slight wound, there was nothing the matter.

Without, then, a perceptible pause, he put his head in at the carriage window, and projected the barrel of a pistol into the vehicle.

An oil-lamp cast a tolerable radiance around, and by the aid of this Claude was able to see the different passengers.

The inside of the coach was quite full.

"That's a rough welcome," said Claude, in off-handed tones, as though it was the simplest matter in the world. "But never mind, I must have my shot back, or else it would not be fair."

Claude used his eyes well while he made this speech, for the double purpose of seeing when anyone made an attempt upon his life, and who it was who had fired the shot which was so near being a fatal one.

When he spoke about returning it, he saw one gentleman shrink back.

That was enough.

Claude knew him.

"Come, ladies and gentlemen," he said. "You don't seem very well pleased. However, we must have business first and pleasure afterwards. I will attend to you, sir, in a few moments."

These words were addressed to the man who had shrunk back, and who Claude suspected of having fired the shot.

He was still further confirmed in this suspicion by seeing him change colour visibly.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen," he said, "time presses. Be good enough, therefore, to be as quick as possible. Your money, watches, rings, and other valuables. Hand them to me quietly, and you will receive no personal violence whatever. But you must be quick, and give them up without resistance. Now."

Still the passengers hesitated.

"Come now," said Claude, "this is really too bad. You cannot escape, and it will be much better for you to give the things up with a good grace than compel me to use force, which I shall be compelled to do. Now, then, I will begin with you, sir."

Claude addressed an elderly gentleman who sat next the door with his back to the horses, and whose face was a picture of ludicrous fright.

In a helpless, confused sort of way, he put his hand into his breast and pulled out a pocket-book, which, in less than a minute afterwards, was safe in Claude's pocket.

CHAPTER CCCXXXV.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ARE ATTACKED BY THE PATROL.

"THAT'S a beginning," he said. "Come, follow this gentleman's example. Really, it's too bad of you. You don't deserve to have any forbearance shown you—you don't, indeed. Come, I shall proceed to harsh measures."

The passengers looked at Claude and saw the determined expression on his countenance, though he spoke so good-temperedly.

They also looked at the long, bright barrel of the pistol, which was resting in a negligent sort of way upon the side of the coach window.

They thought it best policy to submit.

Purses, watches, rings, brooches, ear-rings, and all the valuable articles worn by people tolerably well off, were one after the other handed to him.

The booty was considerable, and must have represented a very large amount.

Claude was highly pleased with the success he had met with, and felt inclined to pardon the man who had fired at him, and who after all had only done his duty, and acted just as he would have done himself had their positions been reversed.

But something else occurred which produced a complete revulsion of feeling.

While Claude's attention had been wholly occupied in receiving the various valuables as they were handed out to him, this man, with the utmost secrecy and caution, managed to draw another pistol.

He was not perceived by anyone.

Then, when Claude was off his guard, and in the act of making the reflection we have recorded, he hastily put the weapon on full cock, raised it to a level, took aim, and pulled the trigger.

The first intimation that Claude had as to what had taken place was the click of a piece of steel.

But the pistol missed fire.

The powder merely flashed in the pan.

With a terrible oath, this man flung the useless pistol full in the face of the highwayman, in the hope that he might thereby do him a serious injury.

But Claude drew aside just in time to avoid the well-aimed and dangerous missile, which fell harmlessly enough into the roadway.

There was now an end to all Claude's pacific intentions. His life had been a second time deliberately and treacherously aimed at.

Nothing but the chance circumstance of the pistol missing fire saved his life.

Had it not done so, he must have inevitably perished, for his body quite blocked up the coach window, so as to make it an impossibility to avoid hitting him somewhere. But providentially he escaped.

There was, however, a flushed and angry look upon the face of Claude Duval, as turning the handle of the coach door, he flung it open.

"Come, sir," he said, addressing the man who had fired, "I must trouble you to alight. You have had what you would call two fair shots at me, and I must have what I call two fair shots at you."

"No—no."

"No, say you? But I must. I presume you are a gentleman."

"Precisely so; and it is for that reason I cannot exchange shots with a highwayman."

"Such a pretext as that will avail you little. I have no such scruples, and I tell you, once for all, if you do not alight, I will fire at you where you are. There will be the risk of hitting some of the other passengers, but that will be entirely your fault."

"No—no, good Mr. Highwayman," cried the other passengers. "Make him alight. Don't fire in here—pray don't. Why, all the way along that gentleman has been swaggering and boasting, and saying how he should like the coach to be attacked by highwaymen, just to show us what he should do."

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Claude Duval, "I should be very unwilling to injure any of you in the slightest degree, or even to run the most distant risk of doing so, but really you must, in self-defence, compel the gentleman to alight."

"We'll soon do that, sir, if you will wait a moment," cried the passengers, and, as they spoke, they set about forcing the gentleman to alight.

To facilitate them in what they were about, Claude opened the coach door.

The whole of the passengers made common cause against the boasting traveller.

They pushed him with all their might, and, as their united strength by far exceeded his, they succeeded in getting him close to the coach door.

Then Claude, leaning forward on his saddle, stretched out his hand, and, seizing him by the collar of his coat with a firm grasp, drew him out into the roadway.

The old gentleman who sat next to the door slammed it shut in a moment, leaving him to his fate.

The boasting gentleman fell rather heavily into the roadway when Claude released his hold.

But he quickly scrambled to his feet.

"Now," said Claude, "I give you a chance for your life. I will count three, and, if by the time I pronounce the third word you are not out of the range of this pistol, you will have no one to blame but yourself. Now! One!"

"No, my fine fellow," said the traveller, plucking up a courage that had a great deal of desperation in it. "No, I will try what I can do for you."

He fumbled in his pockets while speaking.

Claude took no notice, but quietly said:

"Two."

The traveller turned round, and prepared to fly.

"Three," said Claude.

But his adversary had taken one bound, and then gone through the hedge.

However, Duval fired his pistol after him, though whether it took any effect he did not stop to inquire, for he heard the sudden trampling of horses' hoofs, which showed that some one was approaching at a very rapid rate, indeed.

At the same moment, Sixteen-String Jack, who had quite finished with the outsides, cried—

"Off and away, Claude! Off and away! The grabs are after us! Off and away!"

At the same moment, Sixteen-String Jack struck his spurs into his horse's flanks, and galloped in the direction of the country.

Claude lost no time in following his example, for the sound of horsemen, coming from the direction of London, reached his ears with a great deal too much plainness to be pleasant.

The hearts of the highwaymen were elated with the success they had met with in their perilous adventure, and they looked upon this prospect of a gallop into the country with feelings of pleasure rather than otherwise.

A few words passed between them as to what kind of booty they had been able to obtain, and the question was asked as to what kind of hurts they had received, which were really too insignificant to be mentioned.

"We have done a daring thing, and got off well in every respect," said Claude Duval. "To-morrow all London will ring with this."

"It will, indeed."

"Hark, what is that?"

With a sudden rush two horsemen darted forward and planted themselves exactly in the path of our friends, who were consequently compelled to pull up or be thrown down. Of course they chose the former alternative.

"Surrender!" cried the two horsemen, by whom they were confronted. "Surrender!"

"For what?"

"You know for what. We are perfectly well aware of who you are. You are highwaymen, and our prisoners."

"We may be the one but we are certainly not the other," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Let us pass."

"Not so fast, my fine fellows; we have got you, and we mean to keep you."

"As for having us, I think we could show you a clean pair of heels if we wished it."

"And meet the next patrol along the road."

"Is that it? Then we will try, if you like, whether we are your prisoners or you ours?"

Our friends noticed that the two mounted police-officers held drawn swords in their hands, and as they (Claude and Jack) carried such weapons by their sides, they drew them from their sheaths.

The next moment the four bright blades were crossed.

The steel clashed together with a ringing sound.

The two police officers, who were well skilled in the sword exercise, did little more than defend themselves from their antagonists.

They were prolonging the conflict as much as they could, so that the sounds of the affray should reach the ears of the other men patrolling the road, and so that they should surround them, thus making them an easy prey.

From the way in which they dallied, this suspicion soon entered the minds of the highwaymen, and shouting out their convictions to each other, at the same moment precipitated themselves with the utmost vigour upon their foes.

The fight now commenced in real earnest.

The weapons rang together.

The bright blades flashed in the murky light.

The horses reared and plunged.

The officers had much ado to defend themselves from the furious onslaught thus made upon them, and they were effectually prevented from taking any undue advantage by firing a pistol or otherwise, because the left hand was continually employed in holding the reins and manœuvring the horse, while with their right they had to ward off as best they could the furious attack which the highwaymen commenced.

It was no longer child's play.

It was not long before the two police-officers became aware that, skilful as they were in the use of the sword, their opponents were far superior to them.

Anxiously, then, they strained their sense of hearing to the utmost, in order to catch some sound which would indicate the coming of assistance.

Whenever they could, too, they cast uneasy glances up the road, but they could see nothing.

Suddenly, however, there came upon the ears of all four of the combatants the trampling of horses' hoofs upon the road.

The sound was faint.

But distinct.

Our friends had everything to dread from that sound.

Their foes everything to hope.

The consequence was that both redoubled their endeavours.

The highwaymen were quite certain that unless they disposed of their adversaries, and that at once, they should be surrounded and opposed by such a force as would make resistance futile.

Still, let it be said, that they did not take or attempt to take any unfair advantage of their foes.

They merely fought with greater desperation.

And now Claude, by putting into execution a skilful feint, threw his enemy off his guard.

It was only for a moment.

But that moment was enough.

Changing the position of his sword with the rapidity of lightning, he made a thrust at the officer's breast, and before he could recover his guard, the sharp steel entered his breast with so much violence, that the point protruded from his back.

Claude withdrew his sword instantly, and held it in an attitude of defence, for he did not know how much his foe might have been injured from this thrust.

And well for him was it that he did so.

The officer, who seemed maddened with rage and pain, attacked Claude in such a frantic manner that he had the greatest difficulty in defending himself.

Soon, however, the vigour with which the wounded officer dealt his blows, abated, and one more slashing cut in the shoulder from Claude's sword sent him headlong to the ground.

Sixteen-String Jack had found himself opposed to a man much his superior in those physical qualities necessary to a swordsman.

He was a taller and a stronger man than Jack, and had besides a very great advantage which a long arm bestows.

Notwithstanding these disadvantages, however, Sixteen-String Jack did not shrink from the encounter, but put forth all the cunning tricks in fencing of which he was the master.

It was only by this that a balance of any kind was preserved between them.

Jack, however, had been wounded twice, and rather severely too, but still he did not show the slightest symptoms of giving way.

He was still engaged with his foe when Claude freed himself from his antagonist.

Of course the first thing to which Claude Duval directed his attention was the condition of his friend.

He saw him much the worst off in the affray, and he hurried to his assistance, for the trampling of the horses' hoofs sounded with a distinctness that was really alarming.

It was evident that in less than another minute they would reach the spot upon which he now stood.

The police-officer who had so nearly obtained a victory over Sixteen-String Jack, finding that his comrade had fallen and that he was opposed to both, flung down his weapon and sued for quarter—although assistance was to all appearance so close at hand.

Quarter was granted to him on condition that he dismounted, which he immediately did.

Claude then caught hold of his steed by the bridle, and compelled him to gallop along by the side of his own, into whose flanks he struck the spurs rather deeply.

Sixteen-String Jack did the same.

With a rush, then, the defeated police-officer was left in the roadway, for the horses had all grown excited while the battle was in progress, and, consequently, feeling the spur, they darted off at a very rapid rate indeed.

But though our friends had come off victorious in this encounter, yet they were far from being secure.

On the contrary, they were placed in a position of the greatest danger.

Sixteen-String Jack had received two severe wounds from the sword of his opponent, from both of which the blood flowed in great quantities.

Then the horsemen they had heard approaching from the direction of London were, by the time they started, fully in sight.

A cry which they uttered had the effect of making the highwaymen aware they were seen, and they turned round quickly to see who their pursuers were.

One glance was sufficient.

Coming along at a tremendous gallop was a large body of police-officers.

They saw the highwaymen turn round, for they set up a shout the moment they did so, which sounded in their ears like a demand to surrender.

This our friends were not likely to pay any attention to, without their position was very much worse than it was.

All they did was to strike their spurs once more into their horses' sides, which caused them to tear along the road at full speed.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SEEK SHELTER IN AN INN, AND HAVE A TERRIBLE ADVENTURE.

CLAUDE DUVAL quickly found the horse he held by the bridle was a very great incumbrance.

He would not have burdened himself with it at all if he had not thought by so doing he should be depriving the defeated officer of the means of following them.

And this he quite succeeded in doing, for the other horse, when his rider fell headlong to the ground, was naturally much terrified, and he galloped off over the fields at a great rate, and was out of sight almost immediately.

Having effected his object, Claude thought he could not do better than release his hold upon the bridle, which he accordingly did.

The horse, however, seemed by no means disposed to part company, but galloped by the side of them just as before.

There was no objection to his doing this. On the contrary, it might, for all they knew, turn out to be a great advantage to have a spare horse in case either of their own should fail.

The officers in pursuit, who had reached the stage-coach soon after the highwaymen had stopped and plundered it in the manner we have related, there learned all the particulars of the outrage.

A description of the two highwaymen was furnished them, and they were also told in which direction they had gone.

They set off in pursuit at once, leaving the coachman and passengers to do the best they could.

The horses, who had grown very restive after the rope threw them down, had broken the harness and done other mischief, so, in all probability, some little time would elapse before they would be able to resume their journey.

The police-officers, however, cared nothing at all about the passengers, nor about the inconvenience they suffered.

They were intent upon capturing the highwaymen.

After a short gallop they were so fortunate as to get in sight of them, and this acted as a considerable stimulus to their exertions.

Going at such a rapid rate as they were—and their horses' hoofs making such a din upon the ground as they did—the two highwaymen found conversation a very difficult thing indeed.

But it was necessary they should speak to each other, so, raising his voice to its utmost pitch, Claude asked—

"Are you hurt much, Jack?"

"Yes," replied his companion, but although he strove his utmost, his voice was so faint that Claude could scarcely tell what he said.

"You alarm me, Jack."

"No—no."

"You do."

"The wounds are merely flesh wounds."

"Oh!"

"But they bleed profusely, and it is from loss of blood I am suffering as much as possible."

"Cannot you do anything to staunch it?"

"Not while we are going at this rate; and to stop would be madness. No, no, my friend; we must push forward at our utmost speed, and distance our pursuers."

"I think we are doing that now. At any rate, I am sure they are not gaining upon us."

Sixteen-String Jack listened as well as he could to the sounds which came from his pursuers in the rear, and he was certain they were much fainter than they had been.

But this, so far from making them feel satisfied with the exertion and the progress they had already made, induced them to urge their horses to still greater efforts.

The gallant creatures obeyed them well.

Doubtless old Matthew had chosen the horses himself, and was aware of the excellence of their quality—a thing so necessary to our friends.

Away they went, then, at a tearing gallop.

Sixteen-String Jack felt very faint and giddy.

With difficulty he retained his seat in the saddle.

Every now and then he would sway from side to side, and be in imminent danger of falling off.

But each time he recovered himself. A thing more attributable to his skill in horsemanship than anything else.

He had received two wounds, and both almost in the same place—that is to say, in the fleshy part of his right shoulder.

They were deep, and the blood flowed from them in surprising quantities.

The rapid action, too, increased the hemorrhage.

Presently, upon Claude calling out for him to do so, he pulled up.

Both listened.

It was only in a very faint manner that the hoof-beats of their pursuers came to their ears, but the ever-increasing loudness of it told them they were pushing forward with all possible speed.

"Now, Jack," said Claude, "let me bind up your wound."

"No—no. Never mind. Push on a little further, until we are quite out of the hearing of our foes, and then we will take to the fields."

"If you can wait, Jack, until then, it would be much better for us, as some time must be lost in the operation, and we might have a great deal of difficulty in regaining the advantage we now have."

"To be sure we shall. Forward—forward!"

Sixteen-String Jack struck his spurs into his horse's sides as he spoke, and set the example of galloping forward.

Claude Duval could not help admiring the pluck which he displayed.

It was some time before they came to a halt again, and when they did a large piece of ground had been passed over.

The most attentive listening could not, on this occasion, bring to their ears the least sound of the officers in pursuit.

"Now, Jack," cried Claude, "all is well. We have distanced them at last. A few minutes more and we shall quite elude them."

"Thank heaven for that," said Sixteen-String Jack, faintly.

"Cheer up, my friend. Your voice is low."

"I have lost much blood."

"I am afraid so. But, look! here is a white gate which leads apparently into some meadows. I will dismount and open it. When we have passed through I will close it again, so as to cause no suspicion."

As he spoke, Claude slipped off his horse and opened the gate, which was merely fastened with a piece of chain, but in such a manner that any one not let into the secret of it would not undo it without a great deal of trouble.

But it was the business of the highwaymen to make themselves acquainted with fastenings of every description, so the probability is, that Claude opened the gate with as much ease and quickness as the farmer himself could have done to whom the field belonged.

He fastened it again, and then remounted.

"This is a ploughed field," he said. "We shall have to cross it slowly or we shall knock our horses up completely. Still as I cannot hear anything of our foes, it will not matter, and you will besides have an opportunity of putting a rude bandage of some kind round your shoulder. Here, you had better take my neckcloth; you will find that answer the purpose admirably."

Claude Duval pulled off his neck the obsolete piece of attire he had mentioned, and handed it to Jack.

It was already in the form of a bandage, and he slipped it over his shoulder without much difficulty.

They went at a walking pace across the ploughed field, so that he was enabled to drop his reins upon his horse's neck, and proceed in perfect safety.

By this means he had both his hands at liberty.

The flow of blood was checked in a very great degree, but the wound was not properly bound up.

By the time he had done this the opposite side of the field was reached.

There was a gap in the hedge through which they led their horses.

They then found themselves in a spacious meadow.

This they crossed, and proceeded in a straight line for a considerable distance across the country.

They had now every reason to believe that they had completely baffled their pursuers and thrown them off the scent.

Believing this, they came to a halt; and then the first thing Claude did was to bind up his companion's wound afresh, and in as skilful a manner as he was able.

The bandage was already saturated with blood.

Jack was very faint and sick.

The quantity of blood he had lost was incredible, and the wonder is that he could have borne up against its loss with so much impunity as he did.

He was, however, in reality in a fearful state of weakness and the feeling increased in intensity every moment.

Jack did not complain, but Claude could tell his condition, and the necessity for his seeking shelter and rest somewhere was imperative.

But they seemed to be in one of those sparsely populated agricultural districts, at that time by far more common than they are now.

Nowhere could the least signs of a habitation of any kind be seen.

But they determined to push on in the hope of meeting with one ere long.

After the elapsion of about half-an-hour, they came to what they had all along expected to find by proceeding in one direction, and that was a lane.

It was a broad one, and extended right and left as far as they could see.

But to what place it led they had no idea.

They could see the lane through the interstices of the hedge, but none of these were large enough to admit of a passage.

But our friends felt convinced that they had only to go a certain distance to find a gate through which they could pass without any trouble.

Indeed, there was one in sight just at their left hand.

Upon reaching it they found it was secured by a padlock, but a large stone happening to be close by, Claude picked it up, and dashed it with full force upon it, smashing the whole affair at once.

This done he pulled the gate open upon its hinges, and his friend passed through.

Claude Duval had not grown so far confused in his geography as not to know in which direction to go along this lane in order to get nearer London.

He had to turn to the left.

This was the way, then, he went at an easy pace for the comfort and convenience of his wounded companion, all the time keeping a sharp look-out for a dwelling of some kind.

But they went three miles at least, without meeting with a shed even.

Suddenly, however, Claude's quick eye detected a bundle of straw hanging by a rope to a post.

In the olden time the proximity of an inn was often denoted by this means.

Riding up to this post, Claude saw a board projecting from it, upon which in the faint night light he could see some letters were painted, but he could not make them out.

But when he lighted a small lantern which he carried in his pocket, he was easily able to do so.

The words were these—

"The 'Spotted Dog.' First turning on the right. Good accommodation for man and beast."

Claude read these words aloud to Jack, who said—

"Do you know this inn, Claude?"

"No."

"Will it be safe to stop there, think you?"

"We will risk it, my friend. In the state you are in a little rest and proper attention to your wounds are imperative, or you will eventually suffer severely."

"I do want rest, Claude."

"I know you do."

"Shall we be safe?"

"We will run the risk. If danger comes we must be prepared to resist it, and defend ourselves."

At this moment a narrow turning was reached, and Claude added—

"Here we are."

"It looks a dismal-looking entrance.

"It does. If I had been travelling along this road, I should never have thought of turning up there to find an inn, if the inscription on the board had not warned me to do so."

"Nor I."

A shudder crept over Jack's frame as they turned down this narrow lane.

Why he could scarcely say.

He attributed it to the blood he had lost.

But certainly the aspect of the place was rather forbidding.

The lane which apparently led to the "Spotted Dog" was a very narrow one, being barely wide enough to allow the passage of one vehicle.

On one side of this lane was an unusually high hedgerow, with tall trees at frequent intervals.

The other side appeared to be bordered by a plantation of considerable extent.

Being so narrow, these trees cast a very deep and black shadow over the lane, so that it was more like entering a cavern or a tunnel than aught else, except that the blue sky and stars could be discerned overhead.

It was certainly a very extraordinary locality to choose for an inn, and with so forbidding an entrance, Claude thought that it must have been seldom they had any customers.

After proceeding some twenty yards, however, the lane widened somewhat, and then on the left-hand side of the lane Claude saw a faint light.

It looked as though it came from a candle placed close to a window-pane, and this was really the case.

The sound of their horse's hoofs must have been heard, for a man emerged from the inn, carrying a stable-lantern in his hand.

The inn was built upon that side of the lane which was bordered by the plantation already spoken of.

The trees which grew in it consisted chiefly of dark firs and horse-chestnuts, which gave it a gloomy and sombre appearance.

Our friends could not see what kind of a man it was who approached, for he held the lantern before him in such a manner that none of the beams fell upon his own person.

"Hullo!" he said, in a gruff voice, "Hullo! there. Who are you?"

"Travellers. We saw your board up, and the truss of straw a little way down the road, and we want to rest ourselves and our horses for a little while."

"All right, gentlemen," said the man with the lantern. "You will find the best of accommodation at the 'Spotted Dog.'"

CHAPTER CCCXXXVII.

SOME VERY STRANGE ADVENTURES BEFALL CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK DURING THEIR STAY AT THE "SPOTTED DOG" INN.

"LEAD the way, then," cried Claude Duval, "and we will follow you."

"All right, gentlemen. This way, if you please. This way. John—John!"

"Yes," said a sleepy, surly voice, and then Claude and Jack heard a heavy footstep.

The next moment he came within the light of the lantern, and it could be perceived that he was attired like an ostler.

But the expression of his countenance was forbidding in the extreme.

He came towards the horses, and held the stirrups for our friends to dismount.

As soon as his feet reached the ground, such an accession of weakness came over Sixteen-String Jack that he almost fell to the ground.

Claude ran to his assistance, and was just in time to save him.

"My friend has been wounded," he said, addressing the ostler and the man who held the light. "I am afraid he is in a state of extreme weakness, but I don't think he is seriously injured."

"I will help you to take him indoors," said the man, putting down his lantern. "We have only a step or two to go."

Of course Claude Duval did not reject the aid thus proffered, and between them Sixteen-String Jack was led to the door of the inn.

This was closed, but it opened to a touch.

They entered a room on the ground floor, where there was a light and a fire burning in the grate.

As soon as he was placed upon a seat, Jack fainted.

Claude called for water and a sponge.

They were quickly brought, and with the aid of these the coagulated blood was washed away, and then two very ugly-looking, gaping wounds were disclosed.

But Claude Duval's surgical knowledge assured him that those wounds looked to be by far more dangerous than they actually were.

He applied cold water plentifully, and then skilfully bandaged his shoulder.

Still Sixteen-String Jack continued insensible, and in this condition he was, by his comrade's directions, carried upstairs and placed upon the outside of a bed.

Left to himself, Claude proceeded to recover him from his swoon, and after some time succeeded.

Almost immediately afterwards, however, Jack fell off into a deep sleep, which Claude did not attempt to interrupt, for he knew that would more than anything tend to recuperate his strength.

He sat beside him and watched.

From his pocket he produced one of the numerous watches he carried about him, and looked at the time.

It was half-past eleven.

"The night is young yet," he muttered. "We can stop here some hours, and then manage to return to London before daybreak, which will suit very well."

Having come to this conclusion, Claude, who felt not in the least sleepy or fatigued, proceeded to count up the booty they had taken from the passengers in the Oxford mail.

He found it represented a very large sum, being, in fact, about three times as much as he required for his immediate purpose.

Having done this, Claude looked round him at the nature of the place he was in.

It was an ordinary looking apartment, with one plain bed, without hangings, in one corner of the room.

The floor was uncarpeted.

Claude could not but think the behaviour of the inmates of the inn rather extraordinary.

He had seen no one but the two rough-looking men we have described, and these had willingly enough left him and his wounded companion to shift for themselves.

No questions had been asked about him or the condition in which he was.

All that they seemed to care about was to get them into the inn.

Not the least sound from below reached his ears. It might as well have been in an uninhabited house.

After listening for a moment, he went to the window.

It was one which opened like a door, and, undoing the catch, he pushed it back upon its hinges.

Then looked out.

He found the view exceedingly circumscribed.

He could see nothing but the black-looking trees in the plantation, the branches of some of which were almost long enough to touch the window-panes.

There was nothing to be seen there, so he closed the window again.

The intense stillness of the place made Claude feel uneasy, and a thousand vague apprehensions entered his mind.

The strange position of the inn—so retired—so out of the way as it was—struck him as being very strange and unusual.

Then there was the forbidding countenances of the two men.

The more he thought, the more did gloomy feelings creep over his mind, so at last he was fain to rise to his feet and endeavour to chase them away by walking up and down the room.

But in this he failed entirely.

They increased.

The chamber was but dimly lighted by a solitary candle which he had placed upon the mantel-piece, because he thought there its light would be most diffused.

Sixteen-String Jack was breathing laboriously.

Claude was anxious about the condition of his comrade, because he knew so much was dependent upon his exertions on the morrow.

He took the candle in his hand and walked towards the bed, in order to judge, if possible, by his looks what kind of condition he was in.

The heavy slumber entirely produced by the exhaustion of his system, still continued, and there was upon the face of the sleeper an expression of great agony.

Doubtless the pain of the wound was great, though Jack was unconscious of it.

The bleeding had, however, entirely ceased, or at any rate, it had not penetrated through the wet bandages which Claude had tied over it.

We have said that he had caused Jack to be laid on the outside of the bed.

But now, perceiving that he shivered at short intervals, he considered it must proceed from the cold, and that it would be best to cover him over in some way and keep him warm.

He would feel the cold, he thought, in consequence of the blood which had been drained out of his body.

It was easy to cover him, Claude thought, without disturbing his position in the least, by simply going to one side of the bed, and turning the clothes over him.

This he resolved to do, so he deposited the candle on a chair by the bedside, and, taking hold of the clothes, he folded them half over, by this means of course, covering his companion completely, for the bed was wide and of an old-fashioned make.

In turning the clothes over, although he was not aware of it at the time, Claude had taken hold of them all, the bottom sheet included, so that when they were in the position we have indicated, the bed was exposed to view.

Claude did not notice this until he took the candle up in his hands again, and held it down to look at his friend once more.

The light of the candle then fell with full force upon the striped fabic which contained the bed.

Mechanically Claude's eyes rested upon it, but his attention was attracted by a large dark stain, only one half of which apparently was disclosed to view, the other half being under the folded clothes.

There was something peculiar about this stain, and Claude held the candle so as to look more closely at it.

As he did so, he felt a cold, clammy feeling about his heart, and all those vague suspicions and sensations of alarm which he had previously experienced swept over him again with redoubled intensity.

There was something very strange about this large dark stain in so strange a place.

Claude bent closer over it.

A glance almost showed him what the dark stain was, and he turned away with a shudder of horror.

That dark stain was blood.

Not blood which had been recently spilt, or which could have flowed from his comrade's wounds.

There were no traces of it upon the sheets, but upon the ticking of the bed only.

Moreover, by the yellowish tint it had in places assumed, Claude could tell that it had been there some time.

To satisfy himself, he touched it with his finger, and found just where the stain was the bed was hard and stiffened with the serum of the blood.

What tale did this stain tell?

What deed of horror was it the sole trace and witness of?

Claude could not tell, but the suspicions he had previously and vaguely entertained took consistency and shape.

A murder had been committed in that very room.

Into what kind of place had they got?

Claude was no stranger to the tales which were afloat respecting inns where travellers stayed, and were never seen again.

Such dens of murder were unfortunately too common.

Was there not every probability that he had fallen into one?

Surely, yes.

The strange position of the inn itself.

The forbidding countenances of the two men.

Their strange behaviour.

The plantation at the back, so well adapted for the concealment of any crime.

And lastly, the crimson stain upon the bed.

All these things were confirmatory of such a suspicion.

Claude had a horror of assassination.

For a fair fight he would care little, but he knew very well that such a proceeding as that would be altogether in opposition to the conduct of murderers.

He drew his sword from its sheath and laid it across the bed.

He also examined his pistols, and placed them so that he could take hold of them in a second should any emergency occur.

Then he paused a moment to reflect.

What should he do?

He looked at his watch.

It now wanted about ten minutes to twelve.

Would it be best for him to awake his companion and communicate his suspicions to him?

Sleep and rest for a little while were, he knew, very essential to Jack, so he muttered—

"No, I will not wake him. I will sit here and keep watch, and woe to those who attempt anything against him or me. I am more than a match for a couple of such wretches as those, and, perhaps, after all, there is no occasion for me to be alarmed."

While he spoke these words, Claude Duval seated himself on the bed beside his wounded and slumbering companion.

From this position he commanded a full view of the door.

And now he saw something in connexion with the door which he had not previously noticed.

There were no fastenings upon it, with the exception of a drop-latch, which could be raised with as much facility from without as within.

This, then, could scarcely be called a fastening.

Anxiously, then, and with his heart pulsating rapidly, Claude fixed his eyes upon the door, and stretched his sense of hearing to the utmost.

But the same remarkable stillness of which we have spoken continued.

Nothing would have pleased Claude better than to have taken the candle and gone downstairs, in the endeavour to solve the mystery, but if he did this, he should be compelled to leave his comrade, and during his absence the worst might happen.

So he was forced to content himself with keeping watch where he was.

Slowly and wearily the minutes passed by.

It is always so when one is watching.

At every few moments Claude would take a watch from his pocket and look at the time, but growing tired of that he put the watch upon the bed, so that he could look at it any moment he wished.

Half an hour elapsed.

During that time nothing occurred to recompense Claude for his trouble.

Sixteen-String Jack still slept, but he breathed much easier than before, and a faint tinge of colour was beginning to come back to his cheeks.

Claude looked upon these symptoms with favourable eyes.

"Jack will be all right soon," he said. "Perhaps after all I have been frightening myself with a shadow, or perhaps if they had any evil intentions they would be afraid to engage themselves with us."

It was just as he was making these reflections that Claude heard a faint creaking sound.

He was on the alert instantly, and listened with great intentness for a repetition of it.

He had not long to wait.

It came again, and this time with much greater plainness than before.

Someone was ascending the flight of rickety stairs leading to the room in which he sat.

Presently the sounds ceased, and then Claude heard some one whispering.

There could be no doubt about what it was.

He did not move from the bed, however, but fixed his eyes still upon the door.

The candle now required attention, but he could not give it. The wick had grown a preternatural length, and the illumination was consequently much enfeebled.

It cast a dim, shadowy light over the chamber.

Suddenly the whispering ceased, and then Claude heard the creaking of footsteps on the staircase again.

On—on they came, until they paused just outside the door.

Here some more whispering took place.

Claude had not the least doubt that there were two persons without, and that those two persons were the men he had seen, and who possessed such forbidding physiognomies.

His mind's eye enabled him to see through the door, and he pictured the two just as they were standing whispering to each other.

What they said, however, was more than he could make out, although he stretched his sense of hearing to the utmost in endeavouring to do so.

The whispering ceased.

A brief interval of silence followed.

Then Claude heard some one tap very gently on the door with his knuckles.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVIII.

THE LANDLORD AND THE OSTLER AT THE "SPOTTED DOG" VERY DESERVEDLY COME TO A BAD END.

AFFAIRS in the bed-chamber of the "Spotted Dog" are now beginning to assume a critical and interesting aspect, and it is, we confess, with considerable anxiety and interest that we look for the termination of this adventure.

What could be the meaning of this tap on the door, Claude could not precisely say, but the hypothesis which he adopted was doubtless the correct one.

And that was, that the tapping was meant to ascertain whether he was asleep or awake.

Suppose he feigned the former.

His doubts and suspicions would surely then be confirmed or dispersed.

He resolved upon this course.

As silently as possible, then, he slipped off the side of the bed, taking his weapons with him, and crouched down close to the floor.

The bedstead was now between him and the door, so he was tolerably well hidden from the view of anyone coming in.

The tapping came again, and this time it was a little louder.

Still Claude took no notice.

Then the whispering outside recommenced, after which the latch was slowly and silently raised.

Then the door was pushed open to the extent of a few inches.

Claude raised his head so that he could just see over the bed-clothes.

When the door was open far enough a rough-looking head was projected into the room.

One glance at the features was sufficient to show Claude that it belonged to no other than the man who he took to be the landlord of the "Spotted Dog" Inn.

It is probable the dim light of the candle rather baffled and confused the intruder's vision, for he put his hand up to his eyes as though to assist his sight.

But he was apparently satisfied with what he saw, for he ventured to step stealthily into the room, and then turned and beckoned to some one without.

Another head then appeared in the doorway.

This Claude also recognized without difficulty.

It belonged to the man who had played the part of ostler.

It was impossible, having once seen those faces, to mistake them.

"Hush," said the first comer. "Be quiet. I told you they were both asleep by this time. If one was awake do you think he would let the candle burn like that?"

"It has got a thundering long wick, Joe, that's certain."

"Hush, I say."

"I'm whispering."

"I know. But let us get this business settled. We shall be well paid for our work this time. Come on. Never mind about there being two. If they are asleep we can manage them easily enough, and, besides, isn't one almost dead already. Why, it would be doing a good action to put him out of his misery."

"Ah! ah! Joe! you is a rummy one, you is! the idea of that, now."

"We have got the truss of straw and the direction-board to thank for this slice of luck. They little thought we carry it out there every night to get the people here, and bring it away every morning."

"Come on, Joe! Business—business! I know you are always fond of talking about that finger-post affair, because that was your own invention."

"And a good one, too! Ah! ah!"

"Hush, Joe! Let's settle them, and then we can talk afterwards."

"All right, mate."

The two villains, about whose murderous intentions towards their guests there could be no sort of doubt, now produced from their breasts, where they had concealed them, two long bright, glittering knives.

Then, with the stealthy tread of trained assassins, they crossed the room on tiptoe.

They reached the side of the bed.

"Here's one," said the man who had been addressed by his companion as Joe; "but where's the other?"

"All right, I'll be bound! But let us make sure of this one first. We shall then be able to attend to the other."

"Of course we shall!"

The ruffianly ostler raised the hand in which he held the long bladed knife high in the air above the breast of Sixteen-String Jack.

Another moment and it would have descended, and the gallant heart would have ceased to beat for ever.

But that moment was not destined to arrive.

He had not yet reached the end of his career.

Like an armed apparition, Claude rose up from his crouching position to his full height, and no sooner had he done so than, having taken a careful aim, he pulled the trigger of the pistol and fired.

The report of the pistol was something tremendous.

The ostler uttered a yell of fear and agony, and fell in a huddled-up mass upon the floor.

The bullet from Claude's pistol had entered his brain, and killed him instantly.

The arm which had held the knife was now powerless.

Sound as Jack's slumber unquestionably was, the discharge of a pistol within a few inches of his ear was sufficient to break it, and he started up to a sitting posture on the bed as though galvanized.

The landlord of the inn, seeing the fate which had befallen his comrade, and that he was one man opposed to two, turned to flee.

Claude sprang over the bed after him.

In his right hand he held his sword, and in his left the other pistol.

The landlord darted to the door and pulled it open.

He then stood at the top of the flight of stairs.

Claude saw that if he was not speedy in his movements the man would be off, and being acquainted with all the intricacies of the place would probably escape, or perhaps summon some associate to his assistance.

These were both two very undesirable things indeed, and Claude felt that he must adopt summary means to provide against them.

Accordingly he raised his second pistol and fired.

The bullet struck the landlord in the back, and came out at his breast.

He uttered a dismal yell, and throwing up his arms, fell headlong down the staircase.

So suddenly did all this take place, that Sixteen-String Jack had only just time to get off the bed and come to Claude's side.

What he saw puzzled and bewildered him.

"Claude," he cried, "what in the world has happened? Where am I? Am I mad or dreaming?"

"Calm yourself, Jack—calm yourself. You must not get excited. I will tell you all presently."

Sixteen-String Jack rubbed his head in a very confused manner. He could not make it out at all. He had not the slightest recollection of his arrival at the "Spotted Dog."

Therefore he looked at the dimly-lighted chamber with very peculiar feelings.

Claude was not sure the ostler was dead, so he approached him with the candle to look.

One glance was enough.

The man was quite dead.

He had now to ascertain the condition of the landlord, who he had not heard move after reaching the bottom of the staircase.

The fearful fall he had had without the wound was quite enough to kill any ordinary man, but then Claude knew very well that gentry of his class took, in a general way, a great deal of killing.

So, with the candle in his grasp, he descended the little flight of stairs.

The body of the landlord lay in a huddled-up mass at the bottom.

"Hold the light, Jack," said Claude to his comrade, who had followed him downstairs. "Hold the light, and let us see whether the wretch is really alive or not."

A groan followed these words.

It came from the object at their feet, and at once let Claude know the rascally landlord was not dead.

Sixteen-String Jack, however, took the light, and Claude stooped down over the prostate form.

It was rather repugnant to his feelings to touch the wounded wretch, but he noticed he was lying in a very peculiar manner, so he mastered his feelings and turned him over with his foot.

The moment this was done, a yell, apparently of dreadful agony, came from the landlord's lips.

It was followed by a gush of blood from the mouth.

Then a spasm of shudder seemed to convulse the whole body.

That was death.

Sixteen-String Jack was so bewildered at what he saw, and so utterly incapable of comprehending it, that he gazed at Claude like a man in a dream.

But Duval, being assured that the two assassins were quite dead, resolved to give him some explanation, which would clear his mind from the mists of doubt which hung over it.

"Come," he said, addressing Jack, and stepping over the dead body of the landlord as he spoke. "Follow me, and I will relieve you of your astonishment and bewilderment. But first tell me how do you feel—are you better?"

Sixteen-String Jack passed his hand over his eyes in a bewildered sort of way, as he replied—

"Oh! yes. I recollect now. I was wounded."

"Yes, by the patrol."

"And we escaped."

"Yes, but that is not an answer to my question. Do you feel better?"

"I am very weak and faint."

"I was afraid so."

"But I find myself better each moment."

"Come on, then. A little drop of wine will put you right beyond a doubt."

"But, where are we to get it?"

"I will try to find some."

"I can tell you this, Claude. If I quite understood that has just taken place, I should feel very much better."

"Say you so; then I will tell you in a half-a-dozen words."

Claude then rapidly made his companion acquainted with those circumstances which are already well known to the reader, and which consequently do not require recapitulation.

Jack's astonishment was very great.

"I had no idea, Claude," he said, "that such atrocities could possibly be perpetrated."

"Nor I. But from the few words uttered by the two villains, and the stain upon the bed, it is pretty clear they make a regular system of decoying people here during the night, and then murdering them."

"We have had a narrow escape, my friend, and the sooner we get away from this place, I think, the better."

"And so do I; but do you think you are strong enough?"

"I fancy so."

"I am glad to hear that; but still I should recommend you to adhere to my advice, and have a drop of wine—that will give your blood new vigour."

"But where are we to find any?"

"Why, without doubt, there is some in the house, so we have nothing else to do but look."

"Then here goes for an exploring expedition."

"Just so."

"And who knows what else we may find!"

These words were uttered in a tone of deep significance, and as though the speaker quite expected to make some discovery.

"I will carry the candle, Claude," said Jack, "and then I shall at least be making myself useful, if no more."

"Agreed."

In this way the two friends made their way through several rooms on the ground floor, but without seeing anything unusual, and without finding what they sought.

At length, opening a door, they felt a gush of cool air upon their faces, and upon closer examination they found that before them was a flight of brick steps, leading apparently to the cellars.

They hesitated a moment, in doubt whether they should or should not descend and prosecute their as yet unresultful search any farther.

Claude made up his mind that the cellar should at least be searched. He was very anxious that Jack should not set out on his return journey to London without a stimulant of some kind.

Accordingly, he called to his companion to follow, and commenced the descent of the steps.

But not until he had his sword handy in his grasp, so as to be prepared to meet any attack that might be made upon him.

The steps were slippery and steep, and, in order to feel sure of his footing, he soon discovered the necessity of holding the wall with his left hand.

The steps were about twelve in number.

The bottom was reached without the occurrence of any accident, and then they found they were standing upon sawdust, with which the floor of the cellar was literally covered.

A number of barrels were now disclosed to view.

It was some time, however, before they found, stocked in a corner, a number of bottles.

Claude took one from the top of the heap; and, as he held it in his hand, a fresh thought struck him—namely, that it would be dangerous to a degree to drink anything they found in that murder den, for fear it should either be drugged or poisoned.

The same thought struck Sixteen-String Jack at the very same moment, for he said—

"Claude, we have had our trouble for nothing; I should feel afraid of drinking anything we found here."

"And so should I, though the thought did not occur to me until just this moment."

"Nor to me."

"Depend upon it, the best thing we can do is to make the best of our way back to London, and the sooner we reach old Matthew's, the better.

"So say I, but do you think you are equal to the journey?"

"Oh! yes."

"Come on, then."

"Where are the horses?"

"I'll be hanged if I know."

"Did you not see them stabled?"

"No; the fact was, I was so engaged with you—for you swooned as soon as you got off your steed—that I never troubled about the horses, but left them to the ostler."

"The chap you shot upstairs?"

"Yes."

"Then I think the best thing we can do is to set about finding them at once, and——But hark, what is that?"

"What—what?"

"Hark!"

CHAPTER CCCXXXIX.

THE POLICE-OFFICERS MAKE A DESPERATE ATTACK UPON THE "SPOTTED DOG."

BOTH the highwaymen assumed listening attitudes, and then there came to their ears with undesirable distinctness a loud knocking, as though some one was hammering at a door demanding admittance.

There could be no sort of mistake about the character of the sound, and our friends looked rather inquiringly in each other's faces as they wondered who in the world it could be.

Bang—bang—bang!

The knocks succeeded each other with a rapidity which spoke well of the flexibility of the muscles of the person who struck them.

It was a simultaneous impulse which made Claude and Jack, without saying a word to each other, rush in the direction of the steps leading out of the cellar.

They ascended them at full speed, the din of the knocking all the while sounding in their ears.

On reaching the bar they hurriedly opened the door leading into the passage which led from the front to the back of the inn.

They were then certain upon a point of which they had had some doubts before, and that was, that the knocking was at the front, or principal door of the inn.

A very interesting question was now suggested to them, and that was, who could those persons be who were outside?

Were they friends or enemies?

They scarcely thought it possible that those officers from whom they had had such a narrow escape, could have tracked them to their present destination.

But, if not, who could those be who demanded admission in so clamorous a manner?

They did not knock like guests.

Very soon, however, all doubts were set at rest as to who the parties were, for the hammering ceased a moment, and then some one said, in a loud and commanding tone of voice—

"Open—open! Open in the king's name. We call upon you in the name of the king, to open this door, and we give you notice that, if you do not obey us at once, we will break in! Open, in the name of the king! We are his officers of police!"

After these words, it was quite a matter of impossibility for Claude and Jack to have any sort of doubt respecting those who were at the front door.

They were police-officers, unquestionably.

They might not be those they had encountered—their errand to the "Spotted Dog" Inn might be wholly unconnected with them, but whether this was so or not, it was quite clear that the best thing our friends could do would be to get away from the ill-omened spot with all possible speed.

This, however would be attended with a good deal of difficulty, for when the police attacked a house like they did this inn, they generally took pretty effective measures to prevent anyone leaving surreptitiously.

And, unfortunately, as we have already described, Claude, upon his arrival, had felt his attention so wholly attracted to his wounded comrade that he forgot the horses, and neglected to perform the necessary duty of seeing where they were housed, and making himself sufficiently familiar with the place to be able to find his way there alone without hesitation or delay.

Now that he had, probably for the first time in his life, omitted this, he realized its full importance.

Could he have only known where the stable was, he felt the rest he would have to do in making his escape would be comparatively easy, though in reality such would not be the case.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE VISITS TOM KING IN THE CONDEMNED CELL.

His ignorance upon this point was, however, as all our readers can see, a very serious matter indeed.

There was not, either, any time for deliberation, for the officers, having repeated their formula and found that no more notice was taken than on the preceding occasions, had set about demolishing the door in good earnest.

It was a strong door, being wholly made of oak, and defended with oaken beams placed horizontally across it, but it was not strong enough to withstand such heavy blows as the police-officers now rained upon it.

At first the blows only sounded like hard knocks, being clear, sharp, and distinct, but they very quickly changed their character, and a crashing noise succeeded.

It was the stout oak door splitting and giving way in all directions.

This was quite enough to unnerve any one, but it was particularly calculated to produce that effect upon our friends.

It was very important that they should not be captured and kept prisoners for a short time even, for if so, then Dick Turpin and Tom King would assuredly perish at Tyburn, for who was there to render them assistance if they were prevented?

And it was having this responsibility upon their minds which made Claude and Jack lose a great deal of that self-possession upon which they so prided themselves, and which was so very necessary to them.

What was to be done?

The door was clearly giving way, and ere many more minutes passed away, the officers would certainly have it down.

Opposite to this front door was another much smaller, one which, from its position, the highwaymen fancied must lead somewhere at the back of the inn.

But, if they opened it, they would probably expose themselves to much danger.

There was a strong probability that a portion of the officers had taken up their positions there.

And yet, on the other hand, they might not have done so.

But what a fearful risk it was to run to ascertain whether they were or not!

Better that, however, than remain where they were with the certain knowledge that the police would be face to face with them in a moment or two.

If any were at the back door, they thought surely they would ere this have demonstrated their presence by making an attack upon it.

They must run the risk.

Having their weapons ready in their grasp, so that, if occasion required, they should be able to make immediate use of them, they quietly drew aside the fastenings which secured the back door.

Then they opened it gently a little way.

There was nothing to cause alarm as yet.

Emboldened by this, they hastily pulled the door wide open upon its hinges, passed out as swiftly as they could, closed it after them, and stood with their backs placed against it in attitudes of defence.

At this moment there was a tremendous crash, which announced the fact that the officers had at last succeeded in breaking down the front door.

Claude and Jack peered eagerly around them, but they could see nothing of the police-officers.

This was a great load off their minds, so, sheathing their swords, they proceeded to make a search among the out-buildings.

The back of the inn, they found, was built close against the large plantation of which we have made mention, and what yard there was had been formed by clearing away a few of the trees.

There were several sheds, apparently of wood, contiguous to the main building, and these the highwaymen very naturally imagined would form the stabling.

Accordingly they directed their steps towards them.

Before, however, they had gone half-a-dozen paces in that direction, a loud voice cried—

"Who goes there? Stand, or I fire!"

Our friends stopped instantly, for the threat just uttered might be the opposite of an unmeaning one.

Looking in the direction from which the voice proceeded, the two highwaymen perceived a dusky figure hastening towards them.

Another voice now uttered the same words, and another form came running towards the fugitives.

The alarm was spreading.

Doubtless, if it came to an encounter, Claude and Jack would have proved more than a match for these police-officers, for such they were; but then the time occupied by the struggle would enable the other officers to come up with them, and the issue of a contest with, perhaps, four times their number would be very doubtful indeed.

There seemed to be no resource but immediate flight.

It was certain they would have to abandon all idea of getting their horses out of the stable, at any rate for the present.

But the plantation was within a few yards of them, and they dashed off in the direction of it at once, for its leafy coverts were well adapted for concealment.

The officers now began to appear in greater numbers, for they had heard something unusual was taking place, though they did not know what.

Quickly, however, they saw the flying forms of the two highwaymen, as well as the course they were taking, and they put forth their speed, not in the endeavour to overtake them, but to intercept them.

But they were too late to practise this manœuvre successfully.

Seeing this, they called to them to surrender, but no heed was taken of their words, so, fearful of losing their prey altogether, the police-officers drew their pistols and fired.

But the distance was too great for the clumsy, ill-constructed weapons which they carried to be effective, and the bullets crashed harmlessly among the trees.

One more dash, and then Claude and Jack found themselves fairly among the branches.

A sensation of comparative safety now came over them, for among the intricacies of such a place as that the officers would have the greatest difficulty in following them.

The trees grew very close together, and there was, too, an exaggerated growth of underwood.

Both these circumstances impeded their progress greatly.

But they plunged boldly into the recesses of the plantation, quite heedless of the numerous bruises and scratches they received.

The officers fired again, but this discharge was, if possible, more harmless than its predecessor.

And now Claude and Jack began to think that, after all, the loss of their horses was not so serious a thing as they at first thought.

If they had mounted and rode away, the officers would have been very close indeed behind them.

They might not have come up with them, and yet they might have dogged their footsteps into London.

It was quite certain if they had been on horseback they could not have availed themselves of the protection which the plantation afforded them, for the simple reason that it was quite impassable to horses.

So out of these circumstances our friends gathered new hope, and crashed on through the underwood, each moment penetrating deeper and deeper into the plantation, and each moment becoming more and more involved in the darkness which prevailed there.

For this they cared little, because there was all the more difficulty for their pursuers to see them.

They made all speed possible, being satisfied that if they could once get out of the hearing of the police, they should be able to escape from them altogether.

As it was, the loud crashing of the branches and the crackling of the twigs as they forced their way through them, formed a capital guide for their pursuers.

See them they could not, for Jack and Claude could scarcely see a yard before their own faces.

From time to time, however, the officers, as if to show how determined a pursuit they were making, called out to the highwaymen to surrender, and fired their pistols.

But all this was quite useless.

Sixteen-String Jack several times felt his strength fail him, for he was by no means equal to such violent exertion; but each time he felt the sensation of weakness come over him, he shook it off with a vigorous effort.

It is wonderful what capability the mind has of subduing the body to it.

Sixteen-String Jack kept on, and was very little in the rear of his unwounded comrade.

Gradually, to their great relief and joy, they heard the sounds which the officers made in pursuit grow fainter and fainter.

They were either falling off, or else they had taken some wrong direction.

Fancying that it might be the latter, and that the sound of their progress might bring them on the right track again, our friends stopped still and listened.

They could then hear the officers forcing a passage through the dense vegetation which covered the ground.

It was then that Sixteen-String Jack made a suggestion which, from the simplicity of it, is a wonder had not entered their minds before.

"Let us ascend one of these trees, Claude. If we are not seen or heard we shall be quite safe, and we shall be able to remain there until the officers have left the spot. Then we can descend, and act as we may in the meantime determine."

"Agreed," said Claude. "That is, I fancy, about the best thing you could do. Ascend first, and I will assist you. I shall not be far behind."

With this Claude assisted Jack to climb the lower part of the trunk of the tree, and as soon as he caught a fair hold of the branches, he left him to himself, while he began to climb also.

In doing this he was careful to make as little noise as possible, for every moment he could hear the sounds which indicated the approach of the police-officers grow plainer and plainer.

To Claude the feat of climbing a tree was an easy one, and he was soon ensconced among the leaves of an umbrageous chestnut, and seated by the side of his old comrade in arms.

They did not venture to speak, lest the sound of their voices should reach the ears of the police-officers and betray them, nor did they move after having once seated themselves.

With some anxiety and suspense they now stretched their sense of hearing to the utmost.

On came the officers, crashing their way through the trees.

The murmur of their voices presently became heard.

It was in vain that the two highwaymen peered down, and strove to pierce the darkness beneath them. It was too intense, and, moreover, the leaves of the chestnut-tree effectually hid the ground from their sight.

CHAPTER CCCXL.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ELUDE THE OFFICERS IN THE PLANTATION, BUT RUN AGAIN INTO THE LION'S MOUTH.

THEY had, therefore, only their sense of hearing to depend upon, and this faculty they stretched to its utmost extent.

Louder and louder grew the sounds, until, at length, the two highwaymen were certain that their foes were actually beneath the tree in which they were hidden.

They were talking loudly to each other, and the highwaymen easily distinguished what was said.

"Stop a minute," said a voice, "it's no good going on like this. Stop a minute, and then, perhaps, we shall hear something of them, for, curse me! it's so dark, there's no seeing a yard before you!"

The police-officers came to a halt, and then there was silence of a few minutes' duration.

They were listening, no doubt.

Claude and Jack took care not to make the slightest movement in the tree so as to attract suspicion towards them.

"I can't hear anything," said the voice which had before spoken, and which, doubtless, belonged to the officer who had some sort of command over the others; "I can't hear anything, and as for hunting for them in this dark place without any clue, why, it's nothing but d—d folly, so let's go back to the inn."

"The place seems as silent as the grave, sir," said another voice.

"It does. The rascals have doubtless hidden themselves somewhere, and if so, we might look for ever without finding them. Follow me. We will go back to the inn, where doubtless we are wanted."

The trampling of feet followed this speech, as the officers turned round to make their way back to the inn.

In a few minutes the sounds of their retreat completely died away, and then Sixteen-String Jack commenced the descent of the tree.

But Claude Duval laid his hand upon his arm, and arrested his further progress, saying as he did so—

"Stop a minute, Jack. It may not be quite judicious to quit our place of concealment so soon. These officers consider themselves artful fellows, and they may have merely made the speech we overheard in the hope of being able to throw us off our guard."

There was some sense in this, so Sixteen-String Jack acquiesced at once, and made no further movement.

But in a low tone of voice Claude Duval addressed him.

"What do you think of these officers, Jack?"

"In what way?"

"I mean, do you think they knew of whom they were in pursuit?"

"No I do not."

"Nor do I."

"If they had, they would not have relinquished the pursuit as they appear to have done. My view of the case is this. The authorities have in some way become acquainted with atrocities which have unquestionably been perpetrated at the 'Spotted Dog,' and these police-officers have been dispatched to take those who were found in the inn into custody, and when they saw us escaping they took us for the rascally gang."

"That is precisely my view of the case, Jack. I don't for a moment think that they suspect who we are, and I feel pretty sure these officers are not the same that pursued us after our encounter with the patrol."

"So am I, or they would have arrived much sooner than we did, for we left no clue behind by which they could follow us."

"Certainly not."

"The officers will find, though, when they enter, that we have been rather beforehand with them."

"They will, indeed. Do you think it will be safe to descend now?"

"We will listen a moment first."

"Agreed."

The highwaymen listened intently for some time, but nothing save the rustling of the tree-tops, as they were dashed backwards and forwards by the wind, reached their ears.

"All is still," said Claude, at length.

"Yes, all seems still."

"Before we attempt to descend, however, I think there would be no harm in considering our position a little."

"I was going to propose the same thing."

"In the first place, then, we ought to get back to London as soon as possible, but how are we to do it?"

"That is just the question."

"We are some distance from town, and I am sure the state of your wounds is such that, after the exertion you have already undergone, it will be impossible for you to walk the distance."

"I fear so; but even if it was possible, we should have to relinquish all ideas of such a thing because of the time it would necessarily take."

"But what are we to do? Our horses are gone."

"Don't you think it possible to regain them?"

"How?"

"By going to the stable, and trying to get them out unperceived."

"That would be running a very great risk."

"I know that; but just think of the advantage that would be gained by it."

"I admit that."

"For my own part, I am inclined to think that as yet the officers are quite unaware of the horses being in the stable, and, if so, we might creep back quietly, enter unknown to them, mount in the stable, and be off at full speed before they are aware of it."

"It is a bold plan."

"But a good one."

"I think so."

"Then let us lose no time in setting about it. Admitting our conjectures to be true, the officers will have quite enough to do in searching the inn, without troubling about the outbuildings."

"Very likely."

"Come on, then, at once, for if we are to make the attempt at all, the sooner we make it the better. As it is, I fear we shall have some ado to reach old Matthew's before dawn."

"I am ready."

"Descend, then, and I shall be glad if you will assist me."

"I shall do that willingly enough, you may depend."

Claude Duval lowered himself easily, and then, catching hold of a branch, swung for a moment and dropped to the ground.

He assistad his wounded comrade also.

Upon reaching the ground, however, they found themselves in rather a serious dilemma.

All around them was as dark as pitch.

In coming from the inn, the two highwaymen had been too much occupied in escaping from their pursuers to take any notice of the route they had taken, and now they found as they stood at the foot of the tree that they had not the remotest idea in which direction the inn lay.

They had turned round and round so often that they had quite lost their bearings.

They stood undecided for a moment, and then suddenly they heard the report of a pistol.

It was no difficult matter for them to say with certainty from which direction the sound came.

What it meant they knew not, but they faced round towards it.

It seemed to indicate the whereabouts of the officers, and as a matter of course, of the "Spotted Dog" also.

In this direction they proceeded, using the greatest possible amount of caution.

How far they had penetrated into the plantation they had no very definite idea, but they felt sure, from the speed they had made, that it must be a considerable distance.

They kept on for some time, however in profound darkness, but apparently without coming any nearer to the boundary of the plantation, which they might naturally expect to be indicated by the trees growing at a greater distance from each other.

Suddenly, however, the two highwaymen perceived a faint light glittering before them, and after some hesitation, they advanced cautiously towards it.

On a nearer approach they found that this light proceeded from one of the windows of the inn, which was not far off on the left hand of where they stood.

This light formed an excellent beacon for them, and enabled them to make direct for their destination.

At every few steps they would pause and listen.

But hearing nothing alarming, they gathered more confidence.

At length they saw before them, just dimly visible in the darkness, the outlines of the sheds which appeared to belong to the "Spotted Dog" inn.

With the stealthy tread of Red Indians on the war-trail, Claude and Jack crept towards these sheds, keeping as much as possible in the dense shadows that fell everywhere around.

To their joy and satisfaction they at last reached them, without having raised an alarm of any kind.

After a time they found a door, which they opened.

As soon as it swung back upon its hinges, the unmistakable odour of stables saluted their nostrils, and convinced them that they had reached their proper destination.

With every confidence, then, they stepped inside and closed the door behind them.

Claude then ventured to produce a light.

He gave it to Sixteen-String Jack to hold, and then looked about him.

He found himself standing in stables of rather a spacious character, and such as one would scarcely have expected to find in such a situation.

There were but two horses in the stalls, and those the highwaymen immediately recognised as their own.

"Look here, Jack," said Claude, as they went close to the animals. "This shows the necessity of always following the plan we have adopted of first of all seeing our horses properly attended to."

And, indeed, the sight before them was ample evidence of the truth of Claude's remark.

The horses had been led into the stables just as they were, and never touched.

They had not been rubbed down, and the mud, with which they were plentifully bosprinkled, had caked upon them in large masses.

None of the trappings had been removed. They stood there saddled and bridled, in fact, just as they were when Claude and Jack alighted.

The mangers were quite empty, and it was pretty certain the horses had neither had anything to eat or to drink.

At any other time the discovery of this would have produced a great deal more anger in their breasts than it did; but the fact is, the feeling was submerged in the anxiety they felt to get away.

They turned the horses round in the stalls, and prepared to mount, but, just at that moment, they heard a hurried trampling of feet.

They listened.

The sound approached them.

Dreading the worst, Jack put out the little bit of lighted candle he held in his hand, and ran to the door.

Looking through it, he saw a number of police-officers in the yard of the inn.

They carried lanterns, and one of them extemporized a kind of cresset, such as were used by the watch in olden times.

This diffused a bright ruddy light.

They came in a straight line to the door of the stables, and the only inference to be derived from this was that our friends had been seen to enter it.

Jack did not wait to see any more, but closed the door at once, and rapidly secured it by means of a couple of huge bolts and a swinging bar, which his sense of touch easily enabled him to discover.

This done, he waited rather anxiously for the result.

His apprehensions might be without foundation.

Time would soon decide that.

The officers advanced steadily in a direct line to the stable door.

They reached it in another moment, and then the doubts and fears which the two highwaymen entertained were completely set at rest.

In the first place, they tried to open the door, but finding the attempt a fruitless one, they struck some heavy blows upon it, and called upon those within to surrender.

The two highwaymen seemed now to be in a more perilous position than before.

How were they to escape?

There seemed to be but one mode of egress from the stable, and that was the door by which they had entered, and which was now commanded by their foes.

They remained profoundly still after the officers had called upon them to surrender.

But, if they hoped by this course to induce a belief from the minds of the officers that they were not there, it was a total failure.

The next words that were uttered quite testified this.

"You may as well open the door and submit quietly," said a voice, "because we know you are here, and have surrounded the stable that you cannot possibly escape, so give in at once, and your lives shall be spared."

To this speech Claude and Jack paid no more attention than they did to the other.

The officer who had spoken waited a moment in anticipation of receiving a reply, but finding none came, he cried, in a voice of exasperation—

"Curse them! how much more trouble are they going to give us? I am sick of this sort of work, and I don't mean to put up with it any longer. Down with the door, my men! Down with it! We will capture the rascals either dead or alive. It don't matter a dump to us which. Come on. Down with it!"

A succession of heavy blows upon the door followed these words, which showed that the officers had set about breaking it down in right good earnest.

Leaving them to this work, we will turn our attention to what Claude and Jack were about.

The door was a very ill-fitting one, and in it there were numerous chinks.

Through any of these a tolerably good view of the yard could be obtained.

What they saw was anything but encouraging.

Round the door, in a compact mass, was about a dozen men, all police officers, as their dress fully indicated.

They were armed with various heavy weapons, all of which were well calculated for the execution of the task they had before them.

"What was to be done?"

This was the question the two highwaymen asked themselves as they looked anxiously and inquiringly into each other's faces.

It is probable at this moment, finding themselves environed with so much danger, that they repented of having been so temerarious as to return to the inn after having once got clear of it.

CHAPTER CCCXLI.

THE POSITION OF CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK IN THE STABLE OF THE "SPOTTED DOG" BECOMES CRITICAL.

THE din made by the officers hammering on the door was something terrific, and had a rather confusing effect upon the intellects of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

Just for the satisfaction of the reader we will break off our narrative, and, in as few words as possible, simply state what officers they were who made this attack upon the "Spotted Dog" inn.

We may begin, then, by stating that the two highwaymen were perfectly correct in the conclusions they came to. The errand of the officers to the inn was in no way connected with them.

The fact was, that some rumours of rather a disagreeable character, respecting the proceedings at the "Spotted Dog," had reached the ears of the police authorities, and, having received some rather definite information, they thought it high time to send a force to the spot in order to ascertain whether what they had heard really was or was not the truth.

Hence their arrival in strong numbers, and, finding the front door secured — for the intended murderers had taken the precaution to fasten it—they gave the noisy summons for admission which had reached the ears of our friends while in the cellar.

Before attacking the door in this manner, the officer in command had posted several of the men in various positions round the inn, with instructions to raise an immediate alarm if they saw any one attempting to leave the premises.

We have seen how this was done when Claude and Jack endeavoured to cross the yard of the inn.

The officers of police never dreamt for a moment that the two men they were pursuing were no other than Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack; if they had been aware of it, they would have been more energetic than they were.

They were baffled in the intricacies of the plantation, and forced to beat a retreat without having accomplished their errand.

With an audacity that was really wonderful, the two highwaymen returned to the stable.

They were seen to enter it by one of the officers, who had the prudence not to raise an alarm which should reach the ears of those they wished to capture, but hastened off to the chief to communicate the intelligence quietly.

The result of this we have seen.

The officers came in a body, and attacked the door of the stable with a vigour and determination that bid fair to have it down in a very few minutes indeed.

The position of the highwaymen was critical in the extreme.

But they soon recovered themselves from their surprise, and coolly set about making a rapid examination of the stable, in order to find, if possible, some means of egress from it.

In this, however, they were unsuccessful. It was clear there was but one means by which the stables could be entered or left, and that one was commanded by the police-officers.

What must be done? they again asked themselves, and this time with increased anxiety.

To be sure, they might have adopted the desperate expedient of flinging open the door and making a sudden sortie.

But there was so much risk about that course.

Had those who were opposed to them been any other than trained men, or had there been fewer of them than there were, they would unquestionably have availed themselves of this hazardous expedient, but as things stood they rather shrank from doing so.

It was too much to hope that they could succeed in taking these men by surprise, and dashing through their ranks before they recovered themselves.

"I can see but one other chance," said Sixteen-String Jack to his comrade in a hasty whisper; "and I have serious doubts as to the practicability of that."

"What is it? Speak, be quick. Another moment and he door will be down."

Sixteen-String Jack cast an uneasy glance towards the door, and saw that what his companion said was only too true, and that the officers would quickly demolish the only impediment which stood between them and entering.

"Look at the back of the shed, Claude," said Jack. "It seems to me that the boarding is very rotten, and that we might make a breach in it in a few moments."

"What is there on the other side?"

"I have peeped through one of the numerous crevices, and there seems to be a kind of lane."

"What a pity we did not think of that before. Now, I am afraid, it is too late."

"No—no. Do not say that. The door holds bravely upon its hinges, but it is the bar which we put up that does that. Just look at the back of the shed."

Claude hastened to comply with his comrade's request, and found that what he said was quite correct.

The shed was wholly built of wood, and this, in some parts, seemed in the last stage of decay. No doubt this was where the boarding had been more exposed to the influence of the weather.

As Jack had said, there were numerous crevices, and looking through one of these, he saw that the only thing which interposed between them and the narrow lane in which the inn stood was a few rotten wooden planks.

Hope rose in his breast in a moment, and he cried to Jack in a low, but exultant tone of voice—

"We are free—we are free! Lend me your assistance, and in less than a moment we shall have a breach large enough for us to lead the horses through with comparative ease!"

Jack did not require to be told this twice, but proceeded to assist his comrade with the greatest good will.

A vigorous push sent one of the planks flying into the lane, and when one was gone the removal of the rest was easy.

Indeed, the boards gave way before the pressure that was applied to them, just as though they were so much pasteboard, and, in far less time than it takes us to write it, they had made a hole large enough to lead the horses through.

The crashing blows which the police continued to deliver upon the door, effectually drowned the slight noise which our friends made, and they were quite in ignorance of what they were about.

But when Claude and Jack mounted, which they did before they attempted to pass through the breach, they glanced at the door, and saw that it had quite lost its perpendicularity, and that a very few more blows must level it with the ground.

Indeed, this was done before they could properly seat themselves in their saddles.

As the hole was just in front of the door—or rather just opposite to it—the officers saw in a moment what had taken place, and, with a yell of dismay upon their lips, they dashed into the stable.

But the highwaymen were too quick for them.

One touch with the spur upon the flanks of the high-mettled horses made them bound through the aperture in a moment.

Sixteen-String Jack went through first, and Claude Duval followed, but there was so little time between the two actions that any one would have declared they occurred simultaneously.

"Fire—fire!" yelled the officer in command. "Fire—fire! Ten thousand curses! they will escape us yet."

The officers drew their pistols from their belts as hastily as they could, and fired an irregular volley.

It had not the slightest effect, however, for the persons at whom they fired were not within range.

The chief officer appeared to be in a state of great exasperation. No doubt, from the kind of resistance he had met with, the suspicion dawned upon his mind that those of whom he was in pursuit were not exactly what he thought they were.

Having leaped through the hole in the stable, the two highwaymen turned their horses' heads, and sped down the lane at a rate that soon left the "Spotted Dog" behind, and made any attempt of the officers to overtake them quite futile.

The high-road was soon gained, and, without saying a word or relaxing their speed in the slightest, they turned in the direction of London.

There was good policy in thus at once placing as great a distance as possible between their enemies and themselves, because it made pursuit all the more difficult.

They had, too, another motive for making all speed which was quite independent of the last.

It was this.

The many strange adventures which had befallen them upon that most eventful night, had occupied a great deal of time, and, by glancing up at the sky, they could see that they would have very great difficulty indeed in reaching London before it was fairly daylight.

The worst of it was, too, that their horses were tired, and not in condition to put forth much speed, while Sixteen-String Jack was by far too weak to endure any violent exertion.

It is really wonderful, when we take into consideration the nature and extent of the injuries he has received, that he should have borne up against their effects in the remarkable manner he has.

But, then, he had a powerful incentive.

Now, however, that a great deal of the excitement which had been the means of keeping him up had passed away, the reaction commenced, and every now and then a sensation of deadly weakness would come over him, and he would fairly reel in his saddle.

This was in consequence of the immense quantity of blood he had lost.

With regard to the wounds themselves, they were not at all of a dangerous character, and, doubtless, a day's rest at the "White Horse" inn, together with the skilful attentions of old Matthew, would put him all right for the night.

The reader will please to bear in mind that it is now early on Sunday morning—that Sunday preceding the Monday which was fixed for the execution of Tom King.

Time was short, and, as yet, there was very little done towards effecting the escape of the two highwaymen from Newgate.

Still, if all went well they saw very little grounds for apprehension.

More than once Claude and Jack reined in their steeds and listened for any sounds betokening pursuit, but nothing of the kind struck upon their ears.

Every moment now they found it grew rapidly lighter, and yet they were a long way from their destination.

They continued to urge on their exhausted horses, however, and, by means of whip and spur, maintained a tolerable speed.

One thing, it being Sunday morning, people were not likely to be up so early as on any other morning during the week, so they would not run quite so much risk of detection.

On their way to the metropolis they did not meet with a single person, or an adventure worthy of recording.

By the time they had fairly entered London, it was broad daylight.

People were abroad lounging listlessly about the streets and many of them casting inquiring glances at our friends whose appearances were calculated to excite suspicion.

They were covered with mud, and as for Sixteen-String Jack, he was besmeared from head to foot with the blood which had flowed from his wounds.

In this plight they could not fail to attract attention.

According to the arrangement which had been made, our two friends rode up to the front of Montague-house, the spot from which they had started.

Here they found a man waiting for the horses.

He came up to them as soon as they arrived, and assisted them to dismount.

The distance from Montague-house to the top of Drury-lane is very short, and so Claude and Jack soon reached it.

Once beneath the shadow of its houses they felt that they were tolerably safe, for then this thoroughfare boasted even more courts than it does now.

The "White Horse" was reached without any hindrance being offered them.

Both kept a sharp look-out, but they saw no one whose appearance seemed foe-like to them.

They turned down White Horse-yard, and knocked at the secret door. They were necessitated to do this, because the front of the house was closed.

The door was opened almost as soon as their summons was given upon it.

Old Matthew had been on the watch for them all night, and when dawn came without the highwaymen having arrived, he grew agitated in the extreme.

He feared the worst.

His joy at seeing them was proportionally great.

The door was quickly closed behind them.

Refreshments were already laid upon the table in the parlour behind the bar, and Claude and Jack did ample justice to the good things set before them.

Old Matthew had some knowledge of surgery, and he washed and dressed Sixteen-String Jack's wounds in a manner that would have been no discredit to a professor of the art.

They then communicated to him the successful result of their excursion on the highway.

They poured out their booty upon the table before him, and he was really astonished at the amount.

"There will be a devil of a row about this," he said.

"Never mind."

"Well—well, the risk must be run. And now I must beg of you to take my advice."

"What is that?"

"To go and lie down and get all the sleep you possibly can till dusk. I will call you then without fail, and it will be quite time for you to set about your business then."

"Quite time."

"Follow me, then, and get your strength up, for you don't know what you may have to do. Be thankful that you have succeeded so well as you have."

"Lead on, Matthew; we shall be glad enough to follow you; and if, while we are resting, you can get a change of apparel for both of us, we shall be very grateful."

"It shall be done."

Old Matthew led the highwaymen upstairs to a sleeping chamber, and there left them to prepare themselves in the best manner they were able for the startling events that were to happen that night.

The day passed away quietly enough, and without the occurrence of any incident of an alarming or threatening character.

CHAPTER CCCXLII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK VISIT THE THIEVES' KEN IN HANGING-SWORD-ALLEY, WHITEFRIARS.

Conformably with the promise he had made, old Matthew awoke Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack just as dusk was coming on.

They changed their apparel for some which he had provided for them, and then they descended the stairs and partook of a hearty meal.

While they were discussing this, they talked over their plans, and speculated upon the probabilities of their coming to a successful issue.

"I have ascertained one important fact for you," said old Matthew.

"What is it?"

"Why, that the largest meeting of the 'family' to-night will take place at the 'Jew's Harp,' in Hanging-Sword-alley, Whitefriars."

"Indeed! That bit of intelligence is of the utmost importance."

"I know that."

"We shall certainly proceed there. Until you spoke, we were wondering where we should go, but now you have decided us."

"Just so."

"Do you know what time the meeting is to take place?"

"No, but I should recommend you to get there early."

"We will start at once."

"I think that will be the best plan. You can rely upon the assistance of all the family."

"I am glad to hear that; and they won't have their trouble for nothing."

"Go—go. I am most anxious for this business to be over. If your plans were to miscarry, it would be all over with poor Tom; and if he was to come to grief, I know you would never forgive yourselves."

"I am certain we should not."

"Take every precaution, then. If you fail, Tom King has only fourteen hours to live."

A clock struck the hour of six as Matthew spoke.

"We will do our best, you may depend, and no one can do more. But quiet your apprehensions. In seven hours' time both Dick Turpin and Tom King will be out of Newgate."

A few more words passed, and then the highwaymen bid old Matthew adieu, for it was very uncertain when they should see each other again.

At a rapid pace, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack made their way from the "White Horse" inn, in Drury Lane, to Hanging-Sword-alley, in Whitefriars.

They said but little to each other upon the road.

Both were busily occupied with their own thoughts, and, moreover, they were fearful of being overheard.

The thieves' ken to which they were proceeding was one of the largest and best known in London, though neither of our friends had ever paid a visit to it.

Still they knew its situation.

With some amount of curiosity, therefore, they looked about them as soon as they had ascended the flight of steps which led into Hanging-Sword-alley.

The place was as dark as pitch, for the alley being narrow, and the houses on each side being very high, a deep shadow was upon the ground.

At first, although they walked up this alley from beginning to end, our friends could see nothing of the "Jew's Harp."

Presently, however, they saw a light appear at the window of a house, the remaining portion of which was in utter darkness.

Towards this they proceeded, and then they saw that it was a public-house.

They had little doubt it was the one they wanted.

The front door stood invitingly open, and there was nothing whatever which bore a suspicious look about the place.

Upon reaching the bar window, however, they were roughly asked what they wanted.

Claude Duval replied in the peculiar dialect then employed by the thieves in London, and which was as unintelligible to any one not acquainted with it as any foreign language possibly could be.

The countenance of the man who had spoken to the highwaymen underwent a complete change when he heard the few words which Claude uttered.

They were simply an announcement of who they were.

But the man's surprise seemed to be succeeded by a kind of disbelief, for he peered closely into the countenances of both.

Satisfied, however, with his scrutiny, he opened the bar-door and allowed them to enter.

He still spoke in the thieves' dialect, but, as it would be quite incomprehensible to our readers, we will not trouble them with it, but translate as we go on.

"Do you want to attend the meeting here to-night?"

"Yes," replied Claude. "I have a particular proposal to make to the 'family' with respect to Dick Turpin and Tom King, who are, as I daresay you know very well, at this moment prisoners in Newgate."

The man nodded.

"I think they will relish the proposal, and, moreover, it will not be a bootless one, for all who do anything will be well paid for their trouble."

"That's better. There will be a strong gathering here to-night."

"So we were told."

"By whom?"

"Old Matthew."

"What, the landlord of the 'White Horse' in Drury-lane?"

"Yes."

"All right, then. I have no doubts now."

"Then you have had some?"

"Well, you ought not to be offended if I say, yes. You see, we are obliged to be very careful. The grabs are up to all manner of tricks."

"Of course."

"You are full early. The meeting won't take place for a couple of hours yet. Would you like to wait here, or go at once to the room? A few have arrived, but not many."

"If it's all the same to you, we would much rather go where we are least likely to be seen. The grabs are after us, and have given us a great deal of trouble lately. We had a sharp skirmish on the Oxford-road last night."

"Were you on business?"

"Yes."

"Then you had better go into the meeting-room at once, to guard against accidents. The time will soon pass away, and you will find plenty to amuse yourselves with."

"I don't fear that. We came early purposely."

"Will you follow me if you please, gentlemen?"

"Willingly."

The man with whom they had had this brief conversation opened a door which led from the bar into an inner apartment.

As soon as our friends had crossed the threshold, he carefully closed the door after him.

The apartment in which the highwaymen now stood was a small one, and tolerably well illuminated by an oil lamp which hung from the ceiling.

The appearance of this place was ordinary enough, and would not have generated suspicion in the minds of any one.

It was plainly furnished, and when they entered, was apparently unoccupied.

The man made no stay in this room, but walked straight across it in the direction of the fireplace, which was placed so as to be opposite to the door.

On each side of this fireplace were two large cupboards reaching from the ceiling to the floor.

They were closed.

It was not exactly to the fireplace that this man went, followed by Claude and Jack, but to the cupboard on the left-hand side of it.

Taking a small key from his pocket, he unlocked this cupboard, and threw the doors open.

A large recess was then disclosed, looking more like a closet than anything else, and quite destitute of shelves.

The back of this cupboard appeared to be formed of oak wainscoting.

All this was quite fresh to our friends, so they looked at all that was taking place with the interest which novelty produces.

The man walked into this cupboard—for so we must call it for want of a better appellation—and going to the back part of it, he stooped and raised the lower half precisely in the same manner as he would have raised the bottom sash of a window.

It slid up into grooves, and there was the creaking of pulleys, which showed that the principle of construction was the same in both.

When the lower half of the back of the cupboard was thus raised, a gloomy-looking recess was disclosed.

"This way, gentlemen, if you please," said the man, as he stepped aside so as to allow them to pass him. "You will find a flight of steps there, and when you have descended them you will find yourselves in the meeting-room."

Claude and Jack stepped into the cupboard, and upon looking more closely at the gloomy recess, they saw that there was indeed a flight of steps leading down into positive darkness.

Naturally enough, they shrunk a little from descending.

The man noticed their hesitation.

"It's all right," he said. "The stairs are straight and safe. When you get a little lower down, you will see a light."

The highwaymen were forced to content themselves with this assurance, and accordingly they went down the steps.

As soon as both fairly stood upon them, the man who had so far acted as their guide drew down the cleverly-constructed back of the cupboard, and restored it to its ordinary appearance.

Then he closed and locked the cupboard door.

Had they wished to do such a thing, Claude and Jack would have found it rather difficult to effect a retreat.

No such thought, however, entered their minds, and they descended the stairs with a feeling of the utmost security.

Ere long, they saw the light of which the man had spoken.

It was very faint at first, but as they went lower and lower it grew brighter, until at length they found it proceeded from an oil lamp of large dimensions which was hung from the ceiling.

On reaching the bottom of the steps, Claude and Jack saw before them a strong-looking door, which they pushed open at once.

It led into a large department, to which we will devote a line or two of description.

As a matter of course, this chamber was underground; the mere fact of their having descended so many steps as they had was sufficient proof of that.

It was of considerable length, but disproportionately low and narrow.

Down the centre of this place there was a long narrow table, on both sides of which seats were placed.

It was lighted by means of a rude chandelier, consisting of two pieces of wood nailed across each other, and into which candles were fixed.

These were suspended from the roof at uncertain intervals, but as there were several of them, they served to illuminate the apartment tolerably well.

Only two or three people occupied this place when our friends entered, and they were busily talking to each other.

They looked up as Claude and Jack entered, but beyond that they took no kind of notice of their arrival.

They turned back and resumed their conversation.

Claude and Jack sat themselves down close by.

A waiter now made his appearance, and stood before them for orders.

It was said that the best of everything in the shape of drinkables could be had at the "Hanging-Sword" ken, and Claude resolved to test the truth of popular rumour.

Placing a guinea in the waiter's palm, he desired him to bring in a bottle of the best wine there was in the place, and to keep the change himself.

The lad who performed the duties of waiter assigned the guinea to his pocket with great satisfaction, and soon returned with a bottle of old port, which, upon being tasted, the highwaymen pronounced to be of most excellent quality.

The group of persons who alone seemed to occupy the apartment were talking rather noisily to each other, and Claude and Jack could not avoid overhearing some of the words they uttered.

At first they carried no meaning, but the highwaymen quickly found that the subject of the conversation was the exploits they had performed on the preceding evening.

The account that was given was rather an exaggerated one, and at times our friends could not forbear or control a smile.

The narration, however, was wound up with a piece of intelligence that was quite fresh.

Information of the robbery, and a description of the two robbers, had been forwarded to all the police-officers, and their instructions were to leave no stone unturned and no place unvisited, but, at all risks, to capture these two highwaymen.

It was just as they finished that some fresh arrivals took place, and in less than half-an-hour the huge place was full, which proved the truth of the man's words who said that the gathering would be a large one.

It was a palpable fact that all those who came in cast glances upon Duval and Jack, but beyond this they did not venture to make any recognition, such a proceeding being at variance with the rules of the society.

At last, when all were assembled, the chairman made his appearance, and took his accustomed seat.

There was now some approach to order.

Rising to his feet, the chairman said—

"My pals,—You, as well as myself, I daresay, have been told that there are in our company to-night two gentlemen, who we all feel proud to know are amongst us. You have been told, like me, I make no doubt, that these gentlemen—these ornaments of our profession, as I might call them—have come here to-night with an object in view—with a proposal to make."

"Hear—hear!" cried those assembled, banging their drinking vessels violently upon the table.

"What that proposal is we don't know, but we are very anxious to find out. We shall know soon. Pals all, only this very last night you have heard what a glorious deed these two gentlemen have done. You have heard all the particulars. Well, then, I say we ought to be proud that we have got two such gentlemen in our company to-night."

"So we are—so we are!" shouted the turbulent throng. "Shut up! and let's know what the proposal is."

"Order, pals!" vociferated the chairman. "I hereby call upon the two gentlemen, by name Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, to step forward and state their proposal to the company!"

CHAPTER CCCXLIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL PROPOSES TO THE "FAMILY" THAT THEY SHALL ATTACK NEWGATE, AND RESCUE DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING BY MAIN FORCE.

A PERFECTLY deafening round of applause followed this last speech made by the chairman.

It was quite certain that the utmost curiosity was felt to know what it was that the two famous highwaymen could have to say to them.

They were impatient to a degree.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack forced their way through the throng until they got to the end of the table, and then the former said—

"Gentlemen,—I beg that the first thing you will one and all do will be to drink up whatever you may have before you, so that I may have the pleasure of treating you all round."

The cheer which responded to these words was something tremendous.

The hearts of all present were won at once.

With the greatest avidity they drained their glasses, and placed them on the table before them in an inverted position to show that they had fairly done so.

"Now, gentlemen," cried Claude, "you are at liberty to call for whatever you like, no matter what it is. There's something towards paying for it."

He flung a heavy purse upon the table as he spoke.

"Punch—punch!" cried everybody, as with one voice.

"Punch be it, then," said Claude. "You shall have enough to swim in if you like."

Punch was a drink always in requisition at the ken, and preparations had been made on an extensive scale for the manufacture of a large quantity.

The consequence was that very little time elapsed between the issuing of the order and the steaming drink being placed on the table.

The glasses were all filled, and then the company stood up while the chairman proposed the health of their entertainers.

Of course this toast was drunk with the greatest applause.

As soon as the tumult subsided, the two highwaymen responded, and then Claude said—

"Gentlemen all, fill your glasses again, and fill them this time to the brim, and drink the toast I am about to propose to you."

The glasses were filled, and then, amidst a breathless silence, Claude stood up and spoke as follows:—

"Gentlemen all, the toast I want you to drink is this: May Dick Turpin and Tom King make a speedy escape from the stone jug in the Old Bailey."

Not a sound followed this speech.

The toast was drunk in perfect silence.

The glasses were placed down upon the table without it being broken.

Claude continued.

"By the look of every one of you I can tell that you expect what I am going to say. It is this. Dick Turpin and Tom King are at this moment prisoners in Newgate—you must all know that. You must all know how it was that Dick Turpin was taken prisoner, and confined in one of the cells, so it is not necessary for me to say a word about that."

"Hear—hear!"

"While he was a prisoner, his old comrade, Tom King, anxious to procure his freedom, disguised himself and visited him in his dungeon. But somehow his disguise was detected—he was made a prisoner, and confined in one of the cells also. That was in the cause of friendship."

Murmurs of admiration followed these words.

"You see his design failed. Now, we are the only two friends they had left. We wanted both released from Newgate, but, single-handed, how were we to effect their liberation? We were harassed, too, by the knowledge that we had no time to spare, for to-morrow morning is fixed for Tom King's execution at Tyburn, along with the murderer, Adrian Winberry."

There was a general groan of execration at this announcement.

"Gentlemen all,—The strictest watch is kept in Newgate—the place is trebly guarded. The authorities are determined that these two flowers of our profession shall be at once cut off. But, gentlemen, shall we suffer it? Shall we permit them to have their own way? No, gentlemen; I have a proposal to make to you, and I feel sure you will accede to it. We will do a glorious deed! The stone jug is a disgrace to us—a lasting disgrace! Gentlemen, why should we suffer it to exist? Why should we not level it with the ground? Why should we suffer one stone to stand upon another? Down with it! Down with the stone jug, I say; and we will set Dick Turpin and Tom King at liberty!"

The effect which these few startling words produced, spoken as they were with fiery vehemence, is indescribable.

The fiercest cries came from the lips of those who listened; they rose to their feet and gesticulated violently; but, above all the other cries, came the words, "Down with it—down with it! Down with the stone jug!"

The uproar was perfectly deafening.

It was in vain that Claude Duval held up his hand in an attitude which he spoke his desire for silence.

At first not the least attention was paid to it, but by degrees the turbulence of the assembled company abated, and they turned towards Claude, anxious to hear what further he had to say.

Not, however, until there was the most perfect silence, did he attempt to speak.

"My friends, I think you have caught at the glorious

[THE BURNING OF NEWGATE AND RESCUE OF DICK TURPIN.]

idea which I wished to convey to you, and I think as well that my proposition is very far from being a distasteful one."

"Hear—hear! Hurrah!"

"If you will allow me, however, I will set forth the proposition in much plainer terms than I have done. I will tell you exactly what I wish you to do, and how and when you are to set about it."

"Hurrah! Hurrah! Silence for Claude Duval! Let us hear him!"

Claude, while these words were being uttered, turned round to Sixteen-String Jack, who handed him a bag which was crammed to the mouth with the proceeds of their last night's robbery.

Then he got on to the table, and looked round at the numerous fierce faces by which he was surrounded.

Expectation was the prevailing expression upon all of them.

Claude held up the bag in such a position that every one could see it.

He saw the eyes of the men sparkle as they looked upon it.

When he was sure that every one had looked at it, Claude spoke—

"My friends—you see this bag. It is large—it is heavy. Its contents are the proceeds of the toll which we levied last night upon the passengers in the Oxford coach. That money is destined to be shared equally among you, provided you agree to perform the service I am about to ask of you."

"Hear—hear! Speak—speak! Let us know what we are to do!"

"When I tell you, I daresay you will all be willing enough to bear a share in such a glorious undertaking without receiving any reward for so doing, but the fact of your receiving several guineas each to do something you would be glad to do for nothing, will not abate your ardour, I know."

"Go on—go on!"

"This is the proposal, then. I want every member of the glorious 'family' to assemble together within two hours from now. I want them to place themselves entirely under the orders of myself and my comrade. We will then lead the way from here to the prison of Newgate, where Dick Turpin and Tom King languish as prisoners in their gloomy cells. When we arrive opposite to this building, which has witnessed the last hours of many a gallant heart, we will rush forward; we will attack it; we will batter down the doors, and force an entrance into its stone corridors; we will release Dick Turpin and Tom King, and all other prisoners who are worthy of liberation"——

"Hurrah—hurrah! We'll do it—we'll do it. Lead the way. We'll follow. Down with it. Down with the old stone jug!"

Claude endeavoured to make himself heard, but he found the effort a fruitless one, so he desisted.

Presently, seeing that he had something more to say, the uproar subsided.

Then Claude continued—

"Friends all. This ready and unanimous consent is more than I could possibly have hoped for. I am rejoiced to find you so willing, because willing hearts always succeed in what they undertake. As I said before, we will set free all prisoners now in Newgate, and then, when we have done that, we will level it to the ground. We will not leave one stone standing upon another, and to-morrow morning nothing but a mass of ruins shall show where the prison of Newgate so lately stood."

"Fire it!" cried a dozen voices. "Set fire to it! Burn it down! That's the plan! Burn it down!"

"A good suggestion," cried Claude. "We will free the prisoners, and burn Newgate down."

"Hurrah—hurrah!"

"Are you all agreed, my friends? Do you consent to the proposition I make to you? All those that do, let them hold up their hands."

A forest of hands was immediately shown.

There was not a single person in the room who did not in this way testify their approval of the plan proposed.

Some, in their enthusiasm, held up both hands as high as their arms would let them, while others would have held up both feet as well, if such a thing had been possible.

The feeling was quite a unanimous one.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were much pleased with the result of their efforts. It was far more than they had expected, for they quite thought they should have a kind of battle to fight, and have to use a great many arguments to bring the "family" to a right state of mind.

But they had succeeded without, as one might say, the least trouble.

The fact was, Dick Turpin was an immense favourite with every member of the "family," both great and small.

Had it been for any one else, they would not have been so ready to risk life and limb to do them a service.

There was another thing, too, of which Claude and Jack were in ignorance.

The circumstance of Dick Turpin being a prisoner in Newgate had been frequently spoken upon, and already they had devised several plans among themselves by which they would be able to set him at liberty.

Not one, however, had thought of such a bold, daring, and desperate scheme as that which Claude Duval had just proposed.

They wished to set Turpin at liberty, and would freely have done all in their power towards doing so.

But they considered, at the same time, that to destroy the great prison of Newgate, which was an incubus to so many of them, was a glorious thing indeed.

And then, again, there happened to be at that very moment—as there generally was every sessions—a great many of their companions inmates of the city prison.

They would have an opportunity of procuring the liberation of these also.

Altogether the enterprise appeared before them clothed in the most alluring colours.

They had several objects to gain, and they had got two men for their leaders who would shrink from nothing.

The chairman of the meeting rose to his feet, and endeavoured to restore something like order.

To a partial extent he succeeded.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I must say that the proceedings to-night, although important, have been very irregular—very irregular indeed. It seems, however, that you all quite agree with the proposal made by the two illustrious highwaymen who have honoured the ken with their presence this evening."

"Yes—yes."

"Then we will consider that settled, and say no more about it. In the next place, I wish to call to your recollection the fact that you have been offered a large sum of money to do that which you were quite willing to do without any payment at all."

"Yes—yes."

"Then I have a proposal to make to you respecting that money. In the bulk, it is a very large and handsome sum indeed; but when it is divided it will not amount to much each. Now, if this money was to be put aside we could make a sort of fund of it, and use it in this way. Suppose one of us was to get into trouble, and a good counsel would get us off; why, we could use this money to pay the lawyer's fee."

"I beg to second that proposition," said Claude Duval. "It is a very excellent one indeed, to my thinking."

"Hear—hear," said the remainder, but not in a very vehement sort of way.

Still it was agreed to.

The object was a good one, for, by the means proposed, the money would be made available for a good purpose. But if distributed among all, they would not individually or collectively be any the better for it.

Claude hastened to turn the conversation.

"As for the distribution," he said, "I shall leave that entirely with you. Here is the money. Do with it just as you please. I believe I am right in understanding that you are quite ready and willing to place yourselves under our orders, and liberate Dick Turpin and Tom King from Newgate."

"Yes—yes. We are all agreed to that—every one. We will burn the place down, and set the prisoners free!"

"Exactly. It will be a glorious achievement. Such a one as will never be forgotten. We shall succeed easily enough, because the authorities will never dream we have such a thing in contemplation. We shall have all the advantage which taking our foes by surprise will give us."

"Hurrah—hurrah!"

"You are ready for action, I can tell by your voices."

"We are—we are."

"Good. It is now ten o'clock. In two hours' time I shall want every member of the 'family' assembled. We shall be able to collect together without suspicion. At precisely one o'clock you are all to be opposite Newgate, in readiness for action. We shall be there, and at the word of command you will rush forward, batter down the entrance doors, force your way through the prison, and burst open all the cells. Then, when the prisoners are at liberty, we will set the prison on fire in half-a-dozen places!"

"That's it—that's it. Down with the old jug. Down with it. Don't let us leave anything more than a heap of stones to show where it stood. Down with it. Hurrah! hurrah!"

"More punch!" cried Claude Duval, in such stentorian tones that they rose clear and distinct above the Babel of other sounds. "More punch, and we will drink to the downfall of Newgate."

CHAPTER CCCXLIV.

TAKES A GLANCE AT DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING IN THEIR RESPECTIVE CELLS IN NEWGATE.

While these energetic-looking proceedings for effecting the release of Dick Turpin and Tom King from Newgate are in progress, we will just take advantage of a few minutes to have a peep at them and their doings.

The tide of events has, for some little time past, carried us away from the gloomy old prison, and we now avail ourselves of this first opportunity of returning to it.

It will be recollected that the last we saw of Dick Turpin and Tom King was on the Sunday morning when, after the usual service had been performed, they had been marched back to their cells.

The sermon, which was preached by the reverend ordinary, was what was called a funeral one—it being the custom to bring in the names of those prisoners who were to suffer at Tyburn on the following morning.

Those against whom the sentence was to be carried out were Adrian Winberry, John Norman, Richard Sare, and Tom King.

For the three first-named, warrants had been sent to the prison in the usual and legitimate course, so that was all right enough.

But for Tom King the case was rather different.

The warrant which had been delivered at the time of his former incarceration was still unexecuted and in force, for, as the reader is very well aware, the terms of that warrant were never fulfilled, for Tom King was never hanged.

That, then, was the document, upon the authority of which they proceeded to act, but the sheriffs were of opinion that it ought to receive a fresh endorsement.

About obtaining this it was not expected there would be any difficulty or delay, and there was not, for a messenger very quickly returned with it.

The governor's mind was now quite at ease.

Tom King and Dick Turpin, as we have described in a former chapter, were fortunate enough to obtain a glimpse of each other as they sat in the chapel during service, but they did not exchange any further communication than a glance.

As may be supposed, Tom was in a far from enviable state of mind—indeed, he was in a desperate fidget.

He was annoyed to think that his scheme for seeing Dick, about which he had spoken with so much confidence, should have terminated so unsuccessfully.

He had not accomplished the least good, and had got himself into a very awkward situation.

It was the shortness of time which troubled him most.

He had no idea that the authorities would hurry on his execution in the manner they had, and when he reflected how few hours intervened between them and the hour fixed for his death, a cold clammy perspiration broke out all over him, and he almost gave up all hope.

Then he would think of his friends.

He knew they were staunch and true, and that the nature of his situation would be well known to them.

That they would not stand idly by and see him perish he could have staked his life; but with so short a notice what chance had they of getting up a plan of escape with success?

Moreover, he had not heard a word from his friends outside. The governor took the greatest care that no communications whatever should reach him.

From this it may be conceived that the state of Tom's mind was wretched enough.

He could not turn his thoughts in any direction and rest upon a ray of comfort.

All was blank despair.

He would start to his feet a thousand times, and, despite the great weight of his fetters, would pace up and down the cell with hasty strides, as far as the chain by which he was secured would allow him.

He was distracted.

It was not either so much for his own fate that he cared, nor would he have grumbled if, by becoming a prisoner, he could have procured the liberation of his friend; but it was so aggravating to think that he had not bettered Dick's position in the least degree, and yet he had thrust his head into the halter.

At length his thoughts began to assume a more settled form, and it was fortunate they did, for, if his present state of mind had continued, he would certainly have gone mad.

The conclusion to which he come was this.

He must by some means or other get his execution postponed for a week.

"I will protest against being hurried out of the world like this. It is too bad. I will send for the governor. I will speak to him, and try whether I cannot get it put off. Why, a week will make all the difference in the world to me. That must be it. I must have a week's grace. Now for the governor."

Tom King had arrived at a decision, and he felt all the calmer in consequence, but those who know the disposition of Mr. Cawthorn will, we think, come to the conclusion that the chances of obtaining a week's delay were very slight indeed.

However, Tom was rather hopeful in the matter.

His chain would not permit him to reach the door of his cell, or else he would soon have made such an uproar by battering upon it, as would have brought all the officials in the prison to know what was the matter.

Some other means must be adopted, because, for the reasons mentioned, it was quite out of the question.

Tom knew there was a turnkey stationed in the corridor, but how to attract his attention was the difficulty.

He knew from experience that it was no good to shout. He might bawl himself hoarse for all the notice that would be taken of it.

Just within his reach, however, was a stone pitcher, in which his allowance of drinking water was placed.

That gave him an idea.

He picked it up and drank heartily of its contents.

Then what water there was left he poured out on the floor of the cell and allowed it to flow away.

He next took the empty pitcher in his hand.

It was very heavy.

He swung it backwards and forwards, so as to give it an impetus, and then, letting go, it went with full force against the door of the cell, and was broke into a thousand fragments.

The crash was tremendous, for the door was lined with iron.

Scarcely had the sounds died away than Tom was rewarded for his expedient by hearing the trampling of footsteps in the passage.

The next moment the door was flung open, and the governor of Newgate, with a turnkey at his back, appeared upon the threshold.

The look of half-fear, half-curiosity which was depicted upon his countenance when he first appeared, quickly changed to one of anger.

"What do you mean by such violent conduct as this?"

"I wanted you," replied Tom, coolly, folding his arms.

"Wanted me?"

"Yes; and, as I knew it was no good to call out, I adopted this means of arresting your attention."

"Oh! indeed."

"I hope you won't be offended, Mr. Cawthorn; but, the fact is, I want to speak to you upon rather a serious affair."

"Oh! very well. Say on—say on. I am bound to listen."

And the governor, as he spoke, assumed his favourite attitude, which consisted in placing one hand behind him and the other in the bosom of his vest, while he swayed gently to and fro upon his heels.

"Mr. Cawthorn," began Tom, "I want to know whether to-morrow morning has really been fixed for—for—my execution?"

The governor grinned.

"Well, yes; it has," he said.

"But you cannot be in earnest. You do not intend to carry such a monstrous thing into effect?"

"Indeed we do, though."

"But I protest against it."

"Protest, then."

"Mr. Cawthorn, I appeal to you as a man. Is it right for me to be brought suddenly into this cell, and told that I must perish so soon? It is monstrous. What time is there left for repentance?"

The governor looked into Tom's face with a comical expression, which, under any other circumstances, would certainly have provoked a smile upon the lips of the prisoner.

"Now, Mr. King."

"What?"

"You must think me jolly green——"

"No—no."

"I say yes. You must think me jolly green, or you wouldn't try on a dodge like this. It's no good. You will find it won't answer. So say no more."

"What dodge?"

"Why, trying to get your execution delayed. Now listen to me, and I will give you a few words of friendly advice. Abandon all thoughts of obtaining any postponement of your execution. You may just as well, for we don't intend to allow you the ghost of a chance to escape, if we can help it. Do you understand that? Let me advise you, then, to occupy your time between now and to-morrow morning in the best way you are able, for I can assure you you will not cheat the gallows this time."

"It's a monstrous piece of iniquity, then."

"I daresay it is, in your judgment, but it is quite the reverse in mine. I have got your warrant indorsed, so that will be all right. Every preliminary has been arranged, and to-morrow at this time you will be dangling at the end of a rope on the triple tree at Tyburn."

With these highly consolatory words upon his lips, the governor turned round and passed out of the cell

The turnkey hastened to close the door.

As soon as it was shut, Tom sank back upon his seat.

"That is over. They are determined to kill me. They have resolved that I shall die. But something or other comes over my mind like a conviction that I am not yet at the end of my career. Claude and Jack are at liberty and doubtless doing all they can for us, and I will not lose hope until the very last moment, and even then I shall not quite lose it, for I shall remember how narrow an escape I had before."

Tom put his hands to his throat as he spoke.

He always felt an uncomfortable sensation there whenever he thought about his little adventure at Tyburn.

Tom King little dreamt what very energetic measures his two old companions in arms were taking, and how well calculated those measures were to insure success.

He was forced to content himself with the reflection that they were doing all they could for him, and that they would not let him perish if they could avoid it.

And so the remainder of the Sunday passed.

It was a dreary, wretched day for him.

From Tom King we will turn our attention to the hero of our story, Dick Turpin, who lately has not received so much notice as he ought to have done.

We may simply state that he still remained on the same good terms as heretofore with the officials of the prison.

His life was rather monotonous, and there were few incidents indeed to disturb it.

He passed the greater part of his time alone in his cell.

Few people are calculated mentally to endure a life of solitude, and most certainly Dick Turpin was not one of that number.

His was a convivial, jovial spirit, and he was never so happy as when surrounded with plenty of his fellow-creatures.

Such being the case, his solitary confinement preyed somewhat heavily upon his mind, nor could he prevent its doing so.

Then he had heard but little intelligence of a cheerful character.

The news that Tom King's clever disguise had been detected by the governor, and that his old comrade had been taken prisoner and lodged in one of the cells, very quickly reached his ears.

He felt much concerned with respect to his position, for he also heard that there would be no delay in issuing a fresh warrant for his execution, but that they would proceed by virtue of the old one, which they alleged was in full force.

Later still, in order to preclude all possibility of a hitch in the business, he heard that the old warrant had been freshly indorsed.

Dick could not forbear a shudder when he was made acquainted with all these preparations for hurrying his comrade into eternity.

His soul revolted at the indecent haste.

Too well he knew the cause of it.

Luckily Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were aware of their incarceration, and they might render efficient aid, but Dick was one who never placed much reliance upon any one's help but his own.

During the whole of Sunday he was to the full as anxious and restless as Tom King himself, and he counted every minute that would elapse until the time arrived for his companion to be taken to Tyburn.

At length night came.

That night which the authorities had fully determined should be the last that Tom King should pass on earth.

Whether they were doomed to disappointment or not we shall very quickly see.

As the different objects in his cell faded from his view, and darkness came stealing on, Dick Turpin sprang to his feet.

"This will never do," he said. "Surely the damps of this cell have struck a chill to my heart. But I will shake off the feeling. Surely I yet possess some portion of that energy for which I was once so famous. I will summon to my aid what I have got left. Tom King must not perish while I live. I will free him, or perish in the attempt."

It was something with his old manner of speaking that Dick Turpin pronounced these words, and when he had uttered them he felt a fresh accession of vigour fill his whole frame.

"I have been here long enough," he added. "The iron will eat so deeply into my soul if I stay here any longer, that I shall never be able to recover myself from the effects of it. I must escape. Yes, that is it. I will be free from these stone walls, and I will not place myself under an obligation to any living person for that favour. I will be free, and that by my own unaided exertions; and when once I stand in the corridor on the outside of this cell, I will wager my life that, ignorant as I now am upon the subject, I shall not be long before I find out in which cell my friend is confined. Then, when I have made that discovery, few minutes will elapse before he is freed from it, and then it will be hard indeed if we are not able to force a way out of Newgate after having accomplished this much."

CHAPTER CCCXLV.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN BEATING OUT OF THE NEWGATE CELL, AND HAS A STRANGE ADVENTURE IN THE PAVED YARD.

THERE was a wild excitement in Turpin's manner as he uttered the words with which the last chapter concluded, and, when he ceased, he drew himself proudly up to his full height, and seemed to breathe defiance to all the numerous dangers which environed him.

It required a man of no ordinary stamp to boldly look such peril in the face as he did.

There was no vapouring—no idle boasting. His words exactly expressed his meaning, and no more. There was no one to hear what he said—indeed, he was unconscious of having spoken aloud. He merely uttered his own inmost thoughts.

But what man, unaided by tools, or any other person, could hope to accomplish that which Dick had so daringly projected?

Not one, unless he had as powerful a motive to urge him on to make the utmost exertion as he had.

Not only was he striving for his own life and liberty—and it is well known what powerful incentives these are—but he was striving for the life and liberty of his friend, who, he felt certain, without his aid would most assuredly perish before the sun that was so soon to rise had crossed the meridian.

It was, however, easy enough to make such resolutions as Dick had; the difficulty was to carry them into practice.

Dick glanced around his cell as well as the obscurity which prevailed in it would permit him.

But his eye rested upon nothing that looked at all likely to aid him.

The movable objects were very few, and those that did exist were unwieldingly and unserviceable.

It was not, however, because he was in search of anything that Dick glanced round the cell.

It was merely to ascertain how far the night had advanced, and to judge as near as he could what time it was.

He had been the inmate of that gloomy cell for a sufficient length of time to be able to tell with tolerable accuracy, by the deepening shadows on the wall, how much of the night had gone.

"I must pause awhile," he muttered. "I shall do no good by beginning yet. The turnkey will make his last round in a few minutes, and then I shall be able to commence operations with the certainty of not being disturbed."

With these words Dick Turpin sat down upon the rude stone bench which served him for a bed.

Scarcely had he done so, than his quick ears caught the well-known sounds of the turnkey's footsteps in the corridor without.

He threw himself back upon the bench in an attitude of assumed indifference.

Slowly the numerous and ponderous fastenings of the cell door were withdrawn, and the heavy door grated back upon its hinges.

But it was only opened wide enough to allow the turnkey to project one hand and his head into the cell.

In this hand he carried a lantern, and he flashed the light of it about him, until at last its rays fell upon the form of the notorious highwayman.

Dick pretended to be aroused by the light falling on his face, and, rising to his feet, he said in a cheerful voice, as he was wont to do—

"Is that you, Parker?"

"Yes. Mr. Turpin; it's me."

"All right. You roused me out of a bit of a nap, I fancy. I suppose you have come to see that all is right for the night?"

"Yes."

"Take a look round, then; for I feel very sleepy to-night."

"Oh! I don't want to take no look round, Mr. Turpin. It's all right, I know. It's a mere matter of form—one of the new-fangled regulations that have lately been made in the prison."

"So I believe."

"Good night, Mr. Turpin."

"Good night, Parker. I hope I shall be able to get a few hours' rest."

"So do I, sir. It's a shame you are here. But I can't help it. Good night. Good night."

With these words on his lips, Parker, the jailer, who had not only a friendly feeling towards Turpin, but admiration and respect for him as well, closed the door and carefully refastened it.

Dick Turpin was once more alone.

No sooner did the door close than he sprang silently towards it, and listened with feverish impatience to the replacement of the fastenings.

Listened as no one else but a man similarly situated to himself could listen.

To him every creak had an interest and was full of importance.

Those bolts which the jailer so easily shot into their sockets would take him hours to remove, and it was also very necessary for him to know what fastenings he would have to contend with.

First there was the lock.

There could be no mistake about the sharp snap with which it shot into the box provided for it.

Then there were the two bolts at the top and bottom of the door.

He heard those slowly worked into their sockets.

And, lastly, the ponderous iron bar which the turnkey could scarcely lift—for its strength was considered in proportion to its weight—was placed in its staples and securely fixed.

Then the jailer retired.

From the inner side of that door who could hope to be successful in removing those fastenings which was only done with difficulty by the man outside.

But Dick was not disheartened by the prospect he had before him.

None of the obstacles were new ones.

They had existed from the first, and he was acquainted with them all.

Soberly and steadily he set about removing them.

In the first place he groped his way to an obscure corner of the cell, and picked up something small, which he had doubtless placed there for security.

Had there been a light in the cell, it could have been seen what that object was.

It was a knife.

Such a knife as is commonly used at table.

It had come into Dick's possession in a very simple manner.

In former chapters we have related at full length how he had his meals brought to him in the cell, how he paid for them himself, and how he invariably invited the two jailers to eat with him.

This had been done so frequently, that what little caution the men at first exercised was relaxed—whether purposely or not would be hard to say.

However, on the preceding day Dick saw an opportunity of secreting the knife, which he had used to eat his dinner with, and he could not resist the temptation of availing himself of the opportunity, for he thought the time would come when that knife would be of inestimable value to him.

We are inclined to think that the turnkeys were aware of his having abstracted it, but they said nothing.

At any rate, it is quite clear that the knife must have been missed by them.

But although it was a good deal to be possessed of a strong table knife, yet it seems but a poor and inefficient instrument wherewith to effect an escape from a cell in Newgate.

And yet that was the sole tool which Dick possessed, and he not only hoped to escape, but had determined at all hazards to do so.

We will observe his proceedings.

Having taken the knife in his hand and felt the strength of the blade by bending it, Dick crossed his cell again in the direction of the door.

By this time the interior of the cell was involved in darkness, and none could see where the door was situated; but Dick walked direct to it in the dark, so familiar had he become with the topography of his dreary cell.

As he well knew, the inner side of this door was covered with sheet iron, which was riveted on to the woodwork of which the door was composed in such a manner as to leave no part of the wood visible.

The lock was still further protected by another independent plate formed of such well-tempered steel that no drill could penetrate it.

Dick Turpin sunk down into a kind of sitting posture close to the bottom of the door, and began carefully feeling the iron plating with his fingers.

It was well secured in every part.

Undaunted, however, by this, he took the knife, and after many efforts, succeeded in introducing the blade between the iron plate and the door itself.

He considered this a great deal done, and he proceeded with greater confidence to execute the remainder of his task.

That was, to raise one corner of this sheet iron, and gradually lift it up until a sufficiently large portion of the woodwork was exposed to enable him to cut a hole through it.

But he soon found this to be utterly impracticable.

The knife was not strong enough to move the rivets.

A small strong crowbar would have been required to do it, and he possessed no such instrument.

He bent the blade of the knife until he was afraid to do so any longer, for fear it should break off close to the handle, and leave him weaponless.

He paused in his operations.

What should he do?

He was loth to relinquish this means of making his way out of his cell.

He was reluctant to confess to himself that he had failed at the very outset of his undertaking.

But such was the case.

He left the knife sticking where it was, and gave himself up to thought.

Mechanically he raised his eyes to the little grated aperture in the wall which did duty for a window, and which could be distinguished from the black wall of the cell by the faint light which appeared behind it.

The aperture was small, very small, and it was strongly defended with iron bars.

Still, as Dick looked up at it, and then thought of the iron-plated door and the massive stone walls, he thought surely it must be easiest to make a way through here.

Dick knew where that grating looked to.

It was into one of the paved yards of the prison.

He had ascertained that by placing the table under the window and a chair on the table.

By standing on the chair he was enabled to look through the bars.

But he had noticed how firmly they appeared to be fastened in their settings.

Still they did not now seem such impassable barriers between himself and freedom.

Abandoning all hope of being able to remove a small portion of the iron plating on the door, Dick withdrew his knife from the crevice in which he had taken so much trouble to introduce it, and placed it in his bosom.

Then he moved the table, and placed it just beneath the window, and then he put the chair on the top of that.

To ascend these was a matter of no difficulty.

In another moment Dick was looking out through the grating into the paved yard before him.

It was surrounded by high walls, and very little of its general appearance could be distinguished.

As it happened, however, that was a matter of very little importance, for Dick was familiar with the place.

While he looked through the grating, preparatory to taking any more decisive steps, he heard St. Paul's strike the hour of midnight.

The sound was taken up in a jingling fashion by the various churches in the vicinity.

At length the echoes of all died away, and then Dick was startled by hearing a footstep in the yard before him.

He drew back a little way from the bars, and looked down with eagerness and curiosity.

Who could it be?

The mystery was quickly solved.

The sound of the footstep grew louder and louder, and then Dick saw a faint light like a small star.

He comprehended all instantly.

It was one of the prison watchmen making his round.

Dick looked at him with increasing attention, and, by straining his vision to the utmost, managed to make out the outline of the man's form.

He strolled across the yard in a sleepy, negligent sort of way.

When that man was first set that duty he had performed it in a very different manner.

He had flashed his lantern about him, and looked into every corner, not leaving one unvisited.

But, after a time, he grew rather tired of this, for it never resulted in anything, and, as a matter of course, carelessness followed, until he had taken to strolling through the yard in the semi-somnolent state we have described, and not paying attention to anything.

But this is always the case.

Dick watched this man cross the yard and then disappear through a small door in the wall.

Dick now considered he should have the coast clear for a little while.

Taking the knife from his bosom, where he had placed it, Dick Turpin, with the greatest patience, began to pick away the mortar surrounding the stones in which the bottom bars of the grating were imbedded.

The operation was a tedious one, but not half so tedious as he expected to find it, for the mortar was either not of first-rate quality, or else the weather had had an undue effect upon it.

It was softened considerably, and Dick picked it out in large pieces.

For such a purpose as this the knife which he held in his hand was most admirably adapted, and before the various churches chimed the hour of half-past twelve, he had loosened the whole of the bottom row of stones.

He placed the knife once more in his bosom, and, taking hold of the stones with both hands, he exerted his utmost strength and drew them towards him.

At first the iron was obstinate, but the leverage power he had got was great.

The bars bent at the top.

Encouraged to no ordinary extent by the amount of success which had so far attended upon his efforts, Dick redoubled his exertions.

Another half-hour passed.

The clocks struck one.

At the expiration of that time he had so twisted, bent, and broken the iron bars that there was room enough for him to pass through the aperture.

With his heart beating high with hope, and his whole frame in a state of the greatest possible excitement, Dick Turpin prepared to make his descent into the yard.

This was no easy matter.

But while thus engaged his ears were assailed by a strange sound, the like of which he never remembered to have heard.

Instinctively and involuntarily he paused to listen.

The strange sound continued

It increased in force and intensity.

CHAPTER CCCXLVI.

RELATES DICK TURPIN'S ADVENTURES IN NEWGATE WHILE DISGUISED AS A WATCHMAN.

For a few moments, so absorbed was he in what he heard, Dick Turpin forgot where he was and the peculiar position he occupied.

All his thoughts and faculties were concentrated in the sense of hearing.

He was intent only to catch every sound.

For a very short time did he remain in ignorance from whence those sounds proceeded.

It was from the Old Bailey.

Dick Turpin knew this because in the afternoon a faint reflected beam of the setting sun used to make its way into his dungeon through the grating at which he now stood, and from this fact he knew that he must be facing the west.

And, if he was facing the west, he must of a necessity be facing the Old Bailey, for that street runs from north to south along the west front of the prison of Newgate.

It was from the street, then, that Dick Turpin felt confident that the sounds came.

And those sounds.

There was no mistaking their character or nature.

They were produced by the trampling of many hundreds of feet.

The murmur of many hundreds of voices, none of them speaking, perhaps, much louder than a whisper.

Evidently a large body of people was assembling in the Old Bailey.

But for what purpose?

In the present day, when malefactors are executed in front of the prison, such a question would be easily enough answered.

On a Sunday night, when a hanging is to take place on the ensuing Monday morning, it is no uncommon thing for a crowd to assemble.

But at the time when Dick Turpin lived, and for a very long time afterwards, prisoners were not executed in front of Newgate.

Such a thing had never been thought of, nor the device of a movable scaffold either.

In those days the executions took place for the most part at Tyburn.

The condemned men were pinioned, placed in an open cart, attended by a powerful escort, and drawn to Tyburn.

Now, it was at this last mentioned place that people might be expected to collect early and in large numbers.

To be sure there was always a crowd to see the procession start, but then its size was insignificant compared to the other.

Knowing all this, Dick Turpin was at a loss to think why the crowd had assembled there at such an early hour.

And such a large crowd, as from the sound he felt quite sure it must be.

Dick was compelled at last to give it up in despair.

He turned his attention to the business he had under hand.

Little did he imagine that the crowd he heard collecting had so intimate a connexion with him and his fortunes as it really had.

Little did he think that it was owing to the exertions of his true and well-tried friends, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, that the crowd had been drawn together.

Still less did he think that he was taking all the trouble he had been taking and was about to take for nothing; that he would have been released if he had been content to sit quietly in his cell and await the coming of his liberators.

Of all this he was in the most profound ignorance.

He considered the crowd had no connexion with him whatever, and therefore he bent all his energies to the task he had under hand.

It was by no means an easy matter, now that the bars were removed, to pass through the small aperture and descend into the yard outside, which was several feet lower than the floor of the cell.

After some trouble, however, Dick succeeded in thrusting his feet through, and then he gradually lowered himself to the ground.

In another moment he was standing on the stones in the yard.

He drew a long breath of relief, and fancied he was already free, though actually he was as far off freedom as ever, or so nearly so as not to make much difference.

Still he felt that he had achieved a great deal, and felt stimulated accordingly to do still more.

Dick glanced around him, and endeavoured to take in the general aspect of the place in which he stood.

He could only very dimly see about him.

Suddenly, however, he heard a faint rattling noise, for which he could not at first account, and then all at once he knew it was caused by some one rattling a key in a lock, as though attempting to unfasten it in too great a hurry.

The moment he made this discovery, Dick drew back into the shadow of a wall.

He had scarcely done so than a door close to his left hand was opened, and the same watchman as he had seen a little while back cross the yard, again made his appearance.

Dick watched him close the door through which he had just passed, and then an idea entered his mind which he lost not a moment in carrying out.

Watching his opportunity when the back of the watchman was turned towards him, Dick sprang forward and grasped him tightly by the throat.

So tightly did Dick grasp him that, though the watchman made a desperate effort to cry out, he failed to articulate a sound.

"Silence!" exclaimed Turpin, between his teeth; "silence, and your life will be spared. If you make the least sound you are a dead man."

The watchman appeared to collapse upon hearing these words.

He dropped his lantern, but fortunately it fell upon its bottom, and preserved an upright position, so that it was not broken.

With great dexterity and swiftness, Dick pulled off the watchman's hat and great coat and threw them on the ground.

This done, he pulled off his cravat, and, with the aid of this, tied his hands behind his back.

Dick now released his hold of the watchman's throat, and he took immediate advantage of that circumstance to utter a sepulchral sort of howl.

"Oh! you won't be quiet, won't you?" said Dick. "Then I must try if I can't make you. I haven't a gag at the present moment, but this will answer the purpose quite as well."

As he spoke, he made a snatch at the short stick, or bludgeon, which the watchman carried, and gave him a rather sharp crack on the head with it.

The man fell down in a moment in a state of insensibility.

"You would have it," said Dick; "and, now you have got it, I hope you like it."

With this philosophical remark, Turpin dropped the stick, and proceeded to attire himself in the watchman's great coat and hat.

When he had put on these articles of apparel, the change in his appearance was very great indeed.

A feeling of much greater security now came over Dick's mind, and his hopes of being able to achieve his design increased in a proportionate ratio.

He had certainly a much better chance of getting through the prison unnoticed.

But Dick did not stop with the appropriation of the coat, hat, stick, and lantern.

He went to the body of the prostrate watchman, and after searching nearly all his pockets, produced a bunch of keys.

They were the only things he thought it was worth while to take away with him.

Thus armed, Dick Turpin, with a bold and confident step, took his way across the yard.

He found the lantern a most useful and agreeable companion.

He flashed the light round him fearlessly enough, because he knew that if it was seen no suspicion would be excited.

Now Dick did not think it would be altogether prudent to go through the door by which the watchman had just entered the yard, so he looked about him for some other means of leaving it.

On the opposite side he found a door of similar appearance.

He held the light close to the keyhole, in order to judge of the size of key he should require, and then proceeded to select one which from its size he thought was likely to fit.

He was so lucky as to hit upon the right one the first time.

He had the door open in a moment, and he closed it rapidly after him, of course taking the precaution to lock it.

Looking round him, he found himself in a sort of corridor, or passage, at the extremity of which was a flight of stone steps.

Now he had entered this passage and closed the door, the noise made by the mob in the street became inaudible.

To, this, however, Dick attached very little importance indeed, being still under the impression that the assemblage had nothing to do with him whatever.

There were no doors opening from the passage in which Dick Turpin now found himself, and so he hastened along it with all possible speed.

Ascending the steps of which we have made mention, he found his further progress was barred by a door.

This was now no obstacle to him, and he opened it easily enough by means of the bunch of keys.

He then found himself in another paved yard.

This sort of thing was not what Dick wanted.

He wished to gain the interior of the prison, and not keep hovering about the outworks.

However, taking all things into consideration, he had not much to grumble about.

Again, however, there came to his ears, and this time with much greater distinctness than on the former occasion, the uproar produced by the mob in the street.

This might proceed from two causes.

Either he was much nearer to the Old Bailey, or else the noise had increased.

Dick was inclined to think the latter.

At this moment St. Paul's chimed the half hour past one.

Time was speeding on, and Dick felt that he had a great deal to accomplish.

Going close to the wall in this second paved yard, he walked completely round it.

He counted no less than five doors.

One of these unquestionably led into the street, and into the Old Bailey, too.

That door was the only barrier between him and liberty.

Indeed, it could scarcely be considered a barrier, for that word implies something which would have to be difficultly surmounted.

But there could be no possible difficulty for Dick to pass through this door, because the bunch of keys he held in his hand would most certainly have furnished him with the means of passing through it.

His life was in danger.

He had but to make one step and be free.

The temptation was a great one, and no one, without they stood in the same position as Dick Turpin, could say how great a one.

But if he availed himself of this means of escape, he must abandon his friend to his fate.

The idea of doing this never entered Dick's mind for a moment, and he turned away from the door without a feeling of regret.

Back into the jaws of danger he went with a steady tread.

From the door opening into the Old Bailey, he could command a tolerable view of the prison of Newgate.

He walked straight across the yard to a door which, from its situation, he imagined would lead him direct into the prison.

Oh! how he wished he had found Tom King, and that instead of standing there alone as he did, that his old comrade was with him; how easily then could they have effected their escape, and laughed to scorn all ideas of pursuit.

But such was not to be.

Just as Dick was about to introduce the key into the lock, he was startled by hearing a hoarse sort of cry from the mob outside.

What it portended he knew not.

It was followed by the rapid rush of many feet, apparently in one direction.

Then there came a tremendous battering noise.

Dick was surprised, but not for one moment did the faintest glimmer of the real truth dawn upon his mind.

But the reader, from the facts of which he has been put in possession, will be at no loss to understand what these sounds meant.

Passing through the door, which he closed and locked after him, Dick Turpin raised his lantern, and found himself in a kind of vestibule or lobby.

This place was dimly lighted, and at a glance our friend saw several doors opening from it.

Dick did not doubt now that he was on the right track, and that the doors he saw before him led into the corridors from which the cells opened.

No sooner, however, had he closed the door and advanced a pace or two, than a man rose from a seat upon which he had been sitting, and said—

"Hullo! Wilks, what the devil are you doing here? Your post is on the outside of the prison."

Here was a dilemma.

Dick had encountered one of the watchmen, in whose bosom at present it was tolerably certain there was no suspicion.

But how was Dick to act?

As soon as this man found out the mistake he had made, he would raise an immediate alarm.

If Dick retreated through the door again, suspicion would be roused.

If he advanced he would be detected.

Upon the spur of the moment, he adopted the only course that appeared to be open to him.

Assuming a very mysterious aspect, he beckoned to the watchman who had questioned him, and at the same time advanced in a cautious stealthy manner.

The deluded watchman quite fell into the snare thus laid for him.

He thought that something peculiar had come under his notice, and that he wished to impart it to him.

Full of expectation, and quite unsuspiciously, the watchman allowed Turpin to come close to him.

To his great surprise, however, the seeming Wilks raised the short thick stick he carried, and brought it down upon his head with such force and suddenness that he fell to the ground insensible, without having time to utter a sound.

"I could not help it," said Dick. "I could not stop at trifles, and that bit of a crack on the head won't do you any harm, I know."

As he uttered these words he heard a tremendous crash.

Then a bell began to toll most dismally.

It was the alarm-bell of Newgate!

CHAPTER CCCXLVII.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING HAVE A NARROW ESCAPE OF BEING BURNED TO DEATH IN NEWGATE.

LEAVING Dick Turpin in his very peculiar position, we will just turn our attention to the proceedings of his two friends, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, and relate what success they met with in their desperate enterprise, as well as explain the meaning of the sounds which had from time to time reached Dick Turpin's ears during his extraordinary perambulation of the prison.

The "family" had a ready means of communicating with each other, and in less than an hour from the time when Claude's proposal was agreed to, not a single member of the large fraternity was in ignorance of it.

It would not be going too far to say that there was not one unwilling heart amongst them.

Dick Turpin was an immense favourite with them, and they would gladly render him any service in their power, but, on the present occasion, they were perfectly mad for the hour of action to arrive.

To them it seemed like being free from the trammels of the law if the huge prison-house could be destroyed.

Long before the appointed hour small groups of men collected in the open space in the Old Bailey which faces the prison, and their numbers kept continually augmenting, so that in a very short time a large body of people had congregated together.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack had stipulated that the conduction of the whole affair should rest in their hands.

They were to be the commanding officers, so to speak, whose orders were to be promptly and unconditionally obeyed.

Their preparations were soon made.

Their directions were simple.

Just under a gateway that faced the prison, four horses were to stand in a state of perfect readiness for our friends.

A man was appointed to take charge of each of these horses.

It was in this way that our friends provided for their retreat.

Then the general instructions to the body of the people were—

First, to make a dash at the doors leading to the prison—to break them down—overcome all the resistance offered to them, and, proceeding to the cells, open the doors of every one, thus setting all who were prisoners at liberty.

Dick Turpin and Tom King were to be got out of the prison as quickly as possible, mounted on their steeds, and taken away from the spot by Claude and Jack, before pursuit could be commenced.

The mob were then to complete their work of demolishing the building.

These plans were well laid, and well calculated to achieve the end proposed.

The only thing was to get them carried out, and with so fierce and turbulent a body of men this would be no easy task.

However, Claude and Jack felt a great amount of confidence as to the result.

At length the whole of the "family" had assembled, or at all events quite enough of them for the purpose required.

Then the word of command was given.

There was not a man present who was not well armed with such weapons as were likely to be of the most service to them.

As soon as the word of command was given, then, the compact mass made a dash across the Old Bailey, and began battering at the different doors leading to the prison.

These men were armed with large, heavy axes.

The doors of Newgate were strong, but not strong enough to withstand such weapons as those.

Splinters of wood flew about in all directions.

The first door that was forced was that little one at the top of the flight of stone steps which lead into the vestibule.

The turnkeys in this place made no attempt to defend the door, but as soon as they became convinced of the hostile intentions of the mob, made all speed to the governor's apartments, locking all the doors they possibly could in their progress.

Then the other doors were smashed in.

The alarm in the prison of Newgate was now very great and general.

There was quite a rush to the alarm-bell, which was pulled by half a dozen hands.

The clangor was terrific.

The alarm-bell of Newgate was a huge affair, fixed in the roof of the prison.

It was intended to be used as a signal to give notice that a prisoner had escaped, or in the event of any extraordinary occurrence.

The dismal sounds echoed far and wide over the sleeping city.

The people living nearest to the prison were of course the first to take the alarm, and soon many anxious faces could be seen peering out of the windows, while others ascended to the house-tops.

As soon as the men got fairly inside the prison they lost all recollection of what had been said to them, and at once set to work.

They fired the building in a dozen places.

In fact, wherever they saw a chance of setting fire to it they did so.

There was a great deal of wood work about some parts of the building, and the fire, of course, made rapid progress.

Moreover, several of the men had carried in armsful of dry twigs, which they were anxious to get rid of, so they threw them down and set fire to them.

It would have been by far more prudent to have released the prisoners first.

In a dense mass however, which there was no resisting, they swept into the passages and burst down all the doors which opposed themselves to them in their onward progress.

[THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN MOUNT THEIR STEEDS BENEATH THE ARCHWAY.]

Foremost in the throng, and making almost superhuman exertions, were Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

To the full were they conscious of the many difficulties that stood in the way of their achieving their aim, and now that they were so much nearer to it they felt a proportionate amount of anxiety.

Indeed, as they then stood beneath the roof of Newgate, for the first time in their lives, they felt far from safe, although their position was so peculiar.

There was something in the very atmosphere of the place which oppressed them.

Brandishing the axes with which they had armed themselves, they dashed forward and furiously attacked every obstacle which opposed itself to their onward progress.

But, above all the din and racket which was made, could be heard the dismal tolling of the alarm-bell of Newgate.

Oh! how our friends wished they could only find the rope which was attached to it.

How quickly would they have severed it.

Unless the din was stopped, the whole of the city would be aroused, and then what a desperate situation would be theirs.

Claude and Jack were well aware of the amount of dependence which could be placed in the mob ostensibly under their control.

They knew how fickle and unstable they were, and how likely to give up the enterprise at the very moment when they might be successful.

Our readers may, therefore, imagine what a load of responsibility was at their hearts.

Already Claude and Jack found a portion of the instructions they had given had been disobeyed.

They could feel the hot breath of fire upon their cheeks.

It was impossible for them to say what sort of progress it would make, or what hold it had taken of the building.

It might spread with great rapidity, as fires sometimes and generally will.

It might seize upon the whole of the edifice in such a manner as to make it impossible for them to escape with their lives.

Very little good would, however, be done by thinking of this. Other and more important matters called for their attention.

They had only a vague and general idea of the position of the cells, and no definite idea whatever as to the locality of the ones in which their two comrades were confined.

Down went the doors as soon as they came to them, and whenever a flight of steps appeared, having a downward tendency, they descended them immediately.

At length the corridors from which the dungeon doors opened were reached.

The mob had now something to do.

With loud cries, they dashed at the cell doors.

But they were repulsed.

The iron doors were too strong for them.

Then they noticed what they might have seen before, if they had only taken the trouble to look, and that was, that not only were the doors themselves of the strongest possible material, but that they opened outwards, and that the pressure they applied only had the effect of shutting them closer.

Moreover, the fastenings were on the outer side, and it would only be a few minutes' easy work to remove them.

When once they had made this discovery, they set about removing the fastenings at once.

The creaking bolts were withdrawn.

The ponderous bars lifted from their staples, and flung on to the floor of the corridor.

There then remained nothing but the locks.

But these were such insignificant obstacles that they thought nothing of them.

They were either wrenched off, or else the boxes provided for the reception of the bolts were knocked to pieces.

Then the prisoners were released.

They immediately joined the throng of their liberators, and set about doing the same service for others.

In those cases where the prisoners were secured with chains they were violently and roughly freed from their fetters.

Some dozen or twenty cells were opened in this manner and their inmates set free, but as yet they had not succeeded in finding either Dick Turpin or Tom King.

Claude and Jack continually occupied themselves with shouting out the names of their missing comrades, but no reply was vouchsafed to them.

They got terribly anxious, for they feared Newgate would soon be too hot to hold them.

They were not only apprehensive of the fire, which was raging with great fury in many parts of the building, but they feared that the alarm would spread rapidly, and that a force might be opposed to them that might be death or madness to resist.

One after the other the whole of the doors in the corridor had been opened, but without the wished-for discovery having being made.

Retracing their steps, however, they proceeded to another corridor.

Claude and Jack were the first to enter it.

They ran down to its farthest extremity, calling out to their comrades in the loudest tones, but without meeting with the wished-for response.

Still more uneasy, and fearful that, after all, they should not accomplish the misson, they left the chief part of the mob to the task of liberating this fresh lot of prisoners while they sought in other directions.

They were followed by a great number of people.

Presently the loud cries of Claude Duval were responded to by a voice, which, though it sounded weak and faint, he immediately recognised.

He cried out in a joyful tone to his comrade, Jack, who hastened to his side.

Claude spoke again, and once more came the reply.

It was from a dungeon on his right hand that the response proceeded.

"Here is Tom," cried Claude, "and it is to be hoped Dick is not far off. Lend me your aid, my friend, and we will try if we cannot quickly release him."

Claude and Jack had taken care before they started upon their enterprise to stow away about their persons a multitude of articles, of which they might possibly want to make some use.

Jack produced a bunch of skeleton keys, and fitted one into the lock, while Claude withdrew the bolts and removed the iron bar.

By the time he had done this, Jack had found a key which would fit the lock.

He turned it round, and had the satisfaction of finding that it acted upon the wards at the first trial.

The door was swung open.

A glare of light was projected into the dungeon, and then, heavily ironed in the manner we have described, they saw their companion, Tom King.

Astonishment of the most unbounded character was expressed upon his face.

In the silence and solitude of his darkness he had heard the fearful uproar without, but he was quite at a loss to find a cause to which he could ascribe it.

He knew that something of an unusual character was going on, because he could hear, above all other sounds, the clanging din of the alarm-bell at Newgate.

After waiting in anxious suspense, the sounds of many footsteps in the corridor without came to his ears, and then he heard himself called upon by name.

At first, so overcome was he that, though he made a tremendous effort to speak, he found it was impossible.

His emotions overpowered him

He could scarcely credit his own ears.

Again and again, however, he heard his name repeated, and by the same friendly and well-known voice.

Then he managed to speak in a low tone at first, but the second time much louder.

In a cheerful voice he heard Claude Duval bid him to wait with patience for a moment, and then he should be free.

There could be no sort of doubt or mistake about the meaning of the words that were uttered, for they were immediately followed by the withdrawal of the fastenings of the door.

Surely, he thought, he must be dreaming.

How on earth could Claude and Jack be in Newgate? and how came it that they showed themselves so indifferent about being heard as they evidently did?

His brain was in a whirl.

Not for a single moment did the least glimmering of the real state of the case dawn upon his mind.

But whatever doubts he might have entertained with respect to the reality of what was taking place, they were dispelled entirely when the door of the cell was thrown open, and his two comrades appeared upon the threshold.

He sprang forward as far as the chain by which he was confined to the floor would allow him.

The greeting between them, although much hurried, was a warm one.

No time was to be spared for much speech or lengthy explanations.

Sixteen-String Jack produced another bunch of skeleton keys, of a much smaller make than the others, and concentrated all his energies upon the task of freeing Tom King from his fetters.

CHAPTER CCCXLVIII.

TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK, DETERMINE TO SAVE DICK TURPIN FROM THE BURNING PRISON, OR PERISH WITH HIM.

THIS was far from being an easy matter, for, out of compliment to the prisoner, the irons were secured in a very intricate manner.

But with the assistance of the various instruments with which he was provided, Jack soon rid Tom of these encumbrances, and right glad was our friend to find himself once more with his limbs at liberty.

"Follow us," cried Claude and Jack to him. "We cannot stay to give explanation now. Follow us! we have yet a great deal to do."

"Dick Turpin," cried Tom, whose first thought was for his old and well-tried friend. "Dick Turpin, where is he?"

"We have not found him yet."

"On—on, then!" cried King. "You were right when you said you had much to do. The most important part of your enterprise has yet to be achieved."

"Do you know where his cell is situated?"

"No; I have no better idea than yourselves."

"We have no resource, then, but to adopt the same plan as enabled us to discover you."

"And what was that?"

"To shout at every cell door, and listen for a reply."

"Newgate is a vast place, and that will take a long time."

"It will. More time than we can spare. Can you hear that roaring, crackling sound?"

"Yes. What is it?"

"Fire."

"Is the prison on fire?"

"Yes."

"Good heavens, we are lost."

"Nay, calm yourself."

"But I can feel the heat now of the flames upon my face, and the corridor, I see, is full of smoke. How are we to escape with our own lives, let alone rescue Dick Turpin?"

"I have no very serious misgivings respecting the fire—at all events just at present."

"Then you know something of it?"

"Yes. The arrangement was that you and Dick should be liberated, and then the prison set on fire, but they were so impatient that they could not wait until the proper moment, but fired the prison in a dozen places."

"Good heavens! You fill me with alarm. And see what a monstrous flame that was that swept past the ends of the corridor. I fear the fire is of a much more serious character than you imagine."

And this really was the case.

The old prison was in the interior fitted with wood, and these fittings the fire had caught.

Then the devastating element had spread to the roofs and ceilings until the whole of the building was fairly in flames.

The mob on the outside saw the tremendous progress the fire was making, and shouted out in alarm for the safety of those within, and desired them to come out while there was yet time.

The alarm thus uttered entered the battered-down doors of Newgate.

It spread from corridor to corridor.

It reached the ears of those within, and, as they heard it, they one and all made a simultaneous rush to the different exits.

It reached the ears of the terrified officials, who from the first had fled before the mob, intent only on placing the greatest possible distance between them.

They were now in the upper part of the building.

At length the note of alarm reached the ears of the three highwaymen in the corridor, and it almost maddened them.

Was it possible that, so far from rescuing Dick, they had doomed him to destruction—to a worse death than the law would have awarded him?

The reflection was poignant in the extreme.

With loud wild cries upon their lips, they dashed up and down the corridors.

Every cell had been broken open, but no trace of Dick could they see.

It was, they tried to think, just possible that he had been rescued by some other portion of the mob, and was by this time in safety on the outside waiting for them to make their appearance; but all that they knew of Dick's character and disposition gave the lie to this supposition.

The numbers of those around them rapidly decreased, until at length there remained only their three selves.

But, although abandoned by those who had sworn to aid them, they determined not to follow their example and abandon their comrade.

Yet, where could he be?

They had searched all the cells they could find.

In what other part were they to look?

Distracted, scorched, and half blinded by the smoke, they tore madly up and down the passages, and called upon Dick Turpin until their throats were hoarse, and they could shout no longer.

At length, convinced—and most reluctantly were they driven to the conviction—that he was nowhere in the cells in the corridors on a level with where they stood, they were driven to ascend to a higher level, where it was just possible he might be found.

But when they came to the staircase which led to the upper part of the prison—or, more strictly, that part which was on a level with the ground, for our friends were now beneath it—they were met with such a blinding, scorching sheet of flame that they were compelled to shrink back before it.

It was the horrible roaring sound it made which dismayed them as much as anything.

They waited a moment, in the hope that the violence of the flames would abate.

But they were disappointed.

It seemed, on the contrary, to be gaining fresh force.

There was but one course open to them.

It was a disagreeable one.

It was to make up their minds to be scorched by dashing swiftly through the blaze.

There was, however, no alternative in the matter, without they chose to remain where they were, and that they considered worse than death itself.

Mounting the steps as high as the raging flames would allow them with comfort, they prepared to make a sudden rush.

Up the few remaining stairs they bounded—how, they scarcely knew.

Through the wall of flame they dashed, and fell breathless and scorched in the corridor beyond.

Springing with all haste to their feet, they hurried along in the direction where the flames were less fierce, and where, in consequence, the heat was least.

The cries of many voices now came to their ears.

They were in advance of them, and in that direction they ran.

The sounds became plainer and plainer as they went on, and, in a few moments more, a gush of cool air met their faces most refreshingly.

Ten more steps brought them to an open door.

It led them into the Old Bailey.

The street they saw was one mass of people, all swaying to and fro in the greatest disorder.

Loud and fierce cries came from their lips.

Their faces were plainly revealed by the ruddy beams of light which came from the blazing building.

The houses which were visible had a crowd of faces at each window, while the roof-tops of others were covered.

There seemed to be something going on in the crowd of a character which excited them to the utmost fury.

They groaned—they hissed—they yelled—and swayed backwards and forwards like the waves of a monster sea.

There was no hope of ever gaining the slightest command over such a turbulent seething mass as that.

This was the reflection that simultaneously crossed the minds of the three highwaymen as they stood in the doorway watching the maniacal throng.

A tremendous roar now came from the throats of the nearest portion of the mob, and Claude and his companions strained their eyes in the endeavour to ascertain what was taking place.

The only thing which caught their eye was a bundle of something which was tossed here and there above the heads of the mob, as a cork might be tossed upon the surface of greatly agitated water.

Backwards and forwards the bundle went—first one way, and then another.

It bore an appearance of elasticity, for it seemed to bound up into the air every time it reached the mob.

But that was not caused in reality by any power possessed by the bundle itself.

It was caused by the people holding up their arms and catching it as it was about to fall.

Then hurling it up in the air as high as their strength permitted.

And all this was accompanied by the most discordant cries and yells and execrations that ever came from the throats of an excited mob.

Our friends were entirely at a loss to account for what they saw.

They could not make it out at all.

This spectacle was one which they were quite unprepared to see.

No words could be distinguished as coming from the lips of the excited throng, or these might have furnished some clue as to the meaning of the proceedings.

As they gazed thus for the space of a few minutes, and saw what we have described, as well as made the reflections which the scene called for, their attention became so absorbed, that they forgot all else.

Perceiving a man close before him to whom he was known, Claude Duval seized hold of him, and by main force dragged him inside the door where his associates stood.

The man made a desperate resistance at first, but upon seeing who it was that held him, he became suddenly still.

"Speak," said Claude Duval, "and tell me at once! What is the meaning of the strange scene going on before us?"

"Strange scene?"

"Yes. What bundle is that the people are throwing about, and what are they throwing it about for?"

"It ain't no bundle."

"What then? And why do they yell in that frightful manner?"

"You ask me two questions at once," said the man, "and I don't know which to reply to; but if you will be quiet a moment, I will tell you all I know."

"Say on, then."

"Among the prisoners who were released from the cells, was a man named Adrian Winberry, whose execution was fixed to take place to-morrow morning."

"Enough, I know him."

"It was through him that Dick Turpin was captured."

"It was."

"Well, then, the mob, when they found who it was they had let out of the cell, determined that he should not escape the fate he so richly merited, but die a more horrible death."

"What death?"

"They carried him out into the street, despite his furious struggles. They denounced him as the murderer of Mr. Winberry, and hurled him at the people's heads. He was caught as he descended, and tossed up again, and so he has been tossed about ever since, and so he will continue to be while there is a breath of life left in him."

"Oh! this is horrible!" exclaimed Claude Duval. "Bad the man may be, but surely he does not deserve so terrible a fate as this."

"You cannot help it. Besides, if you could induce the people to desist, it would be no good. He must be quite dead by this time."

With these words on his lips, which he spoke in the most unconcerned manner possible, the man turned, and would have mingled with the crowd again.

But his progress was arrested by Tom King, who clutched him tightly by the arm.

"You said just now, did you not, that you saw some prisoners liberated from their cells?"

"Yes, I did."

"Well, then, can you tell us whether one of the prisoners set free was Dick Turpin, in whose behalf this attack upon Newgate was principally made?"

"No, he was not. I have not seen him, and I am almost—nay, quite—certain that he is not at liberty."

"I feared as much," said Claude Duval. "Now, my friends, what are we to do?"

"Do? we can do but one thing. If Dick Turpin is not free, he must be somewhere within the building, where he will perish unless we find him."

"Forward, then," cried Tom King. "I, for one, will either save or perish with him, and I know both you will be of the same mind as myself. Follow me, and we will search the building from the roof to the foundation but what we will find him."

And, as he spoke these words, quite heedless of the peril of the course he was about to adopt, Tom King dashed back again into the burning building.

He did not turn his head to see whether he was followed by his companions.

That, he knew, would be quite useless.

He was certain they were close behind him.

"Back, then, into the blinding smoke and scorching flame they went, intent upon rescuing their gallant comrade from the fate which threatened him.

From chamber to chamber they went, up staircases and down, through long dreary corridors, all the while shouting for him at the top of their voices.

But Newgate is a large place, and, besides, neither of our friends were acquainted with its intricacies, and, therefore, they were not likely to be very successful in their search.

In the meantime the fire spread with the most alarming swiftness, and in a little time it became clear that the fire had seized upon the whole of the building.

Maddened by the want of success which had hitherto attended their efforts, the three friends rushed from room to room.

Still to no purpose.

And now the flames increased in force and heat, and more than once they were compelled to retreat before them.

But, gathering courage and fresh strength from each repulse, they persevered and fought their way onwards.

They had, they fancied, been all over the edifice, but they might have been mistaken, for the smoke was confusing, and the stone chambers and the vaulted corridors were bewilderingly alike.

No words of ours could possibly express the dread and anxiety which filled the hearts of the three highwaymen as they found all their efforts unresultful.

Every moment, too, that elapsed threatened them with fresh danger.

When they got outside the building they expected to have many difficulties to contend with.

The mob might be attacked by the military, for there had been time enough for the alarm to spread all over London.

Suddenly they came to a door which they did not remember having seen before.

It was unfastened, and they flung it open in a minute.

To their disappointment they found it led into the Old Bailey.

The people were still assembled in a dense mass.

Their countenances were still lighted up by the ruddy light.

Our friends were about to turn away again, when a cry burst from the lips of the mob, which had the effect of instantly arresting their attention.

CHAPTER CCCXLIX.

DICK TURPIN HAS SOME HAIR-BREADTH ESCAPES IN THE BURNING PRISON, AND GIVES MR. CAWTHORN ONE FOR LUCK.

Let us leave Claude Duval and his two comrades for a few moments—they have had lately a full share of attention—and let us relate the further extraordinary adventures of Dick Turpin in the prison of Newgate.

The reader will doubtless recollect that, when we last left him, it was under rather peculiar circumstances.

He was disguised in the exterior articles of apparel which had been worn by the watchman he had left insensible in the paved yard.

The long white coat, the felt hat, the short thick stick, the lantern, and the thick woollen comforter which was wound round his throat made a very efficient disguise indeed, and almost any one, casually glancing at him, would be deceived by it.

It had deceived the watchman in the vestibule, for he had addressed Dick by the name of Wilks, which probably was the name of the man who lay so quietly in the yard.

We have related how Dick succeeded in getting close to this watchman without exciting any suspicion in that individual's breast, and how he had suddenly taken advantage of his proximity to deal the watchman a blow with his stick on his head, which gave forth an ominous sort of crack.

The watchman dropped down on the floor of the vestibule as if he had been shot.

It was just as he had done this that Dick heard a tremendous crash.

What it was, or what it meant he had really no idea.

It was the mob, who had just succeeded in breaking down one of the outer doors of the prison.

Then Dick's ears were assailed by the clanging of a bell, which he recognised as being the alarm-bell of Newgate.

Something of an unusual character was now evidently taking place within the prison, and the idea that naturally first presented itself to his mind was that his escape from the cell had been discovered.

He drew in his breath, and clutched the stick firmly in his right hand.

It was the only serviceable weapon he had got.

He then looked around him, determined not to abandon his idea of rescuing his comrade.

He counted no less than seven doors opening from the vestibule.

It was only natural that he should hesitate a moment as to which he should take.

It was while in this state of indecision that he heard the trampling of feet, and then the door which happened to be facing him, was thrown violently open.

A crowd of persons rushed in.

By their attire Dick could tell they were Newgate officials every one of them.

They seemed to be in a state of the greatest panic and consternation.

Nearly all carried lights.

Some were only partially dressed, and among these was one who Dick Turpin recognised instantly.

It was Mr. Cawthorn, the governor of Newgate.

He presented quite a picturesque appearance.

But his countenance was expressive of the utmost alarm.

"What shall we do?" he cried; "what shall we do? We shall be murdered, every one of us, or burnt to death, or something. We can't get out, because of the mob, and the mob won't let any one come near us who would render us assistance. Hullo! what is this?"

He saw the body of the prostrate watchman.

"Here's Wilks," said some one. "What brings Wilks here? He ought to be on the outside of the prison."

"That is not Wilks," cried Mr. Cawthorn, as a ray of light from one of the numerous lanterns fell upon Dick's face. "That isn't Wilks, you idiot. Seize him!"

The men rushed forward in a body to execute this command, but they beat a precipitate retreat directly.

Dick saw his danger, and did the wisest thing he could.

That was to place his back against the wall of the vestibule.

He met the onslaught of his foes with a vigorous flourish of the short thick stick.

He brought it down upon their heads, or any other part of their bodies that came in his way, with right good will, and they fell back bruised and bleeding.

"Confusion!" cried Mr. Cawthorn, as he witnessed the defeat of his men. "Upon him again! That is Dick Turpin in disguise. Seize him! A hundred pounds will be divided among those who succeed in making him a captive!"

These words produced a wonderful effect upon those to whom they were addressed.

Mr. Cawthorn was a man who happened to be gifted with an extraordinary memory of faces.

He only needed to see a man once to tell him ever after.

Now with Dick's appearance he was, as the reader may suppose, owing to his long sojourn in the jail, tolerably familiar; and so he was with Wilks, the watchman.

He saw, then, at a glance that it was not Wilks, and another glance enabled him to identify the disguised man as Dick Turpin.

How he came to be there, or how he had succeeded in disguising himself in Wilks' apparel, he did not know.

Finding himself known, however, and certain that the cumbersome clothing he had put on would no longer be of any assistance to him, Dick Turpin pulled off the watchman's hat and comforter, and then divested himself of his coat.

He stood there then in his own proper character, and ready to do battle with his foes.

They numbered twenty to his one.

But the mode of action he adopted rather astonished them and took them aback.

Instead of waiting for the attack, which they were preparing to make, and which, doubtless, would have been a successful one so far as his capture was concerned, Dick uttered a loud yell, enough of itself to strike terror into the boldest heart; then, whirling the watchman's stick round his head, he dashed forward, and vigorously attacked his foes.

This was a manœuvre which they never for a moment expected, and they were in consequence for a moment too much surprised to do anything in the shape of warding off the attack.

It thus happened that during this movement Dick Turpin was able to do a great deal of execution.

His enemies seemed to fall before him like grass before the scythe.

Right and left they gave way before him.

Then Dick made a leap which carried him a good four feet towards the door through which Mr. Cawthorn had entered.

Mr. Cawthorn himself was standing close to it, and Dick thought this a capital opportunity of paying off old scores.

The governor of Newgate could tell perhaps by the expression of Turpin's face what he was about to do, and he darted aside.

But he was not quick enough to evade the blow which Dick aimed at him.

Crack! came the end of the watchman's stick on to the top of the governor's head, and then in an instant he measured his full length upon the floor.

Without stopping to see how far the blow had been effectual, Dick darted through the door close to which he was, and slammed it behind him.

Hastily turning round, he felt for the fastenings.

He found a couple of bolts.

It did not take him a second to shoot them into their sockets.

He was only just in time.

With a tremendous rush, the men dashed against the door, no doubt under the expectation that it would immediately give way, but they were deceived.

It remained as firm as a rock.

Dick turned round, and found himself in a low, arched passage, which seemed to extend in a straight line for a considerable distance.

There were no doors opening from it, so he was forced to run along it, no other course being open to him.

At the extremity of this passage there was a flight of steps, which led upwards, and the top of which he could not see.

This was not what Dick wanted.

He was quite low enough down in the prison to be where the cells were situated, and, if he went any higher, he would get out of the way of them altogether.

There was no choice left for him, though.

He must either ascend those steps, or go back to his foes.

The latter alternative was so out of the question as not to amount to any choice at all.

Up the stairs he went, then, taking two at a time, in order to get to the top as quickly as possible.

Upon reaching it, however, the unmistakable odour of fire came to his nostrils.

In the distance, too, he could see dense volumes of smoke.

By listening he could hear the roaring and crackling of the flames.

He then recollected what the governor had said about the prison being attacked by a mob and set on fire, and then the conviction came over him that all this was to be attributed to his friends, who were, doubtless, taking this means of rescuing him.

This was to him, under the circumstances in which he was placed, a very consoling thought.

Perhaps they had already succeeded in freeing Tom King from his cell.

But Dick did not like to trust to this supposition without having some better proof than he had at present.

On arriving at the top of the stairs, he found himself on a little square landing, from which only one door opened.

The steps commenced again in a corner, and still led upwards.

Disregarding them, Dick turned all his attention to the door.

It was fast, but, exerting all his strength, he burst it open.

No sooner had he done so, however, than such a mass of flame rushed forth, that he was compelled to either draw back or sacrifice his life.

What was on the other side of the door, or where it led, Dick was, of course, unable to form any idea.

Rapidly he retreated, for the flames, having found an outlet, rushed forth with great fury.

Dick was still compelled to ascend.

He ran to the corner where the stairs commenced, pursued by a long tongue of flame, which seemed intent upon reaching him.

But Dick gained the race, and was quickly out of the way of that danger.

There was one comfort. The fire would form a tolerably good barrier between himself and his foes, and they would not be able to pursue him with such readiness as they otherwise might.

Up the staircase, then, he sprang, determined to go no higher than he was obliged.

The staircase was a spiral one.

Coming, at length, to a kind of landing, he saw a door, which he pushed open.

There was a great deal of smoke beyond, but Dick did not hesitate to pass though the door, and close it after him.

He found himself in an apartment, which was comfortably furnished as a bed-chamber.

There were many little valuable article lying about, and the materials of which every object was composed were of excellent quality.

Indeed, although Dick Turpin only took a hasty glance around him, he was rather surprised to find such a looking place inside Newgate.

The thought did not at first strike him that he had made his way into that part of the prison occupied by the governor, but such was the fact.

This will account for his friends having searched so unsuccessfully for him among the cells.

Dick did not stop to make any examination of this room.

There was an uncomfortable feeling of heat in it, and the smoke was rapidly increasing in volume and density.

The thing which took Dick's attention was the door, and he hastily opened it.

He saw another room beyond.

Uttering an exclamation of impatience, Dick crossed it.

The fire was beginning to give him very great uneasiness.

He was fearful that Tom would perish in the burning mass.

It was some means of getting lower down that he wanted to find. He knew that while he remained where he was, or went up higher, he should only be wasting time.

A feeling of great satisfaction, then, came over his heart when, on crossing this room and passing through the door of it, he found himself upon a spacious staircase, which went both up and down.

He chose the latter direction, and went down at what might, with great propriety, be called a breakneck speed.

As he went down, however, he found the heat increase in an astonishing degree.

The smoke, too, became thick and blinding.

Plainly could he hear the roaring sound which flame produces—a sound which, once heard, can never be forgotten.

Still he kept on, determined, if possible, not to allow himself to be turned back.

He felt his face scorch, and his hair singe, while his clothing seemed ready to burst into flame at a dozen places.

Then he paused, and abandoned the idea of descending any further, for to look down was like looking into a furnace.

Under this impulse, Dick stepped back a few paces, and well was it for him he did so.

If he had remained any longer than he did upon the spot he had just occupied, he would have assuredly perished.

With a tremendous crash a large piece of the staircase, which, by the action of the fire, had been rendered unable to sustain its own weight, gave way, and fell into the blazing depths below

It had the effect for a moment of subduing the raging of the flames.

But they soon broke forth again with redoubled fury, as though from the restraint that had been put upon them.

Turpin shuddered when he thought of the narrow escape he had had.

It was certain that he would have to find some other means of descending than that

He looked around him.

He was standing on a landing from which several doors opened.

Selecting one of these at random, he found it give way before the pressure he applied to it.

Crossing the threshold, he entered another bed-chamber.

The floor beneath his feet felt burning hot.

Looking down, he could see between the crevices of the boarding long bright lines of light.

For the first time the idea crossed his mind that he was in a situation of extreme peril, and that he might have the greatest difficulty in saving his own life.

Convinced that he should do no good to his friend by perishing in the fire, he advanced towards the window, with the intention of making his way out of it before the fire in the room beneath made such a thing impossible.

CHAPTER CCCL.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN MAKING A PERILOUS EXIT FROM NEWGATE, AND IN JOINING HIS FRIENDS IN THE STREET BELOW, WHERE HE FINDS HIMSELF BESET WITH FRESH DIFFICULTIES.

No sooner did Dick Turpin make his appearance at the window, than he was greeted by a loud shout, which seemed to come from a hundred thousand throats.

It was not, however, a yell which greeted him, but a cry of satisfaction and pleasure.

There was no mistaking the character of it.

Looking down, Dick saw that the window at which he stood was a considerable distance from the ground, and that beneath him was the Old Bailey.

He knew the street instantly.

It was brilliantly illuminated by the flames which rose from the blazing building.

Opposite he could see the well-known and familiar shop kept by Coles, the pie-maker.

The Old Bailey was filled with people.

Never in all his life had Dick Turpin beheld such a vast assemblage.

Once afterwards he saw a vaster.

He could tell those beneath him were his friends, and he waved his hands repeatedly to them.

Each time that he did so they gave vent to a tremendous cheer, which made all the place echo again.

Dick Turpin looked down as he meditated making his descent.

There was a window immediately below the one at which he stood.

Through this the flames and smoke poured in volumes.

Through this, too, he would have to pass, before he could reach the ground.

While he stood for this short time in doubt, the fire broke through the flooring from the room below, while smoke surrounded it.

The people noticed it and gave a loud cry, which warned Dick of his danger.

There was clearly no resource for him but to leave Newgate, and that at once.

If he remained he would surely perish.

He must give up all hopes of rescuing his comrade, and console himself with the reflection that some one had been beforehand with him.

The reader will remember that at the close of a previous chapter we stated that Claude Duval, Sixteen-String Jack, and Tom King were about to turn back into the prison, and renew their search for Dick, when their footsteps were arrested by a cry which came from the throats of the people outside.

It was the cry which greeted Dick Turpin's appearance at the window.

Something of an extraordinary nature had happened they felt certain, and it was very necessary for them to know what it was.

They made their way therefore into the crowd.

The first thing they noticed was that the people all turned their faces in one direction.

They followed them, and then they saw the person for whom they had been so anxiously searching, standing at one of the front windows of the prison.

But he seemed to be literally surrounded by flame and smoke.

No sooner did they see this, than the three highway-men at once gave up the idea of making their way into the interior of the prison.

They pushed through the crowd so as to get as close to the windows as they could.

But they would never have got through the compact mass in the way they did, if it had not been for the circumstance of their being recognised.

They were known as being the intimate friends of Dick Turpin, whose position looked so perilous, and they would doubtless do all in their power to rescue him.

In holding this opinion the mob were perfectly correct.

A lane was opened just wide enough for the highwaymen to get through, and as soon as they passed it was closed up after them.

In a comparatively short space of time, then, they managed to get just beneath the window at which Turpin stood.

Then they shouted and waved their hats, in the endeavour to attract his attention.

In this they were also successful.

Down through the mass of smoke Dick looked, as the well-remembered tones struck upon his ears, and then a friendly gust of wind blew the smoke away, and he saw his old comrades making encouraging signs to him.

"Descend—descend!" they cried to him, at the top of their voices. "Descend! Get something and let yourself down as low as you can. We will be beneath and catch you."

Dick nodded, and then his comrades knew he comprehended what was said to him.

As he looked down through the smoke the first person Dick saw was Tom King.

He was quite overjoyed to see his old companion at liberty. So much so that, with a light heart, and unconcerned manner, he set about freeing himself from his perilous situation.

Tom was free.

The object for which he had risked so much was gained.

He had now nothing to do but to drop into the friendly arms that would be extended to catch him.

Turning round, then, Dick strove to look across the apartment, and see whether there was anything that looked likely to aid him in his descent.

But so filled was the chamber with a dense, blue, suffocating smoke, that he found to look across it was a matter of impossibility.

Then Dick recollected having noticed that the apartment was fitted up with great elegance and taste as a bed-chamber.

He remembered the exact position of the bed itself, and also that it was furnished with white hangings.

If he could reach this bed, then, and obtain possession of a couple of long curtains which hung at the head of it, he would be furnished with a rope that would go a long way towards aiding his descent to the street.

No sooner did this recollection occur to him than he abruptly left the window, and, in spite of the bewildering smoke, made his way towards the bed.

He heard the people give a shout as he disappeared from their view.

The floor cracked beneath Dick's footsteps.

It was all but burnt through, and he was fearful that, after all, it might give way, and precipitate him into the furnace that was raging underneath.

Moving, then, as quickly as possible, so as not to leave his weight in one place any longer than he could help, he made his way to the bed.

Dimly before him he could see the white hangings.

He clutched the one nearest to him, and gave it a sudden snatch; using so much force that the rings, or whatever the fastenings were at the top, gave way, and the curtain came down in his hands.

Leaning over the bed, he caught hold of the one which hung on the opposite side, and, by a similar snatch, brought that down also.

This done, he made his way back with all speed to the window.

His appearance was greeted with a vociferous cheer.

Quickly tying the two long curtains together, Dick proceeded to fasten one end to the window-sash.

He then found he had a rope of about twelve feet in length, and though this was by no means long enough to reach the ground, still, if he descended by it, it would materially break the force of his fall.

The more expeditious he was in his movements now, the better it would be; so, having assured himself that the knot was firmly tied, he proceeded without delay to lower himself through the window.

He projected his feet first, keeping hold of the curtains as he did so.

It was quite time he left the chamber.

Indeed, it is questionable whether he could have remained in it above another moment, for the flames now burst forth through the casement with the utmost fury.

Dick felt the hot blaze scorch his back.

Without losing his presence of mind for a single instant, however, Turpin steadily descended the rope.

With great anxiety his friends stood below in readiness to receive him.

Dick allowed the rope to slip through his fingers until the end was reached, and then he paused.

He was at least fifteen feet from the ground, and that seemed a long way to fall.

Part of the distance, too, was through a mass of flame, the ascending heat of which almost roasted him when he hung.

But through this, when he let go, he would pass with great rapidity, so the probability is that he would receive only slight injuries.

The immense crowd of human beings that filled the street were now intensely silent.

Not a sound came from any one of them.

Their interest was wholly concentrated upon the scene that was taking place before them.

The only sound that rose above the roaring of the flames and the tolling of the alarm bell, was the voices of Dick's friends encouraging him to let go.

Dick obeyed.

He relaxed his hold of the rope, and closing his eyes, allowed himself to fall.

There was a sudden sensation of heat.

A still more sudden shock.

Then he was safe and surrounded by friends.

A thousand hands were now outstretched to grasp his in a friendly pressure.

As well as they could, his three friends kept off the pressure of the mob.

They had now only one object to achieve, and that was to get away as quickly as they were able.

But this was destined to be a very difficult matter.

The crowd was quite solid, and it seemed as impossible to force a way through it as to force a way through the strong stone walls of Newgate.

Claude Duval had laid his plans well, but this was a little obstacle which he had not foreseen.

Under an archway, on the opposite side of the Old Bailey, and just facing the principal entrance to the prison, were four horses of first rate quality.

They were in the charge of men upon whom the utmost reliance could be placed.

This archway, then, under which the horses were kept waiting—saddled, bridled, and ready for instant service—led into a kind of inn-yard.

On the left-hand side of this yard there was another gateway, similar in all respects to the other.

But this led from the yard into Fleet-lane—a very narrow and disreputable thoroughfare, which is now partially in existence.

From this description the reader will be easily able to obtain an insight into Claude's plan.

He calculated that they would be able to reach the archway and mount the horses there.

Then, when they had done this, the cattle were to be walked down the yard, and out of the other archway into Fleet-lane.

This thoroughfare would be sure to be deserted.

For the convenience of those who may not be acquainted with the locality, we may as well state that Fleet-lane is a narrow street which runs at right angles out of the Old Bailey, and connects that thoroughfare with Farringdon-street.

But, at the time of which we are writing, Farringdon-street was not in existence. The space now known by that name was then designated Fleet-market.

It was down this Fleet-lane, then, that Claude thought they would be able to make their way without having to encounter any obstacles.

And, doubtless, his calculations would have proved to be quite correct.

But there was the difficulty of getting to the archway.

It was in vain they strove to force a way through the mob.

Every individual of whom it was composed seemed intent upon grasping Dick Turpin by the hand.

It might be very satisfactory to know that one possessed so many friends, but just then their demonstrations of amity were rather undesirable.

Suddenly, however, there was a loud cry, and signs were given that something of an unusual character was going on upon the outskirts of the mob.

This caused a favourable diversion.

And here let us take an opportunity to pause a moment.

We have been altogether led away from describing the effects of the actions, and have simply described the actions themselves.

In the first place, then, there was the prison of Newgate.

From having been set on fire in so many places, the flames had spread with great swiftness over the whole edifice.

A great portion of it, being built of stone as it was, would, doubtless, for a long time withstand the action of the fire, but there was fuel within which would burn for a long time.

Indeed, it soon became evident that nothing but the shell of the building would be left.

The alarm-bell had ceased to toll.

The inmates of the prison, we mean the official inmates of it, finding the desperate aspect which affairs presented, had made their way to the roofs, and from these had succeeded in gaining the roofs of the adjoining habitations.

In these days, when there are so many means of quenching a fire, and so much promptitude in making use of them, some effectual step would long since have been taken; but the case was entirely different a hundred and fifty years ago.

The alarm, of course, spread—it could not fail to do so.

Indeed, the intelligence had been diffused nearly all over London.

Numbers of police-officers arrived, but they were in such a decided minority, when compared with the crowd that filled the space in front of the prison, that they were powerless to do anything but remain passive spectators of the scene.

They could make no impression on such a superior force.

And so the mob had things all its own way.

They remained wedged tightly together, and refused to budge an inch.

While they did this, the officers could do nothing but watch the progress of the flames.

The utmost consternation and excitement prevailed in the immediate vicinity of the prison.

All the people who dwelt there were in the greatest possible fright.

Having stated these facts, the reader will be at no loss to understand how it was the mob was allowed to pursue its course unmolestedly, and how it was that the highwaymen remained in the prison so long as they did.

The cry, however, of which we have just spoken, showed that something peculiar was taking place.

The crowd began to lose its stability.

The reason was simply this.

The police, finding how utterly useless they were, had despatched some of their number to the nearest barracks, in order to call in the aid of the military to quell the disturbance.

This was done, and the cry announced the arrival of a large troop of mounted dragoons, who were all well armed.

The mob shrank back a little at the sight of such formidable antagonists as these looked to be, and the soldiers, perceiving this slight advantage, hastened to follow it up.

The mob still began to give way, though very slowly.

Still they did give way, and were only prevented from giving way still further by their inability to do so.

From mouth to mouth the intelligence passed that they were attacked by a regiment of dragoons, and at last the tidings reached the ears of the four highwaymen, whose chances of reaching their horses under the archway now seemed to be very much diminished.

CHAPTER CCCLI.

DICK TURPIN, TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MOUNT THEIR HORSES UNDER THE GATEWAY, AND ARE PURSUED BY THE POLICE.

From what has just been said, it will be seen that the aspect of affairs was rather peculiar.

The four highwaymen were now menaced by a danger they had never counted upon.

It was danger from those who had been so friendly to them.

A kind of panic seemed to seize upon the mob when they found they were opposed to a military force, of which they had a very reasonable and natural dread.

Besides, they considered they had accomplished all that they had set out with the intention of doing.

Newgate was nothing but a mass of blazing ruins.

Dick Turpin and Tom King were at liberty.

The other prisoners had been released.

Vengeance had been wreaked upon Adrian Winberry.

What occasion, then, was there to oppose themselves to the dragoons, and be finally dispersed after receiving many wounds, when they might as well quietly disperse, and escape the consequences of what had been done?

Looking at things from this point of view, the conduct of the mob was nothing but rational and consistent.

Quietly, then, they began to disperse along the different streets.

In this movement, however, the highwaymen did not wish to participate.

They wanted to get to the opposite side of the way, but it was like thinking of crossing a torrent.

To remain where they were would be but to court destruction.

In what way were they to act?

Dick suggested that they should mingle in the stream, taking care not to lose sight of each other, and, while going in the same direction as the mob, to endeavour to cross it in a diagonal manner.

This was a course that would have answered very well with a real current of water, and might answer with this current of people.

At any rate, as this was the only feasible plan that could be thought of, it was adopted.

The regiment of dragoons had approached the Old Bailey from the Ludgate-hill end, and, of course, the people drifted towards Newgate-street and Snow-hill.

In this direction our friends went.

They found it easy enough to follow the tide, but not very easy to carry into effect the second part of Dick's suggestion.

Slowly, however, but surely, they increased the distance which intervened between them and the stone walls of Newgate, until, at length, they had got fairly into the middle of the road.

To be brief, they succeeded, after awhile, in crossing the street, and standing in safety, all four together, on the opposite pavement.

It was nearly at the top of the street, however—close to the corner of Skinner-street, in fact—and they had now to work their way back to the archway.

This was at least a hundred and fifty yards distant from where they stood.

They would have to force their way, too, in a direction contrary to that which was taken by the mob.

This they were able to do by going in single file, and keeping very close to the houses.

When the pressure was greater than usual, they were able to withstand it by clinging to such projections as they met with.

In this way they forced a passage, and got on much more quickly than any one would have thought.

To their great satisfaction, however, Dick Turpin and Tom King at length heard Claude and Jack say——

"All right—here we are at last. Turn down under the arch."

Another moment and all four of the highwaymen stood beneath the gateway of which we have spoken.

The red reflection of the fire illuminated this place, and they were easily able to see the horses and the men who were there in charge of them.

[THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN SALUTING DICK TURPIN AS CAPTAIN.]

A great load was now removed from the breasts of our friends, and they thought themselves completely out of danger, but in this they were slightly in error, as succeeding events will quickly show.

A word had been agreed upon, the pronunciation of which should be a signal to the man who held the horses that the right persons had called for them.

With all speed possible they mounted their steeds.

By the time they had fairly seated themselves in the saddle, and were in readiness to move, the first part of the soldiers had reached the end of the archway, and were fighting desperately with the mob.

More than this the four highwaymen did not wait to see.

Giving their horses the impulse forward, they made their way into the yard to which the gateway led, and from thence to the other gate, which, as we have already said, would enable them to gain Fleet-lane.

As Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack had arranged between themselves what was to be done, Dick Turpin and Tom King held back and allowed them to take the lead.

The gates were closed, but the man who had been left in charge of the horses ran on in advance and opened them.

There was now nothing to obstruct them.

Passing under the archway they emerged into the narrow lane.

No sooner had they done so, than they heard a voice, which came from the direction of the Old Bailey, say in loud tones—

"There they are—there they are! Hurrah! Forward, my lads! We shall have them, and a good night's work it will be for us! There is two thousand five hundred pounds to be divided between us if we can succeed in capturing them! Forward—forward!"

Instinctively the four highwaymen looked in the direction from which this sound proceeded, and there they saw what seemed to be a very large body of mounted police-officers.

They were in strong enough numbers to completely block up the thoroughfare.

Of course our friends did not wait to do more than fling one hasty glance at their adversaries.

Having done this, they turned their horses' heads in the direction of Fleet-market, and, just grazing their flanks with their spurs, darted off at full speed.

The officers raised a loud shout, and set off after them at the best speed their horses were capable of making.

The rate at which the four highwaymen tore down Fleet-lane was rather alarming.

Several people were in the street, but they hastened to ensconce themselves in the doorways that were nearest to them.

With a rush the highwaymen turned the corner into Fleet-market.

This place was crowded with stalls, barrows, baskets, and such litter as may now be seen around Covent Garden-market early in the morning.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were still in advance, and, without saying a word, they turned to the right, taking their course up Fleet-market towards Snow-hill.

At the period of which we are writing, and long afterwards, a kind of open sewer, called the Fleet Ditch, flowed through this place.

The Stygian stream was spanned by a rude wooden bridge.

Over this the highwaymen clattered at unabated speed, but the officers, who valued their necks a little more, slackened speed slightly as they crossed it.

Up Snow-hill—across Smithfield—our friends went with the police-officers at their heels.

Shots were fired every now and then, but they were harmless.

It is a difficult matter to take aim at anything on horseback while going at full speed.

Continually the officers shouted out to the highwaymen to surrender.

But, as a matter of course, they paid not the slightest attention to them.

The officers were mounted upon horses of excellent quality, and were almost equal to those our friends bestrode.

Such a race as this was, then, could not fail to be full of interest.

As they looked back, and saw how close the troop of officers kept behind them, the four highwaymen became uneasy.

The issue of the race seemed doubtful.

It was in vain they applied, with all possible vigour, both whip and spur to their animals. They were going at the utmost speed, and could not exceed it.

The officers goaded their horses cruelly.

A little horseflesh did not matter much to them; the reward was all they looked for.

Claude led the way towards Islington, then a little village some distance from the metropolis, and not, as it is now, a portion of the huge wilderness of bricks and mortar.

They were in the open country.

London was already far behind, and on both sides of them was nothing but meadows, bordered by tall hedge-rows.

They now reached the foot of a long, steep hill.

The horses showed the most unequivocal signs of exhaustion, and it was pretty certain that, if they were galloped up the hill, they would not be good for much by the time they reached the top.

However, they spurred them onwards, and got half-way up the hill.

Then Dick Turpin, seeing how matters stood, and that it would be something like madness to keep up such a race, cried out "Halt!" at the top of his voice, and, at the same moment, brought his own horse to a stand-still.

His friends were somewhat surprised, and wondered what could be the matter.

But, for all that, they obeyed his command, and came to a full stop.

Dick Turpin turned round and faced the officers.

His comrades did the same.

The officers, who were about twenty in number, were about a quarter of the way up the hill.

Upon seeing their prey stop and turn round in the manner we have described, they were filled with astonishment, and, under the impulse of that feeling, reined in their horses also.

A curious spectacle now presented itself.

The pursuers and the pursued sat regarding each other in silence.

They were just out of the range of pistol-shot.

While the officers continued for a short space of time in this condition of astonishment and indecision, Dick Turpin spoke rapidly to his comrades, thus anticipating the questions which he knew would be asked him.

"It is no good keeping on like this," he said. "We don't stand the ghost of a chance of getting away from them. They will keep on our track like bloodhounds, and follow us everywhere. We had no start, and it is impossible to gain one."

"But what are we to do? We cannot engage with a force so much our superior in point of numbers."

"I have thought of a plan. You see the state of indecision they are in. Already they know not what to think of our sudden movement. From our advantageous position let us charge down upon them. Rely upon it, they will give way before us like chaff before the wind."

This was a bold and daring proposition, and just such a one as we could conceive Dick Turpin to make.

His comrades were surprised at it for a moment, but they soon saw its advantage, and determined that Dick's plan of operations should be followed.

They felt sure the officers would be completely taken by surprise.

Moreover, owing to their advantageous position, they would be able to sweep down upon their foes with a velocity which there would be hardly any resisting.

In the meantime, however, the officers appeared to have recovered from the panic into which they had been thrown, for one of their number, who probably was the one in command, rode forward a few paces with a pistol in his hand.

"It's no go," he cried, at the top of his voice. "You had better give in handsomely, for we mean to have you anyhow. You can't escape, so surrender at once, and I will give you my word you shall not be subjected to any ill-treatment. Come, now, that's a fair offer, seeing as how you're as good as captured already."

"We are of a different opinion," cried Dick, "and we will try to bring you to think the same as we do. Forward, my friends! Down upon them! Hurrah!"

The loud hurrah which Turpin gave was well echoed by his companions, and then, plunging their spurs deep into their horses' flanks, they set off at a fearful gallop down the hill.

The officers saw this movement on the part of the highwaymen with the utmost surprise and consternation.

They made an irresolute sort of stand for a moment, and then, finding how the highwaymen came thundering on, they one and all, as if animated by the same impulse, turned round, and galloped down the hill.

They fully bore out what Dick had said; namely, that they would scatter like chaff before the wind.

The holsters of all the saddles were furnished with pistols, so the highwaymen took the reins between their teeth, and grasped a pistol in each hand.

These they fired, and it was wonderful to see what an impetus the discharge gave to the movements of the officers.

Their speed was much increased.

It was by no means part of Dick's intention to pursue the officers back to London.

As soon as they could after reaching the bottom of the hill, they reined in their horses, and then turned round.

Back up the hill they went, urging their horses to make all the speed they could, because a little distance then in the shape of a start would make a great difference to them.

It would almost seem as though the report of the pistols had had the effect of exciting or frightening their horses, for they tore along at a rapid rate, and seemed oblivious of their fatigue.

Upon reaching the top of the hill, however, our friends paused, and allowed them a short breathing time; but while they did so, they took care to keep a sharp look-out down the hill, so as to be aware when their foes made their appearance.

It was here, then, that the four friends had the first opportunity of exchanging a few words with each other.

The greeting between them was of the warmest and most cordial description.

There was not, however, much time for the interchange of courtesies.

Important matters pressed upon them, requiring speedy consideration.

In the first place, Dick wanted to know the arrangements which had been made by Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

Upon inquiring, however, he found that these arrangements had not extended any further than bringing them to the spot where they now stood.

The expedience of getting to some place of cover was now very palpable.

The officers were not in sight, though, doubtless, not many minutes would elapse before they made their appearance.

Now was the chance of getting shelter somewhere, and such a chance might not occur again.

It would be too much to expect that the same manœuvre would answer a second time, though so successful on the first occasion.

All four, therefore, set their wits to work to hit upon some scheme which would enable them to outwit the officers.

"There is one plan," said Turpin, speaking very slowly, "which I have put into operation a great many times, and never without succeeding; and why should not the same plan answer now?"

"What is it?" asked his comrades eagerly.

"It is to get into the meadows unperceived, and lie down behind the hedge, thus allowing the officers to pass by."

"A good suggestion," cried Claude Duval, "and a thought has just struck me which will, I fancy, enable us to put this ruse successfully into execution."

CHAPTER CCCLII.

BY ACTING UPON CLAUDE DUVAL'S SUGGESTION THE HIGHWAYMEN SUCCEED IN DOUBLING UPON THE POLICE-OFFICERS.

"THAT is good news, Claude," cried Dick Turpin; "let us hear what you have to propose."

"Oh! it is very simple, but it is not less likely to be successful on that account."

"Cerainly not."

"Let us break through the hedge, or get through in some manner that will not leave any trace of where we have gone, and then, instead of lying down behind the hedge, let us creep gently down the hill again."

"I understand you."

"Stop a moment. By dismounting and holding the horses by the bridles we shall be able to lead them down under cover of the hedgerow. There will then be less danger of our being seen."

"But how about the officers?"

"When we hear them approaching we must remain profoundly still. There will be or ought to be nothing to cause them to stop, but will continue their course up the hill, under the impression that we are descending it on the other side."

"A capital plan."

"I am glad you think so, but I have not told you all yet."

"What else is there?"

"If you decide upon acting as I recommend, dismount, for there is no time to lose, and I will tell you in the meanwhile."

"Agreed."

The four highwaymen having resolved upon the adoption of the course proposed by Claude, dismounted from their horses, and proceeded without further delay to look for some gap or opening in the hedge through which they could make their way without leaving anything to show which direction they had taken.

Claude continued.

"As soon as the officers have passed us—as I have no doubt they will—and as soon as we feel sure they have got far enough to be out of ear-shot, we will continue our progress down the hill until we reach its base. We shall then be able to take one of the numerous cross-roads that will be spread before us."

"Better and better, Claude. Really, that is a capital expedient, and I have no doubt in my own mind that the officers will be completely deceived by it."

"You must make haste," said Sixteen-String Jack. "If you do not, you will be too late, for I can hear the hoof-beats of the officers' horses."

The sound to which Jack had alluded came quite plainly to the ears of his comrades, and it acted as an incentive to them to make all the speed they were able.

As is very often the case in England, the road was bounded on both sides by a bank several feet in height, and on the top of this a hedge was planted so thickly as to be impervious to anything.

Our friends went on in the hope of finding a gap through which they could scramble, but nothing of the kind presented itself to their view.

The hedge was in too good a state of preservation.

At length, however, and just as they were beginning to despair, they came to a gate.

But it was locked.

Such a thing as that was not likely to interfere much with the progress of the highwaymen.

Sixteen-String Jack had it unfastened in a moment.

He held the gate open and allowed them to pass through.

Then, closing it, he restored it to its original position.

The trampling of horses' hoofs could still be heard, though the sound was so faint that any less practised ears than theirs would have failed to detect it.

The officers were, however, at a considerable distance, and some time must elapse before they could reach the top of the hill.

There was consequently an opportunity for our friends to make good speed.

There was no fear of their being heard, for the meadow was covered to a depth of several inches with long grass.

Upon this the horses' feet raised no sound.

The summit of the hill was soon reached, and then the descent was commenced.

Presently they could hear the officers were very close at hand, so they slackened their pace to a walk, and finally became still altogether.

They had no fear of being seen from the road; the bank, and the hedgerow above it, effectually secured them from all possibility of detection.

There was only one thing that was in the least difficult.

That was to keep the horses perfectly still, so that no sudden movement should betray their presence to their enemies.

By patting the creatures, and otherwise caressing them, they were in hopes of doing this.

The officers came on at a gallop.

They were talking very loudly to each other, but the highwaymen could not detect the words they used.

They swept past in a moment.

Our friends drew a long breath, but did not venture to move for several minutes.

At length, when they considered all danger was past, they continued their course down the hill.

The bottom was reached in perfect safety.

Breaking through the hedge, they emerged into the high-road.

The officers were now before them.

The pursuers and the pursued had changed positions.

But they did not care about continuing this.

Mounting their steeds, they kept on along the road, looking carefully about them for a cross-road.

They had not far to go before they found one, and they plunged down it without hesitation.

It was a matter of the most perfect indifference to them where it led.

As there was no pressing need for speed, they judged it unadvisable to distress their cattle unnecessarily.

At a gentle trot, then, they took their way along the umbrageous lane.

From time to time they stopped and listened, but they could hear nothing of their pursuers, and they now began to indulge in the hope that they had baffled them altogether.

With this feeling of partial security in their minds, the four friends talked over the various occurrences of the past.

They had much to speak about, but there is no necessity for us to do more than allude to it, because the occurrences of the past have been chronicled at length.

Over and over again did they congratulate each other on having made such a fortunate escape.

They now saw in the sky indications of the coming day.

A faint gray tint was overspreading the sky, and the sun was about to rise upon that day which so many people confidently anticipated would be the last that Tom King would pass upon earth.

It was his second narrow escape.

He had need be careful of the third time.

He was, however, light-hearted enough now, and laughed and chatted gaily with his comrades.

The danger was past, and no longer thought of or heeded.

That they were all greatly fatigued after what they had gone through, our readers can easily believe; and, now that the day was advancing, they looked rather anxiously about them, in order to find some place of shelter.

It might be, however, that they would have to travel a considerable distance before they came to a house, for they had got quite far enough from London for houses to be things of very rare occurrence.

A substantial meal and an hour's rest at some roadside inn would be a good thing both for their horses and themselves.

In the desire to reach an inn as quickly as possible, they put spurs to their steeds and increased their speed.

Presently the end of the cross-country road was reached, and here, as they had more than half expected, they found a public-house.

The junction of a cross-road with the main highway was the place generally chosen for their erection.

Although the hour was such an early one, the inmates of the public-house were all astir.

The sounds of their horses' feet brought the landlady and the ostler to the door.

It was Dick Turpin who inquired whether they could take the horses into bait for an hour or two, and find them with a meal.

He was answered in the affirmative.

Accordingly they dismounted, and, having seen their steeds disposed of in the stable and properly attended to, they returned to the house.

Upon entering the huge, comfortable kitchen they found that a substantial repast had been laid for them, and they sat down to it with hearty good will.

Their exertions and the keen morning air had made them as hungry as hunters.

They washed their food down with copious draughts of some of the finest October ale they had ever tasted.

They remained at the inn nearly two hours, at the end of which time the day had fairly began.

However, they had their horses saddled and brought to the front of the inn; then, mounting them, they turned their heads in the direction of the country.

When they left the inn they had to ascend a hill—being, in fact, another portion of the one they had ascended a short time before.

Upon reaching the top the four highwaymen paused to look about them.

The scene that was spread before them was truly magnificent.

The day was an unusually clear one, and the ground, being rather flat, they were able to see round them in a circle that was very many miles in diameter.

Not a word had been said about pausing at the top of the hill, nor was the reason for doing so mentioned, but all did so, and all, shading the extraneous rays of light from their eyes with their hands, took a long and earnest look around them.

But it was not at the splendid scene which lay before them that they looked.

On the present occasion the beauties of Nature had no charms for them.

They were looking for traces of their foes.

But, though they looked long and carefully, they were unable to see anything of their pursuers.

It was too much to hope that they had given up the chase.

Still, as we have said, there were no signs of them to be seen, although our friends had such a good post from which to take an observation.

It was Dick Turpin who first turned round and broke the silence which had fallen upon the little party.

"I cannot see anything of our foes," he said, "but we must not allow that circumstance to lull us into a state of false security. If we do, we shall assuredly be taken by surprise, and perish."

"You are right enough there, Dick," muttered his comrades.

"We must keep ourselves constantly on the alert, and betake ourselves to some place of safety. It is not possible that the occurrences of last night will be allowed to pass over without notice. The authorities had fully determined upon making an end of us, and they will be enraged accordingly, when they find we have escaped. Then that web is a serious business; and then to conclude, there is the burning of Newgate. All these events, my friends, will have the effect of directing the attention of the whole of the country to us, which will materially increase the danger that has always environed us. This is very serious, and demands our attention; and, to come to the point I wished to reach, what have you made up your minds to do in the future?"

"That entirely depends upon yourself, Dick," said Claude Duval; "we are quite ready to place ourselves under your direction, and be guided by you. I am, however, of rather a different opinion to yourself with respect to the consequences of last night's actions."

"How so?"

"You take too serious a view of it. That we shall be the focus of a great deal of attention in consequence of what has been done, I do not attempt to deny, but that we shall be in any more danger than we have been all along, I beg leave to dispute."

"On what grounds?"

"The simplest in the world."

"I am curious to hear them."

"Then I will tell you. For a long time past the authorities have done their best to capture and destroy us. They have made every effort—strained every nerve. But they have failed. Is this true, or is it not?"

"It is quite true."

"Very well, then. If the authorities have been trying to do their best, you will very much oblige me by telling me how they can do any more."

There was a general laugh at this.

"I think it is quite clear," said Dick Turpin, "that it will take too serious a view of the matter, you take too trivial a one. You are certainly open to that accusation. At any rate, it is necessary we should be exceedingly cautious and careful."

"Oh! certainly—certainly. Public attention will be fixed upon us for the space of nine days perhaps, and during that time the burning of Newgate will form a general topic of conversation, but after that you may rely upon it things will resume their wonted course."

"There is a good deal of sense in your remarks, Claude," said Dick Turpin; "and now that we have got so far, and now that we appear to have a favourable opportunity, I do not think we can do a better thing than walk our horses gently along the road, and talk over our future plans and prospects."

"We ought to do so."

"We have already broken the ice, so let us continue. There are no police-officers in sight, so we will go down the hill gently and talk."

"Agreed."

"If you like, I will tell you what my opinions are."

"Do so—do so."

"There will be such an outcry made about what has taken place, that even were they not inclined to do so, as they are, the public voice would compel them to put into execution some very energetic means of effecting our capture."

"I should not wonder."

"Nor I."

"Still, that is not much to dread," persisted Claude.

"We shall see."

"Very true."

"But, just suppose for a moment that the authorities should talk it into their heads to organize a very strong force, whose especial duty it should be to search the country for us, what, in your opinion, would be the best means we could adopt in order to secure our safety?"

"That is a question more easily asked than answered."

"So I am aware."

"Still, it is not unanswerable."

"You have something to propose, then?"

"I have."

CHAPTER CCCLIII.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN REACH ENFIELD CHASE IN SAFETY, AND DICK TURPIN IS MADE CAPTAIN OF THE BAND.

DICK TURPIN, Tom King, and Sixteen-String Jack looked, with an expression of great interest visible in their features, at the face of Claude Duval when he uttered the words with which the preceding chapter concluded.

Claude had showed himself rather more inclined to take the lead than usual.

"Let us hear your answer," cried his comrades; "and, if your scheme is a good one, we will adopt it."

"You are very kind."

"Come, the answer."

"In the event, then, of the occurrence of such a circumstance as you have mentioned, I should advise, in order to ensure our mutual safety, that we should plunge into some thinly-populated part of the country—where there is a forest, for example—and that we should there secrete ourselves until such time as we should find it safe to emerge. In the intricacies of a forest we could easily set all the efforts of our enemies at defiance."

"Excellent—excellent," exclaimed Claude's three companions, who immediately caught at the idea he wished to convey to them. "Most excellent."

"I am glad the bare outline of my scheme, for it is nothing more, is so well appreciated by you."

"The idea is most excellent," cried Dick Turpin. "The more I think of it, the better it pleases me, and the more confident I feel that it will enable us to elude our foes."

"Of course it will; but you must bear in mind that a great part of safety will rely upon our whereabouts being kept a secret."

"Certainly."

"Well, then, since you are so pleased, what do you say to putting my plan into force at once? I don't know when we shall have a better chance than we have at present. It is beyond a doubt that there are none of our enemies in sight, and we have left no track by which we can be followed from the hill where we doubled upon them."

"Do you know of any place that would answer our purpose, or that corresponds with the description you have given?"

"It is a long time since I was in that part of the country, but I can recollect that, years back, there used to be an extensive forest near the village of Enfield. It was not exactly a forest either, because it was called Enfield Chase."

"I have heard of the place you name," said Dick Turpin, "though I have not been there to my knowledge. Do you think, then, that this Enfield Chase, if it remains in the condition it was in when you saw it last, would be likely to answer our purpose?"

"I do."

"Why so?"

"It is in a very quiet, out-of-the-way place, and is but little known. I think you three were all but ignorant of its existence."

"So we were."

"It is, however, a vast place. A hundred men might conceal themselves in it. Then, as for provisions, we should never want, for the Chase abounds with some of the finest deer that can be found in England."

"Bravo! excellent!" exclaimed Dick. "I see, we are going to lead a Robin-Hood sort of life in the greenwood."

"Just so; and we shall be four merry men, I promise you. If we can but gain this place unperceived, I am sure we cannot do better than remain there for a week, by which time the occurrences of last night will be best part forgotten, and, from our not having been seen during that period, people will come to the conclusion that we have left the country."

"I like Claude's plan vastly," said Sixteen-String Jack. "As you said a little while ago, Dick, the more I think of it, the better I like it. I question whether any place could be thought of offering us more chances of concealment and fewer of discovery."

"I am perfectly agreeable to it," said Tom King "While admitting the force and efficiency of all your arguments, it would be very agreeable as a change from the cells of Newgate, which are by no means to my liking."

"Then it seems," said Dick, "we are quite unanimous upon this point."

"Quite."

"Very good; then we will make our way to Enfield Chase at once—that is, if Claude Duval will direct the way."

"I dare say I shall be able to do that when I have considered our bearings a little. Let me see. Yes; if we keep along this road until we come to the next turning on the right, and go down that until we emerge into the high-road again, we shall only have to follow that to reach the place I have named."

"Very good, then. Let us increase our speed a little, because, having made up our minds where we are going, the sooner we reach our destination the better. You, Claude, lead the way."

In this light-hearted manner the four highwaymen made their way towards the place which they had agreed upon for a resting-place.

No one to have seen them laughing and chatting gaily, as though such a thing as care was utterly unknown to them, would have guessed the part they played on the preceding night.

It was the joy of their reunion which went a good way towards banishing those gloomy feelings which they might individually have felt.

Dick had been separated from his companions for a long time—ages it seemed to them—and they were rejoiced to once more see him in their midst.

We need not trouble the reader with the details of their journey to Enfield Chase.

This magnificent forest, though now no longer in existence, was, at the time of which we are writing, in full glory.

Its size was somewhere about equal to that of Epping forest at the present day.

It was thickly grown with trees of all description, and stocked with deer, which fully deserved the eulogy that Claude Duval passed upon them.

Other kinds of game were to be found there in abundance.

Scarcely a tree now stands to mark the spot where this royal chase once stood.

It was disforested in the year 1779, and since that time it has rapidly dwindled away until it has become merely a thing of the past, and ere long it will be forgotten that there was ever such a place in existence.

It was a capital suggestion of Claude Duval's, that they should make this extensive chase their hiding and abiding place, and his comrades acted very wisely in falling in with it.

Indeed, it may be questioned whether, if they had perplexed their brains for months, they could have hit upon any plan so likely to set at nought any exertions their enemies might make to effect their capture.

If they reached the chase, and fairly plunged into its tangled recesses without being seen to do so, they were what might be called safe.

Nothing but some extraordinary accident could discover them.

The chase itself, admirably adapted for concealment as it was, had many other special recommendations.

It was situated in a part of the country that was but thinly inhabited, and in a place which really deserved the appellation of out of the way.

It was about three hours before noon when the four highwaymen arrived at the outskirts of Enfield Chase.

All the way they had been careful to keep a very sharp look out, and from time to time had ascended trees and eminences in order to assure themselves that they were not followed.

Upon no occasion had they seen the least signs of a human being.

Indeed, the only living creatures which had fallen under their vision were the cattle in the pastures.

Even these were few in number.

With hearts full of hope, then, our four friends guided their horses beneath the wide-spreading branches of the stately trees, and fairly entered the chase.

Each step they took filled them with delight.

Having been cooped up between walls so long as they had, our friends felt all the keener enjoyment of what they saw.

But the scenery around them was of such a beautiful sylvan character, that no one could withold their admiration, no matter how dead they might be to the appreciation of the beautiful.

It was autumn, and the trees presented that variegated appearance which they always do at that season of the year.

The bare branches were not yet exposed, though decaying leaves lay in large quantities upon the ground.

The morning was one of unusual fineness for the season. It was like summer.

The birds carolled sweetly in the trees, and in the air there was that delicious hum which is often heard in the country, and which proceeds from thousands of insects.

With the exception of this hum, and the faint rustling of the boughs of the trees, there was not a sound to break the profound silence.

As they proceeded, however, taking their course in a direct line into the centre of the chase, the murmuring of a waterfall came upon their ears.

The faint, rushing, gurgling noise of the water, as it bubbled over some obstruction, sounded pleasantly on the ear.

The mimic stream was not, however, discernible.

It was hidden by the dense undergrowth with which the chase was covered.

The ground had a downward tendency, and presently our friends found themselves in a kind of dell, or dingle, which was of more than magic beauty.

Its sides were clothed with trees of every imaginable shape and hue, while down one side the little brook they had heard, came pouring in a kind of mimic cascade.

The water was sparkling and bright, and with the sun shining upon it with full power, it looked doubly so.

It fell into a kind of natural basin which it had hollowed out of the soft rock

From this there arose a cloud of spray.

Never in their lives had the highwaymen seen a scene of such enchanting loveliness, and so much delighted were they with it, that they resolved to halt there and go no further.

Accordingly they dismounted, and tethered their horses to the trees in such a manner that they could crop the short, sweet herbage which grew there in abundance, covering the ground as with an emerald carpet.

Our friends sat down close to the little waterfall, and quenched their thirst with its pure fluid.

All were charmed with the spot, and declared they could make it a permanent residence if it was necessary.

Birds of various kinds flew about in every direction, and from their tameness, it was pretty certain that they had remained for a long time unmolested.

The highwaymen were furnished with arms and ammunition, so, as they sat, they amused themselves by firing.

They soon brought down enough birds to last them for the day.

The reports of the pistols sounded with great loudness in that silent spot, but they considered they had penetrated far enough into the forest for it to be safe.

A short search among the neighbouring bushes soon supplied them with an ample store of fuel in the shape of dry twigs and grass.

These they made into a heap, and set fire to by means of the flints attached to the locks of their pistols and a little gunpowder.

In rather a primitive fashion the birds were dressed, and hung before the fire to roast.

But hungry men are easily satisfied, and our friends were content because they could have nothing better.

They were as happy and contented as it was possible for any four human beings to be.

That Dick Turpin really did for a time make a home in Enfield Chase is a matter of history.

Such was actually the case.

An anecdote the writer once heard, and which now comes to his recollection, will bear out the truth of it.

It was from the lips of a personal friend—a gentleman well known to the reading public by his powerful writings—that the author heard the anecdote.

He stated that, when a young man—now about fifty years since—he was on a visit to Enfield, and, during his stay, spent a great deal of time in rambling about the chase, the beauties of which filled him with admiration.

In these excursions he was generally accompanied by an old gray-headed man, who held the post of steward over the estates belonging to the gentleman with whom he was staying.

This gray-headed man, from the fact of his always from a boy having resided within a short distance of the chase, was intimately acquainted with all its intricacies, so he was admirably qualified for a guide to lead the way to those places which were worthy of notice.

On one of these occasions the steward paused opposite to a tree, and pointed out to his companion a large iron hook, which was very cleverly concealed under one of the lower branches.

This hook was rusty, and over-grown with moss.

It was driven firmly into the trunk of the tree.

On being asked his reason for pointing out this hook, the old steward replied—

"I never fail to show that hook to anyone who accompanies me to the chase. It is full of interest to me, and so it will presently be to you."

"In years long back, many and many a fat buck taken from the king's deer has been hung upon it."

"But by whom?"

"By my uncle."

"Your uncle?"

"Yes."

"Then he was a deer-stealer."

The steward nodded.

"And a good many other things besides."

"But it seems strange that you should point out to a stranger the crimes of one of your relations."

"It does seem so; but do you know who my uncle was?"

"No."

"Did you ever hear of the famous highwayman, Dick Turpin?"

"A thousand times; but surely you are not his nephew?"

"I am," replied the steward. "Dick Turpin, the highwayman, was no other than my uncle. I believe I am the only descendant of the family that now remains alive, and, as you see, I am an old man and not likely to live many years longer."

"But you have children?"

"No."

"Then you are the last of your race."

"I am. My name is George Turpin. Now look at that hook. Dick Turpin has hung many a king's deer upon it, and it has been pointed out to you by the only relative of the highwayman in existence."

CHAPTER CCCLIV.

DICK TURPIN BIDS FAREWELL TO HIS COMRADES, AND SETS OUT UPON HIS PERILOUS EXPEDITION.

SUCH is the substance of the anecdote related to the author when the first number of this romance was published. It is interesting from its personality, and about its authenticity there can be no doubt, for upon making enquiries in the neighbourhood, the gentleman alluded to found that what the old steward had told him was quite correct.

Like most other persons, this gentleman felt a deep interest in any little personal particulars connected with the bold highwayman, and he had frequent conversations with the steward upon the subject.

In this way he became possessed of many little details that would have remained unknown, but of which the writer, as the narrative proceeds, will be enabled to avail himself.

He found the steward, who was a trustworthy, confidential servant, was the only son of Dick Turpin's only brother.

"It was through my father," said the old man, "on one occasion, that my uncle Dick got into trouble."

"Indeed," asked the gentleman; "and how was that?"

"In a very strange manner. Dick Turpin, after his famous ride to York, was apprehended on suspicion, and lodged in York Castle, which, as I dare say you know, serves the purpose of a prison."

"I have heard as much."

"Well, when he was apprehended the officers did not know who he was, and Dick accordingly gave them a false name. The crime of which he was accused was a highway robbery, which I firmly believe he never committed."

"Do I understand you to say that your uncle was apprehended on a charge of highway robbery, and lodged in York Castle without the authorities knowing who he really was?"

"Just so. That is the case. Well, my uncle thought he should be easily enough able to prove an alibi, and thus escape; so he bribed one of the jailers in the prison to bring him pens, ink, and paper. This done, he sat down and wrote a letter to my father—that is, to his brother."

"I quite understand you."

"Well, in this letter he was very explicit. He told him how he had been apprehended on a false charge, and how he should be easily able to escape if my father would only come forward and say where he was at the time when the crime was alleged to have been committed. In this letter he also told my father that he had not given his real name, but a false one, and cautioned him not on any account to let his real name be known, for if he did, it would be all over with him."

"And did your father refuse to come forward?"

"I will tell you, sir. Having written the letter, the substance of which I have made you acquainted with, my uncle carefully sealed it up, and then, watching his opportunity, got the jailer he had bribed to carry the letter to the post. It was addressed to my father at Thaxted, in Essex, where he dwelt, and the postage amounted to one-and-tenpence. Dick gave the jailer a crown piece, and expressly desired him to pre-pay the letter, and added that he might keep the change.

"Well, sir, you would have thought the jailer would have executed this little commission all right, but he did not.

"He took the letter to the post-office, and dropped the letter into the box without paying the postage at all, thus keeping the crown piece to himself."

"And what was the result?"

"Why, very serious indeed to my uncle, as you shall hear. In due time the letter reached Thaxted, and when it arrived my father found there was three-and-eightpence to pay. Now, only the week before some friends of his had played him a trick by sending a blank sheet of paper through the post in the form of a letter, and causing him to pay two-and-fourpence for it. Of course he was vexed, for no man likes to be made a fool of.

"Now, when this second letter arrived, the first thing he thought of was how he had been duped before, so he looked at the postmark, and found it York.

"He knew very well he had no one in that part of the country to whom he was related, or who would be likely to write to him; so, convinced this was only another trick, and that he should be laughed at again, he resolutely refused to take the letter.

"In the end it was carried away and forwarded to London, where it was opened, in order to see by whom the letter was sent, and so as to be able to return it to him. Well, of course, when the letter was opened at the post-office, London, the whole secret was out. The police were communicated with, and Dick was detected."

This, and much more, did the old steward communicate, and the writer will be able to embody these facts in the narrative when the proper time for doing so arrives.

For the present, however, we must confine ourselves to a relation of the occurrences which immediately took place.

In accordance with the suggestion of Claude Duval, they remained for the space of one week without daring either individually or collectively to stir from their hiding-place.

They had rather a rough time of it, for, though the days were fine, the nights were cold, and they could find nothing better than the trees to shelter them.

But they were unmolested, and this compensated for a great many of the inconveniences they were compelled to endure.

Their time was pretty fully occupied in telling over each other's adventures.

At length, on the evening of the seventh day after their arrival in the chase, and just as it was beginning to grow dusk, Dick Turpin called his comrades around him.

"We have been here a week now," he said; "and what Claude said has proved quite right, for I don't believe there is another place in England where we could remain so long undisturbed."

"Nor I."

"But, my gallant comrades, it is quite time we ascertained what was going on in the world. We are complete strangers to the transactions of the past few days, and who knows how important it may be to us to learn the transactions of the last week."

"I have been thinking about that," said Tom King. "In fact, I may say, we have all been thinking about it, and, if you had not spoken just when you did, I should have made a request which I will warrant now is forestalled."

"My friends, I dare say you feel as anxious as I do to know what has happened. I am exceedingly anxious, and would fain gain some particulars."

"I know what you mean," said Claude Duval. "You want us to go to London, and we will do it."

"You are not quite right, Claude, this time. I want to learn what has taken place, but I do not want you with me."

"Oh!"

"I will tell you why not. It appears to me that, if they are making search after us, they will look to find us all four together. For this reason, I think if I go alone, I shall not run so much risk of detection."

"I partly agree with you," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but not altogether."

"Where is the difference?"

"Why, it will be better for one to go than four; but, then, I don't think you are the most suitable one."

"Why not?"

"Because you are the best known of all four of us, and the most likely to be recognised. Now, with me the case would be different."

"I know all you are going to say, Jack," interrupted Turpin, "so you can spare your breath. You want to convince us that you are the person best qualified to go. In fact, you all want to go."

"That's about it," said Tom King.

"But need I say how injudicious such a course would be? Only one must go. And there is another thing I wish to remind you of."

"What is it?"

"When you have asked me about my mare, Black Bess, I have invariably told you she was in perfect security, and I firmly believe that such is the case. But we must not doom ourselves to a life of perpetual inaction here. Such a life would never do for me. 'Hurrah for the road!' is my motto."

"And mine—and mine!" said his comrades.

"I know it. And now let me ask you a question. What would Dick Turpin have been without his bonny Black Bess? Why, nothing—absolutely nothing. The fame all belongs to her; and, if we are to go on the road again, as I hope we shall for many and many a bright night, how could I hope to achieve anything without her?"

The three highwaymen waited to hear what further he had to say.

"I could not hope to achieve anything. Now, I alone know where she is, and this is the proposition I wish to make to you. Will you three remain here for the remainder of to-night, and allow me to set out upon my two-fold errand; namely, to fetch Black Bess, and to ascertain what has taken place in London during our absence from it?"

"It is very necessary that we should obtain the information, and also that you should regain possession of your mare, but that does not make the slightest difference to what I said."

"How so?"

"It will be better, and less hazardous, for me to go to London than yourself; and then, as for not knowing where Black Bess is to be found, you can tell me that, and then there will be an end of that difficulty."

"Not quite," said Dick, with a smile, "though I see you are bent upon going if you can. The persons in whose charge Black Bess is left will deliver her to no one but myself, and so it will be useless for you to try."

"You mean you are bent upon going, Dick. However we shan't say you nay. Indeed, I will tell you what we have made up our minds to do."

"What?"

"What we made up our minds to a very long time ago, but which we have never been able to carry out, from the interposition of adverse circumstances."

Dick smiled.

He guessed what was coming.

Sixteen-String Jack continued:

"We have resolved," he said, "to make you our captain, to place ourselves entirely under your control—to elect you, in fact, our leader. We have already done so, in fact, and now the time has come for the arrangement to be carried out."

"You will force this honour upon me," said Dick, "though, if you will believe me, I would much rather be without the responsibility. Still I am well aware of the advantages which must always accrue from a leader—upon having some one whose word shall decide what is to be done in the moment of danger."

"That is just it. And you consent?"

"How can I refuse?"

"Three cheers, comrades."

The highwaymen gave three lusty cheers, which made the old chase ring again, and then Dick said:

"I warn you I shall take advantage of the authority you have vested in me to do just what I was proposing a little while ago."

"I expected that."

"We must give way," said the others.

"I trust you will," said Dick. "For my own safety's sake you may depend I shall be very careful. I will make what inquiries I can, and then, without further delay, I shall make my way to Winberry Hall, for it is there I left Black Bess."

"And I hope you will find her all right again, Dick."

"I hope so too. Not that I have any doubts."

"You have got the whole of the night before you, so you ought to be able to conduct your enterprise comfortably."

"Yes, the night is young yet, but do not in consequence of that expect me too soon. I may be detained, but something will be wrong if I am not back by daybreak."

"We shall be anxiously expecting you, captain."

"Above all things, do not be tempted to roam from this spot, no matter how great may be the inducement. The consequence of your so doing might be serious, and I should be deeply vexed if so capital a place of concealment as this has proved to be is discovered."

"It would be a thousand pities,"

"It would indeed, and therefore I hope you will be guided by what I say. And now I will prepare to start; there could not be a more favourable time."

In this Dick was perfectly correct.

Evening was just deepening into night, and a vague kind of obscurity prevailed everywhere, which had the effect of confusing all objects.

Dick selected the best horse of the four, and rapidly put on his saddle and bridle.

That done, he mounted.

He felt something more like himself than he had done for a long time past.

He looked carefully to his weapons, and took care to be well supplied with ammunition.

Then, fully armed and accoutred for the rather perilous undertaking he was about to perform, Dick Turpin, followed on foot by his three faithful comrades, took his way at a walking pace towards the borders of the chase.

Just visible above the tree-tops was the rising moon, and this enabled Dick to direct his course with tolerable certainty.

He wished to proceed due west, so all he had to do was to keep his back to the moon.

But little was said on their way to the borders of the chase.

All four, however, were busily occupied with their thoughts.

At length, when the increasing thinness of the vegetation, and distance from tree to tree, warned them that they would soon emerge into the open country, the little party paused.

It was Dick Turpin who halted first.

The probability is, that if he had not taken the initiative in the matter, his companions would have continued walking by his side for some distance further yet.

"Farewell," he said, raising his cap as he spoke. "We had better part here. You may expect to see me here to-morrow by daylight, accompanied by Black Bess."

"Farewell, captain," said the three highwaymen, taking off their hats, and bowing profoundly to Dick. "Farewell, captain. A safe journey to you."

Waving his hat, Dick reiterated his injunctions for them not to attempt to leave the place until he returned. Then, striking his spurs into his horse's flanks, he rode rapidly away.

CHAPTER CCCLV.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD GOULDMAN ARE PURSUED BY THE POLICE.

THE strange adventures which befel Claude Duval, Tom King, and Sixteen-String Jack in Enfield Chase after parting with their captain, must be deferred to another chapter.

So much interest is attached to the expedition ... which Dick was about to set out that we are perforce compelled to follow him, and narrate what adventures he met with upon the road.

The reader will doubtless not be at a loss to find the true reason for Dick being so very anxious to fetch Black Bess himself.

It was not that his comrade could not find Winberry Hall, or that Black Bess would not be delivered to him when he did find it, and applied for her.

No, neither of these was the reason.

The fact was, that Dick could not banish the recollection of the beautiful Maud Gouldman from his mind.

To be sure, he did not try to banish all thoughts of her quite so hard as he might have done.

Dick loved her.

For the first time in his life he felt the influence of that power of which some dullards have attempted to deny the existence.

Ever since the first time he had seen her he loved her, and all subsequent events had only tended to increase the violence of his passion.

It was for her dear sake that he had perilled his life and liberty in the way he had, and very nearly forfeited both.

But now he was free he felt an insatiable desire to see her, and he rejoiced to think he had so good an excuse ready at his hand as that which fetching Black Bess afforded him.

With his mind filled with pleasant thoughts Dick took his way along the broad high-road.

His blood coursed through his veins.

As the poet says—

"His bosom's lord sat lightly on his throne."

Higher and higher climbed the moon, and as she rose in the pure blue vault her light became brighter, and fell with a wondrous and beautiful effulgence upon the various objects in the landscape.

But her brightest rays seemed to glitter and fall upon the person of the highwayman and upon his steed.

Very handsome and very picturesque he looked in the romantic light.

His body was erect and his head high.

A pleasant smile was on his lips.

From time to time he spoke kind and encouraging words to his steed.

Only a little time would have to elapse, he told himself, and then he should bestride his bonny mare Black Bess.

That would be a delight of no common order.

So eager was he to reach Winberry Hall, that he departed from the agreement he had made with his comrades.

This was, that he should first proceed to London and learn the state of affairs, and then go for Black Bess.

But, now that he was upon the road, Dick determined upon leaving London until the last as being less important.

After proceeding for some distance across the country

[BLACK BESS RECOGNISES HER MASTER.]

from east to west, he stood up in the stirrups and looked about him.

He seemed to recognise his locality, for he nodded his head complacently, and continued on his way.

Dick met with many vehicles and travellers in the course of his journey, but he drew aside and avoided all of them.

Without the occurrence, then, of any important or interesting incident he arived in front of Winberry-Hall.

He recognised it in a moment.

As it stood before him, the occasion when he had first looked upon the structure rushed vividly across his mind.

The whole place now seemed to him to wear an air of desolation.

There were no lights visible at any of the numerous windows, though the hour was too early a one for the inmates of the hall to have retired to rest.

For some moments Dick sat unmovable upon his steed looking at the building.

Then, recovering from his fit of abstraction, he touched his horse slightly with the spur.

He directed his course to the door at the back of the hall which he so well remembered, and through which he had so often passed.

The back of the hall faced the south, and the moon was now near the meridian.

Consequently her beams poured down upon it with full force.

He could distinguish every object with the greatest ease.

There was the door.

There were the stables.

There was the pump, the never-to-be-forgotten pump, under which Mr. Josiah Skinner had received such a well-merited punishment.

But, taking only a hasty glance at these things, Dick rode up to the door and dismounted.

He then knocked lightly upon the panels with his riding-whip.

To him it seemed an age before his summons was attended to, but in reality only a few seconds elapsed.

A domestic unknown to Dick opened the door.

He carried a candle in his hand, and looked curiously and suspiciously at our hero.

"What is it you want?" he asked, in a voice that well corresponded with the expression upon his features.

Dick hesitated a moment before he gave a reply, and the servant repeated his inquiry in a tone of the greatest impatience.

But Dick, who had made up his mind how to reply, said—

"I wish to see Mr. Shockley, the steward. Be good enough to ask him to come here to the door and speak to me."

As he uttered these words, Dick slipped into the hand of the surly domestic a coin.

The touch of the precious metal produced an immediate change in his behaviour, and, desiring Dick to wait a moment, he hurried off to deliver the message.

Dick had not long to wait.

The summons was such an unusual one that the worthy steward made all possible haste to respond to it.

He recognised Turpin in a moment, though he did not betray his recognition otherwise than by a start, which escaped the notice of the domestic who had brought the message, and who, at the command of Shockley, now retired.

"And can it really be you, sir, that I see?" he said.

"You may credit the evidence of your own eyes; but time is precious to me, Shockley. Tell me, is your young mistress in the house?"

"She is, sir."

"And her companion?"

"Miss Maud?"

"Yes."

"Yes, she is within."

"Let them know that I am here, Shockley. If they will vouchsafe me an interview, I should feel gratified. I should not like to think that I have seen them for the last time."

"They will see you, I am sure."

"Why so?"

"I have heard them speak about you so often."

"Well then, Shockley, announce me; and, if you will permit me, I will stay here and await the result of the announcement."

"No, no; come in."

"I would much rather stay here. Let me have my own way: I will wait here."

"Well, since you will have it so, I suppose I must give way."

With these words on his lips, Shockley turned away.

Dick listened to his footsteps as he walked along the paved flooring of the hall.

He returned in a moment, and said—

"The young ladies will see you. Come this way."

Dick now did not hesitate to enter.

He followed the steward along the hall to the door of the room he knew so well.

Here they halted, and Dick was shown into the apartment in which his first mysterious interview with Maud Gouldman had taken place.

Little did he imagine what would be the consequences of that interview.

As he crossed the threshold he cast an anxious glance around him, but somewhat to his relief the room appeared to be empty.

And the words uttered by Shockley were confirmatory of this, for he said—

"Sit down a moment, sir. The ladies said you were to wait, and that they would be here directly."

The steward withdrew as he spoke, closing the door after him.

Slowly Dick crossed the vast antique apartment.

As on the occasion which was so vividly before his mind, there was no other light in the room save that which the fire afforded.

This, however, was amply sufficient for all purposes of illumination, with the exception, perhaps, of reading or writing.

The fire was composed partly of coal and partly of wood, and it sent up a large bright flame into the chimney.

Dick sat down on one of the antique chairs by the fireside, and waited for the coming of Blanche and Maud.

Maud! His heart beat strangely and his breath came irregularly from his lungs as he mentally pronounced her name.

Before he had time to indulge any further in his reflections the door opened, and the object of his thoughts, accompanied by Blanche Winberry, appeared before him.

Dick rose, of course, in a moment, and bent low in profound salutation.

They acknowledged his bow, and then, with that ease which good breeding can alone bestow, requested him to be seated.

In this they set him the example.

They indicated a chair which was placed exactly in front of the fire, while they sat down upon either side of it.

There was a silence of a moment's duration, and Dick, fearful that it might grow into a pause of embarrassment, hastened to begin the conversation.

"I trust, ladies," he said, in those deep, rich, and yet respectful tones which he knew so well how to assume, and which never failed to cause a feeling of interest in the breasts of his auditors, should they be of the softer sex, "I trust you will excuse this intrusion, but"——

"I cannot accept of any excuses or apologies from you," said Blanche Winberry, "so do not utter them."

Dick bowed.

He was much struck with the altered tones of her voice.

They expressed a world of sadness, suffering, and woe.

Such tones striking upon a sensitive ear would be almost sufficient to produce tears.

But how much had the poor girl suffered!

She had suddenly found herself bereft of every hope.

Her father, whom she loved with that passionate adoration sometimes experienced by an only daughter to her sole surviving parent, had been snatched from her under circumstances of the most terrible anguish.

Then the young man, for whom she felt an undying, unalterable affection, and which sprung up in her breast at once, and continued to burn with undiminished vehemency—that young man who loved her, too, with an affection only equalled by her own—what a terrible barrier had sprung up between them.

Her dreams of bliss had been rudely and violently dissipated.

He was the son of her father's murderer.

Oh! horrible combination of events!

Under the affliction which the bereavement of her father occasioned, what a solace it would have been to her had there been some one who possessed her heart, and to whom she could unburthen all her sorrows!

But this was denied her, and fresh cause for poignant grief given instead.

From the time they had parted in the court she had seen nothing of him.

He had studiously kept himself aloof from her, and had not made the slightest overture.

He felt that it would be hopeless.

That the gulf which yawned between them was so wide as to be quite impassable.

And for this the love she felt for him, and always should feel, was increased.

It bore out the estimate she had formed of his character.

But, without any description of ours, we think the reader, placed as he is in full possession of all the extraordinary incidents relating to this affair, will be able to picture for himself the grief of this young girl, and the effect which it must have, both bodily and mentally, upon her.

Then Maud Gouldman was not less wretched than her much-loved Blanche.

The reader cannot have failed to penetrate the secret of her heart.

She loved Dick Turpin.

Loved him with all the fond fervour which might be expected from so romantic an attachment.

It was in vain she called in common-sense and reason to her aid.

Those good and safe counsellors were unable to make themselves heard above the voice of love, which spoke with impassioned accents in her heart.

And now, when she gazed upon the really handsome countenance of the highwayman, and marked his robust and symmetrical figure—coming, as both did, so fully up to the idea of what a man should be, she felt her passion for the bold highwayman increase.

CHAPTER CCCLVI.

BLANCHE WINBERRY COMMUNICATES SOME IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE TO DICK TURPIN

A SLIGHT pause had followed the last words spoken by Blanche Winberry, but now Dick Turpin hastened to break it.

"You excuse this intrusion, then," he said, smiling slightly. "I thought you would, or otherwise I should not have ventured here. My errand is, however, a simple one; it is to assure you of my safety, and to request you to give me back my steed, for which you have been kind enough to provide an asylum."

"We have heard of your escape," said Blanche, "and have taken pains to learn all the particulars of it that we possibly could. How you have reached here in safety I know not."

"I have met with no opposition; but, pardon me, your last speech seems to intimate something more than it expresses."

"It does."

"To what did you allude?"

"I believe the police have had some sort of suspicion that you would make your way here, for they have several times surprised us, and insisted upon making a thorough search of the hall."

"Indeed," said Dick, contracting his brows. "I am much vexed that you should have been subjected to so much annoyance on my account."

"Do not mention it. So long as you were not here I did not care, and I thought while the officers were here upon a false scent, you might be somewhere else in safety."

"I cannot express my thanks for this feeling in my behalf."

"Nor need you. What I have done has been in requital of what you have done for me, and when the two are placed together, how insignificant mine seems! Can I ever forget that had it not been for your generous behaviour, a villain would have succeeded in effecting his purposes? Had it not been for your self-sacrifice, I should not be here now, nor would my father's murderer have been discovered."

Her voice faltered as she made this allusion to her father, and Dick, who always felt uneasy when he heard his own praises sounded, hastened to change the topic of conversation.

"You have said the police have been here."

"Yes."

"How many times?"

"Three times."

"Indeed. Their suspicions must have been strong, then. When was the last time?"

"The day before yesterday."

"And how did they depart?"

"Apparently satisfied that it was no good looking here any longer."

"Apparently satisfied?"

"Yes."

"What do you mean by that?"

"I fancy they are not satisfied. Shockley told me he was almost certain they were lurking somewhere in the neighbourhood."

"This is serious."

"It may be so; but, should the officers make another attack to-night, be under no apprehension—they will not find you. I shall be enabled to show my gratitude."

"I accept that, then, as an assurance of safety," said Turpin, cheerfully. "I have kept myself closely concealed during the past week, in a place where my foes would never think of looking for me."

"I am rejoiced to think you have got so secure a place in which to conceal yourself."

"My comrades are there now awaiting my return. We have been kept close prisoners, and they are impatient in the extreme to be set at liberty."

"They must be cautious. The authorities are using the most strenuous efforts to secure your apprehension and theirs also. They are determined that the daring outrage you have committed shall not go unpunished."

"Ah! well," said Dick, "we shall see! I am not afraid of them! I have set them at defiance for a long time now."

"You have, indeed."

"And shall do again, never fear for that!—and when I have Black Bess once again."

"She is quite safe," said Maud, breaking the silence which she had preserved all through the interview. "I have seen to her safety and comfort myself."

"Many thanks!" said Turpin, his soul thrilling with the music of the words he had just heard. "When I am once seated upon her back, I shall care nothing for my foes."

"We have trembled for your safety many and many a time," said Blanche, "and we were pleased beyond measure when Shockley told us you were here."

In acknowledgment of this Dick could merely bow.

"I am not insensible," he said, "of all that you have done on my behalf. The judge who showed himself so warm a friend to me told me all about it."

"It was all done out of gratitude," said Blanche. "Indeed, when I think back upon the past, I seem as though I should never be able to show myself sufficiently grateful, and to repay you would be impossible."

"Enough! enough!" said Dick, "I did my duty; and if this is what may be considered a good action, I trust it will palliate the many bad ones that I have in my lifetime committed. I can assure you that, had I the same motives, I would do the same thing to-morrow."

"I do not doubt your singlemindedness; but what a dreadful fate it was that overtook my uncle."

"Dreadful, indeed!"

"Far worse than he deserved."

"Perhaps so. His sufferings must have been terrible; but the mob was incensed, and it would have been as easy to quench the raging of the sea as to have caused them to desist."

"I know it."

"I was not, thank heaven! a witness of that scene, but my comrades told me the particulars of it."

"And what has become of Skinner, and the other two accomplices of my uncle's?"

"I know not. Probably they were set free along with the rest of the prisoners, and have escaped."

"I have heard nothing of them, though I have made every inquiry."

"Perhaps, then, you would be able to afford me some information with respect to what has taken place in the metropolis during the past week."

"You mean with respect to yourself?"

"Just so."

"I have not much to tell beyond what I have already told you. The police authorities, assisted by the military, are making the most strenuous efforts to capture all four of you, and should they do so, no doubt their proceedings would be very summary indeed!"

"I do not doubt it. And now, what about the prison?"

"Newgate?"

"Yes."

"We drove past there three days ago."

"And how did the place look?"

"It is nothing but a ruin. The ruins were smouldering and smoking even then, and a large number of people were assembled, gazing upon it. Nothing but the strongest walls remain, and they are charred and blackened by the intense heat. The whole place will have to be rebuilt."

"Is it possible?"

"Do not let my description, however, so far influence you, as to make your curiosity overcome your prudence."

"Well, I will confess that I should much like to look upon the scene, but that idea must, I suppose, be abandoned."

"If you place any value upon your life."

"The excitement will soon subside, however."

"It cannot long remain up to the present pitch."

"I reckoned upon its having quite or nearly died away by this time."

"Then you will be disappointed, for I think it is fiercer than ever. You are quite safe here, however, for there are hiding-places in the hall so cunningly contrived that they would defy detection."

"Do you anticipate an attack?"

"I have no reason for doing so, but you may have been seen to enter the place."

"I think not. I knew there was danger, and I omitted no precautions."

Blanche rose as he spoke, and rang a bell.

"You will partake of some refreshments ere you leave?" she said.

Dick bowed.

Shockley appeared.

"Have supper laid in the dining-room, Shockley."

"Yes, miss," replied the old steward, retiring to execute her order.

"I must not stay here too long," said Turpin, "though I shall be loath to tear myself away, but I promised my comrades I would return before daybreak, and I must make some allowance in case of interruptions on the road."

"Have you far to go to reach your destination?"

"Yes, many miles; and my comrades will be alarmed if I am later than the time I mentioned."

At this moment the steward returned to say that the supper was quite ready.

Dick and the two ladies followed him to the dining-room.

The interior of Winberry Hall was tolerably familiar to Dick in consequence of his stay there.

A comfortable meal was laid upon the table, and Dick did not omit to do justice to the good things before him, for his fare of late had been something of the roughest.

How long they would have permitted him to stay is more than we could determine, nor was Turpin at all anxious to quit company so pleasant.

As he from time to time stole a glance at Maud Gouldman, and saw how lovely she was, his heart burned with love, but that was soon succeeded by an aching sensation when he thought of the difference between them.

Dick Turpin, however intoxicated he might be with love, was not oblivious of the fact that the night was passing away, and that his comrades were impatiently awaiting him.

Accordingly, after some more conversation of too general a character to merit being placed before the reader in detail, he excused himself to go.

They knew his reasons, and made no effort to detain him.

Besides, they were aware how dangerous it would be for him to travel by daylight.

"If you will show me to the stables," he said, "I will depart. I would rather not attract the attention of your groom. I can saddle Black Bess myself."

"I will go with you," said Maud, rising.

"Nay, nay," cried Dick. "If you will call Shockley, that will do. Or, indeed, I could find my way there alone."

"You had better have a guide," said Blanche.

"I will lead the way," said Maud. "Black Bess has been solely under my care during her stay here."

"Then she has been well attended, I'll warrant. Lady, I am deeply grateful to you for your kindness to my steed; it touches me more closely than kindness to myself."

"You come with me, Blanche," said Maud.

"No, I dread the cold, and I have suffered so much illness lately, and I should be afraid of encountering the night air.

"I cannot suffer either of you to come," said Turpin. "Let me go alone."

"It is a consideration for your safety which causes me to refuse that request. I wish your departure to be as quiet and unnoticed as possible. Come with me. I will show you to the stable-door and also to the stall in which Black Bess is. Could you saddle her in the dark?"

"With ease. Besides it will not be dark; the moon is shining with so much brightness that it seems like day."

"Come, then."

Dick bade Blanche Winberry farewell.

Tears came to her eyes as she pronounced the word.

She forgot that it was a highwayman who stood before her.

His behaviour, from the first to the last, had been so noble, so generous, so self-sacrificing, that she could scarce believe that he was really what he was.

Indeed, on that night it is questionable whether she did not regard him with some stronger feeling even than admiration.

She felt that she was looking upon him for the last time.

Fain would she have put some question to him respecting her father, and the dark transactions in the house in Birdcage-walk, but her emotions so far overpowered her, as to deprive her of the faculty of speech.

Indeed, she found herself unable to articulate the word farewell.

Dick saw how much she was agitated, and hastened to withdraw.

The spectacle was painful for him.

Blanche made no opposition to Maud leaving with Dick.

The errand seemed to her a perfectly reasonable one.

As soon as the door had closed behind them, she felt that she could no longer control her tears.

She buried her face in her hands, and sobbed as though her heart would break.

Poor girl! her sufferings were almost more than she could bear.

The effects of her grief were visible upon her countenance, and the black mourning-dress which she wore rendered her appearance even more ghastly.

In this state of grief, then, she remained, and while it continued she was quite oblivious of all else.

The duration of Maud's absence was, therefore, unnoticed by her, until, hearing a loud uproar at the back of the house, she started to her feet, and then she recollected all that had taken place.

"Where is Maud?" she asked. "Oh! heavens, what has happened?"

CHAPTER CCCLVII.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD MEET WITH A SLIGHT SURPRISE IN THE STABLE.

Dick Turpin's perceptions were not so obtuse as to prevent his perceiving that there was something peculiar in this behaviour of Maud Gouldman.

The reasons she had given for accompanying him to the stable appeared to be ridiculously insufficient.

But it was not likely that he would quarrel with them or make any remark upon the subject.

He was only too delighted at the idea of having her company for a few moments, and the privilege of bidding her farewell alone.

And Dick had determined to bid her farewell, although the love which filled his heart had increased rather than abated.

Let not this be wondered at, for there were few better qualified to command love from all hearts than she was.

Dick Turpin, however, in despite of this passion, overwhelming as it was, did not forget that rude sense of honour which had regulated his whole career.

He determined not to utter one word of love, but to bid her farewell, and then take every precaution not to see her again.

About, then, to take what he fully intended should be an eternal adieu, he rejoiced at the opportunity of doing so without having any eye to observe them.

But his heart fluttered when he asked himself the question, why had Maud been so eager to have no one present at the parting.

One or two things which had taken place had impressed Dick with the idea that the passion he experienced was reciprocated, and he fancied that, led away by a romantic affection, she might be tempted to say and do that which she would afterwards repent.

We need not remind the reader how rapidly a whole train of thought will pass through the mind, and Dick made these reflections during the brief interval which elapsed between his bidding farewell to Blanche and his passing out into the passage.

Maud closed the door behind her.

There was a lamp burning in the hall, and by the aid of this Dick saw the face and form of his companion.

He had always thought her incomparably beautiful, but never more so than at this moment.

There was a kind of bewitching confusion visible in her countenance and manner as she turned towards him.

She held down her head, and her eyes sought the ground.

Dick hesitated a moment, and then, encouraged by her manner, bowed politely and ventured to offer her his arm.

It was accepted, and with a readiness that betokened anything but displeasure.

How his heart thrilled, and how every nerve in his whole body appeared to vibrate when he felt the pressure of her hand upon his arm!

Still, with her head down and silent, she walked with him along the hall in the direction of the door through which he had a short time before entered.

There was not a single person visible, nor did any sound arise to indicate the proximity of any one.

Indeed, the household at Winberry Hall had, since the death of Blanche's father, been much reduced, and those few servants who remained were at this moment in their own quarters in a distant portion of the building.

The whole place was, of course, familiar enough to Dick, and he opened the door with as much ease and readiness as his companion could have done who had lived there all her life.

Crossing the threshold, they passed into the yard.

It was then that Maud spoke for the first time.

She requested Dick to close the door after him.

He did this in a moment.

The moon, which, when he started from Enfield Chase, was only a short distance above the horizon, was now a little past the meridian, and as near the zenith as the moon ever is in England.

There was not a cloud nor even the thinnest vapour visible in the sky, which was of an intense and beautiful blue.

The stars shone, but their brightness was obscured, and in some cases extinguished, by the superior brilliancy of the queen of night.

There was no wind, and the most perfect silence prevailed, giving an air of delicious repose to everything.

It was a night that fully accorded with the feelings that held a place in the hearts both of Dick Turpin and Maud Gouldman.

The yard was crossed in silence, and the range of buildings constituting the stables was reached.

Dick opened the door, and the pair entered.

The interior of the stable was very light.

In the roof several skylights were fixed, which, for the purposes of ventilation, were so constructed as to admit of their being raised or closed at pleasure.

Through these skylights the rays of the moon came with full force, and the place was almost as well illuminated as it was in the day time.

Maud Gouldman led the way to the stall in which Black Bess stood.

She knew it well, for she had made it a practice to feed her with her own hands.

It so happened that Turpin's mare stood exactly under one of these skylights, so that she could be seen with the greatest distinctness.

Dick was full of joy to see his bonny mare, to whose exertions on so many occasions he had owed his life, in such comfortable circumstances.

She was certainly in first-class condition, for everything in the shape of good feeding and grooming had been done.

Maud withdrew her hand, and Dick, with an impatience which he could neither control nor conceal, hastened up to the manger, and patted Black Bess upon the neck.

He spoke to her at the same moment.

Although so considerable a period had elapsed since he had seen her, the gallant creature recognised her master in a moment.

Uttering a joyful, half-neighing, half-whinnying sound, she turned round and responded to the caresses her master bestowed upon her by rubbing her head against his breast.

Had it been some dog who had for a length of time been separated from his master, he could scarcely have exhibited more joy than Black Bess did.

Again and again did Dick pat and caress her.

"You see she is quite safe," said Maud, perhaps with the intention of distracting Dick's attention from his steed to herself.

"Yes, thanks to your kindness and attention," replied Dick, turning round and taking hold of her hand, which he pressed warmly. "How shall I be able to repay you for it?"

"Nay, how shall Blanche and myself repay you for what you have done in our behalf? Do not for one moment imagine that we have forgotten how much we owe you; and that, if it had not been for you, the murder of Mr. Winberry would never have been discovered and brought home to the guilty parties. Oh! it was noble of you—truly noble, to risk your life and liberty in the way you did for the sake of the orphan and of justice."

"Do not speak of that."

"Why not?"

"As I have said, I do not like to hear my own praises sounded."

"But I cannot refrain from expressing that admiration which such conduct as yours is so well qualified to call forth! Had I been told of such a thing, I should have discarded it as being beyond the bounds of belief."

"Well, well, say no more upon the point."

"Blanche feels her loss very, very keenly. She loved her father with all the affection of an only daughter. We, of course, expected you to make your appearance, and I know Blanche intended to ask you some questions respecting the last moments of her father; but I am afraid that her emotion was too great to allow her to do so."

"I could have told her very little, I fear; and certainly not more than I have related to you, and which I dare say you have repeated."

"I have, but then she would have felt a consolation in hearing only that much from your lips."

"Would I had been aware of it earlier, and then I would have approached the subject somehow; but, as it was, I was studious to avoid it, for I feared to hurt her feelings."

"I understand the motives which kept you silent. It is only natural that you should think any mention of the subject would be painful to her feelings. Again, however, let me express our heartfelt thanks for the service you have rendered us, and the admiration we feel for your noble-hearted conduct."

"Enough, enough. I shall be quite content if it will weigh against some of my other deeds."

"It will, it will; rest assured it will. But I will not detain you thus. I know every moment now is of the utmost importance to you. Look, here are the trappings belonging to your steed. I have had them placed here in anticipation of your visit."

She led the way to the stall adjoining the one in which Black Bess stood, and which was unoccupied.

In this were the articles of which she spoke.

Dick hastened to remove them, and in a few moments had his mare fully caparisoned, so that all he would have to do would be to mount.

He turned her head round towards the stable-door.

Then he paused.

The hour of parting had arrived.

It was at this moment that he fully realized how deep an impression Maud Gouldman had made upon his heart.

He was about to bid her farewell, and for ever.

He tried to command his voice to speak.

But in vain.

His throat swelled and ached so terribly that he found it impossible to articulate a word.

On her side, Maud seemed scarcely less affected.

The bright moonlight, as it shone down through the skylight upon the noble-looking forms of the highwayman and his steed, lent them a charm and an air of romance which, in daylight, they would not have possessed.

The idea uppermost in her mind was a fervent wish that Dick Turpin was anything but what he was.

She loved him; but she shrank from avowing, even to herself, that she loved a highwayman.

Observing his emotion, and guessing its cause, she hastened to speak, if only a word, so as to break the awkward and embarrassing silence which now prevailed.

The sooner the parting was over, she thought, the better, for she felt scarcely able to trust herself.

She held out her hand.

"Farewell!" she said, faintly, as she did so, "farewell! It may be that we shall never part again, and therefore you—you——"

She paused, and could go no further.

Her throat seemed to swell up and choke her.

"In all probability," said Dick, "we shall never meet again! Indeed, I shall studiously avoid a future meeting, for the sake of my own peace of mind."

He took her extended hand, which hitherto he had not ventured to do, and pressed it slightly.

"Lady," he continued, "for such is the title by which such a one as I should address you—lady, believe me, this is our last meeting, unless some unforeseen accident should bring us face to face again. I shall try to avoid even the possibility of such an accident."

"Why?" asked Maud, in so faint a voice that none but the ear of a lover could have caught it.

"Do not ask me why, but believe that I have a good and sufficient reason for coming to such a determination."

"I cannot feel content with that," said Maud; "tell me what this reason is."

"Lady," said Dick, becoming, as he proceeded, more and more respectful, "it has been my good fortune to create in your mind a favourable impression concerning me—you have said as much, and I am bound to believe it; indeed, I would not doubt for worlds! But it is such a rare thing for anyone to hold me in esteem, and the knowledge that at least one person does so is so pleasant, that I should be loath indeed to say anything which would be calculated to reverse your good opinion."

"I am not afraid of your doing so," said Maud, huskily.

"Then do not ask me for my reason."

"You are unkind—unjust."

"I would not have you think me so for worlds."

"Then tell me."

"And lose your good opinion?"

"No, no; be under no apprehension upon that point, I beg you. I will give you my word that I will not allow anything you may say to prejudice me in your disfavour. Now tell me—surely you can do so after such an assurance as that."

"If I could be sure of not incurring your displeasure."

"You may be sure."

"Then, lady, I will tell you why I have resolved never to see you more, why I have determined that this shall be our last meeting. The resolution will be a hard one for me to keep. It is because I love you!"

It is impossible to describe the tone in which these words were uttered.

Maud was silent, and so was our hero, until at length the latter said—

"You see I have offended you. But no matter. It is, perhaps, my fate not to retain the good opinion of anyone. Farewell! farewell! I will leave you, and forget that you ever saw or knew Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

He tried to release her hand, but he found himself unable to extricate his own.

She pressed it with such tightness that he could not disengage it.

She came a step or two closer, and placed her other hand upon his breast.

"No," she said, "I am not offended; believe me, I am not. And so far from having lost my good opinion, I think a thousand times more highly of you now than I did before. Oh! I am carried away. I cannot express myself! I"——

Her head sunk upon Dick's shoulder.

But at this moment there was a rapid rush of feet, and a voice cried, in a loud tone—

"Dick Turpin, you are my prisoner! Surrender at once! Resistance is worse than useless! You are surrounded!"

CHAPTER CCCLVIII.

DICK TURPIN IS ATTACKED IN THE STABLE BY MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS.

So very suddenly and unexpectedly these words came upon Dick Turpin's ear, that for the space of about a moment he was rooted to the spot, unable to recover himself from his surprise.

Maud Gouldman uttered a piercing shriek, which plainly told how deep an interest he felt in the highwayman's safety, and clung to his arm with frantic tightness.

The voice which uttered the words with which the last chapter concluded was familiar to Dick, and he recognised it instantly.

It was the voice of Mr. Wriggles, the Bow-street police-officer.

But before we relate what ensued consequent upon this attack, we feel that it is due to the reader to explain to him how it was that Mr. Wriggles learned Dick Turpin's whereabouts, and how it was he broke in upon him at so inopportune a moment.

In a former chapter we have stated that the police had made one or two appearances at Winberry Hall, and had searched the edifice from the roofs to the foundations, each time, of course, without receiving any recompense for their trouble.

They did not find what they sought.

Upon the last occasion, however, Mr. Wriggles, who was at the head of these little expeditions, went away far from satisfied.

Finding himself unsuccessful, and clinging to the idea that Turpin was at Winberry Hall, he resolved to change his tactics.

Hitherto, he had proceeded to the accomplishment of his design in what he considered to be a very open manner.

That did not succeed, so now stratagem and cunning must be tried.

Accordingly, he affected to withdraw all his men, and dropped some hints to the servants that he supposed he must give it up, and search elsewhere.

This he had no intention of doing.

Going to a short distance, he halted at a public-house with the intention of taking up his quarters there until he received some additional information.

As soon as night came, he called aside one of his men who, he judged, would be best able to carry out his instructions, and spoke to him in a low tone.

The police-officer fully understood what was required of him, and he set out at once, alone, in the direction of Winberry Hall.

He approached the place carefully, and spent the night in keeping watch round the premises.

But, as this was the night preceding Dick's arrival, of course he had all his trouble for nothing.

He returned to the public-house soon after daybreak the next morning, as Mr. Wriggles had instructed him to do, and there communicated his unsuccess.

Mr. Wriggles was almost ready to give the job up in despair, but in the end he resolved to have one more trial.

But it was not until late at night that he made up his mind—later, indeed, than on the preceding evening.

In consequence of this, it so happened that Dick arrived at the Hall before the officer, and was comfortably sitting down.

The officer, however, prowled round and round the premises, but without making any discovery.

At length, when his patience was all but exhausted, and he had come to the conclusion that it was "no go," his attention was attracted by the opening of the back door.

Keeping close in the shadow of the outbuildings, close to which he stood, he set himself to work to observe who came forth at that unusual hour.

The bright moonbeams enabled him to see with perfect distinctness two figures, male and female, emerge from the house and cross the yard.

He began now to have better hopes, but he had the prudence to remain quite still.

He watched the two figures, who, as the reader is aware, were no other than Dick and Maud, cross the yard in the direction of the stables.

But, whether they entered them, was more than he could perceive in his present position, and he was fearful of having been seen if he stepped out into the moonlight.

He waited a moment or two, therefore, and then the footsteps of those he had seen having ceased to be audible, he ventured to creep, with a stealthy tread, in their track.

Upon reaching the stables, there was no trace of them to be seen.

Where they had gone he was unable to determine.

He spent some little time in making a tour of the premises, and being still unable to see them, he came to the conclusion that they had not left.

Returning, he made a closer examination, and noticed something which had escaped his observation on the previous occasion.

The door leading into the stable was a little way open.

He approached with a silence that would have done credit to a Red Indian.

The murmur of voices struck upon his ear.

He listened intently.

At first he could only hear a confused murmuring sound, but, by degrees, he could distinguish several words, though he was not able to make connected sense of them.

One sentence, however, reached his ear in full, because it was spoken with greater loudness than the remainder of the conversation.

The voice that uttered it was a manly one, and the words of which it consisted were—

"Forget that you ever saw or knew Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

The reader will remember that in the course of his conversation with Maud Gouldman, Dick Turpin uttered those words.

Stimulated by what he heard, the officer stretched his sense of hearing to the utmost.

He was afraid to believe in the reality of such good fortune as those words seemed to presage.

Could it be possible that the notorious highwayman was in the stable?

A few succeeding words convinced him that such was really the case.

No sooner had he come to this conclusion, than his movements became rather extraordinary.

Like a shadow he glided away from the stable-door.

He crossed the yard.

Then, standing in the shadow of a wall, he produced from his pocket a small round object, about four inches in length and one and a-half in diameter.

He next took from his pocket a long thin stick.

With as much haste as possible he tied the round object we have described to the end of this piece of stick, and then in a moment it became evident what it was.

It was a sky-rocket, though one of rather unusual size.

The officer stuck one end of this stick into the ground, taking care to give it a slanting direction.

Then, by means of what is called a thief's match, and which resembled in many particulars the lucifer now so common, he procured a light, which he applied to one end of the rocket.

With a rushing sound it sped into the air, leaving behind it a long stream of fire.

This was not seen so plainly as it would have been had the moon not shone so brightly.

However, it was plainly visible.

And now this rocket showed itself to be not one of the ordinary kind.

As the reader must know, these ascend until they have attained their greatest elevation, and then burst.

But this rocket, going high into the air, described a complete semicircle, leaving behind it a train of fire as it descended, just as it did when it rose.

Then, on reaching the ground, it exploded, doubtless with great violence and loudness, for where the officer stood he could faintly hear it, and it fell at the distance of nearly half a mile.

But the performance of this wonderful rocket was not yet over.

Upon exploding in the manner we have described, it did not go out, but burnt with a steady, bright blue flame.

This was the signal that Mr. Wriggles had devised, and a capital one it was.

It was an almost instantaneous means of letting him know what had taken place.

And, not only that, the officer who gave the signal would be able to keep his prey in sight, so that Mr. Wriggles would have no difficulty in getting upon their track.

With all these proceedings, however, Dick Turpin and Maud Gouldman were entirely ignorant.

No thoughts of any such thing entered the minds of either.

The signal was, of course, seen by Mr. Wriggles and heard too.

He was on the look out for it, though he hardly dared hope to see it.

The horses were all standing in the stables adjoining the inn in a state of perfect readiness.

All their harness was on, and they were turned round with their heads to the stable-door.

The men were all armed, and ready to mount instantly.

Mr. Wriggles lost not a moment in telling them to do so; and, in a space of time which seemed miraculously small, the officers were all mounted and on their way at full gallop to Winberry Hall.

The officer who had given the signal perceived their approach.

They halted close to the Hall, and the greater part of them, by the order of their leader, immediately dismounted.

On tip-toe they approached the stable.

From what has just been narrated, it must be perfectly clear that the time which elapsed between the officer making the discovery that Dick Turpin was in the stable and the arrival of Mr. Wriggles with his band, was short indeed.

The exultation of the chief officer knew no bounds.

He could not subdue it.

At last, he thought, his prey was securely in his grasp, and that escape was utterly impossible.

Under the influence of this feeling, then, he had dashed open the stable-door and spoken the words with which the last chapter concluded.

Dick Turpin was more taken by surprise than ever he had been in his life.

The reason was simple.

His mind was intoxicated with love, and the manner in which Maud had spoken and acted were well qualified to produce such an effect.

She loved him.

Dick knew it, and his heart swelled when he became conscious of the knowledge.

Despite of his profession she loved him, and did not shrink from avowing her affection.

But he was soon aroused from such blissful dreams.

The piercing scream which burst from Maud's lips went as far towards recovering him as anything.

But she clung to him with terrified violence, nor could he disengage himself.

And she was deaf to his request to release him.

It seemed as though he was safer while she retained her hold upon him.

But that was an error attributable to the excitement of the moment.

It was fortunate for Dick that Black Bess was ready for the road.

His left hand grasped the bridle.

To his right arm and shoulder Maud clung.

"With you," she cried, "with you! Escape! escape! With you, with you!"

Dick understood her meaning.

There was no time to hesitate without he chose to yield himself a prisoner.

There was no time to urge those scruples which, at another period, he would have urged.

Besides which the voice of love, which is nearly always more powerful than that of the mind, influenced his conduct.

The officers, who surrounded the door in a dense mass, now began to show signs of making an attack, though it was clear they all shrunk from entering the stable and coming to a personal encounter with our hero.

"Surrender, Dick," cried Mr. Wriggles, who held a brace of loaded pistols in his hands. "You may as well give in quietly as not. What is the good of being wounded unnecessarily, and you can't escape! I will count three, and if you do not choose to give in by then we shall all fire, and the consequences will be upon your own head!"

To this long speech Dick Turpin paid no attention.

His whole thoughts were concentrated in what he was about.

With an easy exercise of his enormous strength, he took hold of Maud and lifted her into the fore part of the saddle, or, rather, on to the withers of his steed.

Then he mounted after her.

He passed his left hand round Maud's waist, thus sustaining her in her frail seat, and grasped the reins.

He plunged his right hand into his coat-pocket and drew forth a pistol.

Mr. Wriggles saw what Dick was about, and could hardly credit the evidence of his senses.

That he should even think of resisting seemed incredible.

Uttering a howl of rage, he commanded his men to follow him.

He rushed into the stable.

But before he could reach the stall in which Black Bess stood, Dick Turpin was firmly in the saddle.

Mr. Wriggles, however, darted forward, and caught hold of her bridle.

"Surrender!" he said; "surrender! or I will give my men the word to fire, and you will be blown to atoms!"

Dick's blood ran cold about his heart.

It was not, however, for himself that he cared, but for the fair creature in the saddle before him.

Black Bess, who, from her long rest, was full of fire and spirit, did not approve of Mr. Wriggles holding her by the bridle.

Suddenly, then, she lifted up her fore foot and kicked out with great force.

Mr. Wriggles uttered a dismal yell, and fell to the ground.

Black Bess's iron-bound hoof had come into violent contact with his leg, and, as he believed, had broken it.

At the same moment that this occurred Dick Turpin pressed his knees tightly against his mare's sides.

She needed no other impulse forward.

CHAPTER CCCLIX.

MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS PURSUE DICK TURPIN AND MAUD GOULDMAN ALONG THE WESTERN ROAD.

THERE was a rush as of a heavy body falling through space, a short, sharp neigh of satisfaction, and the rapid clatter of horses' hoofs.

Right gallantly did Black Bess obey the only impulse forward her master was in a position to give her.

Dick cheered her by uttering those words which, from experience, he knew to have an animating, exhilarating effect upon her, for he knew her work was far from being over.

A second did not elapse before he reached the stable-door, round which the police-officers, under the command of Mr. Wriggles, stood in a dense throng.

They made a kind of stand, or rather attempted to do so, when they saw Black Bess coming, with the intention of stopping her.

But it was vain to think they could oppose themselves to a body moving with such swiftness.

They gave way, and some were knocked down by the shoulder or legs of the gallant steed, and trampled under foot.

Those who were fortunate enough to be able to draw back with safety did so, and, taking a hasty aim at the flying figures, fired.

The report of so many pistols, fired, as we might say, all at once, was both startling and tremendous.

But it was not the explosion which gave Turpin any uneasiness.

He had felt the bullets sweep by, leaving him unhurt, but he shuddered as he thought that his fair companion might not have been so fortunate.

The shot which had passed him scathelessly might have injured her.

"Speak! speak!" he cried, in loud tones; "tell me that you are not hurt."

"I am not hurt," said Maud Gouldman.

When this little conversation had taken place, Black Bess had crossed the yard.

The officers were still at the stable-door, where a scene of indescribable confusion was taking place.

Dick pulled up.

He turned round so as to face his foes.

At that moment the door leading to Winberry Hall was thrown open, and Blanche, accompanied by a number of terrified domestics, made their appearance, in order to ascertain what was the occasion of the uproar.

They would have appeared sooner, only Blanche had previously given them all strict instructions to retire to rest; and, hearing such alarming sounds, she was afraid to venture forth unaccompanied by them.

What they saw astonished them not a little.

Clearly visible in the bright moonbeams, which seemed to shine upon him with particular effulgence, was Dick Turpin.

There, too, was bonny Black Bess, her sleek, ebony coat shining like velvet.

But, most astonishing of all, seated upon her back, her arms clinging round Dick, and his arms supporting her, was Maud Gouldman.

They could not believe their eyes at first, and when they were convinced that it was indeed no optical delusion, they were quite at a loss to think what conjuncture of circumstances had conspired to place her there.

The officers scrambled to their feet.

Mr. Wriggles was assisted to rise.

He limped to the door of the stable, and there standing only a few yards off was Dick Turpin.

Uttering an impotent curse, he yelled in tones loud enough to reach even the ears of our hero—

"Fire! fire, my men! Wing him if you can! Bring him down!"

An irregular volley followed this command.

But Dick was at a safe distance.

Seeing that the shots were ineffectual, Mr. Wriggles shouted—

"After him! after him! Mount, my men! We won't lose sight of him! We'll run him to earth! Oh! curses."

The last ejaculation was wrung from his lips by the pain which his leg gave him.

For the moment he forgot, in his excitement, the injuries he had received, and he attempted to run towards the horses.

But his recollection soon returned to him.

Dick Turpin had faith in the power of his mare.

That faith was the result of frequent trials.

With an air of the greatest coolness he raised his hat from his head, and bowed low in the saddle.

"Come on, gentlemen," he said, calmly. "It seems you are inclined to have a ride, and I am not in the humour to baulk your inclination. Come on! we shall probably see some sport!"

These words aggravated the officers until they could scarcely bear themselves.

They made a frantic dash towards the spot where they had left the horses.

The officers who had charge of them now led them towards the stable.

Then ensued an immense scrambling into their saddles.

Dick waited to see no more.

Replacing his hat upon his head, and grasping the reins more tightly in his left hand, he seated himself firmly in the saddle, and urged his mare forward.

Black Bess responded to the impulse freely.

She sprang onwards, at that long sweeping gallop for which she was so famous.

Without appearing to make any very great exertion, she flew over the ground with immense speed.

As he passed the corner of some outbuildings, however, a man sprang forward and strove to interrupt their progress by clutching Bess's bridle.

He did, indeed, seize it, but his grasp was only a temporary one.

Dick now held in his hand a strong riding whip, which he carried, not for the purpose of using it upon his steed, but as a weapon of defence when in close quarters.

In his saddle there was a little place made on purpose for the reception of it, and he had taken it out a moment before.

He had twined the thong round and round his hand, so as to have a strong hold of it.

The handle was loaded with lead, and it now swung in his hand like a bludgeon, or the modern life-preserver.

Swinging this round once, he brought it down with full force upon the officer's head.

An ominous crack was the result, and he fell down in the roadway, as if shot.

There was a rush, and he was far behind.

He had scarcely impeded our friend's progress at all.

Away, away they went.

The lane was reached—the open, broad high road was gained.

But the officers were now all mounted, and in full pursuit of the highwayman.

The hoofs of their horses made a terrible clatter on the stony road, for otherwise there was not a sound to break the silence.

From time to time a pistol was fired, but without any result.

Maud Gouldman had fainted.

Still she clung with great tightness to Dick's breast, while he supported her with his left arm.

And, as she leant back, there was but little difficulty in keeping her in her seat.

Away, away, then, with the velocity of a race-horse, went Black Bess—her hoofs striking fire upon the flinty ground beneath her feet.

Dick Turpin took the road leading into the open country.

[THE DYING POACHER REVEALS THE SECRET CAVE TO TOM KING AND HIS FRIENDS.]

To have gone towards London would have been madness.

He was careful, too, to take a road that led him away from Enfield Chase.

He was fearful of being seen to go in that direction, lest the suspicions of the officers should be aroused.

That was a safe refuge only while their presence in it was unknown and unsuspected.

Going, then, in a westerly direction, instead of an easterly one, which would have taken him to his destination, Dick rapidly left that and his pursuers behind.

The distance between both was increased every moment.

The police-officers, however, did all they could to keep up with the highwayman's matchless steed.

They lashed and spurred incessantly, and altogether behaved as though they had not the least regard for their own necks.

But though at the first Black Bess had shown herself insensible, or nearly so, to her double burden, she now gave indications of feeling it.

It was not so much the actual weight, but where that weight was placed.

It was too far forward for her to be able to use her fore legs with proper freedom.

Indeed, Maud was actually seated upon her withers.

As much as possible Dick had striven to counteract this by leaning as far back in the saddle as he could.

To a certain extent he had succeeded in his object, but only partially.

Unwilling to distress the gallant animal, and satisfied by the start he already had of his pursuers, he reined her in.

He was the more inclined to do this, because he saw just a little way on before him a rather steep hill which they would have to climb.

A loud shout, like one of exultation, coming from the rear, told Dick that his pursuers had noticed the abatement of his speed.

He cared not for it.

Mr. Wriggles was almost frantic.

Such a chance of capturing the highwayman he felt sure he should never have again.

In spite of the pain he suffered—for his leg was almost broken by the kick Black Bess dealt it—he insisted upon being placed in the saddle.

Then he started in pursuit.

He urged on his men, and commanded them to urge on their steeds.

They did so.

They were animated, too, when they perceived, as they thought, that the highwayman's mare was flagging.

Every inch of ground they gained—thus lessening the distance between them—they felt fresh stimulus.

From time to time Dick looked back, to see what kind of progress they were making.

He saw they were rapidly approaching.

But he cared little for that.

He knew he could soon recover lost ground.

Slowly, then, he allowed Black Bess to make her way up the hill.

The officers did not draw in a bit.

But in spite of all their efforts they could not make their horses go up-hill at the same speed as they had gone over level ground.

When Turpin reached the top of the hill, they were rather more than half-way up.

He stood for a moment on the summit, and looked down upon them.

He did this with a double motive.

It was to keep an eye upon their motions, and at the same time to allow Black Bess a moment to recover her wind.

Soon the gallant creature champed her bit, and showed herself impatient to be off.

It was time.

The officers had got much nearer, and Dick could hear them shouting something, but what the words were he could not make out.

Nor did he care much, for if he had heard them the chances are a thousand to one whether he would have paid any attention.

Suddenly, however, a shot was fired.

It did no damage, being merely a trial shot to ascertain whether they were within range.

But Turpin considered it was now high time to start.

Wheeling round, he again set his mare in motion.

There was a gradual descent from the top of this hill to the bottom, and down this they went like the wind.

Nor did the officers lag behind.

But what is that in the distance which gleams in the moonlight with a ghastly whiteness?

A second glance was enough to show Dick.

It was a toll-gate.

The road was wide, and the toll-house was built in the middle of it, with a gate on each side.

The whole seemed to have been freshly painted white.

It was this which made it so conspicuous, and caused Dick to see it so soon.

He drew in slightly.

A shout came from the rear.

It was one of triumph.

His capture was now considered certain.

It was not without some apprehension that Dick saw this obstruction in his path.

The gate was a high one.

The chance that it would be opened to allow him to pass through was a faint one.

Had he alone been upon the back of Black Bess he would have laughed at such an obstacle.

But now, with a double load, and after having made so much exertion, he felt somewhat apprehensive of the result.

And now the toll-man, aroused probably by the trampling and shouting, opened one of the windows in the toll-house and projected his head.

As soon as he saw this, Dick gave up all hopes of having the gate opened.

Black Bess must either leap it, or he must be captured.

The former seemed impossible.

The gate, upon a nearer approach, seemed to be of an unusual height, and the top bar was garnished by a row of sharp iron spikes.

Shutting his teeth close, Dick kept on.

The officers shouted with gratification.

It was evident that, great as might be their opinion of the powers of Black Bess, they looked upon the feat of her leaping a toll-bar after such a long, fatiguing gallop as an impossibility.

"Hurrah!" shouted Mr. Wriggles, though the pain in his leg was almost more than he could endure. "Hurrah, my men! Forward—forward! We have him at last!"

CHAPTER CCCLX.

BLACK BESS CLEARS THE TOLL-GATE, TO THE CONSTERNATION OF MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS.

"HOORAY!" cried the toll-keeper, in a high, screaming, excited voice. "Hooray! This will do it!"

From an advantageous post—one of the upper windows in the wooden house—he was able to command a good view of all parties.

He knew in a moment what it meant.

It was not the first time he had witnessed a chase after a highwayman.

Thus, though Mr. Wriggles and his men shouted out at the top of their voices, he could not tell what they said—he knew a highwayman was on the road.

He, too, considered he was as good as captured, and it was under this impression that he gave vent to the triumphal ejaculations recorded above.

What he meant by the latter portion of his speech, when he intimated that something would do it, could very soon be seen.

He produced an enormous brass bell-mouthed blunderbuss—a species of firearm now obsolete, but at that time one upon which great reliance was placed.

The butt of this he placed to his shoulder, and the muzzle he pointed in the direction in which Turpin was coming.

"Pull up!" he screamed. "Pull up, or I'll fire and blow you to bits!"

Dick Turpin heard these words, and so did the officers.

Both looked towards the toll-house, and both, by the aid of the bright beams of the moon, saw the toll-man at the window with the blunderbuss in his hand.

The officers raised a shout of exultation when they saw this unexpected ally.

Dick's situation was now truly desperate.

He could hear the thundering hoofs of his pursuers.

Black Bess must leap the gate.

Steadily he led her to it.

He uncoiled the lash of the whip from round his hand, and grasped it firmly by the handle.

Then he smacked it twice.

The unexpected sounds made a marvellous impression upon his steed.

With three bounds she reached the gate.

Then, snorting loudly, she gave another bound, just as Turpin for the third time smacked his whip.

Up into the air rose the gallant creature, clearing the obstruction bravely.

She left full a foot to spare.

A cry of astonishment came from the lips of the toll-man when he witnessed this, as he believed, impossible feat.

So surprised was he, that he forgot he held a blunderbuss in his hand, and, though his finger was on the trigger, he did not fire.

Black Bess reached the ground with a scarcely perceptible jar, and then bounded forwards at full speed.

Ejaculations of rage burst from the lips of the police-officers when they saw their prey again escape them, at the very moment when they believed they had him safely in their clutches.

A moment before, the advantage was all on their side, and now just the contrary was the case.

It was quite clear that not one of their horses was equal to the task of leaping the gate, and they wisely forebore to make even the attempt.

With a chorus of imprecations they drew up.

"Gate—gate!" they yelled. "Open the gate! Be quick! Open the gate!"

The toll-man had scarcely yet recovered from his surprise, and, in the confusion of the moment, he fired off the blunderbuss.

Luckily for the officers, it was not pointed towards them, or the consequences would have been serious.

As it was, there was a tremendous explosion, which seemed to shake the frail building to its foundations.

"Come down, you d—d fool," roared Mr. Wriggles, foaming with rage and impatience, for he knew what vast importance every moment was to him. "Why the devil couldn't you fire before, and do some good?"

"Who are you calling a d—d fool?" roared the toll-keeper, wrathfully. "Open the gate yourself, and be d—d to you!"

He slammed the window shut as he spoke.

Mr. Wriggles was convulsed with rage.

His countenance was contorted into all manner of shapes, and his mouth opened and shut like that of some huge fish gasping for air.

He was past swearing.

He took off his hat, and flung it with frantic vehemence upon the ground.

Then he caught hold of his hair, and tore it out by handfuls, each one of which he flung with the utmost fury into the road.

One of the officers, however, who happened to have his senses about him rather more than the rest, dismounted his steed, and, going to the gate, made an examination of its fastenings.

He found it was secured by a chain and padlock.

These obstructions he did not despair of overcoming.

Drawing a holster pistol from his pocket, he held the muzzle within an inch of the padlock and fired.

The effect of this was to shatter it completely.

"The gate is open!" cried this very clever officer, as he swung it back upon its hinges.

Without stopping to thank him, the whole of the troop dashed through, leaving him to mount his horse and follow in the best way he could.

Muttering curses at this treatment, for now his chance of obtaining the reward was considerably lessened, he turned round, but at that moment he found himself in the grasp of some one.

Turning round furiously, and inwardly rejoicing at having an object upon which he could vent his resentment, he found that his adversary was the toll-man.

"Hullo, my spark!" said the latter; "that's how you does it, is it? Blest if that isn't a fine look-out! Do you think I am going to be bilked of the toll like that? And to break the lock, too! I'll lock you up till you make the damage good."

"Don't be a fool," said the officer, whose anger cooled as soon as he saw the toll-keeper was a stronger and bigger man than himself. "Don't you see that we are officers of police in pursuit of a highwayman? We were bound to get through the gate, or lose the reward. Why the devil didn't you fire that blunderbuss of yours a little sooner than you did? and then you would have come into your share."

"I was flabbergasted," said the toll-keeper; "I was flabbergasted; that's what I was!"

"Well, let me go; I shall never catch him if you don't."

"But who's to pay the toll?"

"Mr. Wriggles."

"Who's he?"

"One of the head runners at Bow-street."

Upon receipt of this intelligence, the irate toll-man released the police-officer, who made immediate use of his freedom to mount his horse.

But while this little altercation was taking place, his comrades had got almost out of sight.

As for Turpin, he was nowhere to be seen.

Leaving this unfortunate officer to follow his companions in the best way he is able, and to catch them if he can, we will take a glance at the proceedings of our hero.

After Black Bess had jumped the gate, he felt a sensation of almost perfect security.

He knew that none of their horses would be able to do what his had just done.

And he knew that there must of necessity be some delay while the gate was opened.

During that space of time he should be able to do wonders.

The unwonted sound of a smacking whip still rung in the ears of Black Bess, and she sped along the road at a kind of frightened gallop.

Dick let her have her head freely, and go at her own pace.

A little exertion now would enable her to rest all the sooner.

Owing to the expedient of blowing the lock to pieces, which the officer had devised and adopted, the gate was got open much sooner than he expected.

The consequence of this was that the officers were in full pursuit of him before he had got quite such a good start as he intended to have.

Still the distance which intervened between them was considerable, for when the officers dashed through the gate in the tumultuous manner we have described, they could barely distinguish Turpin in the distance, though the road spread level and straight before them.

The horses had breathed a little during the altercation at the toll-gate, and they now set forward with renewed vigour.

The lash and spur were, however, liberally bestowed.

It soon became clear that Dick was gaining upon them.

They were afraid at first to admit this, but the fact soon became so palpable that it was impossible it could be concealed.

Still they did not despair of achieving their aim ultimately, if they could only keep him in sight.

But this Dick determined should not be.

While he had such an advantage it was manifestly his best policy to improve upon it, and distance his foes completely.

In pursuance of this determination, then, he continued to urge Black Bess to make good speed.

Certainly that night she had achieved wonders, but she showed no signs of exhaustion.

Away, away they went—the hedgerows and trees seeming to flit by them with lightning speed.

Maud Gouldman recovered from her swoon—indeed she had never been utterly unconscious of what was taking place around her.

Still she was too much alarmed either to move or speak.

And as for Dick, his whole thoughts were absorbed by the danger of his situation.

He had taken an opportunity once or twice to speak to his fair burden, but as he failed in each case to extract any reply, he concluded that she was still unconscious.

Suddenly, however, Black Bess stumbled and almost fell.

She regained her feet, however, with a tremendous effort.

But she galloped no longer.

She limped along, dead lame.

Full of despair and grief at this circumstance, and making no doubt now that he should be overpowered by his foes, Turpin forced her to come to a halt.

How terrible was his position now!

He dropped his whip, and wiped away the large beads of perspiration which had started forth upon his forehead.

"What is the matter? Why have you paused?" asked Maud faintly.

Dick dreaded to answer her.

"Wait," he said. "Sit still. I must dismount a moment."

"No, no."

"All will be well."

"Me, too. I must dismount if you do."

She clung to him as she spoke.

"Come, then," said Dick, who not only felt unable to refuse her request, but also knew there was no time to be lost in argument.

He assisted her to the ground as he spoke, and then dismounted himself with a beating heart.

What could be the cause of his mare's lameness?

What was the result of it?

Those were questions that would intrude themselves upon his mind, and to which he could frame no reply.

Stooping down, he proceeded to make an examination of her hoof.

What words could express his relief when he found she had picked up a large flat pebble.

It fitted completely in the cavity of the hoof, and, by pressing upon the frog, was the immediate cause of the lameness.

No doubt the effect would cease when the cause was removed.

He hoped so, however.

Quick as thought he drew out his knife, and by means of that removed the stone.

So far as he could see the foot was unhurt.

But, as he stooped down, his ears caught the dull beat of his pursuers' hoofs upon the hard roadway.

He took advantage of the occasion to move the saddle further back.

Then, hastily mounting, he held out his arms, and his companion gave a spring and was placed in her former seat.

She was, however, more comfortable than before, and her weight was not so likely to interfere with Black Bess's movements.

Now came the anxious moment.

Was the mare lame or not.

Dick was almost afraid to make the trial.

He set her in motion, but with a beating heart and a mind full of apprehension.

To his unspeakable relief and joy, however, he found that she stepped freely, and that she had sustained no hurt.

Thankful for this narrow escape, he allowed the reins to fall upon her neck.

She responded to the signal by darting forward at something like her old swift gallop.

But, looking back, Dick could just discern in the distance the figures of his pursuers.

Whether they saw him he was too far to judge.

It might be so.

His heart was now comparatively light, for he did not doubt that he should soon recover the ground he had lost.

But now he had a fresh cause for solicitude.

The moon, which had given so much light, was now almost level with the horizon.

In a few minutes she would set.

By this Dick knew that dawn could not be far distant.

Indeed, as he turned back and looked towards the east, he could distinguish a faint leaden tinge creeping over that portion of the heavens, and which seemed to increase with terrible rapidity.

He felt anxious respecting his companions.

He knew they would expect him with the dawn, according to their agreement, and yet here it was at hand, and he nearly a day's journey from his destination.

He was increasing his distance from it, too, every moment.

CHAPTER CCCLXI.

DICK TURPIN PUTS UP AT THE "BULL AND GATE" INN, AND MEETS WITH A SLIGHT SURPRISE.

THE moon sunk, and as soon as she disappeared below the horizon the dawn fairly came.

Over tree and bush stole the pale gray light, revealing all things through a kind of misty obscurity.

Again did Dick look behind him.

No trace of his pursuers could he see.

Nor did the least sound indicate their coming.

He had fairly distanced them, and he determined to quit the high road and make his way in a diagonal direction across the country, his intention being to reach Enfield Chase as soon as possible.

He would have turned towards it sooner only he did not want to lead his pursuers at all in that direction, and he resolved that should they by any means get upon his track, to immediately change his course, and not repair there until he was certain he could so in secrecy and safety.

As he expected, he had not far to go before he found one of those narrow lanes so common in England.

Down this he instantly turned, still hearing nothing of his foes, and leaving no trace by which they could follow him.

A lane better adapted for his purposes could not have been found.

It was serpentine to a degree, and on each side of it the hedgerows grew to a fabulous height.

These were, too, planted upon the top of high banks, so that as he sat in the saddle Dick could not see into the meadows.

This was a circumstance favourable in the extreme, for had the top of his hat been visible above the top of the hedge it might have been seen, but now all fear of such a thing as that was effectually precluded.

After a short time Dick slackened speed a little, but not much.

He was too near his enemies to feel comfortable.

The lane was of considerable length, and upon reaching its extremity Dick found that it debouched upon another high road similar to the one he had left.

The lane was continued on the opposite side, but deeming it now high time to change his direction, Dick turned to his right along this high road.

He imagined this must be the road back to London, and coming presently upon a milestone, he was confirmed in that idea.

This was a place quite unsuited to him, especially by daylight, so he took the next turning, still being careful to proceed towards his destination.

In this manner he travelled for full three hours, until, indeed, the day had really and truly began, it being about eight o'clock.

He was now in quite a different part of the country.

He had neither heard nor seen anything of his foes since he turned down the first lane.

He could not conceive any means by which they could get upon his track again.

Under these circumstances of security, he made up his mind to halt at the first inn he came to, the exterior of which took his fancy.

He found, besides, that it would be impolitic to continue to travel to his destination by daylight; for, though it is true he met with few persons, yet they looked at him and his burden with great curiosity, which, in some case, might have a dangerous result.

These thoughts were occupying his mind when he espied before him a place which he imagined would precisely answer his expectations.

It was a large, old-fashioned roadside hotel, standing back a long way from the road, with a tall sign-post near the footpath, and adjoining it a horse-trough.

Then, as for the house itself, it looked to be the very pink of cleanliness and order.

Dick had a great fancy for clean people.

He always fancied when he saw a house with clean windows and clean curtains—and, in fine, that an aspect of cleanliness overspread the whole building—that the inhabitants of such a house were kind-hearted and fit to be trusted.

Whether Dick was right or not we cannot say, but we do know that he had had a great deal of experience, and that ought to go for something.

Pleased, then, with the appearance of this roadside inn, the sign of which he saw was the "Bull and Gate," he rode up to the front door.

He dismounted before anyone appeared, and assisted Maud to dismount too, who never questioned him as to what he was about to do.

When he had done this, a stout, florid, middle-aged man, with a long pipe in his mouth, came to the door.

He looked at our travellers a moment, and Dick said—

"Have you any ostler on the premises? I suppose you have, as you advertise good accommodation for man and beast."

Dick pointed to the sign as he spoke.

"Arn't you seen Obi?"

"What Three-fingered Jack?"

"No, no! I mean our ostler. His name's Obadiah, only we call him Obi for shortness, you see."

"No, I havn't seen him."

"Oh! that boy, that boy! He'll drive me mad, I know he will. Now, sir, I am not afraid to say that he's fast asleep in the hay-loft this very minnit. But, never mind, sir, I'll take your horse."

"And I will go with you," said Dick.

"I'll take care on him, sir."

"I don't doubt that, but I'll go with you all the same."

Then, turning to Maud, he added, in a whisper—

"We shall stop here a little while. Black Bess must rest. Go into the house. You will meet with every attention from the landlady, who doubtless will come forward to receive you. I shall not be a moment before I rejoin you. I am only going to see where my horse is placed."

Maud Gouldman inclined her head in token of assent, and entered the inn as she had been requested.

"Lead on," said Turpin, addressing the landlord, who looked all the surprise he felt at the appearance of his visitors. "Lead on to the stables, and I will follow you."

He took hold of Black Bess by the bridle as he spoke, and the landlord at once started off in the direction of the stables.

Dick kept close at his heels.

"You wouldn't believe," said the landlord, "what trouble I have with that Obi. He's the aggravatinest lad that ever lived. I can't keep him awake. He sleeps all night and all day too, and there's no such thing as rousing him. I'll warrant we find him fast asleep in the hayloft."

"Why do you keep him, then, if his services are of so little value?"

"Ah! there it is.'

"Where?"

"Why, it isn't me at all, you see, but my wife

"Oh! indeed."

"You see, she has taken a kind of fancy to Obi, so its no good my complaining, or anyone else saying a word against the lad. She shuts her ears to it all."

"And what is the reason of her partiality?"

"Eh?"

"I say, why is Obi a favourite?"

"Ah! there you puzzle me completely. You see, women is such rum creturs. There's no accounting for them or their tastes."

"Very true."

"But here is the stable, sir. Just lead your horse in, for the place happens to be empty just at present; and then you come up into the loft, and there we shall find Obi, I will wager my life."

Dick led Black Bess over the threshold of the stable, and she walked into one of the stalls, and put her head in the manger in the most natural manner possible.

Almost before the landlord knew what he was about, Dick had divested his mare of the whole of her trappings, and put a halter over her head.

The saddle and bridle he hung on the end of the stall, in such a manner as to be readily taken hold of.

He requested the landlord to allow them to remain there, for he had officiously stepped forward, and was about to carry them off to the harness-room.

They now set off to find the ostler.

The landlord pointed to a ladder fixed perpendicularly against the wall, which led up into the loft, and commenced ascended it.

Dick followed him closely.

The loft overhead was profoundly dark, and Dick did not venture to stir from the top of the ladder until the landlord had removed the shutter which covered the circular aperture.

The place was then, comparatively speaking, well illuminated.

There was a plentiful supply of hay and straw in the loft, and, on going to one corner, there they found the ostler, snoring away as if for a wager.

Dick looked with some curiosity at this somnolent individual.

Imagine a lad about eighteen years of age, short, and so enormously fat as to make it a debatable matter whether he was not broader than he was long.

His clothes fitted him almost as tightly as his skin, and how he managed to get in and out of them seemed a mystery.

The seams, indeed, had burst in many places, leaving the stitches gapingly visible.

Such was the ostler of the "Bull and Gate," and the particular favourite of the landlady.

Dick Turpin regarded him for a minute or two in silence, and then the landlord said—

"What do you think of that, sir?"

"I am not at all surprised at his sleeping so much."

"No?"

"Not a bit."

"How is that?"

"Why, the fellow is so enormously fat that I don't suppose he could keep awake if his life depended upon it."

"I don't suppose he would."

"And you have tried to cure him?"

"Oh! yes."

"But failed?"

"As you see. I gave the job up in despair."

"Now I'll tell you how to cure him."

"How? Tell me, and I will thank you for ever."

"Oh! the means are very simple. I wonder the same thought has not struck you."

"What is it?"

"Starve him!"

"Starve him?"

"Yes. Don't let him have anything to eat for a week, and you will soon find a difference in him."

"Not give him anything to eat?"

"Nothing at all."

"Why, my wife would break her heart."

"Eh?"

"I say my wife would break her heart."

"What for?"

"If he had nothing to eat. Why, she is always fretting about him, and feeding him when he happens to be awake. She says she is sure the poor fellow can't have half enough to eat."

"Ha! ha!"

"You laugh."

"I do, my friend. I can't help it. You may depend you will have to put up with your sleepy ostler, or else get rid of him altogether."

"Oh! that's quite out of the question."

"Is it?"

"Yes; my wife would never submit to that, I feel confident."

"Ah! well, it can't be helped then. Wake him up."

"I will, sir. But he do sleep uncommonly sound."

"He appears to do so."

The landlord was doubtless experienced in waking Obi, for he stooped down and caught hold of his ear with so much violence that Dick thought he would surely have pulled it off.

It had the desired effect of arousing him.

He rubbed his eyes, and looked about him with a stupid, silly expression.

But when Dick saw he had fairly got his eyes open, he took half-a-crown from his pocket, and said—

"Look here, Obi. Here's half-a-crown waiting to go into your pocket, if you will just rub a horse down with a wisp of straw."

These words had an astonishing effect.

The ostler sprang up, and sleep seemed to fly from his eyelids at once.

"Come on," said Dick. "I'll show you the horse."

Obi manifested every desire to follow him, so Dick descended the ladder.

In another moment all three stood in the stable.

Obi set about his work with right good will, and in a manner that showed he was well aware of what he was about.

But half-a-crown was a stimulant he rarely met with.

Dick stood by according to custom, and saw his mare properly attended to, for he knew by experience that ostlers were not to be trusted.

This done, he fed her himself, and then put the promised guerdon into Obi's hand.

His dull eyes sparkled when he felt the contact of the precious metal, and he consigned the coin to his pocket with an air of the greatest satisfaction.

Dick could not help being much amused by this ludicrous incident of the fat ostler, and as he walked towards the house he felt no small degree of curiosity to see the landlady who had made choice of such an extraordinary pet.

It might be that Dick surmised the occasion of her partiality, but if he did he made no remark to the landlord concerning it.

Upon entering the inn, the first person he saw was the landlady.

He was a little surprised at her appearance.

She was exactly the reverse of the ostler.

She was very tall, and very, very thin. Indeed, she would have done well to personate the character of a living skeleton.

There seemed to be scarcely an ounce of flesh on her bones.

She had, too, rather a vinegar-looking expression of countenance, and she looked at Dick closely and suspiciously.

He, however, looked at her with a smile upon his countenance.

He was thinking of the fat, sleepy ostler, and contrasting the two with each other.

He inquired after Maud, and was told that she was in a private room, awaiting his arrival.

The door was pointed out to Dick, who made his way with rather a slow step towards it.

CHAPTER CCCLXII.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD GOULDMAN AT LENGTH COME TO AN UNDERSTANDING WITH EACH OTHER.

FOR the first time since his interview with Maud in the stable, Dick Turpin began to have a little reflection.

So many incidents had taken place of the most startling character, and they had succeeded each other with so much rapidity, that he had really neither opportunity nor leisure for cool thought.

Now, however, his recollections almost overpowered him.

It was in consequence of this, then, that he walked so slowly towards the door of the room in which Maud was awaiting him.

When he reached its threshold, he hesitated and faltered.

"I have acted like a villain," he muttered; "like a base villain! I see it now while I am in my cool blood, but I did not then. My brain was in a whirl. I love her! I feel that I love her, and, unfortunately for her, she seems to love me too! But I ought not to have taken advantage of her passion in the way I have done. I ought to have resisted all her entreaties. It is too late now, however. No, not too late. It is not too late yet to make reparation for the fault I have committed. I will do so though I break my heart! I will do so! I am resolved!"

Having come to this determination, Dick Turpin, still repeating the words, "I am resolved," entered the apartment.

He found Maud seated near the fire in a pensive attitude.

But upon seeing him enter, she rose and came towards him with a smile.

With the quickness of a woman's apprehension, she saw, however, that some change had taken place.

She drew back suddenly, and then looked at him with a wondering expression.

Dick had composed his face into a stern regard.

He felt that he had a difficult part to go through, and one that would require all his fortitude and self-command to sustain.

He tried to speak.

But his voice failed him.

"What has happened?" asked Maud, at length. "Something terrible has taken place. Tell me what it is. Let me know the worst at once. I can bear anything better than suspense."

"I will tell you," said Dick, huskily. "Sit down a moment."

He placed a chair as he spoke.

"And you sit down too."

"No, I will stand."

Maud turned pale, and looked up into his face.

This total change of manner alarmed her. She had never seen Turpin under such an aspect before.

She was at a loss to think what it could portend.

The prominent idea in her mind was that he had found himself menaced by some fresh and terrible danger.

Anxiously and suspensely, therefore, she looked up into his countenance, eager to catch the first words that should fall from his lips.

"Lady," said our hero, "you see before you one who has, for the first time in his life, acted a villain's part."

"How? I do not understand you."

"I will explain, and endeavour to make my meaning clear. To begin, I love you! I am not ashamed to make the confession. I love you! How much it would be hard for me to say. Our meeting was a strange one, and the events which afterwards occurred were much stranger still. The tendency of all was the same. It was to bring me into closer connection with you; and the result of this was the love of which I speak, and which I found totally beyond the power of my control"——

"But I"—— began Maud Gouldman.

"Pardon me," said Dick, interrupting her. "Hear me out. I beg that you will do me the favour to listen to all that I have to say. You know what I am. I am a highwayman, a violator of the public peace, a law-breaker, a fugitive from justice, a criminal so far as committing robberies is concerned. For me to raise my eyes towards you was wrong—wrong in the extreme. But I did so. For me, however, to love something, all beauty, all goodness, all purity of heart, was nothing surprising. Who could remain insensible to such attractions? Presently, however, as time passed on, though I religiously forbore to allow the faintest trace of my passion to be visible, several little things occurred which generated a suspicion in my breast that you have conceived a similar passion to myself. At first I refused to give credit to the evidence before me, but soon I had proof. I regretted this, but still I thought the feeling was nothing more than gratitude inspired by those services which it was my good fortune to be in a position to render you."

"One word," said Maud. "Let me speak one word."

"Nay, listen. I have but little more to say. Although my own love for you was so great, I made up my mind never to avow it. It would have been folly and presumption for me to have done so. I determined, then, to see you once more—to to bid you a farewell which I intended to be an eternal one, and, having parted from you, to have adopted such precautions as would have prevented the possibility of a future meeting.

"There is a gulf between us, so wide and so deep that to cross it would be impossible. I came—I saw you. I looked, as I thought, for the last time upon your countenance. But I was weak. I ought to have resisted the temptation of bidding you adieu alone. However, I did not. And here let me frame the only possible excuse I can for the base blackness of my conduct. In our conversation we were surprised by the sudden appearance of the police-officers. From that moment all was confusion, and that confusion has continued until this moment, and now you are here with me."

"I am here," said Maud, quietly, "and of my own free will. You have suspected my love. It overmasters every other feeling. I know what you are. You have never disguised yourself, and I am willing to dare all and share all with you."

When he heard these words, Dick's first impulse was to spring forward and clasp the lovely girl to his heart.

But a second thought enabled him to restrain the impulse.

His countenance assumed a more mournful expression.

"Alas! alas!" he said.

"Why do you say alas?"

"Because I regret to hear what I have just heard. Oh! lady, I pray you pause. Pause and reflect. Pause, ere it be too late. We were never intended for each other. You know not what I am—you know not the nature of my life."

"I care not," said Maud. "I love you. Fervently, indeed, do I wish that you were anything but what you are. That, however, is useless. The past cannot be recalled."

"It can be forgotten."

"By some."

"Let it be by you; forget that you ever saw me."

"No, no. That would be impossible. I have seen you under many aspects. In the hour of danger I have seen you cool, collected, and daring. I have witnessed your courage, your devotion, your singlemindedness—in fact, all those qualities which call forth admiration. What am I? An orphan—a dependant on the bounty of another."

"Do not depreciate yourself," said Dick. "I know too well the whole circumstances of your life. You are as far above me in station as you are in virtue and innocence. Lady, I pray you, forget this mad infatuation. Forget, as I before asked you, that Dick Turpin ever had existence."

"Never! never!"

"Oh! you wound me to the heart."

"Will you listen to me?"

"I am bound to do so."

"But I mean, will you pay attention to what I say, and believe that I am in earnest and sincere in all I say?"

"I cannot refuse you."

"Well, then, let me tell you that I have well weighed the consequences of the step I have taken. I knew you loved me—I was quite sure of it: a thousand things have occurred to place it beyond all doubt. For my own part

I loved you. At first I fought against the feeling, and strove to subdue it. In vain. The more I tried the stronger did my love become. I then relinquished the struggle; I relied upon your love. I had the vanity to feel that I could do so with security. I devised our parting. You saw it. Then came the hour of danger. What I felt I cannot describe. I had but one idea, and that was that I must be with you. Need I say more? I am here."

Dick Turpin listened to these words with mingled emotions.

He saw before him a girl—young, inexperienced, and enthusiastic. He saw her carried away by the violence of a romantic passion. What should he do?

The position was a trying one.

Had he been heart-whole, the case would have been simple.

Now it was complicated by the love he felt for her.

It required something more than human strength to be proof against the temptation.

Who could renounce the proffered love of one who was adored with all the ardour of a first affection?

To the justice of our hero be it said, he made the attempt.

It is probable that, under no other circumstances than those which actually occurred, would Maud Gouldman have left Wiuberry Hall under his protection.

Now, however, he felt that fatal step had been taken—that her reputation would be sullied—that for her to return would be impossible.

Torn and distracted by contending feelings, he endeavoured to address her.

"You tell me you have duly considered the step you have taken: let me hope for your own dear sake that you have done so. Oh! Maud, dearest," he exclaimed, taking her hand and passionately pressing it, "I love you a thousand times more than life itself. I would not have you share the dangers and hardships of such a life as mine for worlds; such a fate would be too horrible. Hitherto, you have seen but one scene in my life. I am a fugitive. I am allowed no rest—I am hunted from one place to another by the minions of the law. It is as much as ever I can bear; but what would become of you? Oh! my heart bleeds when I think of what I have done! It would have been better a thousand times that I had suffered the officers to slay me than have fled, taking you with me. But, alas! my love blinded me, and I have done you an injury which I cannot repair."

"I cannot allow you to accuse yourself of that. Whatever injury I may have sustained has been of my own bringing on, and I alone ought to be the sufferer. Listen to me. So far from regretting the step I have taken, I should do the same thing again."

"Impossible!"

"I am speaking of myself. And now I have another word to say, for I hope we shall never need another such an interview of explanations. Much as I loved you, I did not leave my home with the intention of becoming a highwayman's bride. No; I saw that you were qualified for better things, and trusted I had the power to reclaim you. You have spoken of your mode of life—its perils and inconveniences. But you spoke as though they must endure for ever. Why not quit this dangerous course? You are young, and there is time to repent."

"Alas!"

"Again that word."

"I regret that you could have set out with an idea so chimerical. You do not know that in England, if a man once transgresses the laws, he is an outcast from society. He can never enter it again. It is so with me. Dick Turpin has for so long been a highwayman that the world would not allow him to be anything else. You must dismiss that as a vision."

"I cannot, and I will not," said Maud, with energy. "It is a thousand pities that one so gifted by nature as you are should so abuse those gifts. But we will quit the theme. Farewell!"

She rose abruptly as she spoke.

"Farewell!" repeated Turpin, in astonishment.

"Yes, farewell. Mine is a wretched lot. I thought you loved me—could have laid my life of it. For your sake I have left home and all that I hold dear, and even you spurn me from you."

She burst into a passionate flood of tears as she spoke.

The sight of those tears at once drove away all Turpin's hesitation.

He wavered in his strong purpose.

Springing towards her, he clasped her by the hands, and in a voice broken by emotion said—

"Oh! Maud, Maud. You know not how false are the words you have just uttered. I do love you, and it is because I do love you that I am acting as I now am. Believe me, a time will come when, looking back upon this scene, you will rejoice that—that"——

"Never," said Maud, through her tears. "I comprehend your conduct. I know its motives. I comprehended all from the first. I love you for it all the more. In your single-heartedness you would not hesitate to sacrifice all that you hold dear. But could I be happy in knowing your despair? No. You have acknowledged, have you not, that I have already committed myself in the eyes of the world?"

"Is it not so?"

"I care not if it is. I rejoice that I have done so. I cannot return. That is impossible. Tell me, then, which you will do. You have the choice of two alternatives."

"What are they?"

"You must either leave me friendless, alone, and unprotected upon the wide world, or take me with you."

"Fain would I be spared either."

"I know the feeling which prompts you to make that remark. But I am here. To return is impossible. I would die rather. We love each other. The fact cannot and need not be disguised. Why, then, should we make ourselves wretched when happiness is within our reach? I have told you that I am ready and willing to share your lot, whatever it may be; still it will be with a hope of bringing you to better things. Choose, then, between our mutual happiness or our mutual despair. The fate of both of us is in your hands!"

Turpin was silent.

He saw too well the position of the young girl before him, and yet he dreaded to allow himself to be convinced by her reasoning.

He hesitated, and Maud observed.

Gently she approached him, and, stealing her arms round his neck, laid her face against his breast.

She conquered!

CHAPTER CCCLXIII.

DICK TURPIN'S THREE COMRADES HAVE A REMARKABLE ADVENTURE IN ENFIELD CHASE, AND MAKE AN IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

Having traced thus far the proceedings of Dick Turpin and his fair companion, we must request the reader to direct his attention to Enfield Chase, where, during Turpin's absence, events of the greatest interest have been taking place.

It will be recollected that the last we saw of Dick's three faithful comrades was when they had bid him farewell upon the outskirts of the forest.

They stood for some time after his departure without moving or speaking.

They listened to the sound of his progress through the wood.

But gradually those sounds became inaudible, and then, turning round, they took their way to the inmost recesses of the wood, to spend the time in the best manner they were able until their comrade should return.

They felt a considerable amount of uneasiness respecting him, for they knew the enterprize was a dangerous one.

Yet, such was the dread that they all had of inaction, and such was the despision they felt for danger, that they all coveted the undertaking.

"This is awful dull work," said Claude Duval, as they walked down a broad glade in the forest. "Here we have told over all our exploits, and have got nothing left to talk about."

"It is dull work," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but I am in hopes it won't continue long."

"If I thought it would," exclaimed Claude Duval, "I would be off this moment."

"Fair and softly," said Tom King. "We are safe."

"A fig for safety."

"That's all very well; but you were one of the first to be in favour of a rest."

"I know that."

"And now you are the first to get tired of it."

"I can't help that. Here we are cooped up in this wilderness of a place, with nothing to do and no chance of meeting with an adventure."

"I'll tell you what you shall do, Claude."

"What?"

"Tell us the story of your life. You have promised to do so many a time, and where would you find a better opportunity than the present?"

"Capital. That will pass the time away better than anything else. Come on, Claude. We will go back to our old quarters, and then, Claude, you must begin."

"Well, I don't mind."

"Come on, then."

Having made up their minds to do something, our friends felt more at ease, and strode with a more rapid step.

They had made up their minds, in order to diminish the chances of discovery, to get always as far as possible into the heart of the chase, and it was towards this spot that they now made their way.

The little dell, or dingle, so full of natural beauties, where they had first halted, was where they had fixed upon.

They had not been tempted to stray far from that lovely spot.

It was sheltered and retired.

A rather long walk brought them to it.

But at length they arrived.

The moon was shining brightly, so they were able to find their path with the greatest ease.

Seating themselves near the root of a gigantic tree, they all prepared to listen to the story of Claude's early adventures, of which they were perfectly in ignorance.

Claude seemed to gather his thoughts and recollections together for a moment, and then he said—

"If I am to begin with the beginning, I promise you I shall have rather a long story to tell."

"So much the better. We shall have plenty of time to listen to you between now and daybreak."

"So you will."

"Begin at the beginning, then."

"Very good. My parents, then"——

"Go on. Why do you pause?"

"Did you hear nothing?"

"No."

"But I did."

"Nonsense. Go on with your story, and don't keep us in suspense."

"I tell you I heard something."

"What was it like?"

"I can hardly tell you. Listen a moment, we may perhaps hear it again. I am certain I was not mistaken."

All now listened attentively, for, situated as they were, it behoved them to pay attention to all sounds of an unusual character.

For some moments all was still.

The trees rustled slighly as their topmost branches swayed to and fro in the night wind, but that was all.

Claude himself began to fancy that his ears had deceived him, and was about to say as much, when all three were startled by a repetition of the sound he had before heard.

It was a low, faint, moaning cry, as of some living creature in great pain.

There was no mistaking the sound, nor the character of it, and our friends sprang to their feet.

There seemed a chance of an adventure.

Although they had heard the sound, they were unable to say with precision from which direction it proceeded.

Before they ventured to move then, they listened for a repetition of it, in order to have some guide for their footsteps.

They had not long to wait.

The sound came again.

But this time with much greater distinctness than before.

Having listened for the express purpose of ascertaining the direction from which the sound had come, and being in anticipation of hearing it, they were now all three in a position to say which course they ought to take.

Without uttering a word further, Claude Duval sprang forward, and the others immediately followed him.

Regardless altogether of the various obstacles in his way, Claude strode on in a straight line for the point he wished to reach.

But, having gone for some considerable distance without meeting with anything to reward their search, and without hearing another cry confirmatory of the previous ones, they paused and once more listened.

As they did so, they naturally looked around them.

They then noticed, for the first time, that they were in a portion of the forest which they did not recognize as having seen before.

It had a much wilder look than the part they had frequented.

The trees were larger and grew closer to each other, so that their branches, intermingling above, made one huge canopy, through the interstices of which the moon's rays streamed with a remarkably beautiful effect.

The undergrowth, too, was much more luxuriant and of a more impenetrable character.

At every step they took they experienced a constantly increasing difficulty in forcing their way.

The scene itself was, however, grandly and sublimely beautiful.

But, although they looked around them and noted the different peculiarities of the landscape we have mentioned, they did not bestow much attention upon it.

They were occupied with the mysterious sound which had interrupted the tale Claude was about to tell, and longing to hear it once more.

They were not kept much longer in suspense.

The sound came again.

But this time, although they were quite certain in their own minds that they had drawn considerably nearer to the spot from which it emanated, it was much more feeble than on the preceding occasions.

It had, too, a more wailing and mournful character.

Evidently, however, our friends had some distance further to go before they would be able to clear up the mystery.

But they did not care much for that.

Noting the direction from which it came, they struggled through the underwood with the best speed they were able to make.

At every step they took the scenery grew wilder and wilder, while the ground rose into deceptive mounds, or sank into treacherous hollows, thus making their route very difficult and perplexing.

But, in the pursuit of any important object, all minor inconveniences are disregarded; and so the three highwaymen did not heed those obstacles from which, under ordinary circumstances, they would have felt inclined to shrink.

For some considerable time the ground had had an upward tendency, though the rise was so gradual that it was some time before they noticed it.

Now the ascent became abrupt.

After proceeding thus for a little more than a hundred yards, they came to a sudden halt.

It was Claude who stopped first, and he called out to his companions to follow his example.

They did so at once, and without hesitation.

To their unbounded astonishment, they found themselves upon the brink of a tremendous precipice.

Had they incautiously advanced a couple of steps further, they must have fallen headlong into the abyss and perished.

It was a wonder and a mercy that Claude saw the danger when he did, for the brink of the precipice was overgrown with shrubs and underwood, which would have almost allured anyone to destruction.

Moreover, the sides of the precipice, in some places, formed a roothold for trees.

The danger of this spot at once ceased when its nature was known.

Cautiously, then, our three friends approached the verge of the precipice.

By the aid of the moon, shining as she was in a perfectly unclouded sky, they were able to see about them with great ease and distinctness.

As nearly as they could estimate, the precipice was about a hundred feet in depth.

But in their position it was difficult for them to form any accurate idea of distance.

Below them was a small open space, upon which

[THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN KIDNAP THE PARSON.]

nothing grew, owing probably to the rocky nature of the soil.

Beyond that the forest stretched as far as the eye could reach, and from their elevated position they commanded a tolerably extensive prospect.

Nothing was visible but tree-tops.

The precipice consisted of an almost perpendicular wall of rock.

Its colour was white, and it glistened strangely as the moon's rays poured upon it.

But, on looking down at the ground beneath, the whole attention of our friends was immediately absorbed by perceiving the dim outline of a shadowy-looking figure.

As they gazed their ears were assailed by the same strange cry.

There was no doubt that it ascended from the ground below, and from whence could it proceed save from the shadowy figure which they could just faintly distinguish?

There was nothing else to be seen from which such a cry could come.

More intently, then, they gazed down upon it, and strained their eyes in a vain endeavour to make out what it was.

But the distance was too great, and the light not sufficient, to enable them to do this.

It might be a human form—indeed, it looked more like one than aught else.

But the cry which they had heard?

Was that human?

Their curiosity was stimulated to the utmost degree by these questions, which naturally suggested themselves to their minds.

With one accord, they looked around them at the nature of the place upon which they stood, to ascertain what means there was of reaching the ground below.

It seemed clear they would have to make a considerable detour in order to do this.

While they were thus engaged, they again heard the moaning sound, and this time they fancied they could faintly distinguish a word.

And that word was help.

But it might be fancy only; for they were by no means certain that the form beneath them was a human one.

"We must descend somehow or other," said Tom King. "Surely there must be a means of doing so; and if it is, as I suspect, a fellow-creature lying at the base of these rocks, we ought to lose no time in rendering such assistance as lies in our power."

"Certainly—certainly!" cried his comrades.

"Follow me, then, and we will try if we cannot find some means of descending to the foot of this rock."

As Tom King spoke he led the way along the top of the precipice.

His companions followed closely in his footsteps.

The rock seemed to extend as far as they could see both to the left and right of them, and varied but little in its average height.

They had no resource but to follow along this, for it was quite impossible for them to lower themselves down the side of the abyss.

Presently, however, they noticed that the depth to the ground below materially and rapidly diminished.

This was caused not by the ground they were upon tending downwards, but by that below rising upwards.

In a little while, no doubt, all became of one uniform, unbroken level.

But they did not go far enough to ascertain this.

As soon as the depth of the abyss had decreased sufficiently for them to lower themselves with safety, they did so.

Upon feeling their feet touch the ground, they hastened along, keeping close to the face of the rock.

But now they had changed their position, the general aspect of the place was, of course, changed also, and they were unable to recognise the spot where they had seen the figure lying.

CHAPTER CCCLXIV.

THE DYING POACHER TELLS THE STORY OF HIS LIFE, AND REVEALS TO OUR FRIENDS THE SECRET CAVE AMONG THE ROCKS.

In this delemma, then, they paused, after having gone, as they imagined, far enough to reach the desired spot.

But they could see nothing lying at the base of the rocks.

This was annoying.

They had, however, no resource but to remain profoundly still, and await a repetition of the cry.

But none came.

Puzzled and perplexed, the three highwaymen, after having waited for a considerable time in vain, set forward, under the impression that they had not gone far enough to reach the object of their search.

But every now and then they would pause and listen.

In this manner they went a long distance—so far that all three unanimously agreed they must have passed the spot where the figure had been lying.

Under this impression they retraced their steps.

Scarcely had they turned than the moaning sound came upon their ears.

It was somewhere close at hand, and they at once proceeded in the direction from which it appeared to come.

They were now more fortunate than they had been.

Lying close to the trunk of a huge tree, which was situated about twenty yards from the face of the rock, was a man.

There could be no mistake about the matter, for through an opening in the trees came a bright ray of light, which revealed him fully.

In all probability it was from the lips of this man that the startling cry had come.

His dress was that of a common labouring peasant. Indeed, he seemed to be nothing more than a farm-labourer.

He was quite motionless, and lay with his face upturned.

The moon's rays fell upon it with full force.

It was furrowed and swarthy, and the lower part of it was buried in a beard—rough, shaggy, and of many days' growth.

Our friends were not a little surprised to see this man. He was the first they had seen since they had been in the chase, and they imagined they had the place entirely to themselves.

Now it became clear that this was a mistaken notion.

Upon a closer approach, this man presented every appearance of death, with which all three of the highwaymen were familiar.

For some moments they stood gazing upon him in silence, until, at length, they were startled by a faint moan, which came from the lips of the apparently dead man.

Its character was precisely similar to the sounds which they had previously heard, and which had so much attracted their attention and curiosity.

"He is not dead," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack. "Poor fellow! I wonder who he is? But never mind, let him be who he may, he shall not perish if this will revive him. I have nothing better to offer."

As he spoke, Sixteen-String Jack produced a small flask of brandy of the strongest quality.

He always made a rule of carrying this with him, not for the purpose of drinking it, but in order to have a stimulant should any accident happen to make one necessary.

He pulled out the cork, and requested Claude to raise up his head a little while he poured some of the spirit down his throat.

This Claude set about doing; but, upon nearing the prostrate man, he saw him show symptoms of reviving, and endeavour to commence a struggle with him.

He evidently feared him as an enemy.

But, taking no notice of this, Claude raised his head as his companion had requested.

Jack now approached, and, in spite of the feeble resistance the man made, poured a good drop of the brandy down his throat.

A violent spasm now convulsed his frame, but it quickly passed away, and then the man, opening his eyes, glared wildly around him.

He saw our friends in a moment, and, under the impression that they must be enemies, tried to rise to his feet, and either escape or attack them.

But his strength was insufficient for this, and he sank back again.

Jack made a sign to Claude that he wished to renew the application of the brandy.

Again Claude raised his head, and again Jack poured a quantity of spirit down his throat.

This time the man was conscious of what was taking place, for he made no struggle as he did on the former occasion.

He swallowed the brandy, but with great difficulty, and then he said, in a faint voice:

"Spare your trouble, spare your trouble. You need not take me prisoner. There is not half-an-hour's life in me! I can feel that. So let me lie where I am, and die under the shade of the old trees!"

The highwaymen were at first not a little surprised at the style of this address, but they soon understood how it was.

The dying man—for such he had proclaimed himself, and such he appeared to be—mistook them for his foes.

But Tom King soon spoke, and tried to remove this erroneous impression.

"You are labouring under some mistake," he said. "We are no enemies of yours, and are even inclined, let you be who you may, to be your friends. Look at us, and be undeceived. We heard your cries from a distance, and with some difficulty have traced you to this spot."

It was evident these words reached the senses of the man, for, making a great effort, he raised himself upon one arm, and looked about him. The forms of the highwaymen were clearly enough visible in the moonbeams.

But he passed his hands over his eyes, as though his sight was dim and he wished to clear it.

"No—no," he said. "You do not wear the garb of keepers. I can see that, now, although my sight is going fast."

At hearing these words, the three friends exchanged significant glances.

"Can we do anything for you?" asked Sixteen-String Jack. "If so, do not be afraid to speak."

"No—no," replied the man. "You can do nothing for me, but leave me here to die."

He sank back again upon the ground as he spoke.

"Speak to us," said Claude. "We have heard in the silence of the night strange and unearthly cries. Did they proceed from your lips?"

"They did."

"And, as we stood upon the top of the rocks, yonder, was it you we saw lying down at the base of them?"

"It was."

"And you crawled here?"

"Yes."

"But—pardon me—how comes it that you are here alone, and, as you say, dying? You can speak to us in all confidence, and rely upon our doing no harm to you."

"I will tell you," said the man. "I will tell you."

He again, and apparently with great pain, raised himself up upon one arm.

"I will tell you what has brought me into this plight. You see me now—you see what I am. Look upon me, for in me you behold a victim of the accursed game laws."

"You are a poacher, then?"

"That is the name which is applied to me."

"But how have you been wounded?"

"Let me tell my tale in my own fashion, and do not interrupt me. I shall live just long enough to tell you the whole, perhaps, but not longer; for I can feel that my injuries are mortal."

"What is the nature of them?" asked Sixteen-String Jack. "Let us know that, and then, perhaps, we may be able to relieve you."

"No—no. My hurts are past all relief, even the most skilful; but if you wish to know how it is I am here—how it is I am wounded; if you wish to listen to a tale of terrible, cruel, and unjust oppression, listen to what I have to say. If you do not, I will be silent."

And he sank back again upon the ground.

"Nay, speak," said Claude Duval, whose curiosity was strongly excited. "Let us hear what you have to say. We will promise not to interrupt you; and, as for harming you, that is quite out of the question, for we are fugitives from justice ourselves."

As he expected, the man was somewhat reassured by this piece of information, and he raised himself once more, but this time in such a manner that he partly rested himself against the trunk of the tree beneath which he was lying.

Then he spoke.

"Two years ago," he said, "I was looked upon as being the smartest young fellow in the country side. My parents were well to do, and I was their only child.

"Nothing important in my life took place till about two years ago, when I fell in with a company of young men, all somewhere about my own age.

"Well, they were free, rollicking fellows, every one of them; and nothing delighted them so much as sport and mischief.

"We carried on all manner of innocent freaks for a long time, and included among them snaring a hare now and then, or shooting a few pheasants occasionally.

"We had more than one skirmish with the keepers, and the intelligence was quickly communicated by them to the lord of the manor.

"He was a man good enough in many things, but he was what is called an upholder of the game laws—that is to say, he would only allow those the pleasure of sporting that he thought proper, and that favour was never accorded to his tenants, one of whom my father was.

"He sent a very threatening message concerning me and my depredations, as he called them; and my father, who knew his violent and vindictive temper, cautioned me to be careful.

"Well, so I was for a few days, until I fell in with the old lot again, and they proposed another night excursion. I had my father's warning ringing in my ears, and, for a moment, I hesitated; but unfortunately for me, I went.

"It seemed the keepers had some inkling of what was going to take place, and had made preparations accordingly. At first we saw nothing of them, and soon bagged a considerable quantity of game; and, when we had everyone of us got something or other in our possession, the keepers came upon us suddenly, and in great numbers. A desperate struggle ensued, and many hard blows were given on both sides.

"Several of my companions escaped.

"The remainder were taken prisoners.

"I was among the latter.

"We were placed in very safe custody, for our captors determined that none of us should escape.

"In the morning we were brought before the lord of the manor, who, in conjunction with two other gentlemen, officiated as magistrates.

"You may guess, under these circumstances, what sort of mercy we had to expect.

"I knew, in a moment, we should be punished with the utmost rigour of the law.

"The crime, for such it was called, was clearly brought home against all of us.

"We were, in consequence, committed to take our trial at the next assizes.

"Bail was refused, although many offered it, and we were all haled off to the county jail, there to await the next assizes.

"This would be in nearly six months' time, for the last assizes were just over.

"In the jail, then, we were forced to remain until the expiration of the time I have mentioned, so we already suffered one sentence of imprisonment before we were tried.

"A good deal of indignation was expressed by several persons when they learned the particulars of the affair; but that made not the least difference to the lord of the manor, who determined that we should be severely dealt with, and made an example of.

"At length the assizes came round, and we were duly brought up for trial. I knew what we had to expect when the lord of the manor was our prosecutor.

"In short, for I may as well make an end of my tale, we were all sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment in the common jail.

"I quite despair of making you comprehend what an effect this affair had upon my parents.

"I was the first in their family who had ever become liable to the law, and they felt the degradation keenly.

"Besides this, the lord of the manor was not content to wreak his vengeance solely upon myself. During my imprisonment the term of my father's lease, under which he held the farm, expired, and he refused to renew it. This was a severe blow to my father, who had laid out all the little capital he possessed upon the farm, and now he found himself obliged to sacrifice it, for the landlord was inexorable.

"They had to turn out of the farm almost at a moment's notice.

"That ruined him.

"He was already almost broken-hearted to think that his only child should be the inmate of a jail.

"Well, gentlemen, he pined and pined away, and placed as I was, what could I do to assist him in the least? Over and over again did I curse myself for my foolishness, the lord of the manor for his unkindness, and my country, whose laws permitted such monstrous evils to exist.

"The next blow that came was the death of my mother. She was ailing and delicate, and this sudden reverse of fortune was too much for her to bear in her weak state.

"This was, you may depend, a severe blow to my father. Indeed he never rallied from it, and, on the day when the term of my imprisonment expired, he died.

"There I stood, then, alone in the world, without a friend, and with the curse of a crime hanging over my head.

"I walked to my native village.

"But the people, when they saw me, all shrunk from me. I had the contamination of the prison-house about me."

CHAPTER CCCLXV.

THE POACHER'S STORY INCREASES IN INTEREST.

A VIOLENT fit of coughing seized upon the poacher at this moment, and interrupted the continuation of his strange narrative.

The three friends exchanged glances, and then bent the whole of their attention upon the form at their feet.

Tom King thought, from the tone of this cough, that it was feigned, with a view probably to concealing his emotion.

And such was really the case.

By an effort, however, the poacher recovered himself.

The brandy which had been poured down his throat had recalled, in a wonderful degree, his fast-expiring energies; but now he felt that his strength was waning fast, and he hastened to bring his story to a conclusion ere death should seize upon him and prevent him.

And, indeed, the highwaymen, as they looked down upon his countenance, which the ghastly moonbeams rendered so distinctly visible, felt no small apprehension that death would appear before he had time to finish, for the traces of it were already to be seen.

It was the emotions which this recapitulation of the past had conjured up that overmastered the poacher, but, having recovered himself, he continued—

"All shunned me, and mine was a proud spirit. I could not brook their aversion, and I determined they should see me no more.

"And so I turned my back upon my native village, with the resolution firmly fixed in my mind that I would never return to it.

"But where was I to go?

"That was a question which very soon obtruded itself upon my notice, and which demanded my immediate attention.

"But I could not reply to it.

"Wherever I went, the taint of the prison-house would be upon me. I should be shut out from all the ordinary employments of my fellow-men.

"These thoughts were gloomy enough, and my mind was gloomy, too.

"It was while I was in this state that I entered a road-side public-house—for I was hungry, tired, and thirsty, and felt as though I must have rest and refreshment before I proceeded a yard further.

"Upon entering the kitchen of the public-house, what was my surprise to find seated there the whole of my prison companions. I mean those with whom I had been captured, and who had shared the jail with me.

"They greeted me, of course, and I recognized them readily enough, for I felt there was a kind of bond of misfortune between us.

"All spoke bitterly of what we were compelled to endure for so trivial an offence, for we could not look upon it in any other light; and after we had sat awhile and partook somewhat freely of the good things the house afforded, we vowed to band ourselves together and have a deep and lasting revenge for what we had sufferad.

"We stayed at the public-house, talking the matter over, until night came, and then we went out.

"I ought to have told you that the place where this public-house was situated was a small village called Waltham.

"It is not very far from where we now are.

"Near this village there is a chase—almost as extensive as this one is.

"Towards this chase, then, which was only a short distance from the public-house, we went.

"We determined to take up our abode in it for the present, and fully concert our future proceedings.

"That very night, as we sat beneath some of the wide-spreading trees in the chase, we matured our plans, and swore a solemn oath of secrecy.

"We resolved that our revenge should be this.

"We would arm ourselves, and go in succession to the residences of all those persons who were in any way connected, directly or indirectly, with our imprisonment, and then make them suffer dearly for what they had done.

"When we came to this determination, we captured a fine deer, and the following night set out upon our errand of retribution.

"We had taken care to provide ourselves with arms, and we had sworn a solemn oath to continue true and steadfast to each other.

"We had also sworn not to allow any circumstances to cause us to desist until we had fully accomplished our mission.

"In order that we should not be recognized, we disguised ourselves in large white smock-frocks, and blacked our faces with a mixture of gunpowder.

"This not only answered our purpose of baffling recognition, but also imparted to us a most horrible and unnatural appearance; so that, we calculated, the very looks of us would strike terror into the stoutest heart.

"The arms we carried, too, gave us an exceedingly ferocious appearance.

"Thus equipped, we set out.

"I need not relate all the deeds which we performed, now, should I live long enough to be able to do so. Let it suffice to say, that we obtained our revenge upon almost all our persecutors before we suffered anything from the consequences of our actions.

"The whole country side was, however, soon thrown into the utmost confusion and dismay.

"Not knowing our intentions, people who had nothing whatever to apprehend from us grew terribly alarmed; and, in short, a general panic soon spread throughout the country.

"From the first, our depredations being almost wholly confined to one spot, and from our always being seen with our faces blacked, we received the appellation which has ever since clung to us.

"That appellation is THE WALTHAM BLACKS."

When the three highwaymen heard this announcement, although they were, in a manner of speaking, prepared (having anticipated it), they could not control a slight start of surprise.

From time to time they had heard of the atrocities committed by, or, at all events, attributed to, the Waltham Blacks; and now strangely enough, one of their number lay at their feet.

With greatly increased interest, therefore, they listened to the continuation of the narrative.

"The authorities were aroused, and very prompt and energetic measures were taken for our capture; but for a long time we eluded them, and still pursued our scheme of vengeance.

"As soon as we had consummated it, it was our intention to separate, and seek safety by flight to different quarters of the country.

"But until our design had reached a consummation, we were bound by our oath not to separate.

"A good many of the things which we did must have reached your ears, and, therefore, I will not repeat them.

"At length, the good fortune which we fancied had hitherto been ours, deserted us.

"Two of our band were captured one night, and on the succeeding day two more.

"This reduced our strength very materially, and on the third day the police-officers, having received some information of our whereabouts, came stealthily to the spot, and surprised us.

"Finding ourselves thus attacked, we fought desperately.

"But it was in vain.

"Their numbers were three times as great as ours.

"Retreat was cut off.

"We were surrounded, and, in the end, every one of us was taken prisoner.

"We were deemed such desperate offenders that there was but one prison in the kingdom considered strong enough to hold us, and that was Newgate.

"Towards this place, then, we were all led without delay.

"My companions all seemed to give themselves up to despair, and to resign themselves to their fate.

"But I did not.

"I resolved to make my escape, if such a thing was at all within the bounds of possibility.

"This resolve I kept before my mind to the exclusion of all other thoughts, and keenly watched for any opportunity with which I might be favoured.

"As we got nearer and nearer to London, however, my hopes diminished.

"But I would not despair.

"At last, however, we fairly entered London.

"We traversed its busy streets, until at length the gloomy prison of Newgate was reached.

"As we paused beneath its portals, a shudder passed over me, and hope fled.

"Suddenly, however, as we were being marshalled into the prison, I saw a chance, if I made one desperate effort, of effecting my escape.

"I resolved to make that desperate effort, for, let me do what I would, I could not make my position worse than it was now.

"Urged on by despair, I struggled furiously when it came to my turn to be led into the prison.

"They were unprepared for this attack.

"I was the last, and all the others had gone in quietly and peaceably enough.

"You know what it is if you can take your opponents by surprise.

"I broke from their hold.

"I was free.

"A little crowd of people had collected, as they always do, round the door of Newgate, and when they saw my bold action, they applauded me, and, separating, allowed me quick passage through their ranks.

"The officers were, however, very soon upon my track.

"I was running for my life, and the exertions I then made seem, when I look back to them, as being utterly beyond belief.

"However, in the end I escaped. I am compelled to hurry over the remainder of my story, for each breath I draw, comes with difficulty from my lungs.

"It is enough to tell you I escaped, but I was the only one who was so fortunate.

"The rest of my companions were brought up for trial, and sentenced to death.

"They all suffered at Tyburn.

"Thus I was left alone.

"Some kind of fascination seemed to draw me to the scene of my former exploits.

"I still continued my depredations. Indeed, since the time I have mentioned, I have made my home almost entirely in this forest and those near to it, but——"

The voice abruptly ceased.

The poacher, with a faint groan, fell back.

"He's gone at last, poor fellow!" said Tom King.

"No—no; I think not," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Quick! Claude; quick! Hold up his head again, and let me pour some more brandy down his throat."

This was done, and then, somewhat to the surprise of Tom, the man gave signs of fresh life and of recovery.

It was a minute or two before he could speak, although he tried several times to do so.

At last, however, he gasped out—

"Water—water!"

Claude Duval no sooner heard these words, than he hastened off to procure some, if possible.

His two comrades remained.

The poacher drew himself up again, but manifestly with great pain, and he said—

"I am going—I am going fast. Listen, and I will tell you the rest. I have lived here a solitary life. You told me, did you not, that you were fugitives from justice?"

"We did."

"And such is the case?"

"It is."

"Then I will repay your good offices by the disclosure of something which may prove to be of as much value to you as it has been to me; for when, many a time, I have been hard pressed by the keepers, I——"

"What—what?" said Tom King, anxiously bending over him.

"I have found safe refuge there. Look! do you see the rocks yonder, which form the precipice at the base of which you found me lying?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, then, if you will go from here in a straight line, you will see a large bush of prickly thorn. I can see it here, or my dying eyes deceive me. Look—look!"

"Yes, I can see a bush," said Tom King, "or what looks very much like one."

"It is one. Go up to it, and take hold of one of the top twigs, and bend it down. You will find, with a little pressure, it will almost lie flat upon the ground. Upon doing this, an opening in the rocks will be disclosed. It is the entrance to a cavern, and so cunningly hidden as to defy detection, for when you release your hold upon the thorn-bush, it will fly up into its natural position, and the opening in the rock will then be invisible."

The two highwaymen listened eagerly to these words, but the poacher continued to speak rapidly; and, fearful that they should lose some important information, they forbore to interrupt him in any way.

"That secret cave has been a place of shelter for me many a time; and now let me make all clear to you. Two nights ago, as I was coming through the chase, I trod unexpectedly upon a mantrap, of which there are many lying about. In a moment the sharp iron teeth fixed themselves in my leg.

"The pain was so great that I sank down on the ground in a swoon, from which, however, the dreadful agony I endured soon recovered me.

"I could not refrain from uttering several groans, my anguish was so terrible.

"For some time after I recovered myself from my swoon I lay on the ground without moving. My pain seemed to paralyze me.

"But the dread that the keepers would shortly make their rounds and discover me, inspired me with fortitude, and gradually I rose to my feet.

"I found myself, however, utterly unable to release myself. The spring was too much for my strength, and, moreover, I was in such a position that I could not obtain proper power over it.

"Finding this to be the case, I lay down and gave myself up to despair.

"I tried all I could to resign myself to the fate which I felt sure awaited me.

"In this way hour after hour passed by.

"The severity of my pain now somewhat abated.

"It seemed to subside into a feeling of numbness.

"Finding this to be the case, I raised myself a little from the ground, and had a look at the trap once more, in the faint hope that I might be able to free myself from it.

"But this second effort only served to show me the futility of the first one.

"I was never one, however, to succumb to difficulties.

"The idea struck me that I might unfix the mantrap from the ground, and drag it after me, either until I met with someone who could release me, or until I could find some means of releasing myself.

"I set about acting upon this idea at once, and after incredible suffering and labour, I succeeded in loosening the mantrap from its fastenings.

"I now tried to drag it along the ground with me, but the frightful anguish which the attempt occasioned me compelled me to desist.

"My position seemed now to be worse, if anything, than it was before."

CHAPTER CCCLXVI.

TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MAKE AN EXAMINATION OF THE POACHER'S SECRET CAVE.

THE dying poacher seemed to gain fresh energy as he proceeded; and he now continued the relation of his strange adventures in a rapid tone of voice, as though he was desirous of bringing it to a conclusion.

"Still I had done a good deal, I thought, and that stimulated me to make fresh efforts.

"Looking all round me, I at length espied a large round stone.

"Could I but crawl towards it and obtain possession of it, I thought I might perhaps be able, by using it as a hammer, to so break the springs of the trap as to be able to set myself at liberty.

"But the stone seemed to be far out of my way, and I feared I should not be able to reach it.

"By slow degrees, however, I managed to decrease the distance it was from me, until at length, by lying down and stretching out my hand, I was able to grasp it.

"A gush of joy came over my heart when I found that I fairly had it in my possession; and, impatient to test this mode of operations, I commenced my attack forthwith.

"The stone, I found, was but ill-adapted for the purpose I required; but I had no better tool, and I persevered.

"After hammering for a long while—I cannot tell you how long, I so far weakened the springs and otherwise broke the trap, that, in the end, I managed to free my leg.

"I fainted when this was done.

"As before I was brought back to my senses by the intolerable aching of my wounded limb.

"I sat up and tried to examine it.

"It was swelled to thrice its usual size.

"Blood was slowly oozing from it, for the sharp teeth had penetrated far into the flesh.

"It is a thousand wonders that the bone was not broken—indeed, I am by no means sure that it is not, for I have never had the slightest use in either leg or foot since.

"The chase was familiar enough to me, and I knew whereabouts to look for the nearest stream of water.

"Thither I made my way, and bathed my leg in the cool water.

"I then found that there was every symptom of inflammation, or something worse, having commenced.

"I bathed it, however, as well as I could.

"But when I had finished, I found my strength was almost gone; and my leg, though at first much easier after bathing it, now increased in painfulness to a terrible degree.

"I had no use in it whatever; and, when I stood up and tried to drag it along after me, it seemed as though it would drop off.

"But it is no good for me to linger over my dreadful sufferings. I found myself continually growing weaker, and, upon looking at the wounded place again, I could tell that it was mortifying.

"I could feel the pain which proceeded from it all over my whole body.

"It almost seemed as though the teeth of the trap had been anointed with some poisonous substance; though perhaps it was the rust with which it was encrusted.

"I felt confident that the hurt was a mortal one, and resolved to crawl, if I possibly could, as far as the secret cave of which I have spoken, where I intended to lie down and die unseen.

"As I made my way towards it, my torment became extreme, and, from time to time, I could not repress a cry of agony which was indeed forced from my lips.

"It must have been this which you heard.

"I crawled on and on until I arrived at the base of the rocks where you saw me. I was completely overcome, and my sufferings were so terrible that I groaned frequently.

"In the silence of the spot I heard you arrive at the verge of the precipice above. I heard you speak to each other, but I could not distinguish what you said.

"I was lying with my face upwards, and I could see you looking down upon me. The idea, of course, entered my mind that you were the keepers in quest of me; and acting under the influence of that impression, I crawled away among the underwood; but, when I reached this tree, my strength deserted me, and I could go no further."

These last few sentences had been uttered with increasing faintness, and Jack again administered some of the brandy.

At this moment Claude returned with some water.

But the man was too far gone for it to have a revivifying power upon him.

He passed his hands repeatedly over his eyes as he gasped, rather than said—

"The cave—the cave! I have told you all, now, and I shall die in peace. You will find it a good place for concealment, and it will be your own faults if you do anything to betray it. Ha! you have come at last! I have been deceived! False—false! Off! I say; off! Slay me, if you will; but you shall not take me prisoner! Off—off! I"——

The last words died away in an inarticulate gurgle, and he fell back dead.

For a moment or two neither of our friends broke the silence which followed the poacher's death.

Presently Claude spoke.

"It's all over with him at last, poor fellow! and I am very sorry for it. He was a brave fellow, there's no mistake about that; and it is a pity a brave man should ever die such a death as he has."

"It is, indeed, a pity," rejoined Sexteen-String Jack. "But it's no good grieving over it; the fault is none of ours."

"True, we have the consolation of knowing that we did all we could for him."

"So we have," added Tom King. "You were talking about our having an adventure, Claude, and we have with a vengeance."

"Yes," said Claude, "and I wonder what sort of a place this cave is that he talks about. I am afraid we shall find it all a myth."

"Why so?"

"It is quite clear that his senses wandered part of the time, and it may be that this cave was but some illusion of the imagination."

"We can soon put that doubt at rest," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but, first of all, I think we ought to ascertain whether he is really dead or not."

"By all means let us do so."

"An examination of the poacher's body was now made, and the result of it was that they found life quite extinct."

A feeling of curiosity caused them to look at the leg which had been caught in the trap.

They found that the bone was broken, and that mortification of the limb had taken place, which was the immediate cause of death.

"This is a nice state of things, is it not?" said Tom King. "I fairly shudder when I think of the risk we have so blindly run. We must be careful for the future where we tread."

"We must, indeed, or no one knows how soon that poor fellow's fate will be ours."

"As Tom says, I fairly shudder when I think of the danger we have been ignorantly exposed to."

"There is but one thing for us to do," said Claude, "and that is to exercise the utmost caution."

"You are right. But come, since it seems we cannot do any more for this poor fellow, let us find whether there really is a cave or not."

"With all my heart," replied Tom King. "But I don't quite agree with you when you say that we cannot do any more for this poor fellow here."

"You mean we might afford him decent burial, and so prevent his body being a feast for carrion?"

"Just so."

"We will do that, decidedly. But you know what I meant when I spoke?"

"Of course."

"Come on, then."

"The highwaymen now made their way to the particular part of the rock which the poacher had pointed out.

Upon arriving there they were somewhat puzzled, for they found that the rock for some distance was overgrown with the thorn bushes of which the dying poacher had spoken.

This was all the better, so far as the secrecy of the cave was concerned, but it made our friends' task of discovering it difficult.

It was Tom King who hit upon an excellent expedient for ascertaining which was the particular thorn-bush they sought.

He drew his sword, and plunged it into all of them in succession.

He was rewarded for his trouble after several trials, in each of which the point of his sword, passing through the bush, struck the rock.

Presently, however, the sword went in up to the hilt without coming in contact with any obstacle.

"Here it is," he cried, exultingly.

He sheathed his sword as he spoke.

In the meantime, Claude and Jack, who were full of anxiety, caught hold of the upper portion of the bush in the manner they had been directed, and, giving it a smart pull, they found it come towards them.

They continued their pressure until it reached the ground, and then a black looking opening in the rock was disclosed, which seemed just about large enough for a man to enter.

This was confirmation of what the poacher had told them.

The curiosity of the highwaymen was by no means appeased.

They wanted now to explore this cavern, and ascertain its character.

But all within was most profoundly dark.

This did not much signify, for the highwaymen took care to be never unprovided with the means of obtaining a light.

"A torch will be the thing to assist us in our explorations," said Tom King; "and we can soon form one from the branch of the first resinous tree we come to."

"Of course we can."

"Then let us look about us, my friends, and provide ourselves with several, in case they should be needed."

Our friends had not far to look for the species of wood they required; and, having rudely trimmed half-a-dozen pieces into the form of torches, they returned to the entrance of the secret cave.

As before, they pulled down the thorn-bush, and Claude Duval held it in that position while Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack entered.

They halted just inside the entrance, and there, being sheltered from the wind, they proceeded to ignite one of the torches.

As soon as it had fairly caught light, and there was no fear of its being suddenly extinguished, Claude entered, too.

By seizing some of the twigs on the inner side, and pulling them towards them, they were able to fill up the gap completely, and so that no one could have told what was behind it from the other side.

Tom King had the torch, and he held it as high above his head as he could.

By the aid of its light they found they were standing in a rude, arched passage, rather narrow and tolerably high.

It seemed to extend for some distance in a straight line, though to where it led the light they carried did not enable them to determine.

The air did not seem altogether of the purest, for the torch burned but dimly.

Finding they had so little light, two more torches were ignited, which were carried by Claude and Jack.

The ground beneath their feet was firm and level, and they made their way at a rather rapid rate along the passage.

It was about a hundred feet in length, and so irregular in height, shape, and width, as plainly proclaimed it to be the work of nature unassisted by art.

After going the distance we have mentioned, they suddenly emerged into a spacious cavern.

A cold chill struck them as they entered it, and the air seemed much purer and fresher than that in the passage.

The torches burned more freely, but still the light they gave was quite inadequate to illuminate the vast extent of the cavern.

Claude Duval stationed himself at the entrance of the passage with a torch in his hand.

This was a by no means unnecessary precaution, for, if it should prove that there were other recesses in the cavern presenting a similar appearance, they might be puzzled to find their way out again.

While Jack and Tom King were thus engaged in their explorations, they found that a soft, gentle light began to pervade the whole of the cavern.

It stole upon them so gradually that they were unaware of its approach until the cave was quite filled with it.

At first they could not account for this phenomenon.

The place was quite dark when they entered it, and now it was every moment getting lighter, and they could see, not only the sides of the cavern, but also numerous natural columns, which appeared to have the effect of supporting the roof.

This, however, was invisible.

A kind of hazy mist seemed to have settled there, which hid it from view.

It was evidently from this mist that the light proceeded.

What could it be?

After a little thought our friends hit upon it.

The roof of the cavern was an immense distance from the floor, and, doubtless, in it were numerous small crevices through which the light came.

But, if this was the case, day must have dawned, and the time arrived when Dick Turpin promised to return.

No sooner did they recollect this, than they precipitately left the cavern.

Upon emerging into the open air, they found that, not only day had dawned, but that the sun had risen.

Finding this to be the case, they hastened towards the spot where they expected to find their comrade.

But they might have spared themselves the trouble, for, as the reader is aware, at that very moment Dick Turpin was flying for his life.

CHAPTER CCCLXVII.

A TROOP OF OFFICERS ARRIVE RATHER UNEXPECTEDLY AT THE "BULL AND GATE," AND DICK'S POSITION BECOMES EXCEEDINGLY CRITICAL.

"Look! look, Dick! What is that yonder? Do you see that cloud of dust? What is it? Oh! what is it?"

It was Maud Gouldman, who, in an anxious tone of voice, addressed these words to our hero.

As she spoke, she pointed in a particular direction with her finger.

It was close upon sunset, and they were standing together at one of the windows in the "Bull and Gate" inn.

Some hours have elapsed since we saw them last.

The time was occupied in coming to an understanding with each other.

And now, having succeeded in doing this, they were standing, as we have said, at one of the windows in the public-house.

They had been looking at the magnificent prospect spread out before them, for the room in which they were was on the upper floor, and was fitted with a large, old-fashioned bow-window.

It was the best room in the inn, and was never used except upon special occasions.

But the liberal manner in which Dick paid for what he had, caused the landlord to offer him the best accommodation he had at his disposal.

When she spoke, Dick Turpin looked immediately in the direction to which his fair companion pointed.

It was along the road, and the way they had come.

The glowing rays of the setting sun shone somewhat perplexingly into the room, and Dick put up his hand to shade his eyes from them, so as to have a good look in advance.

There, as she had said, he could distinctly perceive a cloud of dust, which indicated the approach of some large troop either of horses or men.

"What is it? Oh! what is it?" said Maud, anxiously, repeating her former inquiry. "Tell me at once."

"I am by no means certain what it is."

"But it may be our foes?"

"It may be, but I scarcely think it probable."

"Still it is possible."

"It is."

"Oh! fly! fly! Let us fly at once! Do not let us incur any unnecessary danger. Let us fly at once."

"I would rather ascertain whether they really are officers upon the road."

"How can you do that?"

"We shall see them presently."

"No, no; a thousand times no! Such a course would be by far too dangerous. We should not have time to fly, then."

Dick smiled at the alarm of his companion, which was, however, nothing more than natural.

"I will tell you what I will do," he said, "and that will quiet all your apprehensions. I will summon the landlord, and tell him to have Black Bess saddled and brought to the back door. Should there be any danger we shall then be able to fly, and leave our pursuers far behind."

Maud consented to this arrangement, but with considerable reluctance.

Dick, however, called the landlord, and gave him his instructions.

He was promised immediate obedience.

During this time Maud had not once removed her eyes from the cloud of dust which she had seen.

The road extended before them in a straight line, until it vanished to a point.

It was at this point where she had first seen the cloud of dust.

Now, however, it was very much nearer, which showed that whoever was on the road was coming at a good speed.

Still, nothing of them could be seen.

Dick rejoined Maud at the window, and, not without feeling some anxiety himself, looked out.

He had stayed at the inn until now for several reasons.

Perhaps the first one was on account of Black Bess.

He knew how much depended upon her fleetness and endurance.

Her strength had been severely tried during the past night, and he was anxious she should have rest sufficient to recover from it.

They had, too, a long way to go before they could reach Enfield Chase.

And Black Bess would have to carry a double load.

These reasons alone were sufficient to cause Dick to remain, but there were others as well.

He did not know what other means could be found of conveying Maud to Enfield Chase without their destination being known, which he wanted to keep a profound secret, unless he adopted the same means as before.

But this kind of travelling was, in the highest degree, calculated to excite attention.

For this reason Dick resolved to postpone the commencement of his journey until night.

He calculated upon reaching his destination about dawn the next morning.

There was only one point upon which he felt any anxiety, and that was that his comrades, finding he did not return at the appointed time, would fear that some accident had befallen him, and would, contrary to his injunctions, set out in search of him.

If the truth must be told, Dick felt but little alarm when the cloud of dust was pointed out to him, for the simple reason that he could not conceive by what means the officers could have got upon his track.

Nevertheless, he did not regret the precaution which, for the sake of soothing his companion's fears, he had taken.

All around was very still, and presently Dick's keen ear could distinguish a faint sound, which was perfectly well known to him.

"They are horsemen who are approaching," he said; and, after he spoke, Maud noticed that he looked with much greater eagerness than before.

She was soon able herself to recognize the trampling of horses' hoofs.

Louder and louder they grew, but still the riders continued invisible, in consequence of the dust which enveloped them.

Suddenly, however, Dick drew back from the window.

The horsemen had come near enough for him to know who they were.

They were mounted police-officers.

Maud did not require to be told this.

She guessed it in a moment.

"They are your foes," she said.

"They are officers," rejoined Turpin; "there can be no doubt about that."

"Then fly—fly at once! Why do you hesitate?"

"Because I was considering whether I should not do better by remaining here."

"What, and be captured?"

"Nay—nay; I did not mean that. But do not look so alarmed, or suffer your mind to be so filled with apprehension. Believe me, I do not think we are in any danger."

"Why, then, are the officers on the road?"

"That I cannot tell you, but they might be there without having the slightest connection with me. I do not think it possible that they could have tracked me hither. If it had, they would have been here long before this."

Maud was only half-satisfied with this reasoning, but she was silent.

Dick was anxious to reassure her.

"If these officers who are now approaching so rapidly are on the look-out for someone else, my safest place will be here, because they will pass by; and, believe me, I would willingly allow those gentlemen the precedence, and have them on the road before instead of behind me."

"I can understand all that," interrupted Maud; "but the danger."

"I have considered that. Suppose, now, that these officers were not in pursuit of me, that their business had nothing to do with me, and I was to go out and gallop away. I should be seen, and a pursuit be instantly commenced; and this, if only for your sake, I would fain avoid."

"But how shall you learn whether they are in search for you until too late?"

"How too late?"

"For you to make your escape."

"Easily."

"The officers are close here now."

"I can tell that by the sounds. You stand by the window, and keep a look-out. I will keep here, in the middle of the room, and so avoid being seen. How far are the officers off?"

"Only a few yards."

"They have slackened speed, have they not?"

"Yes."

"What are they doing?"

"They seem to be talking to each other in an excited manner, as though they could not agree about something."

"But they are still slowly approaching the inn?"

"Oh! yes."

"Draw back a little. Do not let them see you if you can avoid it."

Maud obeyed.

But she did not remove her gaze for one second from the group of officers.

They were now coming at a walking pace, and presently, to the great alarm of Maud, one of them raised his riding-whip and pointed to the inn.

He accompanied the action with some words uttered in a loud tone of voice; but what the words were she could not tell, although she strained her sense of hearing to the utmost.

Dick now began to grow terribly anxious and fidgety.

"Tell me," he said, "if they go on, or whether they stop at the inn-door."

"We shall soon know that. Oh! fly! Fly at once, while there is yet time!"

"There is plenty of time; and, by acting precipitately, I might draw down upon myself that very danger which I am so anxious to avoid."

Finding him thus determined, Maud Gouldman urged the matter no longer, but continued to rivet her attention upon the officers, among whom a dispute of some sort or other was unquestionably taking place.

Some were of one way of thinking—some of another.

But Maud could not ascertain what the difference arose from.

They were all walking very leisurely.

The horses looked tired and weary, and their sides were wet with perspiration.

How Maud's heart beat as the momentous crisis arrived!

Would they pass the inn?

How that would lighten her heart of the fearful load which now weighed it down!

Alas!

It was not to be so.

The dispute, whatever it was, terminated.

The officers drew up in front of the inn.

More than this Maud did not wait to see.

With her face the picture of alarm, she rushed towards Dick, who, during the last few moments, had occupied himself in loading and repriming his pistols.

"Fly—fly!" she cried. "I fear it is too late."

"No, no. Be calm, and then all will be well. Are you sure the officers have stopped?"

"Yes."

"Go once more to the window, and see whether they have passed on."

Maud felt there was a slight hope in this, and she obeyed instantly.

She almost shrieked with terror.

"No, no," she cried. "They are all dismounting hastily from their steeds, and entering the inn. Oh! what shall we do?—what shall we do?"

"Calm yourself," said Dick, quietly, whose manner afforded a striking contrast to that of his companion; "calm yourself, I pray! It is the time for action! Come!"

He passed his arm round her waist as he spoke, and, going towards the door of the room, he opened it and passed out.

The sounds of many loud voices struck upon his ears, convincing him of the truth of the intelligence which Maud had just given him.

But he could not tell what was said, so many were speaking at once; nor, indeed, did he stay to listen.

He had noticed the interior arrangements of the inn, and he was certain he could make his way anywhere about it without difficulty.

He reached the top of the stairs, but paused ere he descended them.

[THE MARRIAGE OF DICK TURPIN IN ENFIELD CHASE.]

He fancied he could hear voices at the foot.

Thus, perceiving, as she thought, all hope of retreat cut off, Maud suffered an agony of apprehension.

But not so our hero.

With a stealthy tread, he passed the top of the stairs, and entered a room the door of which was nearly opposite and only a few paces distant from the top of the stairs.

The room was vacant, and fitted as a bed-chamber.

There was a large window in it, with a folding casement which opened like a door.

This opened on to a kind of rude wooden balcony, or gallery, which ran along the back of the building, on a level with the first floor.

Dick opened this window with all speed, and passed through it.

Then he assisted his companion to follow him.

No sooner was Dick on the wooden gallery than he looked over the railing which protected it.

From this place he commanded a view of the back door.

No Black Bess was there.

But, looking in the direction of the stable, he saw the fat Ostler, Obi, leading her along.

So far, then, all seemed well.

Maud grew calmer and more collected when she saw the chances of escape thus increase.

There was at both extremities of the wooden balcony a rude flight of steps, which led down to the yard below.

To the nearest of these Dick now directed his own and his companion's footsteps.

As yet he saw nothing of the officers.

They made all the speed they possibly could, and the top of the flight of rickety steps was quickly reached.

Down this they sped with a rapidity which astonished themselves, and caused Obi to look up with a kind of sleepy wonderment.

CHAPTER CCCLXVIII.

DICK TURPIN HAS A GREAT DEAL OF DIFFICULTY SHAKING OFF HIS PURSUERS.

But Dick paid little, if any, attention to the sleepy ostler.

His thoughts were intent upon one object.

That was to reach Black Bess in the smallest possible space of time.

Right glad was he to see that his gallant mare was fully caparisoned for the road, and ready for instant service.

The exertions she had already made did not seem to have had any effect upon her.

Her coat was sleek, and her neck proudly arched, while at every step she took she seemed to "spurn the ground."

Dick felt his eyes glow with admiration as they lighted upon the steed to whom he owed so much, and to whom he was about to trust to save himself from the foes who were so close at hand.

He did not pause when he reached the bottom of the wooden steps, but hastened forward to where Obi stood.

With great promptitude he swung Maud up on to the fore part of the saddle.

Having done this, he put his hand into his pocket, and drew forth another half-crown to reward the sleepy ostler for his services.

Just as he was placing it in his hand, however, the back door of the inn was thrown open.

The sound caused Dick to turn in that direction, and there he saw the landlord of the "Bull and Gate," with a throng of Bow-street officers around him.

"There he is! there he is!" they cried, and, as they uttered these words, they made a rush to the spot where Turpin was standing.

But, ere they could reach it, our hero had vaulted into the saddle.

In an instant he passed his left arm round Maud's waist, thus retaining her in her position, and took hold of the reins.

In the other hand he held a loaded pistol.

He did not wait to see or hear what the officers would do, but, the moment he found himself fairly in the saddle, he fired the pistol at his foes, producing considerable confusion among their ranks, and then threw the discharged weapon among them.

At the same moment he touched Black Bess lightly on the flank with the heel.

The touch was sufficient.

She gave one tremendous bound, and then set forward at a gallop which she alone was able to perform.

A shout came from the officers, and they made a simultaneous rush to the front door, where they had left their horses standing.

Then ensued an immense scrambling into saddles.

But, though they made all speed, by the time they were ready to start, Dick had got a long way ahead.

He had leaped a low wall that bounded the inn yard, and gained the high road, along which he sped at a rate that made pursuit appear ridiculous.

But the officers did not intend to give in without making an effort, at least, to capture their prey.

The large reward that was offered, and the renown that they would gain should they succeed in capturing the celebrated highwayman, acted upon them as very powerful stimulants for action.

Plunging their spurs, then, into the flanks of their exhausted cattle, they tore along the road.

Dick Turpin was just visible in the distance, but the reason of this was the straightness of the road, which enabled them to see for a long way.

Our hero was never aware of one circumstance connected with this affair; and it is as well, perhaps, that he was not, for the knowledge would only have supplied him with cause for vexation.

But there is no reason why the reader should remain in ignorance of it.

The troop of officers, then, who were now in full pursuit, and who had been perceived by Maud, had not the least idea, when they halted at the door of the inn, that Dick Turpin was staying there.

They were in search of him, however.

Indeed, all the principal roads round the metropolis were at this time patrolled by large bodies of officers, whose duty it was to keep a sharp look-out for Dick Turpin and his comrades, and to spare no means of taking them prisoners, either dead or alive.

They had been upon the road for some hours, and both horses and men were tired; so, upon perceiving in the distance the sign of the "Bull and Gate" inn, they slackened speed, and a rather animated discussion ensued as to whether they should pause there a little while for refreshment, or push on.

In the end they resolved to stop, and they accordingly did so.

In all probability, having no suspicions upon the point, they would have left without knowing that Turpin was there, or disturbing him in the least.

But fate had decreed it otherwise.

Upon alighting at the door of the inn, they spoke to the landlord, who came forward to receive them, and then entered.

The horses were, however, left at the door in charge of one of the officers.

The remainder inquired for the ostler.

The landlord then replied that he would be disengaged directly, as he was at that moment engaged in saddling a gentleman's horse.

The officers walked down the passage, and into the inn kitchen, which was situated at the back of the house, and had a large bow-window, which commanded a view of the yard.

Nothing was more natural than that, on entering this place, the officers should look through the window into the yard.

Indeed, they could scarcely avoid doing so, for the door was immediately facing the window.

They looked through it, then, and the first thing they saw was Obi, the ostler, leading a beautiful black horse.

Now, of course, these officers had been furnished with very accurate descriptions both of Dick Turpin and his steed, and the first glance they gave at this black horse in the yard engendered the suspicion in their minds that they had by accident fallen upon what they so wished to find.

Ere they could recover from their surprise, or, indeed, give a second glance at the beautiful black steed, they saw two figures move rapidly across the yard towards the ostler.

Here they paused; and, with a rapidity that bewildered them, they saw Maud swung on to the saddle.

They then had a good view of Dick.

They recognized him instantly.

A wild sort of howl came from their lips, and, as if actuated by one impulse, all rushed towards the back door of the inn.

They were in hopes of being able to surround Dick, or reach him before he was able to mount.

But in this hope they were disappointed.

His movements were much quicker than they thought they could be.

What now ensued the reader is already aware, and from what he knows of the character of Black Bess, for swiftness and endurance, he will think that the officers stood rather a poor chance.

But pertinacious perseverance will do a great deal, and we must wait and see what the officers will accomplish by hanging on the track of the highwaymen.

As for Dick himself, as soon as he saw what a capital start he had got, he dismissed all thoughts of uneasiness from his mind, and let his mare go at a pace which, though a swift one, was not swift enough to distress her.

From time to time he cast anxious glances back, and so did his companion.

But the sun had now set, and darkness was fast beginning to render distant objects indistinct.

This was a favourable circumstance for Dick, since it made his chances of escape all the greater.

Coming at last to a long, steep hill, he allowed his mare to ascend at a walking pace.

Upon reaching the summit, he halted and faced round to the direction in which he had just come.

From the top of the hill a very extensive view of the surrounding country could be obtained.

But the outlines of the various objects were confused and indistinct.

Only the highest features of the landscape could be distinguished.

The valleys were filled with darkness.

Looking back upon the road he had come, Dick strained his eyes in an endeavour to pierce the obscurity which lay below him, and to obtain a glimpse of his foes.

But both attempts were equally unsuccessful.

On the top of a hill, however, Turpin was aware that sounds could be heard from a great distance—more especially if he applied his ear to the ground.

He resolved to adopt this expedient, and, having acquainted Maud with his intention, he dismounted.

He laid himself down at full length, and, putting his ear flat on the ground, listened for some moments with the utmost intentness.

But all was still.

He could not distinguish any sound, however faint, which indicated the approach of his enemies.

From this circumstance he came rather too abruptly to the conclusion that they had given up the chase.

He, therefore, leisurely rose to his feet, and again mounted his mare.

But, although he was so easy and confident, his companion was quite the reverse.

To her the danger of their situation seemed magnified a thousand times.

As Dick placed his foot in the stirrup, she said to him, anxiously—

"Look, look. Oh! what is that over the hedge? Look! I can see men, and horses too. Oh! Dick, your foes are upon you. We are lost!"

These words were spoken in a low, suppressed voice, and in accents of the utmost terror.

They were calculated to have rather an embarrassing effect upon Dick—just at the moment when he was felicitating himself upon being so uncommonly safe.

Dick was one, however, who never allowed surprise to long retain the mastery over him.

He was in the saddle in a moment.

But before he had time to look and ascertain the truth of Maud's information, there was a flash and a report.

He felt something hot whistle by his cheek.

Then he heard a voice cry—

"Forward! forward, my lads, and we have him! I winged him that time, I'll be sworn! Forward! forward!"

There was a hasty trampling of feet, and the cracking of twigs, as the words were uttered.

Dick comprehended the state of affairs in a moment.

The officers had been cunning enough to leave the high road and take to the fields.

On the soft turf they made scarcely any sounds in their progress.

They had continued to push on at full speed, and had galloped up the hill while Dick walked it.

When they reached the top they saw him.

Had it not been for the warning received from Maud Gouldman, Dick would have found his position much more serious than it actually was.

However, he knew that he was unhurt, and that the best thing he could do was to set off at full speed.

He did so, and shortly received from Maud the gratifying assurance that she had not been in any way injured by the pistol-shot which had been fired.

This was the only thing which Dick cared for; and, having received the assurance that she was unhurt, his heart grew light again.

Still, he resolved to shake off his foes as quickly as possible.

He was annoyed with himself to think he had allowed them to gain upon him in the manner he had.

One thing was certain.

He must shake off his foes at once, or else give up all idea of making his way to Enfield Chase, or they would be too much upon his track and the secret of his retreat be in danger of discovery.

Indeed, as it was, he thought it would be better if he could change his course, and so mislead them as to the direction he had taken.

Impressed with this idea, he turned down a lane that branched off from the high road.

The officers descended the hill with break-neck speed, and followed after him.

Dick heard the clatter of their horses' hoofs.

Convinced that they were in the lane, Dick now urged Black Bess, for once in her life, to put forth her utmost speed.

The result was surprising.

Away she flew, at a speed which would be deemed incredible, and which, perhaps, none but a mare of her matchless breed could accomplish.

The faint clattering of the officers' horses' hoofs died away into utter silence.

Still Dick was careful not to pull up too soon, and so run the slightest risk of making his enemies aware of his intentions.

Presently, however, he pulled up.

He listened for a moment, but all was still.

He then backed his mare close to the bank of the ditch on one side of the road, and made her face the hedge on the side opposite.

It was only a low one, and he was convinced she would clear it easily.

Nor was he mistaken in his calculations.

She gave one spring, and alighted on the soft ground in the meadow.

Dick had considered his position, and he now shaped his course across the field, in what, he thought, was as nearly as possible a straight line to Enfield Chase.

His judgment did not deceive him.

In a short time he emerged upon the high road, along which he took his way at an easy gallop.

He was now tolerably free from apprehension.

He could hear nothing of his foes, and he doubted not that he had baffled them completely,

But he resolved to waste no more time, and not to allow them another opportunity to come up with him.

He beguiled the tediousness of his journey by conversing with his companion, who now began to experience a feeling of greater security than she had hitherto done.

CHAPTER CCCLXIX.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD GOULDMAN AT LENGTH ARRIVE SAFELY AT ENFIELD CHASE.

It was just about daylight on the morning following when Dick Turpin and Maud Gouldman came in sight of Enfield Chase.

The night had been occupied with travelling incessantly.

Black Bess had rather a tired look, but still she sped along as though she was aware the termination of her journey was almost reached,

Dick had taken the opportunity, which their long ride had afforded him, to explain to his companion his exact position in life.

He also mentioned his three companions, who, the reader will bear in mind, Maud had never seen, and never even heard of.

Dick put the worst face upon everything; but Maud still continued willing to share his lot, whatever it might be.

Our hero could not avoid being touched with this devotion, and a sharp pang shot through his heart as he asked himself what was to be the termination of this romantic affection.

Indeed, the thought was so painful a one, that he endeavoured to banish it from his mind altogether.

Dick could not help feeling anxious with respect to his comrades.

He was now something like twenty-four hours beyond the time he had appointed for his return.

He knew their impatience, and felt almost certain that it would not stand such a trial as that.

They would be ignorant of the cause of his delay, and would doubtless come to the conclusion that some mischief had befallen him.

When once they had got hold of this idea, he knew they would not rest until they had set out in search of him.

And this was what he dreaded, for of course they would be ignorant of the presence of so many of their foes upon the road, and their danger would be that much increased.

He did not keep his thoughts secret from Maud, but freely told her what was passing through his mind.

At length Dick reached the spot where he had parted from his comrades, and which they had mutually agreed should be the meeting-place.

He looked around him in vain for some signs of their appearance.

All was still.

The birds had scarcely yet begun to chirp and leap from bough to bough.

Dick was quite sure he had not been observed to enter the chase by anyone.

A long time had elapsed since he had seen a human being.

And now, as they stood thus upon the appointed spot, they might, without any great stretch of the imagination, have easily imagined themselves alone in the world.

The hour was, perhaps, about the stillest of the whole twenty-four, and they were in one of the thinnest populated districts in England.

Dick waited anxiously and impatiently for several minutes, but no sign of his comrades appeared, and his worst suspicions were realized.

They had gone off in search of him, and the result of this would probably be that they would either be taken prisoners, or their hiding-place discovered.

As a last hope, and not that he thought it would be responded to, Dick uttered a kind of chirping whistle, with which, in olden times, he had been wont to summon his comrades.

The shrill sounds died away upon the silent air, but there was no reply.

Dick dismounted, and assisted his companion to alight.

"This fills me with uneasiness," he said; "but it is no more than I expected. What to do, I know not. If I go away in search of them, I may only be the means of incurring fresh danger!"

"Why not stay here," said Maud, "and await their coming?"

"I am afraid I cannot do better."

"Wait with patience. It may be that they will return in safety."

"I trust they may."

With such conversation and speculations as these, they whiled away the time.

Presently their ears were saluted by a faint sound, which could not have reached their ears but for the intense stillness of the place.

Dick drew back yet further into the shadow of the trees, and listened.

The sound grew plainer, and its character soon became perceptible.

It was a rustling noise, as though someone or something was forcing a way through the dense undergrowth with which the ground, to a depth of a couple of feet, at least, was covered.

Someone was approaching.

But who?

That was a question which he could not determine, though he hoped to find it one of his companions.

He peered forth, at the same time taking care to keep himself concealed.

He could distinguish the sound of a horse's hoofs, but could not see either animal or rider.

Suddenly the sound ceased.

Still he could see nothing.

Wound up to the highest pitch of excitement, he listened.

He heard a voice say—

"I am back first, it seems, and I am a good deal behind my time. I hope they won't be long, or I shall be uneasy."

Dick felt as though he could shout for joy.

He knew the voice.

It was that of his old comrade, Tom King.

He whistled again, and then emerged from his place of concealment, leading Maud Gouldman by the hand.

His whistle was this time responded to by a cheerful cry, and the next moment Tom King alighted from his steed, and came hastening towards them.

But when Tom saw that Dick was accompanied by a lady, he shrunk back a little.

Turpin, however, advanced, and, grasping him by the hand, shook it warmly.

"I am back safe, you see, and have brought some one with me. You are surprised, no doubt, but this is Miss Maud Gouldman, to whom I have been fortunate enough to be of service, and she has rewarded me for what I have done by consenting to share my future lot."

Tom King looked astounded.

But he quickly recovered himself.

He had had his suspicions before upon the point, though he had never said a word about them, and now he saw them more than confirmed.

Tom King had received the education of a gentleman, and it was in quite a courtly way that he acknowledged Dick's introduction.

He raised his hat, and made a graceful and profound bow, after the manner of the times.

Maud Gouldman was surprised, although Dick had somewhat prepared her for those she had to meet, by describing their persons, manners, and history.

She was impressed in Tom King's favour immediately; and, indeed, his personal appearance was well qualified to produce such an effect.

But, as for our old friend, he looked upon her mistrustfully.

She vividly brought back to his mind the half-forgotten memories of the past.

He felt that he could never again trust a woman.

But no expression corresponding with this feeling was permitted to appear upon his countenance.

He turned towards Dick.

"I am rejoiced to see you safe back again," he said. "You have no idea what anxiety we have suffered on account of your long absence."

"I can form a good notion of it. But, Claude and Jack—where are they? And where have you been? since, to my knowledge, you have only just returned to the chase."

"One question at a time, Dick—one at a time! After we parted from you, the night before last, we returned to the chase, and there met with a marvellous adventure, the particulars of which I will presently communicate to you."

"Well?"

"This adventure occupied us for some hours, and it was daybreak before we were aware of it. However, as soon as we made the discovery, we hastened off to this spot, expecting to find you here waiting for us."

"But you were disappointed?"

"We were. Well, we waited here until it got fully day, and then we imagined something or other had detained you, and we made up our minds to wait for night with what patience we could, for we did not expect you before then."

"Go on. You have not answered my question."

"I will in a moment. But, if you will just pay attention, you will understand all that has taken place."

"Very good."

"Having made up our minds, then, that you would not return until night, we retired to the chase to get a few hours' sleep, of which we stood greatly in need, as you will readily believe when I relate our strange adventure."

"You fill me with curiosity, Tom. I am at a loss to think what adventure you can have had."

"Never mind that, just at present; it will take too long to tell. We slept for several hours, and woke up a little before sunset. We then had something to eat, and by the time we had despatched our meal, we found that it was fairly night."

"What then?"

"We repaired once more to this spot, in the hope of seeing you shortly make your appearance. But in this hope we were disappointed, and at length we found it impossible to wait idly any longer."

"What did you do then?"

"We agreed to go in search of you."

"Just as I thought!"

"We could not rest here. Well, we got our horses, mounted them, and separated, each one of us taking a different road, and agreeing, whether successful in our search or not, to meet here as soon after daybreak as possible."

"I understand now."

"I thought you would. Of course, my search, like theirs, has been a fruitless one. I am glad to see you back, for if you had not been here when we returned, we should have run the risk of going to London."

"I was in dread that you had already done so; but, since you have not, all is well."

"As you say, all is well. In all my excursion, and I have been some miles, I have not met with a single living creature."

"So much the better. But where are Claude and Jack?"

"That is a question I can answer no better than yourself. You know the agreement we made with each other when we parted. I suppose they have gone further than they were aware, and found it impossible to return at the appointed hour. I was myself somewhat late for that very reason."

"Yes, it was daybreak when we arrived, and we had been waiting here some time when we heard the sounds of your approach."

"Of course, you did not know who I was?"

"Of course not, and hence my caution. But, hark!"

"Some one approaches."

"Claude or Jack?"

"That I do not know."

"It will be no harm to stand aside and reconnoitre."

"Certainly not. Let us do so."

All three once more betook themselves to the shelter which the trees afforded them.

It was a horse approaching, and it stopped somewhere about the same spot as Tom had a little while before.

In another moment there was a low whistle.

"That is Claude," said Tom King, in a whisper, as he replied to the signal.

They then emerged from their concealment, and found Tom to be quite correct.

It was Claude Duval who had just arrived.

His delight at seeing Dick safe back again can easily be imagined by the reader without our describing it.

He was much struck with the beauty of Maud Gouldman, whom he treated with more respect than he would any princess; and Claude Duval always bore the character of being the "gentleman highwayman."

Ere they had time to do little more than exchange greetings, Tom King espied Sixteen-String Jack at a little distance.

He was making his way for the spot upon which they stood, and would arrive in another moment.

Our friends were thus happily reunited, though fate destined that it should not be for long.

Every face bore a light-hearted, happy expression, and to have looked at them just then, no one, not knowing them, would have dreamed what they were.

On foot, they all turned towards the chase, and plunged into its leafy recesses.

Each led his own steed by the bridle.

On their way, Tom King related to Turpin and Maud their adventure with the wounded poacher.

When Dick learned what had occasioned his death—namely, that mantraps were laid about—he felt a pang of alarm and apprehension.

He stopped short in a moment.

But his comrades assured him that they had carefully examined the route they were about to take, and were quite confident that there was no fear of mantraps.

Thus reassured, Turpin ventured forward again; but his companions could not avoid noticing the extreme caution he observed at every step he took.

But it was not for his own safety that he was anxious, but for Maud's.

The secret of the existence of the cavern was now communicated to him, and he was also told that that was the place of their destination.

This was welcome intelligence indeed to Dick, for he had been wondering where he could find a shelter for his fair companion.

He trusted the cavern was a comfortable place, and fit for habitation, and he questioned his comrades closely upon the subject; but they could afford him but little information, having made only a casual examination of the place.

They told him how a soft, gentle light, in some way or other, managed to make a way into it; and that circumstance filled him with hopes that it would prove a comfortable place.

CHAPTER CCCLXX.

CLAUDE DUVAL, TOM KING, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SET OUT UPON AN IMPORTANT EXPEDITION.

In a few minutes now they reached the face of the rocks in which the concealed cavern was.

Dick Turpin and Maud Gouldman both looked around them with surprise, interest, and curiosity.

Especially was the mind of the latter filled with these feelings.

To her, all that she saw, and all that was taking place, had the ineffable charm of novelty.

All accorded, too, with her own romantic disposition, and she gazed upon the lofty trees, and the rugged surface of the rocks, with inconceivable delight.

She would not have changed her position for a home in the noblest and grandest mansion in the land.

There are some minds which are so constituted.

But to nearly all, we fancy, there must be a great charm about leading a primitive life in some vast forest.

If so, it is very natural, for such originally was the state of man.

Dick's three companions had well marked the appearance of the particular thorn-bush which hid the entrance of the cave, and they were able, without the least difficulty, to distinguish it from the others that grew near it.

Claude caught hold of the top of the bush, and pulled it down.

He kept it in that position by placing his foot upon it.

In the meantime his comrades had removed all the trappings from their steeds.

They carried them just inside the passage, and piled them up in a little angular recess, which was admirably adapted for their reception.

The horses were then left at liberty to feed on the rich herbage that abounded there.

They were not afraid of their straying far away.

When this was done, they all entered the passage, with the exception of Claude Duval.

This place was in total darkness, so Tom King lighted one of the torches they had made use of for the previous occasion.

When this was done, Claude entered, and replaced the thorn-bush; taking care to do so in such a manner as to defy detection.

A few minutes enabled them to reach the termination of the gloomy passage, and then they emerged into the cavern.

Here the torch was not only unnecessary, but useless; and so Tom extinguished it, and thus got rid of an incumbrance.

Outside the cavern it was now broad daylight.

Looking up to the roof, from which the light manifestly proceeded, our friends found, after a little attention, that their conjecture was perfectly correct.

They were just able to detect numberless small crevices in the rock; and it was through these that the daylight made its way in a kind of misty radiance.

Upon gaining the cavern, Dick's first impulse, after having looked up to the roof, was to ascertain, if possible, the size and extent of it.

There was not much difficulty about doing this, for the whole of it was thoroughly illuminated; and, as their eyes got more and more accustomed to the subdued light, they were able to distinguish even the minutest object.

The cavern was in shape somewhat circular—it approached this form more nearly than any other.

At a rough estimate, its diameter in its widest part was about fifty feet, and in its narrowest thirty.

The height was a hundred, or perhaps more.

The walls of the cavern were in many places covered with some kind of glittering ore, which reflected the rays of light with a remarkably beautiful effect.

From the roof depended numerous stalactites, some of which were only a few feet in length, while others were so long as to reach the floor, and had the appearance of being natural supporting pillars.

But this was only in appearance.

The floor of this cavern was composed of some kind of hard earth, and this seemed to be the only thing that was artificial about the place, and even this might have been natural.

Such were the most prominent characteristics of this remarkable place.

Upon looking about them more closely, however, the highwaymen found several indications of the place having, at some time or other, been inhabited.

In one part of the floor was fixed a large flat stone, and upon this there still remained the extinct embers of a wood fire.

Then, pushed into a kind of recess, of which there seemed to be a great number all round, were a table and some seats, all roughly made with the rudest of materials, and yet competent to perform the service required of them.

Our friends were glad of these necessaries, which would so materially conduce to their comfort, should they think of remaining long.

Having found these articles in a recess, prompted them to renew their search in the remainder.

They resolved to go regularly round the cavern, and take each one in its turn as it presented itself.

Ere they had gone many paces, they came to a very large deerskin, which was hung up on the wall of the cavern.

Thinking there might be something behind this, Dick took hold of it and pulled it aside.

An opening in the wall was now disclosed.

Looking in, they saw a small chamber, about ten feet square, which seemed to be lighted in the same manner as the outer cavern.

But what immediately attracted Turpin's attention was a dark-looking mass of something in one corner.

He strode towards it in a moment, in order to ascertain its character.

He found it to be a great many deerskins, all laid perfectly flat, and one on the top of the other.

The use of this was obvious at a glance.

It was, indeed, to serve as a couch, and no doubt it would make a very soft one.

Highly pleased with this discovery, they left the little chamber, and on making the circuit of the cavern they were astonished to find seven more chambers of a similar character, and all furnished with skins in the same manner.

This promised them something better in the shape of sleeping accommodation than they had had lately.

All were now quite in high spirits.

"I believe we shall be able to live here like merry men," exclaimed Dick Turpin. "There seems to be almost every convenience we can require."

"There does indeed, and we ought to feel glad we have got so secure a place where we can stay until our last affair blows over a little."

It was Tom King who said this, but Claude added—

"It would do for a time, no doubt, but you would find being here terribly dull. Indeed, I have found it so already."

"Yes," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but why should we not take permanent possession of this place, and make sallies from it whenever we think proper?"

"That sounds better," rejoined Claude Duval.

"You feel the want of some employment, Claude, do you not?" said Dick.

"I do, and that's just it."

"I thought so. Now, I have a little expedition for all of you, if you think proper to undertake it."

"You are our captain. Command, and we obey!"

"Very good, if you like to look upon it in that light."

"What is it to be?"

"Do not be so impatient."

"But I can't help it."

"Why, you have only just come back from one expedition."

"Very true; but I met no one. I had nothing but a solitary ride."

"Well, then, this is what I want you to do."

Dick Turpin whispered something in Claude's ear.

He looked amazed for a moment, and then he said—

"All right, captain. It shall be done."

"What—what?" asked his comrades, eagerly.

"He shall tell you presently," said Turpin.

"Shall we start at once?" asked Claude.

"What do you think?"

"It's daylight."

"So it is."

"I think we had better wait till dark."

"Agreed; there will be much less danger then."

"You are right, captain."

Here the subject dropped, but Claude was obliged to whisper in the ears of Tom and Jack what Turpin had said to him.

As they became the recipients of the intelligence, their countenances for a moment expressed the same amount of astonishment as his had.

At any rate, nothing was to be done till night, and that was far distant, the day having only just begun.

They occupied their time making several preparations.

Fuel was brought in, and a fire made up on the hearth, for the season was far advanced, and the cavern was chilly.

A dense volume of smoke arose from the fire, and then our friends thought they had done a very injudicious thing.

The smoke would make its way out of the numerous crevices in the roof of which we have spoken, and should anyone happen to pass by a discovery must take place.

There was, however, but little fear of any one visiting that unfrequented spot, and yet such a thing might happen at the most inopportune moment.

In order to set this point at rest, they all resolved to leave the cave, and get upon the roof of it, if such a thing was at all practicable.

On emerging from the cave, their first care was to take accurate note of the bearings of different objects; and, having done this, they proceeded to ascend to the top of the rocks.

In order to do this, they had to make a considerable detour.

At length, however, they were convinced they stood upon what was the roof of the cavern.

The smoke was imperceptible, and so, too, were the crevices through which the daylight penetrated.

These latter were so small, and so overgrown with dense vegetation as to be quite invisible, unless the closest search was made.

And, even then, they seemed nothing more than cracks and fissures in the rock, through which it was impossible to see down into the cavern.

Then, as for the smoke, the only way they could account for not being able to see that was that, by ascending to so great a height, it was converted into an impalpable vapour before it reached the surface.

In order to set the point at rest, several coins were dropped through the crevices.

Upon re-entering the cavern, these coins were all found lying upon the floor of it.

The highwaymen now experienced a feeling of the greatest security with respect to the secrecy of their strange habitation.

The more they found out about it, and the better they became acquainted with it, the more they liked it.

By this time the fire had burned up, and was quite clear, and the next thing to be thought about was a meal.

This they set about having in their usual primitive fashion, and here it was they experienced the full benefit of Maud's presence among them.

The meal was served up with the best of all sauces, and that was a keen and vigorous appetite.

It was wonderful to see how soon all adapted themselves to their new quarters, and began to feel quite at home.

When the meal was over, some hours were spent in cheerful conversation, in which the various actions of the past were fully discussed.

Presently, however, Dick Turpin's three comrades withdrew.

They had recollected something which they had promised to do, but which had been forgotten until the present moment.

The reader will perhaps guess what it was.

It was to bury the remains of the poacher to whose confession they were indebted for the comfortable habitation they had got.

There was something abhorrent to the feelings of all three of them in the thought that his inanimate remains should become the prey of the wild denizens of the forest.

A very little trouble on their parts would prevent it.

This, then, was the reason they withdrew, leaving Turpin and Maud in the cavern, who probably did not much regret the circumstance of being left alone.

The body of the dead poacher was but a few paces from the entrance to the cave, so Tom and his two comrades quickly reached it.

They found that the carrion crows had already begun their feast, and they had some difficulty in scaring the loathsome birds away.

They were but ill-provided with tools requisite for digging a grave, but for such a thing as that it was not likely they would hold back.

With the aid of their swords and some fragments of wood, they succeeded in making a hole large enough and deep enough for their purpose.

In this they placed the body of the poacher, which already presented a terrible spectacle.

The earth was shovelled in and hammered down hard.

By the time this was done they were surprised to find that darkness was rapidly closing in around them.

But winter was very close at hand, and the days were short.

Returning to the cave, they signified to Dick their intention of setting out at once upon their little expedition.

To this he made no demur; but, on the contrary, pressed them to be as speedy as possible, and not to return on any account until their object was accomplished.

To these terms they consented; and, pleased with the idea of having some business on hand—and business, too, in which they felt a peculiar interest—they set out with light hearts.

Their steeds were saddled, and Maud and Dick accompanied them to the outskirts of the chase, where they bade them adieu.

What was the nature of the business upon which they were engaged, and what sort of success they met with, we shall very quickly see.

CHAPTER CCCLXXI.

RELATES WHAT BEFEL THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN UPON THEIR MYSTERIOUS EXPEDITION.

When the three highwaymen left Enfield Chase, it was not quite night, though darkness was fast approaching and increasing.

Objects at a short distance were invisible, and a general gloom overspread the whole of the landscape.

The night offered a remarkable contrast to the preceding one, which had been so unusually bright and beautiful.

Now, however, the heavens were entirely covered with one dense, sad-coloured cloud, which permitted not a glimpse of the blue ether to be obtained through the smallest rift in the whole of its vast expanse.

So far, too, from the moon pouring down upon the earth a flood of bright and beautiful light, her position in the heavens could not even be distinguished.

To our friends, though, and the expedition they were upon, this night was unusually favourable.

In a short time their eyes became accustomed to the insufficient illumination, and they were able to see their path with the greatest ease.

Ere they had gone a hundred yards, however, they drew rein, and as well as could be distinguished in the darkness, looked at each other irresolutely.

It was Claude who broke the silence.

"My friends," he said, "I have already acquainted you with the nature of the business we have to carry out to-night, but the subject requires some little consideration. In the first place, the question arises, where are we to look for our destination?"

"That sounds a strange question, Claude," replied Tom King, "but I perfectly well understand what you mean. I am not able to answer you, but perhaps Jack is."

"Well, yes, I am," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Where—where?"

"As I was out early this morning, on the look-out for Dick, I saw just the place we want."

"Did you indeed?"

"Yes."

"But did you notice its position well enough to be able to find your way back to it in the dark."

"I think so, for I maintained the same direction all the time."

"That will do, then," said Tom King. "It is lucky you noticed it, for I saw nothing of the kind, I am certain."

"Nor I," said Claude Duval.

"Never mind, all is well. Just bear round a little to the left-hand, then you will come to the high road; keep along it, and you will soon be where you want to be."

"Have you got what I asked you to provide yourself with?" asked Claude Duval.

"Yes," answered Sixteen-String Jack; and, as he spoke, he patted a little bundle of something, which he had got strapped before him on the saddle.

"That's all right enough, then, and we can look upon the whole of the business as settled."

"I hope we may. I have been engaged in many a strange adventure before to-day, but never in one half so strange and curious as this."

"The same here," exclaimed the two others; and, as they spoke, they turned their horses' heads in the direction of which Sixteen-String Jack had spoken.

There was now a silence of some minutes' duration, but it was broken by Claude Duval, who, addressing Tom King, said—

"What do you think of this last affair of Dick's?"

"You mean about Maud Gouldman?"

"Yes."

"Why, taking all things together, I am sorry it happened."

"Are you?"

"Yes; and if I do not mistake, you are of the same opinion as myself."

"Well, Tom, I am."

"So am I," said Jack.

"Then we are all quite unanimous upon the point." continued Claude.

"Well, I don't wonder at it. You see it will upset everything, and, let you look at the matter in what way you will, it presents a disagreeable aspect."

"True; and for that reason I think we ought to make the best of it we can."

"We cannot alter it, that is very certain."

"Of course it is; then, in my judgment, the best thing we can do is to submit to the change with the best grace we can."

"We must try to do so; though it strikes me we shall find it very disagreeable."

"Well, if so, we must put up with it, that's all. But here we are at the high road at last."

The three highwaymen leaped the low wooden paling which skirted the meadows they had been crossing, and alighted in the high road.

"Now follow me," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and I will lead the way, But we have some distance before us, I can tell you that."

"Never mind; our cattle are thoroughly refreshed by the rest they have had. Forward! forward!"

At a sharp trot, which got over the ground in a really amazing manner, they took their way along the high road.

Their horses' hoofs made a tremendous clatter, which made conversation too difficult to be pleasant; and, as they had nothing more to talk about than the expedition they were upon, they were silent.

Each, however, busied himself with his own thoughts; and, unconsciously, they all dwelt at the same moment upon the same topic.

And that was about the advent of Maud Gouldman, and the changes which were likely to result from it.

In this way they continued for a long distance—until, indeed, the winter evening had deepened into night.

The air was raw and cold.

The whole atmosphere seemed to be loaded with dampness, and nothing but the strongest necessity would have induced ordinary travellers to be abroad.

But the highwaymen paid little attention to the inclemency of the weather.

During the whole of their journey they had scarcely met with a single individual, and they had not passed a vehicle of any description.

The road was a lonely one, and at such an hour, and in such unfavourable weather, it was deserted entirely.

Sixteen-String Jack continued to lead the way without the slightest hesitation, and his friends followed him with the most implicit faith in his power to guide them.

At length they reached a small village, which straggled for some distance along the high road.

What was the name of it they had no idea.

Passing through it, however, without perceiving a single inhabitant, they kept on for about a quarter of a mile further, and here they halted.

"Is this the place, Jack?"

"Yes," was the reply. "Look yonder!"

Sixteen-String Jack raised his riding-whip as he spoke, and pointed to what appeared to be the square tower of a church.

As soon as his friends perceived it, they said—

"Oh! yes, this must be right. Have we much further to go?"

"I suppose not, but I cannot precisely lead the way; for, when I passed this spot this morning, I was going at a rapid rate, and did little more than cast a hasty glance around me."

"We must approach and reconnoitre."

"We must. Come this way quietly."

The three now took their way across the road; and, after going a few yards, arrived at a low stone wall, over which a few white gravestones could be distinguished glistening in the darkness.

This showed that the building to which Jack had pointed was no other than a church. Indeed, they could now perceive the dim outline of the ancient sacred edifice.

"I should think this churchyard would be a good place to leave the horses while we do our business; that is, if we can get into it pretty easily."

"Go on a little further. You are almost sure to come to a gate."

They did so, and quickly discovered one of those white gates which, in country places, so often open into the graveyards.

This gate was simply secured by a ponderous iron latch, and this Claude raised with very little difficulty, and the party fairly entered the churchyard.

They dismounted, and led their horses by the bridle until they reached an alder-tree, which grew at the junction of the two broad paths intersecting the churchyard.

To this they secured their cattle, though in such a manner as allowed them liberty to graze.

This done, they paused, and endeavoured to pierce the darkness which surrounded them.

In this attempt they were unsuccessful.

But, luckily for them, the clouds just at that moment parted, and, through a long straggling rift in them, the moon shone sweetly down.

Her rays seemed all the brighter in consequence of the darkness which had hitherto prevailed, and which was now completely dissipated.

Those objects which had before been invisible were now distinctly revealed.

The massive square tower of the church could now be seen, even from a considerable distance; and, in addition to this, something which instantly attracted the attention of the highwaymen.

This was a stone building, contiguous to the church, and, from its position, doubtless the residence of the vicar.

They pointed this house out to each other in a manner which plainly indicated that the business they were upon was in some way connected with it.

With hasty steps they crossed the churchyard, and went straight towards it.

A small gate separated the garden of the vicarage—for such it was—from the church; and this the highwaymen opened, and passed through.

The front door was reached by a flight of broad and handsome stone steps, and it was surmounted by a portico of great solidity and beauty.

No notice was as yet taken of the intrusion of our friends, who looked up at the various windows of the dwelling before them, in order to ascertain whether a light appeared at any of them.

But all was dark, which seemed to indicate that the inhabitants had all retired to rest.

The highwaymen were not satisfied of this, however, until they had looked all round the building; having done which, they returned to the front, and took up their former position.

And now the moon, who by her light had rendered them such good service, was again completely obscured by the clouds.

For this they cared not, as they had already performed all the service which lay in their power.

In a whisper, however, Claude spoke—

"There is one piece of information which it is very desirable we should be in possession of."

"What?"

"The name of the parson."

"But how are we to find that out?"

"There's the difficulty."

"Stop."

"What?"

"I know how we can find it out."

"How?"

"By going to the door of the church. Don't you know that the name is always painted there on a board?"

"Of course it is. I might have thought of that myself."

"Make haste, it will not take us a moment; and such a piece of information will be valuable in the extreme to us."

Being of this opinion, they hastily left the garden in front of the vicarage, and re-entered the churchyard.

It was easy enough to go straight up to the porch, and, having arrived there, they felt about for the position of the notice-board.

Having found it, Tom King lighted a thief's match.

He fancied this would burn just long enough to answer his purpoee, and so it did.

They saw the name, and managed to make it out, though the letters were half effaced.

Being in possession of the name of the parson, they returned to the garden.

They were now ready for action.

Sixteen-String Jack had removed the bundle from the front of his saddle, and he held it under his arm.

What its character was could not be distinguished.

With stealthy tread the three highwaymen ascended the little flight of stone steps in front of the vicarage, and stood close to the door.

At a sign, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval retired behind one of the pillars, where they were completely out of sight.

No sooner was this done than Tom King seized the knocker, and banged away with right good will.

The hollow sound reverberated through the dwelling, but no immediate notice appeared to be taken of it.

In consequence of this, Tom, after pausing a moment, renewed the assault, and this time with a vigour that was really terrific.

Ere he had ceased, one of the upper windows was violently thrown open.

The swinging leaf of the lattice went back with a crash against the wall, and the clattering of broken glass followed.

Tom looked up, and in the imperfect light, he could just distinguish the white night-capped head of someone.

Whoever this individual was, he appeared to see our friends, for he instantly called out—

"Who's there? What do you want?"

The tones of the voice were angry and insolent.

"Is that the Reverend Mr. Martext?" asked Tom King, in a voice of well-affected grief and concern.

"What if it is?"

"If it is, reverend sir, although I am very sorry to trouble you at such an unseasonable hour, I must ask you to come and see my brother. He lies even now at the point of death, and is sadly in want of you, holy sir, to administer spiritual consolation to him."

"Who is your brother, eh?"

"A stranger to you, I have no doubt, reverend sir," said Tom King, still keeping up, with consummate skill, the peculiar tone of voice he had assumed.

The parson hesitated.

He was not fond of being called up of a night after having gone to bed.

Tom continued—

You will only have a few yards to go, reverend sir, and, with your permission, I will lead the way. My brother is dying, and he so earnestly requests to see you that I do hope you will not refuse."

Mr. Martext, the parson, was completely deceived by this statement of Tom King's, and no suspicion of its genuineness once crossed his imagination.

Nevertheless, could he have got out of the job of having to leave his home at that hour of the night, he would gladly have done so.

[DICK TURPIN AND MAUD ARE ATTACKED BY THE SERPENT IN THE CAVERN.]

But he could not.

He knew his position in the parish too well to dream of refusing.

Should he do so, the fact would, of course, become public, as all disagreeable facts are sure to do, and the result would be considerably to his prejudice.

So he resolved, after a moment of hesitation, to visit this dying man, and he called out to that effect from the window.

But, as the reader will not fail to have observed, it was not from any desire to smoothe the passage of a dying soul from this world to the next that he gave his consent, but merely from a selfish feeling.

It would not do, in a worldly sense, for him to refuse.

He closed the window, however, with very angry and unchristian-like feelings about his heart, and commenced attiring himself.

The sufferings he presently underwent seemed almost like a species of retribution.

It is quite certain he fully deserved the punishment he met with.

He was not long putting on all his clothes, and, as soon as he was dressed, he descended to the front door.

The night was cold, and he was seized with sudden fits of shivering.

He put the lamp down on a little side-table in the hall, and undid the fastenings of the door.

He opened it and passed out.

Tom ascended the steps, and came towards him.

Seeing he was there, the parson closed the door.

He advanced to the top of the flight of stone steps, and there he paused.

"Now," he said, "how far do you want me to go? Where is your brother? and who is he? Answer these questions, or I won't go a step further. I don't know you."

"Mr. Martext," said Tom, in the same assumed voice,

"my brother is a stranger to you, but the distance you will have to go to find him will be very short."

"Where is it?" asked the parson, angrily, about whose heart strange suspicions began to gather.

"Close at hand," said Tom. "Close at hand, I assure you."

"Then I shan't go, for I don't like your looks. Ha!"

This last was a sudden ejaculation of surprise.

The parson tried to turn round, and rush back into his house.

But he was too late.

He had suffered himself to be ensnared before the suspicion that anything wrong was taking place had entered his mind.

What had happened we will now proceed to relate.

CHAPTER CCCLXXII.

THE EXTRAORDINARY MARRIAGE OF DICK TURPIN AND MAUD GOULDMAN IN THE GLADE IN ENFIELD CHASE.

WHEN Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, at a sign from Tom King, had slipped behind one of the pillars of the portico and concealed themselves, the latter took the bundle from under his arm and unfolded it.

It fluttered down, and, as he held his hands before him, reached to his feet.

But what it was, the darkness of the place in which he stood did not allow it be seen.

In this way they waited during the little dialogue which took place between Tom and the parson.

As soon as they were aware of the result of it, they prepared themselves for action.

They heard the door opened, and dimly saw the figure of the parson cross the threshold and advance to the head of the steps.

As soon as he had done this, they glided from their place of concealment as noiselessly as two spectres.

The parson never suspected who was behind him.

Cautiously, silently, and slowly they drew nearer and nearer to him while the little conversation took place between him and Tom King, which was purposely prolonged by the latter, in order to give his comrades proper time to achieve their design.

It was a bold and novel one.

Having stationed themselves behind the parson, both highwaymen took hold of the mysterious object which Sixteen-String Jack had carried rolled up like a bundle.

It could then be seen what it was.

It was a sack, and one of rather unusual dimensions.

Claude and Jack had hold of it near the mouth.

The ejaculation which came so promptly from the parson's lips was caused by his suddenly finding the upper part of his body enveloped in the sack, which Claude and Jack had drawn over his head.

To use a common expression, "before he knew where he was," the sack was slipped down as far as his feet.

In vain he struggled.

In vain he tried to turn round, and gain the secure asylum which his home afforded him.

He was lifted off his feet with bewildering rapidity.

At first he was totally at a loss to think what had happened to him, and the agony of uncertainty which he experienced was something terrible.

He struck out wildly with his arms, and plunged madly with his feet.

But he did not achieve his freedom thereby.

He was lifted up by Claude and Jack.

The mouth of the sack was firmly secured by Tom King.

Parson Martext was then a complete prisoner, and wholly in the power of his captors, for them to do with him as they might think fit.

A position in which he was less capable of helping himself could scarcely be imagined.

He could not see what was going on, or judge by the expression of his captors' countenances what sort of fate was destined for him.

What strange and terrible thoughts swept like a dismal phantasmagoria through the brain of the unfortunate parson when he found himself in this inexplicable situation, no tongue can tell.

He made up his mind, however, that his doom would be death at least.

One would have thought, from his occupation, and the doctrines he enunciated when standing unthreatened by the least prospect of danger in his pulpit, that death would have presented few terrors to him.

But such was proved to be anything but the case.

A most abject fear took possession of him, and he shook like one afflicted with the ague.

He tried to command his voice sufficiently to implore the mercy of his captors, but his tongue refused to do his bidding.

In the meantime, the sack, having been properly secured, Claude Duval took hold of it at one end and Sixteen-String Jack at the other.

Tom King then led the way across the garden and through the churchyard, and, in a few minutes, the highwaymen emerged into the lane.

The parson was deposited on the ground while the highwaymen regained possession of their horses.

It was while he lay thus that Parson Martext became aware of the fact that the mysterious object in which he was confined was nothing more nor less than a sack.

But this discovery in no way enlightened him as to the motives for which he had thus been made a prisoner, nor did it tend to remove in the slightest degree the apprehensions under which he suffered.

Before he had time to make any further reflections, the three highwaymen arrived with their horses

Parson Martext heard them pause.

He heard them whisper to each other.

But he could not distinguish the words they uttered, for they spoke in a very low tone of voice.

"It won't do for us to ride straight off now we have got him," said Tom King. "I daresay he knows every trick and turn about the place, and, if so, in spite of his being in the sack, he will find out where we take him to."

"What shall be done?"

"That is a point well worthy of consideration."

"We must decide quickly."

"Oh! certainly. The less time we lose, the better. What do you propose?"

"I don't know."

"The thing we want to do is, to thoroughly confuse him, and cause him to lose all idea of whereabouts he is—supposing him to have any idea upon the subject."

"Just so."

"Well, how is it to be done?"

"I have an idea," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"What is it? Let us hear it once," exclaimed his comrades.

"You know, when they play at blind man's buff, they always make the one whose eyes are bandaged turn round several times?"

"Of course they do."

"And what do they do it for?"

"To confuse his ideas, and make him uncertain in which direction his face is turned."

"Exactly. You have hit it. Now, this is what we want to do with the parson."

"It is. But, then, how are we to make him turn round in the manner you mention?"

"I confesss, at first sight, that seems very difficult; but, as I don't see why we need be very particular with him, I think it may easily be got over."

"How?"

"Why, we will so turn, and roll, and bundle him about, that he will no more know where he is than if he had been suddenly put down in the moon."

"Bravo! That will do."

These last words were spoken rather more loudly than those which preceded them, and, the consequence was, they reached the over-strained ears of Parson Martext, who immediately put upon them the most terrible signification.

He thought they must allude to his murder.

No sooner had they come to the decision we have recorded, than they at once set about putting it into execution.

The first thing they did was to pick up the bag at both ends, and then to run round and round in a circle with it, as though for a wager, to the parson's great amazement, who found this circumstance more inexplicable than the others.

He soon grew giddy, and sick, and faint; but, heedless of that, the gyratory movement was continued.

Suddenly, however, they stopped, and then ran round in the opposite direction to that which they had taken before.

This lasted for a few moments, and then, deeming the unfortunate prisoner not sufficiently bewildered, they made him stand upon his feet.

This, however, he was scarcely capable of doing, and he was only prevented from falling by the following means.

The three highwaymen stood round him in a triangle, and near enough for them to be within arm's-length of their prey.

First Claude would seize him by the arm, or some other portion of his body, and give him a whirl round.

Then, before he could fall to the ground, he would be seized by Tom King, who would whirl him round in precisely the same manner, and then pass him on to Sixteen-String Jack.

Thus the parson was knocked about from one to the other of them, until at length they ceased, for they were completely tired.

He sank breathless and exhausted on the ground, and incapable of making the slightest movement.

It was while he was in this state that Mr. Martext was lifted up on Tom King's horse, which happened to be the strongest animal of the three.

The manner in which he was placed upon it was anything but an agreeable one.

He was laid across the withers of the horse, just as a sack of corn might be.

Tom got up and sat behind him in the saddle.

He grasped the sack with one hand in such a manner that it could not possibly fall off, and then held the reins in the other.

The order to advance was now given, and off they set at a canter which jolted Mr. Martext about in a terrible manner.

After going for some distance, Tom King relinquished his burden to Claude Duval, who, in his turn, passed it to Sixteen-String Jack.

Thus taking it in turns, they at length reached Enfield Chase.

Their design had been to thoroughly baffle and bewilder the parson, and this they succeeded to the fullest extent in doing.

Whether he had gone north, east, west, or south, he had not the remotest notion.

The pleasant little dell where they had first halted on entering the chase, and which had so often been a rendezvous, was the point to which the highwaymen directed their steps, for it was here they had agreed to meet Dick; and, from the length of time they had necessarily been absent, they fully expected to find him.

Nor were they mistaken.

Immediately upon their arrival at the sweet sylvan spot which the moonbeams now lighted up, for the dense clouds had dispersed, they saw Dick and Maud emerge from the shadow of the trees, to which they had retired upon hearing their approach, in order to be quite certain it was their friends before they made themselves visible.

With all speed the highwaymen alighted, and Parson Martext, still enveloped in the sack, was laid upon the ground.

The horses were led away, and a few words passed between Dick and his companions.

The result of it was that Dick withdrew with Maud for a little while to some distance.

He was to return to the dell upon receiving a signal from his comrades.

In the meantime they made themselves very busy indeed.

A small empty cask, which had served them for a seat, was placed on end upon a level piece of ground.

Then they proceeded to untie the bag and release their prisoner.

When the sack was removed, they were somewhat alarmed to perceive that the parson lay quite still, without exhibiting the least signs of life.

Conjecturing, however, that he had merely fainted, Claude Duval fetched some water from the natural basin into which the mimic waterfall fell, and plentifully besprinkled him with it.

He was quickly rewarded for his trouble by seeing the apparently defunct parson stretch forth his arms and open his eyes.

Observing these signs of recovery, the administration of a little spirit was next resorted to, and it was wonderful to see what a revivifying effect a small quantity of it produced.

In a few minutes they had him thoroughly restored to consciousness.

It was some time before the reverend gentleman could recall to his mind the occurrences of the past.

He glared round him with mingled surprise and curiosity.

He was quite at a loss to think to what place he had been conveyed, for the trees by which he was surrounded possessed no distinctive character by which he could recognise them.

As soon as he had partially recovered from his state of mental confusion, Tom King addressed him.

The sound of his voice had the effect of bringing all that had happened full before the recollection of the parson, and again he was seized with the horrible fear that he was destined for some terrible death, which had formerly possessed him.

Perceiving this, and the great extent of his fright, Tom endeavoured to reassure him.

"Fear nothing," he said; "your life and body are in no danger. Do you comprehend that you are in no danger?"

The parson opened and shut his eyes in a wild and convulsive manner, and made several ineffectual attempts to speak.

He made several pantomimic gestures with his arms.

"I say again," repeated Tom King, observing the effect his former words had upon him, "I say again, you are in no danger. I tell you, once more, that your life is safe, but only upon certain conditions."

"Conditions?" repeated the parson, at length being able to speak.

"Yes, conditions. Your life will be spared, and your person carefully preserved from all harm, if you do exactly as you are told. But the moment you refuse, or even hesitate, to do what is commanded, that moment will be your last, and you will be handed over to a terrible fate."

"Oh! good gentlemen," said Parson Martext, rising to his knees, for he now began to find that his situation was not so bad as he had thought it—"Oh! good gentlemen, spare my life, pray spare my miserable life, and I will do anything you ask; indeed I will. Try me, gentlemen! I will do anything you ask, if you will but spare my life."

"That is well," said Tom King. "In the first place, then, you must swear——"

"Oh! yes, gentlemen. Contrary to the regulations of my profession as it may be, and unseemly as it may appear, yet, to save my life, I will even swear. D—n you all! D—n me for a fool! D—n all the world!"

Our three friends could not control their laughter at this ludicrous interruption; for, of course the sort of swearing in which the reverend gentleman indulged was not the kind that Tom King required, and as he would have found if he had only had patience enough to allow him to finish what he was about to say.

They judged, however, from this that the parson was rapidly recovering from the abject fear with which he had been possessed, and this was really the case.

Tom King, however, spoke to him with some severity.

"You must swear," he said, "not to reveal to a living soul any of the events of which to-night you may be a witness. A solemn oath will presently be proposed to you, which, if you refuse to take, you will that instant cease to exist; for we are desperate men, and should think no more of taking your life than we should of taking a sparrow's."

"I will take any oath you like to propose to me, gentlemen," said the parson; "but, oh! spare my life—spare my life."

"You will be uninjured if you will consent to the terms I have proposed. Am I to understand that you do so?"

"Yes, yes, gentlemen. Anything to spare my life."

"Very well, then. Listen."

"I am listening, merciful sir."

"You have been brought here to-night to perform the marriage ceremony upon two persons between whom no legitimate impediment exists."

"Anything but that, good sir. Ask me anything but that, and I will obey you. But I cannot do that. Indeed, I cannot."

"Then prepare yourself for instant death."

"Mercy! mercy!"

"Have mercy on yourself. You have been brought here for the express purpose of solemnizing a marriage, and, if you refuse to do it, you die at once."

"But, good sir, pray reflect."

"There is neither time nor need for reflection. I tell you, again, you have these two alternatives, and the choice you make depends upon yourself."

"But if, as you say, there exists no legitimate impediment why these two persons should not be joined together, why do they not in a proper manner present themselves at a church?"

"There are good reasons why such a thing is impossible; and with those reasons you have nothing whatever to do. Decide! Will you perform the ceremony, or will you die at once?"

As he spoke these words in a very determined manner, Tom King took out of his pocket a pistol, which he loaded, primed, and cocked.

The parson watched his every movement with an intentness that was really ludicrous to witness.

Advancing close up to him, Tom King thrust the muzzle of the pistol rather roughly in his ear, as he said—

"I shall count three, and if you do not consent then, the moment I pronounce the word three, I shall pull the trigger, and your brains will be scattered upon the sward."

The contact of the muzzle of the pistol had a remarkable effect upon the parson.

There was no doubting that Tom would carry out the intention he had expressed; and then, as for the pistol, he knew that the slightest pressure on the trigger would do the business—for he had seen it loaded with his own eyes.

In a screaming voice he cried out—

"Oh! yes, gentlemen. I will do it; I will do it. Anything to spare my life."

"Agreed," said Tom, as he removed the pistol. "Believe me, you have chosen wisely, for I should not have hesitated to keep my word."

"I shall be ruined through it, though."

"Pho—pho!"

"It is against the express orders of the bishop."

"Oh! bother the bishop."

"It's all very well for you to say, bother the bishop! You are independent of him, and I am not."

"That's very true. But I suppose you will only be ruined when the intelligence of what you have done reaches the bishop's ears?"

"No, not till then."

"All right, my friend; then you have nothing whatever to fear, for, of course, you would not be such a fool as to tell him yourself."

"No, I should not tell him."

"Then, you may rely upon it, the information will not reach his ears from any of our lips, for it will be to our interest to keep the matter a secret. So you need have no apprehensions on that score."

The clergyman smiled in a feeble and ghastly sort of way.

"Where are the bride and bridegroom?" he said.

"They are in waiting," said Tom King, "and will make their appearance as soon as ever we are in readiness. Now, let us have no further trouble. We shall keep a close watch upon you, and the moment you refuse or hesitate to obey us, you die!"

CHAPTER CCCLXXIII.

RELATES THE MANNER IN WHICH THE MARRIAGE CEREMONY WAS CELEBRATED BETWEEN DICK TURPIN AND MAUD GOULDMAN IN ENFIELD CHASE.

PARSON MARTEXT was now thoroughly subdued, and he prepared to resign himself to his fate with the best grace he was able to command

Tom King looked round, and saw that his comrades had completed their preparations.

Mr. Martext still continued on his knees.

Tom took hold of his arm, as he said—

"Rise at once, and follow me."

With a groan, which he tried in vain to repress, the parson did his bidding.

Tom kept hold of his arm, and led him towards the spot where the cask had been placed.

"Do you see that?" he asked.

"Ye—es," stammered the parson, misgivingly.

"Well, then, mount it."

"Mount it?"

"Yes."

"What for?"

"Don't ask questions, but obey! You will stand upon it to perform the ceremony."

Mr. Martext had no resource but to submit.

With a very bad grace, he got upon the cask.

He was a little man, and, like most little men, had a very great idea of his own dignity and importance.

The head of the cask was only just large enough for him to stand upon, and he cut a rather ridiculous figure.

"Now," said Tom King, "stand perfectly still, as you value your life. Where is your prayer-book?"

As he heard this question, a gleam of hope shot across the parson's face.

He fancied that perhaps, after all, he should be able to escape the solemnization of the ceremony.

"I have no prayer-book," he said; "and, therefore, I cannot read the service."

This was an entirely unlooked-for obstacle.

The three highwaymen stared blankly at each other.

Mr. Martext ventured to smile.

Was their project after all to be defeated, at the very moment, too, when they had begun to felicitate themselves upon its speedy accomplishment?

It seemed so; for, as our readers may suppose, the highwaymen were not in the habit of carrying prayer-books about with them in their pockets.

The parson's smile expanded into a grin.

He saw the dilemma in which they were placed.

"I don't believe the rascal," said Claude Duval, at length. "We have only his word that he don't carry a prayer-book. Search his pockets, and see."

"Agreed."

Claude and Jack sprang forward, and, in spite of the resistance which he made, proceeded to search the parson's pockets.

"What's this?" asked Sixteen-String Jack.

He had taken hold of the parson's coat-tails, and his hand came in contact with some hard substance, which, from its shape, he felt certain must be a book.

He plunged his hand into his pocket.

His conviction was confirmed.

He drew forth a book.

"Now, then," he cried; "who would take the word of a parson?"

"I told you he was not to be believed," said Claude Duval.

"What do you mean by telling us such a deliberate falsehood?" said Tom King, angrily, addressing the parson. "Do you know you are playing with your life?"

"He deserves to forfeit it," cried Claude Duval, indignantly.

"He does, indeed."

"Mercy, gentlemen—mercy!" exclaimed Mr. Martext. "You promised to spare my life!"

"I know we did; and, in return for our mistaken clemency, you tell us a deliberate falsehood."

"No—no."

"Shame—shame!"

"No—no!" screamed the parson, again; "I haven't told you a falsehood."

"I say you have."

"But I haven't."

"Didn't you say that you could not perform the marriage ceremony, because you had not a prayer-book with you?"

"Yes, I did."

"You admit, then, that you told us a lie?"

"No—no!"

"But you must have done. Here is the book."

"No there isn't; that is not a prayer-book."

"Not a prayer-book?"

"No."

"What is it, then?"

"A hymn-book."

"Oh! d—n it!"

Sixteen-String Jack opened the book, and, by the aid of the moon, saw that what was printed in it was divided into lines and verses, just as hymns would be.

The parson was doubtless right.

He had triumphed; and it was easy to see, by the expression of his countenance, that he enjoyed it.

But Claude Duval came to the rescue.

He was determined that they should not have all their trouble for nothing, if it could possibly be helped.

Turning towards Mr. Martext, he said—

"Now, sir, listen to me, and answer truthfully the questions which I shall propound."

"If you don't," exclaimed Tom King, "I'll blow your brains out!"

The stern tone in which these words were uttered made the parson's knees tremble under him.

"What is it you want to know?" he asked.

"How long have you held your present situation as parson?"

"How long?"

"Yes, how many years?"

"Nearly twenty."

"Oh! nearly twenty. Well, then, Mr. Martext, perhaps you will be good enough to inform us how many times during the twenty years you have performed the marriage service."

"I really cannot recollect."

"Why not?"

"Because I have performed it so many times."

"Exactly; that is just what I thought."

"Oh! is it?" said the parson, with a puzzled air.

He could not perceive to what point Claude's questions tended.

"Yes. But we will try if we cannot form some idea of the number of times. We shall not be particular to a few. Now, on an average, how many times do you read the marriage service in the course of a week?"

"On an average?"

"Yes. You understand what I mean by the term, I suppose?"

"Oh! yes."

"How many times, then?"

"Why, about three."

"No more?"

"No."

"How many times did you perform it during the past week?"

"Five times."

"That, then, is over the average?"

"Oh! yes."

"Well, we are bound to believe you. Just stop a minute, and you will discover the object of these questions. You say you have been parson for twenty years; and, on the average, have celebrated three marriages every week during that time?"

"Yes."

"Well, then. There are fifty-two weeks in every year. Three times fifty-two comes to——Let me see. I'll tell you directly. Three times fifty-two comes to exactly one hundred and fifty-six. Now, that number must be multiplied by twenty—the number of years, you know; and that gives three thousand one hundred and twenty."

"Quite correct," said Tom King.

"Now, Mr. Martext," continued Claude, "do you see the drift of my questions? If you don't, I'll soon make you. If you, by your own confession, have performed the marriage service over three thousand times, it is quite clear you must know it by heart; and, therefore, a prayer-book is superfluous. You can repeat the words just as well without one as with."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Claude's two comrades, clapping their hands with delight at the clever manner in which Claude had got the better of the parson.

"I forget it altogether," stammered the parson.

"Stuff!" cried Claude. "You don't expect we shall believe that, do you? You must know it off by heart."

"But I have a very bad memory-"

"Then we will see if we cannot improve it."

"Parson Martext," said Tom King, "we can't afford to waste any more time. You must solemnize the marriage at once. Here, take this book; no expostulations, they will not avail you. Take this book, I say. It will answer your purpose just as well any other."

"Of course it will!" interrupted Claude, "and I will soon improve your recollection. Do you see this?"

As he spoke, he took out of his pocket a rather large-sized pocket-flask.

He held it up close to the parson's nose.

"Do you see this?" he repeated.

"Ye-es," stammered Mr. Martext.

"Do you know what it is?"

"No.

"Then I will tell you. It is a powder-flask and, if you don't like to believe me, look here."

Claude took an unloaded pistol from his pocket, and poured some of the powder the flask contained into the pan of it.

He pulled the trigger, and a bright flash succeeded.

"You see there is no deception about the matter, so just pay attention to what I am going to do."

The parson watched him with the utmost intentness.

Claude took the flask, and poured a small quantity of the powder it contained all round the cask.

"What's that for?" asked Mr. Martext, in the greatest trepidation.

"Hold your tongue," said Claude; "you will see in a moment."

As he spoke, he continued to pour out the gunpowder; and, having surrounded the cask, he laid a train of it in a straight line, which he extended until his flask was emptied.

"Let me get down," roared Mr. Martext. "I don't like to stand here."

"If you move an inch," said Tom, "I will blow your brains out."

"Mercy—mercy!"

"Stand still, then."

"What does that powder mean?"

"It means just this," said Claude. "I am now about to summon the bride and bridegroom, and the moment they arrive you must begin and read the service without making any more fuss. If you don't, or if you hesitate about the words, or appear as though you were performing the ceremony against your will, I shall touch the end of this train of gunpowder with a match which I shall hold in my hand already lighted, so as to be in perfect readiness. The spark will fly along the train with the rapidity of lightning. It will reach the cask upon which you now stand. That cask is nearly full of gunpowder. It is in communication with that which I have sprinkled round the outside. The same moment, then, that I touch the end of the train with a lighted match, you will be blown up in the air, and, when you come down again, you will find yourself in a thousand pieces."

During the whole of this alarming speech, the countenance and gesticulations of the unfortunate parson were most amusing to witness.

His eyes rolled.

His teeth chattered.

His whole body trembled convulsively.

Indeed, his whole appearance was the embodiment of the most absolute fright.

No sooner, however, had the last words of Claude's speech been uttered, than he suddenly seemed to collapse.

All those muscles whose office it was to maintain his body in an upright position, seemed suddenly to lose their power.

He doubled up, as it seemed, into an inconceivably small compass, and rolled off the cask on to the green sward.

The highwaymen could not forbear laughing at this result of their threats.

However, as too much time had already been wasted, they determined to dally no longer.

Moreover, they feared Dick would lose all patience; and, not only that, they had a great deal of work to do before daybreak.

Tom King, therefore, went up to the spot where Parson Martext lay, a huddled-up mass.

He did not say a word, but clapped the muzzle of the pistol to his ear in the same manner as he had done before.

Horrified as the prisoner was by the information which had just been imparted to him, and confused as his whole mental faculties were in consequence, he still retained sufficient sense to understand the fresh danger with which he was menaced.

He started up into an undignified sitting posture.

"Mercy—mercy!" he yelled.

"Silence," said Tom, "and listen to what I have to say."

"Ye—es, good sir; I am all attention."

"Very well, then. If you don't want me to blow your brains out this moment, you will mount up again on to that cask."

"No—no! Mercy!"

"I will show no mercy if you do not obey me."

"But the gunpowder?"

"You have nothing to apprehend from that. If you perform the service properly, you will be as safe standing on the top of that cask of gunpowder as you would be if you were standing upon an empty one."

"I can't do it."

"You have you choice between that and certain and immediate death. Which do you choose?"

"Oh! I am a dead man. Have mercy upon me, a miserable sinner!"

"Your alarm is quite groundless. I tell you, over again, you have nothing to fear if you will only comply with our demands. Rise, or sit still and have your brains blown out."

It would seem by his manner that the parson set a very high value upon this article, for any mention of it made an immediate effect upon him.

He rose tremblingly to his feet, and looked around him with a pitiful expression, which was, however, a comical one.

"Mount that cask," said Tom, pressing the muzzle of the pistol into his ear with still greater force.

Reluctantly the parson obeyed.

He mounted the cask with the air of one who mounts the scaffold.

When upon it, his knees trembled so excessively as to make it problematical whether he would stand or fall.

"Keep still," cried Claude Duval, in a tremendous voice; "and now understand your position. Take this."

He thrust the hymn-book into the parson's hands as he spoke.

It was taken submissively.

"Never mind about it's being a hymn-book," continued Claude. "I am quite certain you know the marriage ceremony by heart; so, when the bride and bridegroom kneel before you, you will repeat it as though the words were before you. If you do this, all will be well; no harm will come to you. To guard against all accidents, however, and to secure your compliance with what I have proposed, I shall stand at one end of the train with a lighted match in my hand, and, if you fail in any way to perform your contract, I shall not scruple to blow you to atoms."

At this awful contingency, the parson seemed again in imminent danger of falling off the cask.

He recovered himself, however, when Tom presented his pistol.

Claude went on.

He judged he had already frightened and threatened the parson sufficiently, and so he thought he had better reassure him a little, for fear he should be too much overcome by his terrors to do what was required of him.

"On the other hand," he said, "if you perform the service to our satisfaction, and take the oath of secrecy which we shall propose, not only will you be perfectly free from all injury, but we will make you a present of a round sum of money, and take you in safety to your own house again. Now, silence. Those are our terms. You may accept them or not, just as you please. Prepare yourself. I am now going to summon the bridegroom."

As Claude spoke, he uttered the agreed-upon signal, and Dick immediately came forward in response to it.

He was at a loss to think what had been the cause of the delay, though he fancied it must proceed from some contumacy on the part of the parson.

Maud accompanied him.

She leaned heavily upon his arm.

Of the means taken to bring the parson to the chase she knew nothing.

She was, however, a consenting party to the solemnization of the ceremony.

Entirely led away by the romantic attachment which she experienced for Dick, she did not take into calculation all the results which must inevitably follow the step she was about to take.

If she is really in love, however, when does a woman pause or reflect upon future consequences?

At the last moment Maud felt some slight misgiving.

But she shook it off, and would not allow her determination to be shaken by the strangeness of her position.

She could not avoid feeling it acutely, in spite of her efforts not to do so.

Unresistingly, then, she allowed Dick to lead her up to the cask upon which Mr. Martext was standing.

She knelt down beside him, at his request.

Then Claude, who held a long piece of lighted touchwood in his hand, made an imperative signal to the parson to commence reading the service.

Fearful of the consequences of a refusal, he began.

But he was in such a state of agitation that he could not speak properly, and all that reached the ears of the bride and bridegroom was a confused, mumbling sound.

Whether it was right or not, they had no idea, but they took it for granted that it was.

As Claude had assumed, Mr. Martext knew the marriage service by heart perfectly well.

He faltered and hesitated once or twice, but, each time that he did so, Claude put the lighted match closer to the train of gunpowder.

This was sufficient.

The parson would recover himself, and proceed with renewed vigour.

He had a mortal fear of his life, and would rather do anything than sacrifice it.

As the reader may be sure, there was in reality no gunpowder in the cask.

That was a little fiction invented purposely to terrify Mr. Martext.

The cask was an empty one, which had been found among the miscellaneous odds and ends in the cavern, and had been used for a seat, for which purpose it answered very well indeed.

The powder which had been sprinkled about was genuine, but then scarcely any harm would have resulted to anyone if it had exploded, and Claude by no means intended that it should.

It shows how much the parson must have suffered his fears to get the better of him, or else he would have known that he was in no danger of an explosion, because the others would have been involved in the same destruction as himself.

That idea, however, never once occurred to him.

In a gabbling voice, he proceeded with the service until he had ended it.

He signified this by closing the hymn-book with a smart slap.

Then, completely overcome, he once more doubled up and rolled on to the ground.

The ceremony was over.

Dick Turpin and Maud were man and wife.

There was only one thing that was wanting to complete it, and that was a wedding-ring.

This deficiency, however, was not material, and could be supplied at the first convenient opportunity.

The union of the highwayman and a lady such as Maud was, was a strange conjunction of destinies, and we look forward with interest to trace its results.

Raising Maud to her feet, Dick at once led her away from the dell, leaving his comrades to square accounts with the parson.

This they at once set about doing, for time was fleeting fast; and ere long, they knew, the night, which had witnessed so many strange occurrences, would completely flit away.

They had a great deal to accomplish.

The dismay of the parson was to them a source of the greatest amusement.

Tom King had all along taken the initiative with respect to any proceedings connected with him, and he now continued to do so.

Knowing by previous experience the remarkable effect which the cold muzzle of the pistol had upon him, Tom once more pressed it into his ear.

The parson rose the moment he was commanded to do so. He assumed a kneeling posture.

"Shake off your fears," said Tom. "You have done what we required of you, and you have now nothing whatever to dread from us in the shape of personal violence."

The repetition of this assurance seemed to have a revivifying effect upon him.

He struggled to his feet.

"We have promised to take you back to your house," continued Tom, "and you may rely upon our performing that part of the contract. Have you any idea where you are?"

The parson looked round him.

Observing he did not immediately reply, Tom repeated the question.

"I am in a wood," said Mr. Martext, at length.

"You needed no conjuror to tell you that; but what wood?"

"Ah! that I don't know."

"Then I should advise you not to attempt to find out. As we don't want you to know, you cannot be surprised if we take steps to make such a thing utterly impossible."

"You were good enough to promise me something for my trouble."

"Right," said Tom. "I am glad you reminded me; I always like to fulfil all my engagements."

Then, turning to Claude, he added—

"You carry the purse, so I leave that part of the business to you."

The parson turned round eagerly and avariciously towards Claude, who drew forth a large leather bag, and, plunging his hand into it, drew forth a number of guineas.

These he pressed into the parson's hands, who extended them impatiently.

The next moment they were conveyed, with a sigh of satisfaction, to his pocket.

Mr. Martext was poor, and the amount he now received was more than his annual stipend.

He by no means repented his night's work.

He considered himself amply paid for all the inconvenience, alarm, and terror he had suffered.

He professed his utmost willingness to take any oath of secrecy which they might think fit to propose.

Claude dictated one, which Mr. Martext readily repeated.

He seemed anxious to convince them of his good faith.

"We will now take you back to your residence, as we promised," said Tom King, "and you must not feel angry with us if we adopt such means as we think will prevent you discovering this retreat."

"Do anything but put me into that sack."

"If you have so great an objection to it, I daresay we can devise some other equally effective mode."

"Do so, then, I pray you, for the sack is excessively distasteful to me."

The highwaymen consulted together for a minute or two, upon this request.

It was at length agreed that Mr. Martext should merely be blindfolded, and placed upon a horse behind one of them.

To this the parson himself consented, and they at once proceeded to carry out the arrangement.

The long neckcloth which he wore was taken off, and bound over his eyes in such a manner as to make it an impossibility for him to see in the slightest degree.

Tom King then mounted his steed, and his two comrades lifted the parson on to the horse behind him.

"Clasp me round the waist," said Tom King, "and hold on for your life. If you don't, you will probably find yourself in the roadway."

Mr. Martext did not require twice telling to do this.

He clasped Tom convulsively.

There was no fear of his hold being shaken off.

Claude and Sixteen-String Jack now mounted their steeds, and accompanied Tom to the high road—it being their intention to take it in turns to relieve Tom of his burden.

They were careful, too, to take every precaution they could think of to baffle the parson, and confuse him as to the direction taken.

For this reason Tom would cause his horse to wheel round and round for several times in rapid succession, and then to set off in a straight line—but in what direction he judged it to be out of the parson's power to tell.

And in this he was quite correct; for though, when they set out, Mr. Martext had made up his mind to accurately observe the route taken, he soon became so completely bewildered that he gave up the attempt in despair.

CHAPTER CCCLXXIV.

CLAUDE DUVAL HAS AN ADVENTURE ON THE HIGHWAY, AND MEETS WITH A SAD MISHAP.

Having succeeded in baffling the parson as to the route taken, the highwaymen set forward, at the best speed of which their horses were capable, in the direction of his dwelling.

This they reached without the occurrence of any incident worthy of record; but, when just within sight of the church, the same manœuvres were repeated.

Then, suddenly darting forward, Tom drew up with a jerk just opposite the gate leading into the churchyard.

Claude and Jack dismounted; and Mr. Martext, upon receiving the intimation that his home was reached, suffered them to lift him down.

When once they had got him in their grasp, they did not release him, but with great swiftness carried him to the palings, and, lifting him over, dropped him on to the soft soil in the graveyard.

The parson uttered a yell when he found himself falling, and, as soon as he reached the ground, he made a desperate effort to remove the bandage which covered his eyes; but, long ere he could succeed in doing so, he heard the trampling of horses' hoofs die away in the distance.

When, at length, he removed it and looked around, he found himself alone, sitting on a mound in the churchyard, and with no human being in sight.

Our friends considered that they had managed this business very cleverly, and congratulated themselves upon it.

The road before them was straight and level, so they put their horses to speed; for already upon the eastern horizon could be perceived some faint indications of the coming day, and they wished to gain the shelter of the chase before it got thoroughly light.

Gradually, however, a faint gray tinge overspread all objects, rendering them indistinctly visible.

As this pale, spectral sort of light increased in brightness, a curious kind of white mist became perceptible.

It seemed to rise from the ground and to increase in density as they proceeded, until, at length, they appeared to be enveloped in a cloud of white steam, making it impossible for them to see half-a-dozen yards beyond their horses' heads.

This was a phenomenon which all three of the highwaymen, when returning from their excursions on the road had frequently witnessed, and more than once they had owed their escape to it.

Never was the white mist more acceptable than on the present occasion, and they earnestly hoped that it would continue until they reached their destination.

It was of the utmost importance that they should not be seen to enter the chase by anyone, because the safety of their refuge there depended entirely upon their presence in it being unsuspected.

Despite the manifest danger, then, of so doing, they pushed on at full speed through the mist, trusting more to the sagacity of their horses than their own to keep them clear of any obstacles.

Soon, however, it became evident that the mist was local, or else that it was passing away; for, as they continued on their way, its density rapidly diminished.

Suddenly as they looked in advance, the three highwaymen saw simultaneously some huge, black, shadowy object.

It was approaching them rapidly.

Under the impulse of the moment they pulled up, and drew their horses close to the side of the road.

No sooner had the clattering of the hoofs of their own steeds ceased, than another sound reached their ears.

They recognised it in a moment.

It was that peculiar grating, crushing noise which is produced by a vehicle passing rapidly over a gravelled road.

Before they had time to more than notice this, the huge shadowy object which they had first perceived swept by them at full speed.

They then saw that it was a large travelling carriage, which appeared larger to their eyes than it really was, in consequence of seeing it through the mist, which, though thin, magnified and distorted all objects in a remarkable manner.

There was a sudden rush, and then the vehicle became lost to sight, though the grinding of the wheels could still be heard.

"It was a fortunate thing," said Tom King, "that we perceived that carriage when we did and drew aside. If we had not, we must inevitably have come into collision with it, and we, beyond all doubt, should have been the greatest sufferers."

"There can be no question about that," coincided Jack; "for they never reduced their speed in the least. I wonder who they can be, travelling at such a tremendous rate, and at this unusual hour, too?"

"I have a great mind to find out," said Claude Duval; "for, I can assure you, what I gave the parson has reduced the amount of our wealth very materially."

"No—no, Claude."

"But I say it has."

"I don't mean that."

"What do you mean, then?"

"Why, don't think of stopping that carriage."

"Why not?"

"Because, as sure as you do, we shall not reach the chase until long after daylight; and I should not like the secret of our place of refuge to be discovered just yet."

"Nor need it be. This is a thinly-populated piece of country, and we need not feel so afraid of being seen."

"Well, do not let us run the risk on this occasion."

"Why not? I cannot allow a good booty, such as that probably is, to pass me without making an attempt to obtain possession of it."

"But it will be unwise to do so in this instance."

"Not a bit."

"Besides, while we have been talking the carriage has got quite out of hearing."

"Never mind that—I can easily overtake it."

"What! going at such a speed as it was?"

"Yes."

"But think how late it will be when we return."

"Not at all. The business will be over in ten minutes; and it is so long since I had an adventure on the road, that I feel it to be a matter of impossibility for me to let this one pass by."

So saying, Claude struck his spurs sharply into his horse's flanks, and, before his comrades could say another word, or make the least attempt to stay him, he darted off at full gallop in the direction the carriage had taken, and which was, of course, away from Enfield Chase.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack could not help feeling annoyed to find their comrade act in so headstrong a manner, and they feared the worst results would ensue.

However, the mischief was now done, and the only thing they could do was to make the best of it.

Accordingly, then, they turned their horses' heads in the direction Claude had taken, and followed him, determined to share whatever danger he might incur, and also to be at hand in case their presence should be needful.

But such was the impetuosity with which Claude had set forward, that he was already out of sight and hearing.

They, however, spurred their horses and endeavoured to come up with him.

The reader will doubtless recollect that, several times lately, Claude expressed his dissatisfaction at the dull, inactive life they were leading.

He longed for the excitement of an adventure on the road; and on the present occasion, as we have seen, this feeling got the better of his prudence.

He knew the danger and risk that he would run, but the knowledge did not deter him; and he galloped off alone in the manner we have related, calculating that his companions would follow him, and caring very little whether they did or not.

He soon found, however, that the carriage had got much further in advance than he could have believed possible; and, although his own speed was so terrific, it was some time before he came in sight of it.

When he did so, day had fairly dawned, and the faint light in the east was rapidly extending itself over the whole of the heavens.

In spite of this circumstance—and he could not fail to notice it—Claude kept on.

He was certainly gaining on the carriage, and he pressed his steed to make a still greater effort, and overtake it as speedily as possible.

The clattering of hoofs was terrific, and sparks flew from the flinty stones upon the road at every bound he took.

It seemed as though the sounds of his approach reached the ears of those of whom he was in such hot pursuit.

At any rate he fancied their speed was much increased. Still he gained on them rapidly.

Claude looked back once or twice, but he could see nothing of them.

A few more minutes elasped, and then he approached within a yard or two of the carriage.

He held a loaded pistol in both hands, having taken the reins between his teeth.

Judging himself to be near enough to effect his purpose, he fired one of the pistols in the air, and, the moment he had done so, dropped the now useless weapon into the road.

His left hand was now free, and he seized the reins with it.

Then, when the report of the pistol had died away, he cried, at the top of his voice.

"Halt! coachman. Pull up your horses, or you are a dead man!"

The first pistol Claude had fired in the air, but the explosion terrified the coachman, and he was by no means sure whether he was not dead already.

However, he still retained his senses sufficiently to comprehend Claude's command, which fell upon his ear with painful distinctness.

Mechanically he tightened his hold upon the reins, and the four horses by which the carriage was drawn came to a standstill.

The vehicle itself swayed about a great deal on its springs in consequence of having been stopped so quickly, but before the oscillation ceased the window was let down with a tremendous clatter, and a man's head was projected through it.

"Drive on, coachman!" he cried, in tones of startling energy. "Drive on, I say! How dare you take orders from anyone but myself?"

Implicit obedience was the coachman's duty, and now he did not scruple to give the horses a sharp slash with the whip, in spite of Claude's threat.

The high-mettled steeds plunged and reared for a moment before they started off.

During that moment Claude reached the side of the coach.

"Halt!" he cried again. "Halt, I say, or it will be the worse for you."

With great suddenness the man who had put his head out of the carriage window turned round, and, before Claude had the least idea of what was about to happen, he levelled a pistol at him with great rapidity, and fired.

It was evident that he was a proficient in the use of the weapon, or he could not have taken aim so hastily as he did.

"Take that!" he cried, as he pulled the trigger.

At the same instant the carriage was set in motion.

Claude's finger was on the trigger of his pistol, and he fired.

But the shot was an aimless one, and the trigger was drawn only by a convulsive contraction of the muscles.

He reeled in his saddle.

A gasping sob came from his lips.

The discharged pistol and the reins dropped from his strengthless grasp.

A film gathered before his eyes.

Still he made a desperate effort to retain his seat in the saddle.

It was in vain.

Another gasping sob, which sounded almost like a groan, came from his lips.

He swayed twice from side to side in the saddle.

Then dropped like a log of wood into the road.

CHAPTER CCCLXXV.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD GOULDMAN HAVE A TERRIBLE ADVENTURE WITH A SNAKE IN THE OLD CAVERN.

As we have already related, Dick Turpin, as soon as the marriage ceremony was concluded, led his newly-made bride from the spot at once, leaving his friends to square accounts with the parson, of which scene he by no means desired that she should be a spectator.

He was married to her under the name of John Palmer, for it would not have done to trust the parson with the secret of who he really was.

He thought, if his comrades properly carried out the instructions he had given them, that no more would be heard about the matter.

Whether he was right or not in this conjecture, we must leave for time to determine.

As might be expected, Maud expressed her surprise at the extraordinary behaviour of the parson, and questioned Dick closely as to the cause of it.

But he returned only evasive answers to her interrogations, and endeavoured to change the subject of the conversation.

This he had but little difficulty in doing.

A keen wind swept through the forest-glades, and Maud shivered more than once.

"Come," he said, "the night air is cold; let us seek the warmth and shelter of the cavern."

"And Claude and his two comrades, where are they?"

"Fear nothing on their account. They are about to go out upon an expedition, from which they will not return for some hours. Most probably it will be at daybreak, and that is now far distant. Come, then, to the cavern, where we can depend upon not being interrupted."

Maud assented, and permitted Dick to lead her in the direction of the entrance.

She was now a highwayman's bride, and, though she repeated the words over and over again in her mind, still she could not realize fully her position.

However, she said nothing, although she could not banish a slight feeling of depression.

But, when she looked up into Dick's countenance, and saw it beaming with love, and the deepest possible respect, she felt cheered and reassured.

At length the cavern was gained.

A wood fire was smouldering on the stone which was set in the floor.

It was dim, and seemed on the point of expiring; but close at hand was a heap of brushwood, placed ready to replenish it, and this Dick cast on pretty freely.

The wood was dry and the twigs small, so the fire quickly burned up, and diffused, not only a comfortable warmth, but a cheerful light over the cavern.

Dick drew one of the seats they had found close up to the fire, and, seating his companion upon it, placed himself by her side.

For some moments both were silent.

Dick's thoughts were busy, and so were Maud's.

The former was reflecting upon the change which had taken place in his position, and the effect it was likely to produce upon his future prospects. The latter was considering by what means she could win him from his present mode of life.

As the interval of silence increased in length, it became more painful, and Dick resolved to make a bold effort and break it.

He placed his arm round Maud's waist, and gently drew her towards him until her head reclined upon his shoulder.

Then, in as cheerful a tone as he could command, he reverted to the occurrences of the past, and the extraordinary concatenation of events by which they had become acquainted with each other.

He alluded to all the manifold incidents which had since occurred, and all of which must be familiar to the reader, so that it will be unnecessary for us to repeat their conversation.

As he proceeded, however, Maud became insensibly interested, and joined in his remarks.

Most particularly did they dwell upon Blanche's unhappy lot, and Maud found it out of her power to restrain her tears.

She told Dick how much the poor girl had suffered, not merely from her father's death, and all the terrible circumstances connected with it, but from the fact that she had fallen deeply and violently in love with the son of her uncle, Adrian Winberry, but who in no way resembled his bad parent.

Still, whatever his good qualities might have been, she found it would be impossible for her to unite herself to the son of her father's murderer.

From such a union no good could possibly result.

And so she pined and grieved in the hopelessness of her affliction.

In this way the time passed rapidly and pleasantly.

Suddenly, however, Maud raised her head.

As she did so her countenance became convulsed with sudden terror.

Her lips parted, as though she was about to utter a shriek, but no sound issued from them.

Her eyes were fixed upon some object which rendered her speechless with horror.

She had encountered it the moment she raised her head, and found it impossible to remove her gaze.

It was fascinated.

But Dick saw nothing.

Maud knew it, and strove with all her might to speak, and warn him of the frightful danger with which he was menaced.

But in vain.

The faculty of speech was utterly denied her.

Still, she clung with convulsive energy to her companion, and her grasp tightened rapidly.

Surprised, Dick looked down to ascertain the cause of it, and was astonished to find her countenance distorted with horror.

He saw her eyes were intently fixed upon some object, and in a moment he turned his face in the direction in which she looked.

As he did so, a shout of surprise, but hardly of fear, burst from his lips, and he sprang suddenly to his feet.

A sickening, hissing sound, which chilled the life-blood in their veins, followed the movement.

Dick staggered back a step, and, in doing so, overturned the seat upon which they had been sitting.

Brave and bold-hearted as we know him to be, Dick Turpin may well be excused for the emotion he exhibited.

The object upon which his eyes had fallen was enough to dismay the stoutest heart.

On the side of the fire opposite to that upon which he sat was a huge serpent. In some strange way it raised its long, shiny body upwards, and moved its head about with a restless, uneasy motion.

The height at which it held its head from the floor, was at least four feet.

Its body was of immense thickness, and covered with scales, which glittered with a hideous brightness in the firelight.

At every movement they sparkled vividly, and assumed a thousand different hues and tints—from the brightest yellow to the deepest black.

Well calculated to inspire fear and disgust as such an animal could not fail to be, its most terrible features have yet to be described.

Its head was large and broad, and furnished with two comparatively small eyes, but of the most intense brilliancy that can possibly be imagined.

No words could possibly describe their peculiar character. They possessed a strange power of fascination.

When Maud first saw the serpent, her gaze was immediately riveted upon its eyes, and she found it impossible to look in any other direction.

As we have seen, it deprived her of every faculty.

She was like one spell-bound.

Every muscle was rigid, and insensible to her will.

She was rooted to the spot.

Precisely the same effect was produced upon Dick, but not in the same degree.

When he looked in the direction to which Maud's terror-stricken countenance was turned, he saw the hideous creature, and, under the first shock of surprise, had uttered a shout and started to his feet.

His eyes had been riveted upon those of the serpent, and he felt it beyond his power to remove them.

He made several efforts.

They were all vain ones.

The serpent's mouth was stretched open to its fullest extent.

Its horrible, forked, fang-like tongue played in and out with a ceaseless motion.

A sickening hiss issued from its throat, which seemed to increase in loudness and malignancy every moment.

It appeared preparing for a spring.

Dick was appalled.

His breath came from his lungs in short and unequal gasps.

Suddenly the serpent moved, as though about to glide round the fire and attack them.

For a moment, then, Dick's eyes were freed from their horrible fascination.

He took advantage of that moment.

He grasped the hilt of his sword, and drew it from its scabbard.

The polished blade gleamed brightly in the firelight.

With his other hand he still supported Maud.

On came the snake.

This time, however, Dick took care not to encounter the glittering, reptile-like eyes.

He stood prepared to destroy the snake, which, from its general appearance, he felt convinced was of a venomous character.

One touch of those long poisonous fangs would be sufficient to cause death either in himself or his companion.

Dick was ignorant, too, of the full powers of mischief which such a creatnre possessed.

Steadily it came towards them, with a hideous, undulating motion.

Dick fancied it had the power to spring upon them from a distance.

He held his sword in an attitnde of defence, determined to use it upon him should an opportunity present itself.

Maud was motionless. She was once more under the influence of the serpent's fascination.

Dick tried to release himself from her hold, and spring forward and attack it.

But he could not shake her off.

Gradually and stealthily the snake came nearer, until Dick fancied he could reach it.

He raised his sword and brought it down with the full force of his arm.

It hissed through the air.

But he missed his aim.

The serpent saw the sword descending, and drew back its head just in time to avoid the blow which was levelled at it.

Infuriated at his failure, Dick started forward a few paces, despite the danger of so doing, and struck another blow.

He did not wait to see the result of the blow, but drew back precipitately.

It was well he did so.

He inflicted a slight wound upon his adversary, but that was all.

Enraged by the pain the wound doubtless occasioned, the vibrations of the snake became more rapid.

It was about to dart upon them and enfold them in its embrace, when Dick, instigated by the courage of desperation, again sprang forward, although Maud tried her best to hold him back.

Again he struck at the snake, aiming as well as he could at the creature's head, which, he believed, was the only mortal part about it.

The sword descended with terrific swiftness, but the snake swerved aside, and the keen blade inflicted only a slight wound near its neck.

Terrified by his failures to produce an effect upon the creature, Dick darted aside with all the rapidity he was master of, dragging Maud with him.

It was well he did so.

Maddened by these repeated attacks, the serpent darted forward, and would have inevitably struck them, had they continued to stand upon the same spot.

As it was, they escaped.

But Dick was now growing alarmed that, ere he could destroy this noxious reptile, one or both of them would be afflicted with its venom.

The snake, baffled in its first attempt, turned round with surprising rapidity.

Dick retreated.

The snake followed with a rapid motion, leaving a streak of blood behind it on the floor of the cavern to mark its progress.

CHAPTER CCCLXXVI.

THE NON-ARRIVAL OF TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AT THE CHASE AT THE APPOINTED HOUR, FILLS DICK TURPIN WITH UNEASINESS AND ALARM.

THE danger with which Dick Turpin and Maud were assailed was of no ordinary description.

The present adventure was one totally dissimilar to any he had ever had before, and therefore, it is not to be wondered at if he failed to act with his usual coolness and daring.

As the serpent approached, therefore, he retreated, endeavouring to keep the fire continually between himself and it.

The behaviour of the serpent now indicated the utmost anger and ferocity.

It darted its forked tongue in and out of its mouth, with inconceivable rapidity, and hissed incessantly.

Still Dick managed to keep out of its reach.

This, however, was a state of things that could not last, as all hopes of tiring the animal would be futile.

He would have sheathed his sword and drawn a pistol, and endeavoured by means of that weapon to defeat his adversary, but he feared that, during the time it would necessarily take to do this, the serpent would make an attack upon him.

As for his companion, she was too much overcome with fright to be of the least assistance to him—in fact, she was an incumbrance rather than otherwise, for, without her, Dick doubted not that he should be able to vanquish the reptile.

As it was, she impeded the freedom of his movements.

At length Dick paused.

He felt that he could not continue thus retreating round the fire, for it required increasing vigilance.

Moreover, to add to the perplexity and horror of his situation, the fire showed evident symptoms of expiring.

The light it now gave was dim and perplexing, and the flames were fast subsiding into a dull red glow.

A vigorous stir would have altered this, and caused the fire to burn up brightly; but, placed as Dick was, it was out of his power to do even this simple act.

Confusing shadows were cast around, but still Dick's keen eye caught sight of the snake stealthily approaching.

Slowing it came, with its body flat upon the ground, and its treacherous-looking head raised only a few inches from it.

By a rapid motion, Dick changed his position somewhat.

He now stood with Maud more behind him than he had done hitherto.

His intention was to shield her from harm as much as possible.

Then, holding his sword in an attitude to strike, he awaited the approach of his enemy.

Either unconscious, or unheedful, of the uplifted sword, the snake continued to advance.

Dick knew the danger of allowing it to come too near to him, and, watching his opportunity, he darted forward with great suddenness.

Just at that moment, the snake made a spring.

But Dick observed the oscillation of his body, and was prepared.

Down came his sword, but again the rapid movement of the creature rendered his aim untrue, and instead of the sword striking him full upon the head, as he fully intended it should, it fell upon the fleshy part of the snake's body, about two feet from the head.

But such was the force and precision of the blow, that the body was completely severed.

Dick now considered the victory was gained, but he soon found that the battle had yet to be won.

Both portions of the snake now writhed themselves into strange contortions, and he quickly perceived that the vital principle, which is so strongly implanted in this class of reptiles, was far from being extinct.

The fangs were still charged with poison, and he had a narrow escape of coming into contact with them.

Providentially, however, he escaped.

Blood flowed in prodigious quantities from the severed body of the snake, and literally dyed the floor of the cavern.

One more blow would, however, be requisite to despatch the creature, but how to deliver it he knew not.

Maud clung to him with frantic violence.

Her fear was fast becoming more demonstrative.

She was deaf to all Dick's entreaties and commands to release him, and allow him to slay the monster.

He had no resource but to drag her with him, and this he found was no easy task, for she was no longer passive in his hands, as she had been.

In some unaccountable manner the severed serpent still continued to writhe itself toward Dick, still animated by the idea of doing him an injury if possible.

At length it came near enough.

For the last time our hero raised his sword.

This time his aim was not destroyed.

The sharp blade descended full on the middle of the serpent's head.

There was a horrible, sickening crash, and then the awful creature ceased to exist.

By this one blow Dick had divided its head between its eyes.

It was dead.

He gave a sigh of relief, and, flinging down his sword, he caught Maud in his arms.

For a moment he dreaded she would swoon, but she recovered herself.

It was the dread that Dick had been hurt by the fangs of the serpent that enabled her to do so.

She was terribly frightened and agitated, and our hero had much ado to calm her.

At length he did so, and, upon learning that he was wholly uninjured she burst into a flood of tears.

They soon relieved her heart, and she was able not long after to look up into Dick's countenance with a smile.

That smile he would have given empires to purchase.

Looking up, he saw, near the roof of the cavern, a dim, hazy light, which showed him that dawn was at hand.

For the present the cavern could not be otherwise than disagreeable to Maud, and she required but little persuasion to be induced to leave it.

"I expected my three comrades back again ere this," said Dick, as they emerged from the passage into the open air; "but they have not returned, and I cannot imagine what has occurred to delay them."

"Let us walk towards the borders of the chase," said Maud.

"I was just about to propose that we should do so. It may be that we shall meet them on our way."

"Was the expedition upon which you told me they had gone a dangerous one?"

"By no means. But you tremble. Are you cold?"

"No, no; but I cannot divert my thoughts from the terrible conflict you had in the cavern with the snake."

"You think too much about it. Try to banish it from your mind."

"I fear that will be impossible, for, to the longest day of my existence, I fancy that awful spectacle will be before my eyes."

"It was an awful spectacle," said Dick, "and we ought to feel thankful we have escaped so well as we have."

"I think I shall never be able to venture into that cavern again."

"Nay, nay; I think that fear a groundless one."

"But we may be attacked again."

"Such a thing is possible."

"Then, who could run such a danger a second time; or, if anyone was found willing to do so, how could he hope a second time to be the best off in the encounter?"

"That is very just; but serpents are by no means common in England, and, in all probability, this is the only one for miles round. I now remember having heard that these strange creatures have a strange affection for fire, and have been known to travel many miles in search of one."

"That, then, may have been the occasion of our visitation."

"In all probability it was so. Do you not recollect that, when we first perceived it, it was close by the fire?"

"It was—it was; and it may be that, if we had not molested it, it would never have hurt us."

"That, too, is possible, but I should not have liked to have trusted to it. However, when Claude, and Jack, and Tom return, I shall relate the whole affair to them, and then, with their aid, make a thorough exploration of all the hidden intricacies of the cavern. Our safety demands that we should not delay doing this."

"But the danger?"

"It will be less than remaining in ignorance of the place, and, besides, we shall all the time keep carefully on guard. It is a disagreeable event and I am much annoyed that it has happened."

"Hark! Dick, what is that?"

Both listened.

"I hear nothing," said Dick at length.

"Nor I now."

"What kind of sound was it that attracted your attention?"

"It sounded as though someone was creeping through bushes, and trying how silently it could be done."

"But I heard nothing."

"The noise was very slight."

"And now all is still."

Both listened again, but no sounds reached their ears except those peculiar to the forest.

It was a few moments after this that both reached the borders of the chase.

Not only had day fairly dawned, but the sun had already attained a considerable altitude above the horizon.

There was an anxious expression upon Dick's countenance as, having noticed this, he looked around and saw no signs which indicated the approach of his companions.

He was entirely at a loss to account for their being so much longer than he had anticipated; and, as the time continued to slip by without bringing him any indications of their coming, he began to grow much alarmed.

This uneasiness did not escape Maud, and she questioned him as to the cause of it, for she now began to think that the expedition upon which they had gone was of by far more dangerous a character than Dick had led her to believe.

He, however, assured her to the contrary.

"What can have delayed them," he said, "I am quite at a loss to think. I fear they have fallen into some unexpected danger."

"We can but wait with patience," said Maud, "and hope for their return. They may arrive almost immediately."

"I fear not."

"Upon what grounds?"

"I do not think they would venture to return to the chase while it is light; but, then, where can they be?"

Dick was much perplexed, and very uneasy.

He paced up and down with hasty strides, striving to calm the commotion of his mind.

Fain would he have leaped upon the back of his gallant mare Black Bess, and sallied forth to ascertain the fate of his companions, but the impossibility of leaving Maud behind him, and the manifest danger he must be the means of bringing down upon them all by thus exposing himself, put such a thing entirely out of the question.

As the day wore away without bringing any tidings of his absent comrades, his uneasiness increased, until at length he made up his mind that the worst had happened.

Never had a day appeared so long; but at length it passed away, and night came on.

Right grateful did Dick feel when he saw the lengthening shadows which the trees cast upon the greensward.

As the sun sank behind the horizon, a chill wind swept over the face of nature; but, heedless and insensible of it, he stood near the borders of the chase, listening for the faintest sound.

The twilight, which endured a short time after sunset, deepened into night.

But his comrades came not.

All things became involved in the general gloom.

Still Turpin waited at his post in vain.

The silence remained unbroken.

CHAPTER CCCLXXVII.

TOM KING AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SET OUT IN SEARCH OF CLAUDE DUVAL.

From what has already been related, we doubt not the reader will be able to understand why it was that Dick Turpin and Maud waited vainly at the appointed spot for the return of the three highwaymen.

We will return to them, and relate what further happened on that eventful morning.

When Claude had ridden up to the travelling carriage and stopped it, he little dreamt of the fate he was bringing upon himself.

The particulars of this adventure will be fresh in the mind of the reader.

He had fired a pistol in the air, and then, as soon as the noise of the explosion had ceased, commanded the coachman to stop.

His order was obeyed, for the report of the pistol still rung in his ears, and the coachman was not quite certain whether he was shot or not.

No sooner, however, had the vehicle been brought to a standstill, than the occupant of the carriage let down the window, with a terrible clatter, and, in a voice of extreme irascibility, inquired how he (the coachman) dared take orders from anyone but himself.

He concluded by ordering him to drive on.

The coachman obeyed.

He smacked his whip, and the high-spirited horses, giving one plunge, set the vehicle in rapid motion.

At this moment, the occupant of the coach, turning his head round, saw Claude Duval.

He then, without waiting another second, fired a pistol at him.

Claude was quite unprepared for this sudden attack.

The aim was a treacherous one, and the person who fired was evidently an adept in the use of the pistol.

The bullet struck our friend full in the breast.

His finger was already on the trigger of his pistol, in readiness to fire, and the sudden spasm which shot through his form caused a contraction of the muscles in his fingers, and the weapon exploded.

The shot, however, was perfectly aimless.

Claude was conscious that he was wounded, and strove to retain his seat in the saddle.

The effort, however, proved an abortive one.

The hand of death seemed to grasp him tightly.

He swayed backwards and forwards twice or thrice as he endeavoured to retain an erect position in the saddle.

Each time, however, he grew more incapable; until at length he uttered a strange, gasping sob, and fell into the roadway like a mass of inanimate matter, and not like a human being.

As he fell, the pistol he held in his hand slipped from his grasp on to the road, while his left foot in some way got entangled in the stirrup.

When he fell he was utterly unconscious.

Fortunately for him, his horse, though terrified to a degree, did not move from the spot, but stood exactly in the same position, trembling in every limb.

Had the horse started forward at a gallop—and such a thing was far from improbable—the consequences would have been terrible in the extreme.

Unable to make the slightest movement, and deprived of all power to extricate his foot from the stirrup, he would have been dragged, a bruised and mangled mass, at the heels of his steed, until death should have released him from his sufferings.

Claude Duval, however, was not destined for such an awful fate.

As we have stated, when he fell from the saddle to the ground, the horse, although suffering an agony of fright, stood profoundly still.

But of this Claude was ignorant.

The film that had come over his eyes appeared to him to be that of dissolution, and after that moment he remembered nothing.

It may, perhaps, be thought that he fully deserved the consequences of his own rashness and refusal to listen to the remonstrances of his comrades.

The danger of the enterprise upon which he had announced his intention of setting out, had been pointed out to him. But he heeded not what they said.

Intent only upon an adventure, which would vary the monotony of the life he had recently led, he cut short the brief dispute which had taken place between them on the subject by clapping spurs to his horse's sides, and darting off in pursuit of the carriage, which, owing to the swiftness with which it rolled over the ground, was no longer audible or visible.

For a moment or two after his abrupt departure, Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack sat in silence on their steeds.

The former was the first to break the silence.

"How foolish it is of Claude," he said, "to act in this manner. It seems as though he was quite indifferent whether or not our hiding-place is discovered."

"It is either that," replied Sixteen-String Jack, "or else the devil has got possession of him."

"You may depend it is the former," said Tom; "for latterly he has done nothing but grumble about the inactive life which we have been leading."

"So he has; and you think he has made up his mind to put an end to it?"

"I do."

"Well, I must say, he has gone the right way to work; for look, it grows lighter and lighter every moment, and we are a long way from Enfield Chase."

"It is very annoying, in every way you look at it. Not only will Dick be angry at such mad-headed conduct, but, doubtless, he is at this very moment standing at the appointed spot waiting for us."

"We shall not be there by daybreak, that is certain."

"No, for it is daybreak already, and Dick will be fancying all manner of evil has befallen us."

"But what are we to do? We must not stay here talking like this."

"I can hear nothing of Claude."

"Nor I. There's no knowing how far he may continue his mad gallop after that carriage."

"He will follow it until he overtakes it, you may depend."

"I suppose he will."

"That is just his character. For my own part, now that day has fairly dawned, I think the further we get away from Enfield Chase the better."

"Exactly, for if we are seen, as we are almost sure to be, and are at a good distance from it, the chase will not be suspected as our place of refuge."

"Precisely so. Then I propose that, instead of waiting here like this, we set off in pursuit of Claude."

"Agreed, my friend."

The two highwaymen, being both of the same opinion upon this point, struck their spurs into their somewhat jaded animals, and, at a steady gallop, took their way in the direction Claude Duval had gone.

It was fortunate for him that his comrades came to this decision.

The white mist, which we have mentioned, still hung in places on different parts of the road.

It seemed to have rolled itself up into dense masses, and then waited for a puff of wind to carry it away.

It thus happened that our two friends were unable to see very far in advance, for if they were not actually enveloped in one of these fleecy masses of mist there would be one on the road before them, through which they could not see.

Besides this, the morning light was faint in the extreme, and a considerable time would elapse ere the sun rose.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack were well pleased to find that all along the road they did not meet with a single human being; but this is scarcely to be wondered at, for the hour was one at which few people would be abroad even in populous places.

Our friends pursued this road, for a long while, without meeting with anything that indicated the presence of their absent companion.

At length, however, they entered one of those masses of mist of which we have made mention.

The road sank down into a kind of hollow, and the mist appeared to fill it completely.

It extended, too, for a great distance over the meadows on either side.

They quickly discovered, after going a few yards, that the mist was much denser here than they had hitherto found it.

This was in consequence, not only of the road being so much lower in this part than any other, but because of the immense tracts of swampy, marshy land in the vicinity.

In a short time, so dense did the mist become, that our friends could scarcely see beyond their horses' heads; and, as they were quite ignorant of the character of the road before them, except that they found it descended rapidly, they judged it prudent to reduce their pace to a walk.

The further they proceeded the denser did the mist become, until they were unable even to see their own horses' heads.

Consequently, they were invisible to each other.

They spoke continually, in order to be sure that they were not far apart; and it was only by this means that they were able to keep together.

To attempt to guide their horses was quite impossible, so they let their reins fall upon the animals' necks, and placed themselves entirely under their guidance, relying more upon the finer senses of their steeds than their own.

In this they acted wisely.

The horses went very slowly but surely, and they kept the middle of the road.

The silence that prevailed was something remarkable.

Indeed, it had a painful effect upon our friends.

It was not as though all was still, but as though the mist enfolded all things in its embrace, and deadened all sound.

Even the trampling of their own horses' hoofs only reached their ears in a muffled manner, the effect being almost the same as if they had trodden upon snow.

This was a natural phenomenon which neither of the highwaymen had ever before witnessed, and they longed to find the road rise, for, while it descended as it did, there was no hope of it getting thinner.

In this expectation they were disappointed.

The ground continued to have a downward tendency, though they fancied the descent was not so steep as it had been.

What was on either side of them they could form no idea, and their eyes ached with the efforts they made to pierce the uniform-coloured mass before and around them.

It was during this strange, hushed silence—if we may so speak—it was while the sounds of their own horses' hoofs reached their ears but indistinctly, it was during a pause in the conversation which the two highwaymen kept up with each other, that their ears were assailed with a sound so dreadful, so horrible, so utterly unlike anything which they had previously heard, that the first shock of surprise caused them to fairly reel in their saddles before they could recover themselves.

A strange chill struck to the heart of Sixteen-String Jack as he heard this terrible and unearthly sound, and, in a voice of extreme agitation, he cried to his companion—

"What is that? Tom, Tom, what is that?"

CHAPTER CCCLXXVIII.

TOM KING AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAVE A MYSTERIOUS ADVENTURE WHILE SEARCHING FOR THEIR MISSING COMRADE.

Tom King did not reply.

He could tell by the tone of voice in which his companion asked this question how greatly he was agitated, and he could not conceal from himself the fact that, if he spoke, it would be in the same anxious, hesitating manner as Sixteen-String Jack.

Therefore he was silent.

But, had he been able to command his voice, he would not have been in a position to return a satisfactory answer to his question.

The sound he had heard was so totally unlike any other that had struck upon his ear; and he was quite at a loss to think from whence it could have proceeded.

It was, too, quite indescribable; and, though its echoes still vibrated in the air, they would have been unable to convey to a third person any idea of what it was like.

Tom reined in his steed.

At the same moment, by making a great effort, he was able to call out to his comrade to halt.

Sixteen-String Jack was only too glad to obey him.

Guided by the sound of his voice, he made his way close to his companion's side.

He extended his hand and touched him.

Tom King uttered a shout.

This circumstance will serve to show how much he was unnerved by the sound he had heard.

Sixteen-String Jack was perfectly invisible, and the shout he uttered was one of alarm upon feeling himself touched, without being able to see by whom.

Jack's voice, however, reassured him, and, holding out his own hand, he grasped that of his staunch comrade.

Here they remained, quite motionless and speechless.

They were listening for and longing to hear a repetition of the sound which had struck so much dismay to their hearts.

Whether the horses were alarmed by the sound, or whether the infection of the fear which their riders exhibited communicated itself to them, would be hard to say; certain, however, is it, that they manifested extreme terror.

They trembled in every limb, and their ears were projected forward as though they, too, were listening for the awful sound to come again.

The highwaymen were not kept long in suspense.

The sound came again.

But this time, it was louder and more horrible than before.

It was, too, more prolonged.

It died away in a kind of sighing moan.

What could be the meaning of such a sound?

It was certainly not human.

Tom and Jack were not more sure of their existence than they were of this.

What, then, did it portend?

They shuddered as they simultaneously asked themselves this question.

All men are superstitious.

This may sound a bold assertion, but it is a true one.

It seems to be a feeling, an impulse, implanted in every mind

As a matter of course, it varies with different persons, both in intensity and degree.

There may be some philosophic minds who would avow that they were free from all taint of it.

Doubtless, under most circumstances, they would be so.

But, surround them with something awe-inspiring—something which they cannot comprehend—something altogether out of the pale of their experience—and then observe the effect.

In spite of their philosophy, in spite of the scepticism which they will endeavour to call in to their aid, they will feel their soul shrink within itself, and their mind become a prey to superstitious influences.

So it was with our two friends.

Their daring and bravery have, on many occasions, been exhibited, and the reader will not require to be told that they possessed those qualities in an eminent degree.

But now they were surrounded with strange circumstances.

They were in a portion of the country wholly unknown to them.

They were surrounded by a mist possessing qualities different to anything they had previously known.

They were unable to see where they were, or form any conception of the perils with which they might be environed.

It was under such circumstances as these that they heard the terrible and heart-dismaying sound, and it was in consequence of this that it produced the effect it did upon them.

Had they heard it in the bright sunshine, or in some place with which they were familiar, the effect would have been different.

Boldly enough they would have proceeded to ascertain from whence it came.

But now they remained quite still.

Had this terrible sound some connexion with their missing comrade?

This was a question that would intrude itself upon their minds.

They could not divest themselves of the idea that it was in some way connected with him.

Was it the foretoken of his death?

Unable to move to ascertain this, they remained with their hands clasped.

At length, however, ashamed of this fear, which, though natural, they persuaded themselves was totally unworthy of them, they determined to push on cautiously for a few yards at least.

Accordingly, they patted their steeds upon the necks, so as to reassure them as much as possible, and strove to urge them forward.

In vain; they planted their forefeet firmly upon the ground, and, drawing their bodies back, refused to stir an inch.

An application of the spur produced no better results.

In fact, it served to confirm them in their obstinacy.

It was while thus engaged that our two friends again heard the terrible sound, and they now noticed something in connection with it which had previously escaped their observation.

This was that the sound appeared to proceed from somewhere very close at hand.

But whether it came from the right or the left, from above or below, they could not tell.

It seemed to fill all the dense white mist with which they were surrounded, and to reach their ears on all sides.

Rendered desperate by again hearing the sound, and furious that their horses should have disobeyed them, they renewed their efforts to urge them forward.

The horses, maddened with the sharp application of whip and spur, reared violently and swerved, but they did not advance.

If anything, their motion seemed to retrograde.

Suddenly the highwaymen ceased their fruitless efforts

They had made an important discovery.

The mist was growing thinner and more transparent, and, probably, ere long would completely disappear.

They soothed their horses, and induced them to remain still.

Further and further they were able to see around them, as the mist slowly but imperceptibly dispersed.

At first they were able to distinguish the horses upon which they sat.

Then the two friends could dimly see the outlines of their own forms.

But every moment they increased in distinctness.

Then the tall hedgerows which fringed both sides of the road came into view.

But the attention of both highwaymen became wholly absorbed in a contemplation of their steeds.

They stood with manes erect, and necks outstretched.

Their nostrils were expanded, and their ears directed forward.

They shook with terror.

It seemed as though they could see something before them which excited their fears.

Perhaps, however, it was only the effects of their former fright.

Vainly did both Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack strain their eyes and try to ascertain whether anything was on the road before them.

As yet the mist was too opaque for their vision to pierce it for any distance.

Again they tried to urge their horses onwards, for the mist was now fast losing the density which had previously characterized it.

It was to no purpose.

Their eyes were still fixed upon something.

Again came the awful sound, and when they heard it the horses started and shook, and gave utterance to a strange cry, which was doubtless expressive of fear.

Again the highwaymen bent forward in the saddle, and tried to learn what was on the road before them.

A black, dusky, shadowy-looking object at length met their straining sight.

They closed their eyes a moment, fancying themselves deceived.

Quickly, however, they opened them again.

Something like a huge and shapeless black cloud was evidently before them.

Its size was gigantic, and its outlines so faint as to be indistinguishable from the mist into which they merged.

What could it be?

They knew not, but they could not help feeling convinced that, let the shadowy object be what it might, it was from it that the horrible sounds proceeded.

Clearer and clearer grew the mist.

Gradually it faded away.

Its colour changed in some mysterious way, and this was another occurrence for which our two friends could not account.

The explanation of it, however, was simple.

The sun had risen, and it was his early rays irradiating the mist which caused the change of colour so inexplicable to the highwaymen.

In consequence of it the white mist assumed a golden, yellow tint.

As they gazed upon the black object, its indistinctness seemed to increase, and its size also.

What it was, however, they were still unable to form any idea.

At last its outlines became better defined.

Slowly they traced them, and likened them to various objects which, as they proceeded, they found to be erroneous.

At length Tom King spoke.

"Look, Jack," he said. "Look at it now. What is it like?"

"I cannot tell."

"Now, now," continued Tom, "it resembles a horse; but whoever saw a horse of such dimensions? It is larger than an elephant!"

"It does resemble a horse," said Sixteen-String Jack, after looking attentively for a few moments. "But that it should be a horse is quite impossible, for who ever saw a horse such a size as that?"

"There it is, my friend. That is what puzzles me; and yet I can liken it to nothing else. Its resemblance to a horse becomes every moment more striking. I am bewildered."

"So am I; but we cannot do better than remain where we are. The mist is rapidly fading away, and when it completely disappears, which it shortly must do, we shall then be able to come to a correct conclusion with respect to this extraordinary affair."

"You are right, my friend; we will remain still, and watch attentively."

Both the highwaymen now relapsed into silence.

They concentrated all their attention upon the mysterious object before them, which had caused them so much alarm and speculative conjecture.

So absorbed were they that, for the time being, their absent comrade was forgotten.

If they had been two statues they could not have remained more immovable than they did.

Suddenly, however, the mist disappeared, as if by magic.

The means, however, was simple enough.

A stiff breeze had sprung up, and the mist scattered before the first puff of it.

Away it rolled, it rolled in fleecy masses, over the meadows, leaving the roadway almost clear, and fully revealing the mystery which had so perplexed Tom and Jack.

CHAPTER CCCLXXIX.

CLAUDE DUVAL'S CONDITION IS FOUND TO BE VERY DESPERATE INDEED.

STANDING in the centre of the roadway was a horse.

There was no mistake now about the matter.

But the horse was shorn of its tremendous stature, and now presented itself of the ordinary size.

A moment's thought enabled our friends to come to a correct conclusion upon this point.

The apparently gigantic size of the animal had been caused in consequence of their viewing it through the dense medium of the mist, to which the sun's rays communicated extraordinary refractive power, causing all objects seen through it to appear magnified in a surprising degree.

If Tom and Jack had looked at each other, they would have perceived the same thing had taken place with respect to themselves, though not to so great an extent, in consequence of their proximity.

These reflections, however, did not occur to Tom King and Jack at the moment, though we have thought fit, for the satisfaction of the reader, to set them down here.

What they saw farther occupied all their thoughts and attention.

The horse, whose size had appeared so gigantic, was standing in an attitude of the utmost terror.

His mane was bristling, and his eyes, which were turned upon our friends, were almost starting from their sockets.

In a word, the whole appearance of the creature was indicative of the utmost extremity of terror.

In the surprise caused by the sudden discovery they had made, Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack had uttered a loud shout.

It was one of anguished horror.

It was not, however, the horse only which caused this.

Lying on the ground in a pool of blood, which had flowed from a wound in his breast, his arms outstretched upon the damp earth—with a pistol almost within reach of his hand—his left foot entangled in the stirrup, was Claude Duval.

Such, as the reader will remember, was the position in which we last described him, and such was the position in which he was discovered by his comrades.

This was indeed a dismal spectacle to meet their eyes, and one which they were far, very far from expecting.

It had never for a moment crossed their minds that they should find Claude in this unfortunate condition; and so great was their surprise that, for some moments, they remained without attempting to move.

No longer were they at a loss to understand why their horses had refused to advance.

The antipathy of such creatures to human blood is surprising.

They will scent it from afar off, and refuse to pass it.

Here the crimson fluid lay upon the road in large quantities.

Not only was Claude literally surrounded with it, but there was a long streak of it extending for some distance, showing that the horse had not all the time remained motionless as they found it, but had dragged the body of their companion along the road.

That, under such circumstances, he could continue to live, seemed quite out of the question—or, if he was alive, they felt convinced that life was held by the frailest and most uncertain tenure.

This was a point, however, which they would have to ascertain, and, in doing it, a considerable difficulty presented itself.

If they alighted from their steeds, they feared the horse, alarmed at the movement, would set off at headlong speed—dragging Claude, a bruised and mangled mass, after it.

This was so extremely likely, that the two highwaymen, with a terrible feeling of sickness at their hearts, remained still in their saddles.

The attitude of the horse, though expressive of so much fright, was one also that indicated his inclination to set off at a gallop upon receiving the slightest provocation to do so.

In such a state of excitement, the least thing would startle it, and our friends, necessarily, felt full of dread.

It seemed as though the least attempt to approach the animal would be sufficient to cause the death of their friend, if he was not dead already.

On the other hand, to permit him to remain in his present position was not less dangerous.

It was evident, then, that the horse would have to be approached and seized.

Now, when in their calmest and most quiet moods, our friends were well aware this was a by no means easy task.

For mere frolic they would gambol away from the hand outstretched to catch them.

Their hearts sank as they saw all the difficulties with which they had to contend.

Besides, while they were in this state of indecision, some other persons might arrive upon the scene, or something might occur to startle the horse.

The effort must be made.

At length, Sixteen-String Jack resolved to make the desperate attempt.

He spoke to Tom King, announcing his intention, and requesting him to remain perfectly still while he alighted.

Tom consented, for of the two he had much rather his friend endeavoured to perform the unpleasant task than himself.

Gently Sixteen-String Jack slipped off his steed.

Claude's horse, attracted by the movement, gazed at him affrightedly.

For some moments Jack did not attempt to move.

Slowly, however, he held out his hand in an encouraging manner.

The horse seemed to look at it wistfully and suspiciously.

Then Sixteen-String Jack spoke to it and in such a manner as he judged would be best calculated to soothe his apprehension.

The horse looked at him for a moment or two, and then stretched out its neck.

Encouraged by this, Jack ventured to advance a step, taking care to keep his hand still extended, and continuing to address it.

The horse took a step towards him irresolutely.

Jack advanced until he was almost near enough to touch it, and then he paused.

If he was too precipitate he would ruin all.

He had met with more success than he had dared to hope for, but still he did not allow it to bind his caution.

Circumspection was more than ever necessary.

Once more he advanced.

But this time the horse showed an inclination to start away.

Jack did not trust him further.

At the last moment he might deceive him and start off.

Measuring his distance, therefore, with all the accuracy of which he was capable, Jack sprang forward with great swiftness.

His aim was a correct one.

The horse started and plunged, but not until Jack had firm hold of him by the bridle.

He patted him with the other hand.

As soon as he saw that his comrade had secured the horse, and that there was no danger of his starting away, Tom King hastily dismounted and came to his assistance.

Leaving Jack to control the horse, Tom made his way to the prostrate form of Claude Duval, and set about releasing his foot from the stirrup.

He saw, at a glance, that, in consequence of the position of the foot, the easiest and quickest way of disengaging it would be by unbuckling the stirrup-leather.

This he hastened to do.

He had no difficulty whatever in the matter, for Sixteen-String Jack had quite succeeded in quieting the horse.

When the latter saw Claude's foot freed from the stirrup, he led the creature away and tethered it to the bough of a tree, which grew near the side of the road.

Then, with a heart full of anxiety, he ran back to ascertain whether Claude was dead or alive.

He was by the side of Tom King in a moment.

The first glance was anything but assuring.

His face was colourless and corpse-like, and his body rigid.

His eyes were staring wide open and covered with a kind of glassy film, which they always present in death.

Both shuddered.

Kneeling down, however, Sixteen-String Jack tore open his clothes in order to ascertain the character of the wound he had received.

A glance told him that it was caused by a pistol bullet, which had struck him in the chest.

From this the blood had ceased to flow, in consequence of the serum having coagulated over it.

His body was icy cold.

With a choking sensation at his throat, Sixteen-String Jack placed his hand upon his old comrade's heart.

He could feel no pulsation.

The action of that mysterious organ was stilled.

A deep groan came from Jack's lips, and tears started from his eyes.

Tom King was scarcely less affected, for his acquaintance with Claude was not a thing of yesterday.

"Alas," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, in a voice of anguish, "my first forebodings are realized; he is quite dead. Little did I think, when he rode away from us so suddenly, that that was the last I should see of him in this life. He is dead, and the truest, best, and bravest heart has ceased to beat!"

Jack ceased.

His emotions overpowered him.

He could speak no longer.

His friendship and companionship with Claude Duval had been of such long standing that he never thought that it could come to a termination.

Now, however, the end was reached.

So great was his grief, that he was oblivious of all things else, and it was some time even before Tom King became alive to the extent of their danger.

It was, however, imminent.

They were upon the broad high road, and day was rapidly advancing.

Discovery seemed certain; and it was clear they could not hope to remain much longer in their present exposed situation without being seen by someone.

Gradually Tom King made Sixteen-String Jack sensible of this, but for a long time he refused to take into consideration the danger in which he might individually be placed.

At length, however, Tom King succeeded in persuading him to stifle his grief for a short time, while they removed the body of Claude Duval to some more retired place.

The argument which had most weight with him—and, indeed, which induced him—was this.

Tom King hinted the possibility of the dead body of his much-loved comrade falling into the hands of the officers of police.

He at once consented to its immediate removal.

With a heavy and almost bursting heart, he assisted Tom King to raise the body,

Then the question arose, to what place should they take it.

Looking around them, they perceived at no great distance a clump of trees, which formed either a plantation or coppice, and to this they resolved to direct their steps.

It was too far off, however, for them to carry their comrade's body, so, at the suggestion of Tom King, it was placed across the back of his steed, which they would be able to lead in the required direction.

CHAPTER CCCLXXX.

THE MYSTERY OF THE HORRIBLE SOUND IS UNRAVELLED, AND TOM KING AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK CARRY CLAUDE DUVAL'S BODY TO THE WOOD.

DURING the whole of these proceedings, Claude Duval exhibited no signs of life, but presented every appearance of a corpse.

There was not the slightest symptom to raise the hope that he was yet alive, though holding possession of existence by a frail and uncertain tenure only.

[DICK TURPIN COMMANDS THE EXECUTION OF THE SPY.]

Like a sack of grain he was lifted by his two sorrowful comrades, who, having carried him some distance, placed him on the back of his own horse.

The creature trembled and shook.

His eyes glared; and once again the two highwaymen heard the frightful and unearthly sound which had so much alarmed them.

Even now they started, and, in their surprise, almost let fall the body of their comrade.

The mystery was now explained.

The sound came from the horse!

Yes; strange as the assertion may seem, it is nevertheless true.

But it was such a cry as neither of our friends had ever heard a horse give utterance to; and, but for the evidence now before them, they would never have believed it.

The sound was one expressive of the utmost terror, and is never uttered by a horse except when severely hurt, or extremely frightened.

Its character was most unearthly, and could be likened to nothing else but what it was.

Claude's horse, with that sagacity which is so frequently exhibited in such creatures, seemed to comprehend what had befallen his master.

The cry might have been wrung from him through terror, or—who knows?—it may have been uttered for the purpose of bringing assistance.

Many and many a time during that night had he startled all those around with the horrible screaming, groaning sound.

That the creature was terrified to a degree, was quite certain.

Its glaring eyes, erected mane, and trembling form, all bore indisputable proof of the fact.

It was, too, bathed in perspiration, which nothing but fright could have produced.

Tom King and his comrade could not but feel gratified at this satisfactory solution of what seemed to be an inscrutable mystery.

The condition of Claude Duval, however, too much occupied their thoughts for them to exchange any remarks with each other respecting it, though, doubtless, at a future and fitting opportunity, they would have some conversation on the subject.

By this time day had fairly begun, and they were full of apprehension lest they should be discovered before they could reach the distant shelter.

Sixteen-String Jack took upon himself the mournful duty of holding Claude on the horse, so that the motion should not cause him to fall off.

The two other horses were close at hand, and these Tom King held by the bridle with his right hand.

With his left he grasped the rein of the frightened animal, which seemed possessed of fresh fear at its lifeless burden.

Tom, however, had little or no difficulty in leading it away along with the others.

Ere he started, he looked eagerly up and down the road, in order to ascertain whether they were observed.

All, however, remained silent.

There seemed to be no people at all upon the road, which he could not help thinking was an extraordinary circumstance, though a very favourable one to him just then.

Suddenly, however, his keen eye detected in the distance a small cloud of dust.

"Look, Jack!" he cried. "Look behind you! Someone is on the road. I fear now we shall be prevented from reaching the shelter of yonder trees unperceived."

Jack's eyes were dim with tears, which he found impossible to repress, and he had to draw his hand across his face before he could see what his companion pointed out.

When he saw the cloud of dust, upon which the sun shone with great power, causing it to be distinctly visible at a great distance, he said—

"Yes, Tom, horsemen are on the road, but they are a long way off. If we are speedy in our movements, we may get under shelter before they can perceive us."

"Come on, then, my friend."

"Lead the way; I will take care of poor Claude's body. Alas! I never thought that he would die such a death as this. Lead the way, Tom, and don't go too fast or you will shake him off."

Tom King looked up and down in search of some opening in the hedge through which they might make their way, but nothing of the kind presented itself.

As far as he could see, the hedgerow presented a uniform and unbroken line.

It was necessary that they should cross the hedge in some way or other, because the little clump of trees they wished to reach was on the other side of it.

This was exceedingly awkward at a moment when time was of so much importance to them.

The horsemen, whose approach the cloud of dust indicated, were rapidly drawing nearer, and every moment diminished the chance of being unseen by them.

If, as they more than suspected, these should be officers of police, their situation would be embarrassing in the extreme.

Hampered as they were with the body of their late comrade, they would be unable either to fly with sufficient rapidity to distance their pursuers, or successfully contend with them if it should come to an encounter.

No amount of danger, however great, would, we are persuaded, have had the effect of causing them to abandon the dead body of their comrade to their foes; no, not even if they were certain of securing their own positive safety by doing so.

Under these circumstances, then, and with all these thoughts fully before his mind, it is not to be wondered at that Tom King should experience a great degree of anxiety, and look eagerly up and down.

To remain where they were, however, would do no good, and to go towards the approaching horsemen would be little short of madness.

So, adopting the only course of action open to him, he led the way along the road in the opposite direction, hoping soon to see either a gate leading to the meadows, or else a gap in the hedge through which they could force their way.

Sixteen-String Jack found his task of holding his comrade's body on the horse by no means an easy one, and he also became conscious that they were leaving a track behind them which could be followed with the greatest ease.

From various parts of Claude's body, and also from his apparel, blood trickled slowly, and fell drop by drop upon the road.

This must be altered, or discovery would be inevitable.

He spoke to Tom King upon the subject, and for a moment they were puzzled what to do.

At length Sixteen-String Jack hit upon an expedient of which Tom signified his approval.

Both the highwaymen stripped off their coats, and wrapped their deceased comrade in them.

This was found to answer their purpose admirably.

The blood no longer trickled down upon the roadway; and, probably, the coats would prevent it doing so for some time.

This occupied them several moments, and, when they again started, they perceived that in the interim the horsemen had rapidly gained upon them.

Still, however, they found they were too far off for them to speak with any degree of precision as to their character.

Evidently they were in great numbers.

The size of the cloud of dust which they raised in their progress was ample evidence of this.

That they were either police-officers or soldiers, in search of the highwaymen, seemed beyond all doubt.

As rapidly as possible Tom pushed on.

Still he was vexed not to be able to see a gate.

They were now in almost the lowest part of the hollow into which the road sunk.

Both before and behind was a long, steep hill.

Down one the horsemen were coming, and up the other it seemed that Tom King and Jack would have to take their way.

There was a bend in the road not many yards before them, and, as soon as they passed round this, they hoped to be lucky enough to find a gate.

Even if they did not, they would be out of sight of those in the rear, for some minutes at least.

Presently the bend was reached.

Passing round it, almost the first thing that attracted Tom's attention was a gate, which was swinging open in the road in a somewhat dangerous manner.

This caused him to increase his speed.

As the gate was not very far off, it was soon gained.

As soon as they passed through it, they endeavoured to close it after them.

This, however, they were unable to do, for the fastenings were broken.

There was a large stone lying near, and this Tom King placed against the bottom bar of the gate in such a manner as to prevent it swinging open again.

They now found themselves in a ploughed field of vast extent.

At right angles to the gate, however, and the road they had lately been pursuing, was a tall, quickset hedge running in the direction of the clump of trees whose shelter they were so anxious to gain.

This hedge divided the ploughed field in which they stood from a meadow; and, as its direction was at right angles to the road their pursuers were coming, they were in hopes, by keeping close underneath it, of eluding their observation altogether.

Animated by this hope, they pushed on at even greater speed.

Just under the hedge was a narrow, beaten path, upon which they could walk without difficulty.

The ground rose rapidly beneath their feet, and they hoped to be able to pass the brow of it before the horsemen reached the pool of blood in the lane.

This, they calculated, would delay them a few moments at least.

If those who approached were officers, then a close search would be certain to take place.

If, on the other hand, they were merely civilians who were approaching, their first impulse would be to spread an immediate alarm, and look for the body

Now, if Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack were not recognized in their character of highwaymen, the circumstance of their being in possession of the dead body would be sufficiently suspicious to warrant their being detained and taken into custody.

The reader will, therefore, comprehend how manifold and cogent were the reasons which induced the highwaymen to shun observation as much as possible.

At length the crest of the hill was reached.

Below them were several fields, and beyond these the clump of trees which had first attracted their attention when in a higher part of the road.

To this they still resolved to direct their steps, for they could perceive no other place which offered them the promise of a shelter.

They commenced their descent.

Scarcely had they done so, however, than a loud cry, which seemed to issue from many a lusty throat, struck upon their ears.

They knew the meaning of it in a moment.

The pool of blood had been discovered, and the fact that they had no time to lose was pressed more urgently upon them.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXI.

A TROOP OF LIGHT DRAGOONS FOLLOWS HARD UPON THE TRACK OF THE HIGHWAYMEN.

ACCORDINGLY, their pace was accelerated as much as possible; but they were not able to go very fast, from the fear they had that Claude would be shaken off.

By this time, however, Sixteen-String Jack had succeeded in getting the body of his friend tolerably well balanced, so that he had not so much difficulty in holding him on.

At present, however, they were sure they were out of the sight of their enemies, and they hoped to be lucky enough to continue so until the wood was gained.

It was now not far off, and every moment seemed to materially increase the distance.

No more sounds reached them, except the one wild shout of astonished discovery; but whether this was because they were too far off to hear what happened further, or whether it was because no other cry was uttered, they knew not.

The horsemen, whose approach they had perceived, were part of a troop of light dragoons, who, in common with a great many more of the home troops, had been sent out on the (to them) unwelcome expedition of searching for the four highwaymen, whose late daring and desperate deeds had made the whole country ring.

The authorities had at last taken the matter vigorously in hand.

The length of time which had already elapsed since the daring outrage at Newgate, without the perpetrators of it having been brought to justice, caused a general outcry against the inefficiency of their means in dealing with such desperate characters.

For their own honour's sake, then, the authorities had taken the matter in hand, and they felt that their own reputation was at stake.

The large rewards they had offered for the capture of the offenders had proved quite useless.

If the police could not, under such a stimulus as this, accomplish the task set them, they were certainly quite incapable of doing it at all.

Having come to this conclusion, the police were set aside, and they resolved to try what could be done by military aid.

Orders were given in the proper quarter that so many troops should be singled out for the service, and this was accordingly done.

In a very military manner the soldiers, under the command of their officers, were made to patrol the roads within twelve miles round London.

They were divided into small detachments, each one of which had a particular piece of ground to go over.

Their instructions were commensurate with the exigency of the occasion.

Should they encounter any of the highwaymen, they were to pursue them with all possible speed and energy.

If they found it impossible to overtake them or to make them prisoners, they were to be shot down without mercy; as captured they were to be, one way or the other.

These orders sound somewhat sanguinary, and unlike those issued by the authorities in such matters generally; but the reader must bear in mind the peculiar posture of affairs.

The public prints of the period were loud in finding fault with the insufficiency of the means of dealing with these desperate law-breakers, and this caused the adoption of more stringent measures than, perhaps, would otherwise have been thought of.

Such, however, were the instructions given to the soldiers.

The highwaymen were to be captured, either dead or alive, and it did not seem to matter much which.

As for the military themselves, small mercy could be expected from them.

There was not a man among them who was not disgusted and angry with the extra and unsoldier-like duty they had to perform; and they made up their minds, as they were obliged to submit to their orders, to put an end to the affair as quickly as they could.

In quite an angry and revengeful spirit, then, from which our friends had everything to dread, the soldiers set about their new duty.

Up to the present moment, as we are aware, they had met with no success whatever.

Owing to the highwaymen having kept so close within the shelter of Enfield Chase, all their patrolling had been without result; and they had the additional aggravation of knowing that they had taken all this trouble for nothing.

It was by no means a treat to be obliged to leave the barracks and pace up and down a piece of roadway night after night—especially when the season was so far advanced as it was.

There was a sharp frost every night, and they felt the effects of it severely.

Still they met with nothing to reward them for their trouble.

The roads remained perfectly quiet; people made their journeys to and from the metropolis in safety, and nowhere was there any rumours of alarm.

From this it became clear to them that those of whom they were in search were hiding somewhere.

If so, they had only to wait patiently for them to make their appearance.

This was what they were least capable of doing; but the authorities were inflexible, and they had to continue their disagreeable duty.

The reader will easily understand how fraught with danger to the four highwaymen, in whose fortunes it is presumed they feel an interest, such a state of things as this must be.

But what was worst of all was that they were ignorant of the additional danger with which they were menaced.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack, as they made their way towards the plantation, thought that at most they were officers who were so close upon their track, and the idea of their being soldiers never once glanced across their minds.

Upon reaching the bottom of the hill which they had been descending for some time, and upon reaching the lowest part of the hollow into which the road fell, the horse upon which the foremost of the dragoons rode suddenly swerved; and, had he not been an accomplished and practised horseman, would certainly have unseated him.

As it was, he only preserved his balance with difficulty.

Looking down upon the ground to see what it was that had caused the animal's alarm, he perceived an immense pool of blood.

Under the impulse of the moment he gave utterance to a loud shout of surprise, which was echoed by several of his companions.

It was this cry which had reached the ears of Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack as they bore the body of Claude Duval over the fields.

Upon making this discovery, several of the dragoons, by the command of their officer, alighted, and made a closer examination of the pool of blood, and the ground in the neighbourhood of it.

From the appearance of the former they were quite of opinion that it had not lain there very long.

The discovery of the streak of blood which our friends had noticed followed as a matter of course.

This, the reader will remember, had been caused by the horse dragging the body of its rider after it.

Following this streak of blood, which they had no difficulty whatever in doing, the dragoons found it extended only a short distance, and terminated in another pool of blood, the dimensions of which were almost equal to the one they had found.

Here, then, was ample enough evidence that a tragedy of some kind or other had been perpetrated, and they doubted not that, if they only took the trouble to look around them, they would quickly discover still further traces of it.

With this impression they examined the ground all round, but this afforded them very little information.

The ground was dry and dusty, and blurred all round with footmarks, produced both by horse and man.

Not a few were produced by themselves, and they found themselves puzzled to say which.

The discovery of the spots of blood which had flowed from the wounds of Claude Duval when he had been placed upon his horse by his two companions, was next made, but these ceased after they had followed them for a few yards.

They were unanimously of opinion that a struggle had taken place, though what evidence there was of it we know not.

Still, that was their impression.

They were of opinion, too, and in this they were indisputably correct, that the struggle had only taken place a short time before—an hour they thought at most.

To men who had been ordered out upon what they had been led to believe was dangerous service, but who hitherto had met with nothing to vary the dull monotony of patrolling up and down a lonely country road, this discovery which they had just made was quite an interesting one, and, for the mere desire of having something to do, and something to occupy their thoughts with, they set about making a vigorous search all around.

They had already consumed sufficient time in their explorations, and Tom and Jack made the best use of it they could.

Leaving the soldiers to prosecute their search along the road for something which should elucidate the mystery of the pools of blood, we will return to the proceedings of the two highwaymen.

When they heard the shout, they made sure that, in another moment, their foes would be upon them; and, stimulated by this impression, they made still greater speed.

They were well aware of the importance of their gaining the shelter of the trees unseen.

If they did so, they had a secure hiding-place; if not, they would only have the meagre benefit which the cover would afford them in an encounter.

Owing to the position of the hedgerows, which happened to run most conveniently for them, they were able to keep on their course without being exposed to the view of any persons who might be in the road they had so lately left.

This was very fortunate for them.

Had they been compelled to cross the open meadows to reach their destination, instead of being able to creep along under the hedges as they did, they would inevitably have been seen by the dragoons, many of whom stood up in the stirrups, and took as long a look round the country as they from their elevated position could.

For the reason just given, however, they failed to see our friends, who were effectually screened from all such observation.

With all steadiness and speed the two highwaymen continued their melancholy journey towards the little wood, which seemed to mock all the attempts they made to approach it, and to recede as they advanced.

This, however, was the effect of their own anxious minds.

Gradually they were nearing their much-wished-for destination.

All sounds from the rear had ceased, and they began to indulge themselves in the hope that they should be able to get off undiscovered.

It was a very narrow escape, for, had the mist continued much longer than it had, or had they any longer delayed the removal of the body, the dragoons would have been upon them before they could have got out of sight.

At length our friends reached a spot where there were no longer any hedgerows to cover the route they took.

They had reached a large piece of barren, uncultivated ground, with which the little wood appeared to be surrounded.

This they would have to cross.

The distance was not great, but all the way there was not so much as a shrub to shield them from observation.

Perceiving this, Tom King, who led the way, very prudently came to a halt, and resolved to reconnoitre before he went any further.

With this intention, he pulled aside some of the twigs in the hedge, and, peering through, endeavoured to ascertain whether anyone was in sight,

But, though he looked closely and carefully in every direction, he was not able to see anyone.

Fancying that it was now safe for them to cross this open space, Tom King once more took hold of the horses by their bridles, and the little procession once more started on its way.

Three minutes, or even less, sufficed to enable them to cross this piece of waste land, which apparently encircled the wood like a belt.

Quite a gush of joy came over their hearts when they found themselves fairly under the friendly shadow of the trees; but, before they pushed on into the interior, Tom King again paused, and, having taken up a requisite position, looked long and keenly in the direction they had come

With his eye he was easily able to follow the route which they had so lately travelled, even to the gate through which they had passed on quitting the high road; for the little wood was situated upon an eminence commanding an extensive prospect, and which caused it to be a conspicuous object for many miles round.

Although his scrutiny was so close and searching, Tom King was unable to see anything that was at all calculated to raise any feeling of alarm; and, with his heart relieved on this score at least, he struck at random into the wood, being intent only upon reaching some place of concealment.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXII.

TOM KING AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ARE INTERRUPTED IN THEIR MELANCHOLY TASK OF DIGGING A GRAVE FOR CLAUDE DUVAL.

He was fully impressed with the importance of doing this with as little loss of time as possible, not only on account of his pursuers, if such they were, but upon the account of Claude Duval.

He was anxious to satisfy himself that he was really dead, for he did not feel disposed to take that unpleasant fact for granted.

In fact, he would much rather remain sceptical upon the point until furnished with some more positive proof than he had at present.

There was, however, very little in the appearance of his comrade to inspire hope, for he had not, up to the present moment, shown the least signs of vitality.

Wrapped up in the coats which his two companions had so hastily placed round him, he looked a strange object, and no mass of inert matter could have laid across the saddle more helplessly than he did.

The trees in this little wood did not grow very closely together, and they met with little or no difficulty in leading the horses onward.

The ground rose rapidly beneath their feet, which was the chief thing they had to contend against.

The wood was, in fact, nothing more than a conical-shaped hill, overgrown with trees; so that, no matter at what part it was entered, the ground had a rapid upward tendency.

In spite of this, Tom King went on.

He was anxious to get as far away from the outskirts as he could, which would lessen the danger of discovery; he was in hopes, too, of shortly finding that the trees would stand more closely together, and afford a better chance for concealment.

In this, however, he was disappointed.

There was little or no undergrowth, such as is generally found in a wood; for the most part, short, sweet herbage took its place, and the trunks of the trees were, upon an average, two yards apart.

Notwithstanding this, the hill, when seen from a distance, seemed clothed with verdure from the base to the summit.

This was because the trees were evergreens, and with large leafy branches.

Up this steep ascent, then, our friends toiled—Tom King with the bridles of the horses in his hands, and leading the way, Sixteen-String Jack holding the body of Claude Duval upon the horse, and so overcome with grief as to be only partially conscious of whither he was being led.

Claude had been his intimate associate for so long a period that no one losing their nearest and dearest relative on earth would have felt the parting more keenly than he did.

From the rear no sounds of an alarming character reached their ears, and Tom King began to congratulate himself upon the circumstance of having entirely eluded the observation of those who were so close behind him on the road.

Suddenly a faint ejaculation of surprise came from Tom's lips, and, startled by the sound, Sixteen-String Jack looked up.

He, too, was astonished at the strange view before him.

The summit of the conical hill was reached.

A circular piece of ground, about twenty feet in diameter, upon which no trees grew, appeared.

It was covered with grass, and here and there were a few small, stunted shrubs.

It took but another moment for the little party to reach this level place.

They advanced to the centre of it, and then, pausing, looked about them.

Tom King then found his previous ideas fully verified.

Round them, in an irregular circle, grew a tall belt of trees, and the place upon which they stood was not only the summit of the hill, but the centre of the wood.

From the belt of trees by which they were environed the ground gradually sloped down to the level country.

It was a singular piece of natural scenery, and, being so, we have taken the trouble to particularly describe it.

Satisfied by the hasty glance they cast around them, Tom and Jack now turned all their attention to their comrade.

With great care he was lifted off the horse, and laid at full length upon the soft turf.

This done, Tom King took the three horses, and, leading them to a distance, tethered them to a tree in such a manner that they were able to crop the soft, sweet herbage.

He then returned to Sixteen-String Jack.

Claude Duval had been laid upon the ground with his face upturned to the sky.

Sixteen-String Jack was kneeling down beside him, and looking with a pained expression into his countenance.

This was as white and inanimate in its appearance as a marble statue.

The eyes were still blindly staring open, and covered with a glassy film; the teeth were still tightly clenched together.

The whole of his body was quite cold and rigid.

That he was quite dead there could be very little doubt, and yet both his comrades were loath in the extreme to admit it.

They would not, could not, believe in the possibility of such a thing.

Tom King observed the anguish of Sixteen-String Jack, and said not a word; but, going to the other side of the prostrate form, he knelt down and took hold of one of Claude's hands.

It was quite cold.

He placed his fingers on his wrist, but was unable to detect the least fluttering of pulse.

He let go the hand with a deep sigh.

It fell like a stone upon the ground, assuming precisely the same position.

In a voice, broken by emotion, Tom said—

"Jack, my friend, what is to be done? Alas, I fear that all is over, and that our gallant comrade is no more."

Sixteen-String Jack made no reply, but, burying his face in his hands, uttered a deep groan.

Tom leaned forward, and tearing open Claude's apparel, placed his hand upon his breast, immediately above the region of the heart.

Here he fancied he could detect some little warmth; but in this circumstance there was little hope, for, as he well knew, the heart and the parts surrounding it did not grow entirely cold until some hours after the spirit had fled.

He was anxious to know whether any beating could be distinguished.

But all was still, and he was at length forced to the conclusion that his heart had ceased to beat.

All, then, was over.

He withdrew his hand.

Jack still kept his face covered.

Tom addressed him,

"Cheer up, my friend; such grief as you exhibit, though a worthy tribute to your respect for your old comrade, is quite unavailing. It becomes our duty now to look to ourselves. We can do nothing for Claude, poor fellow; he is far beyond the reach of our aid. But we are surrounded with danger, and it is a duty we owe ourselves to look to our own safety and preservation. Cheer up, then, my friend, and let us do the best we can."

Sixteen-String Jack, thus addressed, removed his hands and looked Tom King full in the face, who was pained to a degree to witness the grief-stricken appearance which it exhibited.

"Tom," said Sixteen-String Jack, holding out his hand as he spoke, "let us part. As you justly say, you have your own safety to look to; as for me, my place is here, by the side of my old comrade and friend, and here I will remain, in spite of every obstacle."

Tom King looked at him with mingled grief and surprise.

"Jack," he said, "this is madness! But I can excuse you, for I know the causes which have produced it. It is not solely my own safety which I wish to seek, but yours as well, my friend. Can you forget the troop of horsemen who were so close behind us on the road? They may have got upon our track, and if so, they will be shortly here. Then what is to be done? Because your old comrade is dead, would you be content to resign yourself and his body into the hands of our enemies? Never! We must defend ourselves. I can pardon you for allowing your grief to obtain a brief mastery over your faculties, but now you must rouse yourself, and do that which is best."

Tom paused, expecting Jack to make some reply.

But he continued silent.

Undaunted, however, Tom King renewed his solicitations.

"We can do nothing for Claude now," he continued. "It lies in the power of no man to recall the dead to life. We have only one sad, mournful duty to perform. You comprehend it. It is to consign his body to the earth, and thus prevent the authorities from wreaking any indignity upon his lifeless remains. Surely, you would make an effort to prevent such an occurrence as that. Rouse yourself, then, and assist me to dig his grave! Alas! it grieves me quite as much as it does you to think that is the best service we can render him."

While Tom spoke thus energetically his companion became more himself,

Totteringly he rose to his feet.

In a broken voice, he said—

"You are right, you are right. It was weak and foolish of me, but——"

He ceased abruptly.

His sobs prevented further speech.

Impatiently he dashed his hand across his eyes, and endeavoured to repress his rising emotion.

"Come," he said, "I will help you. Claude now is no longer able to defend himself, and it is our duty, as you say, to prevent any indignity being wreaked upon his remains. We must not allow him to fall into the hands of his enemies. I am ready to assist you."

Tom was pleased to find that he had so far succeeded in rousing his companion.

He looked about him for a spot which would answer his purpose.

Then, crossing the little circular space, he halted beneath the wide-spreading branches of one of the largest of the trees that fringed the enclosure.

Jack understood him, and, after casting one glance upon Claude's lifeless form, followed him.

Not another word was said.

They had no better tools for digging a grave than the swords they wore by their sides, but it was by no means the first time they had turned them to such a use

Tom King now traced the outline of the grave with the point of his sword, and began removing the turf in such a manner as to enable him to replace it as it had been found, and so as not to excite any suspicion that the ground had been disturbed.

This was a work of time, but at length the task was completed.

It was now high time, Tom thought, to reconnoitre.

Accordingly, he threw down his sword, and, leaving his companion to commence the excavation of the grave, he prepared to climb the tree beneath whose shade he had been at work.

It was of considerable altitude, and, from its position on the summit of the hill, he doubted not that he should be able to obtain a very extensive prospect of the surrounding country.

The tree was one easily to be climbed.

As he stood upon the ground, he could reach the lowest branch, and, taking hold of this, he drew himself up with little difficulty.

With great agility, he made his way from bough to bough, until he judged he had reached a height sufficient for his purpose.

Standing upon one of the upper limbs of the tree, and retaining himself in this position by grasping a branch above his head with his left hand, Tom King looked keenly around him.

All, however, as far as he could see—and that was over many a mile of cultivated country—was peaceful and tranquil.

No trace of any human beings resembling those whose approach he had to dread met his view.

He turned round and looked upon the scenery upon all sides of him.

Suddenly his eyes were attracted by a faint glitter.

Looking more closely and earnestly, he perceived, upon a broad road at some distance, a troop of mounted soldiers.

They were those from whom he had so narrow an escape while in the lane; but this he knew not.

He gazed upon them attentively, being anxious to ascertain whether they were approaching or receding.

While in doubt upon this point a sudden turn in the road hid them from his sight, and he saw them no more.

Having made this discovery, he at once prepared to descend the tree.

The soldiers, even if their presence in that sparsely-populated district was connected with them, were so far off that a long time must elapse before they could reach the hill.

During that interval they would, he calculated, have ample time to perform their melancholy duty.

Upon reaching the ground, he found that Sixteen-String Jack had already dug to a considerable depth beneath the surface.

He had found this active exertion to be a relief to his over-wrought feelings.

In a few words Tom made him acquainted with the result of his reconnoitering, and requested him to stand aside for a little while, and he would relieve him in his toil.

This, at first, Jack refused to do, but in the end Tom prevailed upon him to accede to his request.

Tom King then leaped into the grave and commenced turning out the soil with great rapidity, for he knew the sooner the job was over the better it would be, for more reasons than one.

Sixteen-String Jack, meanwhile, had crossed the open space again to where his dead comrade lay.

Again he knelt down by his side, and soon became oblivious of all that was happening around him.

On his side, Tom King was so fully occupied with what he was about, and with his own reflections, that he heard not the stealthy approach of many footsteps, nor yet the occasional crackling of dry twigs, which denoted their progress.

Suddenly, however, there was a loud cry which struck upon the ears of both the highwaymen with startling effect, and, before they could recover from their surprise, they found themselves surrounded by a dense throng of persons.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIII.

TOM KING AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAVE A REMARKABLE ADVENTURE IN THE WOOD.

THE first impulse of both the highwaymen, upon making this astounding discovery, was to place themselves in an attitude of defence; but this, they found, they were not capable of doing effectually.

Tom King had his sword already in his grasp, and he held it before him in such a manner as to enable him to ward off a blow. But then he was at a disadvantage.

He was standing in the grave, which was at least three feet deep, and the new-comers surrounded the brink of it in a moment.

He was then completely at their mercy.

As for Sixteen-String Jack, when he left the grave to throw himself upon his knee by the side of Clande's body, he had not even taken his sword with him, but left it sticking up in the ground, near the mound of upturned soil.

He was then defenceless, and before he could spring to his feet he was completely hemmed in.

Nevertheless, he started up, and, unprovided with the means of defending himself against a host, as he was, he placed himself beside the body of his slain comrade in an attitude to do battle with anyone who approached him too closely.

But the new-comers did not attempt to advance.

They contented themselves with standing round him in a dense throng, and at a respectful distance.

A glance at their forms was sufficient to show both Tom King and Jack that it was not their enemies who had so suddenly made their appearance.

The garb they wore in no way resembled that of either a police-officer or a soldier, though it was quite as distinctive.

The throng was composed both of men and women.

The total number was probably thirty.

There was not one unarmed.

They held in their grasp either a long dagger-like knife, or else a formidable bludgeon.

Their attitudes were threatening in the extreme, though, at the same time, their countenances expressed astonishment.

Then from among the crowd which surrounded Sixteen-String Jack and the body of Claude Duval, a man advanced.

He halted within a few paces of the former, who looked at him with an inquisitive glance.

This man, who stepped forward, seemed to be of an age almost patriarchal.

His hair was silvery white, and hung down over his shoulders in waving masses.

His beard, of the same hue, reached almost to his waist.

But notwithstanding these indications of extreme age, he held his body with great erectness; and it was in the manner of one habituated to command over others that he stood before Sixteen-String Jack.

His face was thin and wrinkled, and of a deep brown tint.

His whole form was very spare, and his great height and erect attitude made this more noticeable than it would have been had his stature been less.

Although in his whole frame there was not a superfluous ounce of flesh, yet all his bones were well covered with muscle, and he was, doubtless, in possession of unusual strength.

With his left hand he grasped a long staff, not unlike the quarter-staff, which was so favourite a weapon with our Saxon forefathers.

His eyes were bright and piercing, and he fixed them with inquiring keenness upon Jack's countenance, who, however, returned his gaze with equal firmness.

The attitude of the remainder of this throng, when the old man stepped forward, was submissive to a degree, and each one fixed his eyes upon him in order to obey the slightest movement he should make.

After bending upon Jack the inquisitive glance, as we have recorded, the old man spoke.

His voice was clear and sonorous, but it had a strong foreign accent.

The tones in which the words were uttered indicated both sternness and displeasure.

"Who are you?" he asked; "and what want you here?"

"Before I reply to that question," said Sixteen-String Jack, boldly, "I must know by what authority you ask it. At present I cannot see what better title you have to be here than myself."

The old man started back in surprise, as though unaccustomed to be spoken to with so little deference.

"What right had you," continued Sixteen-String Jack, "to rush in and surround us as you have done? We were in no way interfering with you."

"Down with him! down with him!" cried the motley crew, accompanying their words with menacing gestures.

The old man held up his hand, and in a moment, as if by magic, everyone became still.

"You speak with little respect," said the old man, addressing Jack. "Do you realize the fact that your life is in my hands, to take at any moment I think proper?"

"I do not. Your numbers are superior to us, and in an encounter we might, probably, be slain; that is, if all of you were cowardly enough to attack two men who have done nothing to provoke your hostility."

"You speak with singular boldness," said the old man, in whose manner Jack fancied he could detect something akin to admiration. "But with regard to having done nothing to provoke our hostility, there you are in error. You have done this."

"How? in what manner?" asked Sixteen-String Jack, in the utmost surprise.

"You have infringed one of our laws, and the penalty of that infringement is death."

"Yes, death!" echoed the wild throng around, and again their gestures became violent and menacing to a degree.

The old man, however, must have exercised over them some singular power, for they grew calm again the moment he uplifted his hand.

Then addressing himself to Sixteen-String Jack, he said—

"You have, doubtless, heard much but know little respecting Zingari—that race which always keeps to itself, and never dwells beneath a roof."

"Gipsies!" ejaculated Jack.

"Such is the name by which you English know us, and it serves as well as any other. But we are Zingaris. Our race is numerous, and we are all bound to each other by bonds we dare not break without incurring the direst consequences."

"But," said Jack, who was now perfectly calm and collected, "what has all this to do with me? Look yonder; surrounded by another portion of your crew, is my companion."

He pointed towards Tom King as he spoke, and all eyes followed the direction of his finger.

"You have taken him at unawares," added Jack. "You see he is in the earth up to his waist. Your band surround the brink of the pit, and he is unable to effectually defend himself."

"What does he here?" sternly demanded the old man.

"I ask again, by what authority do you put this question?"

"I was about to tell you, but you refused to listen."

"You told me you were gipsies."

"I told you we were a portion of that numerous race, which is dispersed all over England. We are wanderers, and have no place of settled abode; we wander whithersoever our fancy dictates. But we are bound together by universal laws which we are bound to recognise. One of them is, that a member or representative of every family should, once in every nine years, repair to this spot here to meet, to prostrate themselves before their king, and renew their oath of allegiance. This is the appointed and important day, and here, you see, we have assembled."

"But," interrupted Jack, "I"——

"Hear me out," said the old man, interrupting him in his turn. "For centuries immemorial the open space upon the summit of this hill has been the place where this important ceremony has taken place. From those remote ages, of which I have just spoken, a law has descended to us; that law decrees that, should we, on the day in the ninth year when the meeting is to take place, find upon this spot one or more of the house-dwellers, their lives should pay the forfeit of the intrusion. Now do you understand?"

"I understand your words perfectly well," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but I most resolutely refuse to recognise your power."

"Beware," said the old man, in a stern voice, which was echoed by an angry cry from those who eagerly crowded round.

"Beware of what?"

"I tell you, again, your life is in our hands. By the laws of our race it is forfeit to us."

"It will not be given up without a struggle," said Jack, coolly; "and now, as you have had your say, I must request you to attend to me."

"You are bold."

"Why should I not be? Listen."

The old man felt constrained to do so.

He could not but look upon Jack with admiration at the courage he displayed.

Jack spoke.

"You see this body here," and he pointed to the body of Claude Duval; "I and my companion, pursued by our enemies, brought it to this place, in the hope, first that he was not dead, and then, finding he had ceased to exist, to bury him here. When you abruptly broke upon this spot, you found me kneeling by the side of the corpse, and my companion yonder digging the grave. You outnumber us, but, although such is the case, you need not delude yourself into the idea that we shall tamely submit to be put to death because a sanguinary law has been handed down to you. I give you warning that, if you advance a step further to execute your purpose, I shall defend myself to the utmost, and, though I have little hope of achieving a victory, yet, before I am slain, I shall be able to wreak more mischief upon you than you may consider at all agreeable. And now I have spoken. Do as you think proper."

As he concluded this very daring and defiant speech, Sixteen-String Jack folded his arms across his breast, and gazed calmly upon the crowd of swarthy, angry faces by which he was surrounded.

His address evidently produced a great effect upon the old man, and he remained for a few moments in silent thought.

"You have spoken falsely," he said, at length.

"I have not," returned Jack, angrily.

"I say you have."

"In what particular?"

"That is not a corpse which lies at your feet."

When he heard these words Jack started as though he had been struck by a bullet.

The old man had spoken clearly, and his words reached, with the utmost distinctness, the ears of Tom King, who had also heard the whole of the preceding conversation.

Those around, however, were not prepared for the effect which this last statement had upon him.

He gave one spring, and leaped out of the grave.

So suddenly was this done, that no one was in time to prevent him.

He whirled his sword round his head, and, as they heard the keen weapon whistle through the air, they all instinctively drew back.

In three bounds Tom King was beside Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

He burst through the ring with which they were encircled before a hand could be raised to prevent him.

Then, standing over the prostrate body of his comrade, he cried—

"Who is it that says he is not dead, and by what authority does he make the statement?"

"I say it!" said the old man as he stalked forward a few steps, with a majestic air, "and my authority is the truth. That is not a corpse."

"Do you mean to say, by that, that my comrade is alive?"

"I do."

"Then I thank you from my heart for such a piece of intelligence, though I hardly dare believe it to be true."

"You may rely upon it. My eye is old and dim, perchance, but it does not deceive me."

"Then it was a blessed chance that brought you here," said Sixteen-String Jack, "or we should have consigned him to that most terrible of all fates—premature interment."

"Is this really so?"

"It is."

"Who are you, then?"

"It would be dangerous to proclaim ourselves, for a price is set upon our heads."

"By the house-dwellers?"

"Yes."

"Then I can spare you. I seek to know no more. Under these circumstances you are clearly no house-dwellers, but outcasts from them. This enables me to set aside the law of which I have spoken, but there is no other person, besides myself, who has the power to do so."

"Accept our thanks, then," said Tom King, seizing him by the hands. "For my own part, I can perceive no signs of vitality about our comrade; but I know your race hold possession of many secrets connected with life and death, and therefore I place reliance upon what you say."

"You may do so safely," said the old man, with a pleased expression of countenance.

"Restore, then, my friend to life," said Tom King, "and ask of me anything you like in return."

"I will do so," said the old man, if only for the courage your companion has exhibited. I must, however, attach one condition."

"You have only to name it for it to be complied with."

"It is that you keep profoundly secret all that has already come under your observation, and all that may futurely do so while you are with us."

"That we promise readily, and it will go hard with us if we do not find some more substantial mode of testifying to our gratitude."

"It is needless," said the old man, who then turned round and addressed some energetic words to those assembled, in a language which was quite unknown to our two friends.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIV.

THE GIPSY WOMAN RESTORES CLAUDE DUVAL TO CONSCIOUSNESS, AND GIVES UTTERANCE TO A WARNING AND A PREDICTION.

THE whole of the occurrences which we have related at full length in the preceding chapter took place with such rapidity, and were, in themselves, of so bewildering a character, that Tom and Jack found their ideas in a state of great confusion.

By degrees they recovered the use of their faculties, and divided their attention between the body of their companion and the weird-like events which were occurring around them.

They were unable to form the least idea about what the old man said, but, let it be what it would, it met with immediate obedience.

From this, they argued, that the influence of this strange old man was very great indeed.

Like nearly everyone else, Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack had heard plenty about gipsies, and had occasionally encountered them; yet the amount of actual knowledge which they possessed upon the subject was very small indeed.

Of one fact, however, they were well aware, and that was, that certain members of this romantic race were acquainted with strange secrets in the healing art; and that, where wounds were concerned, instances were innumerable where they had effected a cure after the best surgical aid had failed.

This was more particularly the case at the commencement of the last century, when the science of medicine was very far indeed from the position to which it has since attained.

Therefore, although they could not see the least signs of life about Claude, yet they took the old man's word that he was not dead.

Great as might be the authority of the old man, this last command of his, although it was obeyed, was done so reluctantly.

The majority would much rather have obeyed the sanguinary law enforced by their ancestors.

The account which the old man had given of their strange meeting in that place was unquestionably correct.

Once every nine years, in accordance with immemorial custom, one member of each family had to present himself upon this spot, no matter how far he might happen to be distant from it, or what difficulties might intervene.

If any family omitted to send a representative, they were no longer considered as belonging to the true Zingari.

What was the object sought to be attained by this novennial meeting, would be hard to say; doubtless it was intended by the projectors to be a means by which these wanderers might preserve some of the characteristics belonging to distinctive races.

Be the object, however, what it might, it was this novennial meeting which had brought the gipsies together on this occasion.

One more word of explanation, and we have done.

The old man we have so often mentioned occupied the position and title of the king of the Zingari.

This title and position were hereditary, and had been faithfully transmitted from father to son.

As the whole tribe only united once every nine years, it was only on these distant occasions that the king was able to exercise the authority which devolved upon him.

It was probably this circumstance which caused him to be so implicitly obeyed.

The children, too, were taught by their parents, from their tenderest years, to obey the king in all things.

It was a strange fancy for these outcasts to have a king, but doubtless they felt it added to their importance.

The sceptre, however, was a barren one to the possessor of it.

The present king was a man who happened to be gifted by nature with sentiments more human than generally fell to the lot of his subjects; and to this we may attribute his manifest inclination to save the lives of Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack, as was demonstrated by the readiness with which he twisted the circumstance of their no longer having claim to the title of house-dweller in their favour.

The reader is now in a position to comprehend what follows, and we at once resume.

When the gipsy king had uttered these words of command to his subjects, they dispersed, and no longer showed any manifestations of hostility.

There were many, however, who bent upon our friends a ferocious glance.

The old man now pronounced a single word which sounded like a name—at least, it was the manner in which it was pronounced, more than aught else, which induced this belief in the minds of our friends.

It was confirmed by their shortly afterwards seeing a woman approach, who presented every appearance of extreme age.

She had long outlived the brief space of time allowed for human life.

She supported her steps by means of a stout stick.

She made her way up to the gipsy king, and stood in an attitude of great deference before him, as though awaiting his instructions.

Her whole frame trembled like an aspen in consequence of her extreme age.

Tom King and Jack looked at her with the greatest curiosity and attention.

It was in vain, however, that they listened to the instructions which were given her.

They were uttered in a peculiar language, which might as well have been Greek for all the information which it conveyed to their ears.

The old woman, however, understood them readily enough, since the language in which they were spoken was the dialect of the tribe.

As soon as the old man had finished addressing her she made a deep obeisance, and then, turning round, hobbled towards the spot where Claude Duval still lay upon the ground, and, for aught our friends could tell to the contrary, quite dead.

The old woman knelt down beside him, and, having removed his clothing sufficiently for her purpose, placed her ear upon his heart and listened intently.

Apparently satisfied with this examination, she said something to two young men, who immediately disappeared.

This old woman fulfilled the functions of surgeon-physician to the tribe, and was reputed to be possessed of more than ordinary skill in the treatment of wounds and external hurts.

[DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS ARE ATTACKED IN THE CAVERN BY THE DRAGOONS.]

The two young men she had despatched quickly returned, one bringing water and the other some kind of unguent and bandages, such as would be required to dress a wound.

The first thing the woman did was to wash away the mass of coagulated blood, which entirely covered the orifice of the wound from observation.

When this was done, Claude did not present half such a terrible spectacle.

We need not tell the reader with what intentness Tom King and Jack watched every movement.

As soon as the congealed blood was removed, the old woman commenced an examination of the wounds, and by the way she set about doing this, our friends could tell she was no stranger to her work.

A strange cry came from her lips, and she looked up to the countenances of the two highwaymen.

In tolerably good English she said, with the greatest surprise perceptible in her tones,—

"Is it possible you thought him dead?"

"We did, indeed, think so," replied Tom King, "and were filled with grief on that account. But why do you speak in so surprised a manner?"

"Because I cannot account for your having fallen into such a mistake!"

"Mistake?"

"Yes, mistake. It is true he has received a wound from a pistol-shot, but it has done him little harm."

The two highwaymen looked incredulous.

"Speak," they both cried, as with one voice; "explain yourself!"

"See here," said the old woman. "The bullet struck here," and she touched Claude upon the breast as she spoke, "but it did not enter. Of course, had it done so, the wound would have been mortal, but it struck against the bone and then glanced off. It has inflicted a long, ugly gash, but has really done no further mischief. Owing, perhaps, to some strange position of the body, an immense quantity of blood has flowed from this wound, and your friend now lies in this miserable state for the want of it."

"And is it possible," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, who hardly dared believe in this sudden reverse of fortune, "is it possible he is in nothing but a swoon from loss of blood?"

"That is all," replied the old woman; "and, if you will leave him in my care, you will soon find him as well as ever he was."

Prepared as he was for this welcome intelligence, Sixteen-String Jack was almost overcome by it.

He had begun to mourn for Claude as dead, and to look upon him as no longer belonging to this life.

To hear that he had only been insensible from loss of blood was, indeed, startling intelligence to our friends.

There was no doubt, however, as to the veracity of what the old woman told them.

They could see for themselves that the bullet had not penetrated his chest, but had struck obliquely upon a bone, and glanced off, leaving a deep gash to mark its course.

From this blood had flowed in prodigious quantities, and it was this immense loss of the vital fluid which produced those appearances which we can scarcely feel surprised at Tom and Jack taking for death itself.

Great, now, was their joy upon receiving so favourable an account of Claude's condition, and they now watched every proceeding of the old woman's with redoubled interest.

Fortunate, indeed, was it for all concerned that this strange encounter with the gipsies had taken place; for, had it not have happened, the probability is Claude Duval would have been buried alive, as the contiguity of the troop of dragoons would have caused them to hurry over their melancholy task.

Happily, all this was averted.

Having removed from the wound every morsel of extraneous matter, the old woman dressed it with the ointment which had been brought her.

Then, with surprising skill, she bandaged it up, assuring our friends, as she did so, that the wound, being only a superficial one, would require no further attention, except that the bandages should not be removed until it was thoroughly healed.

All this time, however, Claude Duval remained in the same state of death-like torpor; and how it was the gipsy king had told at glance that he was alive seemed a mystery.

It might be that, in his long life, he had had opportunities of comparing the difference between death and insensibility.

Be that, however, as it may, his statement was proved to be correct.

Having properly attended to the wound, the old woman now proceeded to restore Claude to consciousness.

From the breast of her gown she produced a small bottle of green glass, which was partially filled with some sort of milky-looking liquid.

Removing the stopper, she held the open mouth of the vial close under Claude's nose.

For a moment no effect was produced, but, at the end of that time, the two highwaymen were pleased to perceive a slight movement of the body, and then a faint sigh came from their wounded comrade's lips.

They would have pressed forward and spoken to him, but the old woman would not permit them to approach.

"He is now in a state of extreme weakness, and great caution must be used," she said. "Wait a moment until I have done."

As she spoke, she took up a bottle which had been brought along with the ointment and bandages.

It contained a somewhat thick fluid of a bright crimson colour.

This she suffered to let fall drop by drop into Claude's mouth, who possessed just sufficient strength and sense to swallow these small quantities.

This fluid the old woman continued to administer drop by drop, until the patience of our friends was fairly exhausted; but still she kept on, until the bottle was drained of its last drop.

Next, taking some of the cold water, she caused him to swallow it.

This done, she drew back to watch the effect.

Gradually Claude's eyes closed, and he dropped off into a profound sleep.

When she was sure that the potion had fairly taken effect, the old woman turned round to our two friends and thus addressed them—

"This sleep," she said, "will probably last many hours; I cannot say how many, as that depends entirely upon circumstances. On no account, however, must his slumber be broken. He must be kept perfectly quiet, and allowed to wake of his own accord. When he does this, you will find he has recovered a considerable portion of his lost strength, and it will hourly increase. As for the wound, as that is merely in the flesh, you need not trouble anything further about it. It will get well of itself, and with rest he will soon recover his strength. But the faculty of looking into the future is given to me, and, as you are his friends, bid him, when he awakes, to beware of the next wound he receives, as it will assuredly be a mortal one."

CHAPTER CCCLXXXV.

CLAUDE DUVAL TAKES ONE MORE GLANCE AT THIS WORLD.

It was the peculiar circumstances under which this prediction was uttered that caused it to produce the effect it did upon the minds of Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack.

At any other time they would have laughed at the idea of the old decrepit woman before them having the gift or power of fortelling events—especially if the prediction had been uttered by itself.

But she had been speaking of Claude's condition, and telling them how he would awake; then, more in the manner of a friendly caution than aught else, she uttered the remarkable words with which the last chapter concluded.

As soon as she had spoken she rose to her feet, and, mingling with those assembled, was in a moment lost to sight.

Upon looking around them, our friends found that the number of the gipsies had very much increased during the time that they had been watching the old woman's proceedings, and fresh arrivals kept continually taking place.

Tom and Jack would have mingled with the throng, and singled out the old woman, to whom they wished to give some more substantial token of their gratitude than mere words, but they were prevented by the gipsy king, who placed himself directly in their path.

"Whither go you?" he said.

"To see the woman who has dressed our comrade's wounds, in order that we may reward her for what she has done."

"No reward is required, young man," said the gipsy king. "What she has done has been done freely."

"Still"——

"Attend to me, if you please," interrupted the old man. "You are here upon sufferance only, and you must be content to do as you are bidden. In the first place, then, you may take my word for it that the condition of your friend is by no means serious, and when he awakes from his sleep he will be almost himself again."

"Those are most welcome words to us," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for we had already mourned for him as one dead, and we are proportionably overjoyed to find that he is yet alive. It is for this reason that we would fain do something to testify our gratitude."

"I am about to afford you an opportunity," said the gipsy king.

"Speak! You have only to tell us what it is, and it will be done."

"In the first place, then, I shall require you to take a solemn oath of secrecy, not only as to what you have witnessed in this place, but all you have been told in explanation; for I need scarcely tell you that the secret of our meeting on this spot is known to no other housedwellers than yourselves."

"We will readily take any oath you may think fit to propose."

"That is well, then. And now, in the second place, although you are here, we cannot allow you to remain and be a witness of the ceremonies which are performed on this occasion. Some of our race will construct a kind of litter of the boughs of these trees, and, placing your comrade upon it, will carry him to the base of the hill, where you must promise to remain and watch him."

"To all this we readily consent. If you will have the litter constructed, we will carry him down the hill ourselves."

"Nay, nay; for reasons of our own we will do that, too."

The gipsy-king then turned round and addressed a few words of command to some young men who were standing at no great distance.

These the highwaymen conjectured to be connected with the construction of the litter, and such proved to be the case, for the young men set about hastily lopping off several of the lowest branches.

In a very short time they had sufficient for their purpose, and they weaved them into a litter with very great skill indeed.

As soon as it was ready they placed it down by the side of Claude, and, with the greatest care and gentleness, lifted him upon it.

The next thing was to carry it down the hill, which they did with the same amount of care.

Tom and Jack followed it; but not until they had expressed their thanks to the gipsy-king—not only for having saved their lives, but also for his attention to Claude Duval.

Then they freely took the oath which he proposed to them, after having done which, they descended the hill again very willingly, leaving the gipsies to perform their mystic ceremonies unobserved.

Neither of them had forgotten the soldiers which Tom had seen in the distance from the summit of the tree, but so long a time had elapsed since then without their making their appearance, that they very correctly came to the conclusion that they were retreating when they saw them.

The lower part of the hill seemed, then, quite as likely to afford them the shelter they needed as the upper portion of it.

The litter was deposited upon the ground, and Claude was allowed to remain in it.

The horses, too, were then brought down and tethered close at hand.

The gipsies then left them, though not until they had received a reward from our friends.

Tom and Jack watched the gipsies out of sight, and then the former turning to the latter said—

"Well, Jack, I think, of all the strange adventures I have ever had, this is the strangest."

"Unquestionably," said Jack. "I never before knew anything like it."

"I have heard many strange things concerning the gipsies, but never anything to surpass or even equal this."

"The most surprising thing is the coincidences," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"In the first place, there was our selecting the wooded hill as our place of concealment; and then, to think that when we arrived there was upon the occasion, in the space of nine years, when the gipsies repair to it."

"It seems more strange the more we reflect upon it."

"It does, indeed; but most of all do I rejoice in the discovery that Claude is still left to be among us. I confess at times I can hardly believe in the reality of such good fortune."

"I am puzzled to think how the gipsy king could have told at a glance the difference between death and a state of insensibility."

"That seems very surprising."

"And he was right."

"Did you notice one thing the old woman said?"

"What? About Claude taking care how he received his second wound?"

"No, that is not what I meant just then."

"What?"

"In speaking of the wound, she said it had bled copiously, but doubtless that the flow of blood had been increased by his body having remained for some time in a position calculated to drain it of blood."

"Yes, she said that."

"And then think of the position in which we found Claude."

"It was certainly just what she seemed to indicate."

"Just. His foot being in the stirrup, and his head upon the ground, the blood was naturally drained out of his body."

"You must recollect, my friend, that at present we have no idea how it was that Claude came to be in the state in which we found him."

"I know we have not, and we shall have to wait patiently until he wakes before we can know."

"His sleep seems very heavy, almost like death."

"It does, except that you can see he is breathing rather heavily."

"I would give a trifle for a box of the wonderful healing ointment which the old woman carried."

"If its virtues are what she represents, it would be invaluable to us."

"It would, indeed."

"I wonder how long Claude will sleep."

"I know not; but I am certain Dick must be full of alarm and agitation at our non-appearance."

"We must contrive to get back to the chase before daybreak to-morrow morning, or he will be setting out in search of us."

"What time is it now?"

"Noon has passed. It will, however, be six hours, at least, before darkness comes; and let us hope, by that time, Claude will awake and be well enough to accompany us. If we started early in the evening, we could travel slowly, and yet reach the chase before dawn."

"So we could."

"That is what we must hope for, then."

In such conversation as this, the two highwaymen whiled away the time during which they watched by the side of their slumbering companion.

Without some such conversation, the time would have passed slowly indeed; and, as it was, they found it hang rather heavily on their hands.

At length, however, they observed that the shadows of the trees grew rapidly longer, and by this they knew the sun was sinking in the west.

In a short time from now it would be dark enough for them to commence their journey; the only thing was, would Claude awake?

The injunction, not on any account to rouse him from his slumber, was urged upon them with too much earnestness for them to think of disobeying it.

At present Claude showed no signs whatever of awaking.

His sleep seemed as profound as it had been at its commencement.

Anxiously his two comrades looked upon him, as well as the fading light would permit, in the hope of being able to see some signs of returning animation.

But none appeared.

Weary with watching, they at last turned away.

The sun sunk, and the brief autumnal twilight which succeeded quickly deepened into night.

Darkness came over all things, and beneath the shadow of the wide-spreading branches of the trees it was profound, and they were unable to distinguish each others' forms.

Fain would they have lighted a fire with some of the dry brushwood which was lying about, and which they could easily have gathered together, but they feared to do so lest it should prove a beacon to their enemies to show them their whereabouts.

For this reason, then, although they had the means of procuring a light, the fire was not ignited.

As the darkness increased they seated themselves as close as they could to the litter upon which the slumbering form of Claude Duval reposed, in order to be aware, by their sense of hearing, the moment when he awoke.

Their patience was put to a severe trial.

Time glided onward, but still he awoke not, and were it not that in the silence of that place they could occasionally hear his somewhat laboured breathing, they would have fancied he was not sleeping but dead.

A circumstance now occurred which afforded them some consolation.
